In the firſt conflict, Horatius Coclus, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tibris; at length feeling himſelfe too faint to ſtand againſt ſo many, cauſed the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the Riuer, like a hunted Stagge, reſrethed his hote ſpirits, and returned ſafe to his fellowes, with the like reſolution to giue a new charge. Porfenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Ianiculus, which is the verie entrance vnto the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, aſſuredly his owne: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the conſtant reſolution of Alatius Scauo's (who hauing by error ſlaine Porfenna his Secretarie, inſtead of the King himſelfe, did in ſcorne of torments threatened, burne off his owne hand) hee thought it not any whit prejudiciall, either to his safetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Arms his sonne, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion hee was, for their chastitie, not for beautie, mourned the losse of him one whole year. For into his place, for the residue of his year, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his room (deceasing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to strive against the streame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about foure-teen years, priuately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law, Mamilus Tusculanus, romaching a fresh at those old repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succour vnto the Tarquines, mulstered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Anlus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistrate greater than Consuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemy; and Cosius or Spurius Casius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recover againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went current, of Cassar and Pollex, two Gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye witnesses of their valour, and fellow helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no object of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselves at home; and the sixteenth year after the Kings expulsion, vpon insigation of some desperate bankrouers, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an vproare in the holy Mount; vntill by Mucenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controuersies, the Consuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement amongst themselves, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsi and Aequi held them longest, who made warre, of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victorie: although, by reason of the pueritie of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would haue bene ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bene no occasion of disparagement, had hee not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, and after judgement, banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsi, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe, which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so farre forth, that hee was come within foure or five miles of the Citie. Incamping there hee made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Countrie, that hee would not relent, by any supplications of Embassadors, vntill his Mother Peturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Countrie, than friends to their sonne and husband, were more auaileable to Rome, then was any force of armes. Hercupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsi, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, hee died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans; against whom the Fabij, three hundred and sixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imployed, as it had been in a priuate quarrell. These Fabij, after some good seruices, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented and all slaine: one only of that whole house, had beene left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proccesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volscij, at the hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Consul, with his whole Armie, had beene discomfited, had not L. Quintus Cincinnatus chosen Dilator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successfull answer to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countrey in the space of sixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volscian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chosen Governours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, and all other Magistracies) would have rauished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captaine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Hereupon the people, in an uproare, took the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrells, or desire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new warre, against the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diueritie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidenates, and vterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integritie than fortitude. For when a Schoole-master, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yielding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him back into the Citie; which forthwith yielded vnto him in reuerence of his iustice. The sieg of Veij was ten yeares, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad vnder beafts skinnes (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vowes neuer to returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoiles, that they consecrated their tenths to Apolla Pythius: and the whole people in general, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his seruice, than before they had beene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequality in diuiding the spoiles: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new peece of seruice, against the furie of the Gauls: who being a populous Countrey, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) liued so long, that the sonnes, destitute of meanes, were enforced to roaue abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their rest: and withall being a Nation valiant in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Roouers ouer many Countreies. Some of them lighting on Italia, set vpon Clusium, a Towne in Hetruria; whereof Rome hauing information (and being careful of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some iniurie offered by the Roman Embassadors, conuerted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giuing a great overthrow to the Romans, by the Riuer Alia, vpon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for vnluckie, and called Allenfis in the Roman Kalendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leauing the citie; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and euery one shifting for himselfe, ere the enemy came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestal Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conuaid away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering their boldnesse out of desperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did seate themselves in T Irones, in their severall houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, which M. Marcius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gauls were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoile, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, that fate in their Majestie, with a graue resolution: having first reuerenced them as Gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the Citie was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of s^{ix}uen Moneths. Once they were like to haue surpris'd it by night, but being discryed by the gaging of Geese, M. Marcius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed vpon: the Gauls being wearie, and the Romans hungrie. The bargaine was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound waight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilst the gold, was in waighing, the Gauls, with open insolencie, made their waights too heauie: Brennus, their Captaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cauiling, came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gauls, with such violence, that hee disperfed their troupes, quenched the fire of the Citie with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoiles with advantage, and forbeare the gold, in accepting which, they had lately bene so nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill success. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Coruinus (each of which in single fight, slew a Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable seruice, was afterwards accepted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to goe to the Vejj to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

 About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Vejj, they changed their gouernment from Consuls to militarie Tribunes. The gouernment of these also, after some yeares, was by ciuill disension interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled: another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Consular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies bee a Plebeian. This was after the building of the Citie, three hundred sixtie six yeares. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares set forth against the warlike Sannites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: situated betwene Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians: their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselves subjects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or what else whatsoeuer to obtaine protection, which the Romans, although both Countries had bene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuour the lesse, easily allowed off; especially aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the aboundance of Come and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The Families of the Papyrij and Fabij were most employed in the managing of this warre, which indured the space of fiftie yeares. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountered by the Sannites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men.

But

But for these losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Sannites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Sannites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) beganne to stirre. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributarie to Rome.

In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce betwene the Romans and Sannites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, so that they required to have 10 one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand, of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betwene them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

84 Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Consuls, whom the Spoth-layers aduertised, that the side should be victorious, which lost the General in fight. Hereupon, Decius the Consull, exposed his life to the Enemy, and purchased victorie (as was beleued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himselfe for his Ar-

20 mie, the sonne of this Decius, being after Consull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Deos, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order, he caused his owne sonne to be put to death, who had slaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged, in single fight.

When the Latines, the Aequi, Volsci, Hetricks, Campani, Sannites, and Hetrurians, 30 with some other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduertured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consull, walking all their Countrey with fire and sword, from the Riuier Nar and Velis, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as Mediators, betwene the Romans and Sannites; with a peremptorie denunciation of warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse the peace by them tendered. These threats, which discouered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Sannites were vtterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their 40 abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained, that certaine ships of theirs were robbed; and sent Embassadors vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucani, Messapians, Brutians, and Apuliens, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Sannites, and other Subjects of Rome, to rebel, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their owne weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aide (being a Grecian; as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominiou of Rome should be 50 confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which already, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

PYRRHVS, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to liue in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wifer Prince would haue desired. He had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdome, to make an offensive warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth, at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that hee might serue to giue some hinderance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing none other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would call themselves vnder his protection. They had in their companie, some of the Sammites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their severall Nations, as much as cou'd be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cyneus his chiefe Counsaillour, asking what he meant to doe after euery of the victories which hee hoped to get: that, hauing wonne Rome, he would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie he would quickly get the Isle of Sicily; that, out of Sicily hee would passe ouer into Africke, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrey; and being strengthened with the force of all these Prouinces, hee would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneus enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cyneus then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could bee contented with his owne.

Nevertheless, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to bee omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie, of almost thirtie thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cyneus, with the rest he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vnterly carelesse to provide for the Warre. Wherefore he was faine to shut vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strickt muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behoouing to their estate.

Which he was occupied with these cares, Lucius the Roman Consul drew near, and beganne to waite Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their owne Countrey; the Sammites were carelesse of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would haue beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude; and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. Hee was now driven, either to set forward, with those that him selfe had brought into Italie, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein wherein little was to be repofed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne fufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had bene fattered by foule weather at Sea, were fafely come to him: with which herfolucd to affay the valour of the Romans, againft whom he proudly marched.

Lanius the Confull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and gaue him battaile, ere all his adherents fhould be readie to joync with him. This boldneffe of the Roman, and the slackneffe of the Meffapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger moft concerned, caufed Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrell, betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Campe; or whether, confidering better at neare diftance, the weight of the bufineffe, which he had taken in hand, he were defirous to quit it with his honour; the fhort anfwere, that was returned to his propofition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans fent him this word, that they had neither chofen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon, both Armies haftened their march vnto the Riuier of Stris: Lanius intending to fight, before the arriuall of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from paffing that Riuier, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the firft view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue difcipline of warre: which caufed him to let a ftrong Corps de garde, vpon the paffage of the riuier, that he might not be compelled to fight, vntill he faw his beft aduantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skillfull in the Art of warre, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Armie entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horfe, at the fame time, beganne to paffe the Riuier, in fundrie places: which caufed the Greekes to forfake the defence of their banke, and fpeedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; where with he thought it beft to prefent them, ere their whole Armie had recouered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marfhall his battailes; himfelfe with the horfe, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly receiued him, as men well exercifed in fuffiaing furious impreffions. In this fight, neither did his courage tranfport him beyond the dutie of a carefull Generall; nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifeftation of his perfonal valour. It behooued him indeede to doe his beft; for he neuer met with better oppofers. Once, and fhortly after the fight began, his horfe was flaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vfe of his Kings armour, which was tome from his back. This accident had almoft loft him the battaile: but he perceiving it, difcouered his face, and thereby reftored courage to his men, andooke from the Romans their vaine joy. The fight was obftinate, and with the greater losse (at leaft of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his fide, as long as onely fpeare and fword were vfed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whole vnufual forme and terrible afpect, the horfes of the Romans (vnaccuftomed to the like) were not able to fuffaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiving their horfe put to rout, and driuen out of the field; finding alfo themfelves both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of thefe ftrange beafts; gaue way to neceffitie, and faued themfelves, as well as they could, by hattie flight: in which confutation, they were fo forgetfull of their difcipline, that they carried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was foonne fpread ouer Italic; and the reputation was no leffe than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to bee heard, that a Roman Confull, Confull, with a select Armie, should loose in plaine battaile, not only the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more bravelly wonne by Pyrrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, save the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that heooke, in hauing the glorie of this action peculiarly his owne, at such time as he blamed the Lucians and Samnites, for comming (as we say) a day after the faire. Neuertheless, he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore, he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them Cyneas his Embassadour; ¹⁰ demanding only to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at rest, and him selfe accepted as their especial friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts, labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recouering their captiues, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italie against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blinde Senator, did stirre them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answer, that whilest Pyrrhus aboade in Italie, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that Cyneas made, at his returne, of the Roman puissance ²⁰ and vertue; as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed betwene them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answer was, He must first depart out of Italie, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made prouision for warre; the Romans leauing a more mightie armie than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access vnto his forces, of all the East parts of Italie. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and quell fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants, gaue to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so joyfull, as the former had beene: rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For hee had lost the flower of his Armie in this battaile, and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor law any likelihood of preuailling against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest he should bee driuen to spend vpon his old stock. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should alwayes stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Scholers in such learning, how to make them vnseruicable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour safe out of Italie; which to doe (seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting a nie faire conditions of peace, or of truce) heooke a slight occasion, presented by ⁴⁰ fortune, that follo weth to be related.

ð. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How PYRRHUS, being invited into Sicill, forsooke Italie; wanne the mast of the Isle; and lost it in short space.

PYRRHUS returnes into Italie; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes back to his owne Kingdom.

When Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had benee the due reward, vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough, to aduance him selfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as he professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnes of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had benee wicked. These 20 affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdom. As for Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus, he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neare vnto Europe. Yet hee made great shew of meaning to reuenge his fathers death: but being stronger in monie than in armes, hee was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murderer. While these three strove about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatening warre, or promising his assistance, to every one of them. By these meanes he strengthened himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voiage, which hee had then in hand: requesting monie of 30 Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to haue them restored at two yeares end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, & quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomie grey mightie on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked hee increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria, was held by Stratonice his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her hee circumvented by making loueto her, and (according to the fallion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, 40 with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his vilanie found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard off. Belgus a Captaine of the Gaules, hauing forced his passage through many Countreies, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwile, to look for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates, in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselves, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell 50 vpon Italie, the other, passing through the Countreies that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long aboade in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeeme peace with tribute: as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe; vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeares after such time that his fellows had taken Rome.

Ccccc

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would give: His answer was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor give any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, that they would faine confute with deeds, the vanitie of such proud words. It may seeme strange, that he, who had given away part of his Armie unto Pyrhus, for very feare; should beeo confident in vndertaking more mightie enemies. The King of the Dardaniens offered to lend him twentiethousand men against the Gauls; but hee scorned the offer; saying, that hee had the children of those, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie must needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But hee soone found his great error, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battaile continued; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter astonishment.

The report of this great ouerthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrie as lost. Only Sophenes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which hee many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vsing the victorie at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Soldiers would haue made him King, which title he refused, and was content with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe feldome come alone) the good successe of Belgius, drew into Macedon Brennus another Captaine of the Gauls, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse; against which mightie Armie, when Sophenes with his weake troups made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leauing all their Countrie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of, in lesse then fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who fought to discouer and subdue vnknowne Countreies, as it all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had beene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes beene carried to Pyrhus in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romans, had not other tidings out of Sicill distracted him, and carried him away in pursuite of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who raigned ouer the whole Iland, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicill, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoide slaucerie, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good obey, than to liue vnder the well knowne heauie yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agrigentines, principall Estates of the Ille, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the businesse of Sicill more important, or more full of likelihood, or whether perhaps he beleued (as came after to passe) that his advantage, vpon Macedon, would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicill he transported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leauing them free as hee found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered, or note worthie. The Armie which he caried into that Ille, consisted of thirte thousand foot, and two thousand siue hundred horse: with which, soone after his descent in Sicill, he forc't the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also wonne the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Mamertines in battaile, hee beganne to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue *Sofratu*s (to whom his crueltie was suspect) out of the Iland, and put Thenon of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatnesse; which two persons had faithfully serued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as hee serued himselfe, and salued the disreputation of his leauing Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Sammies, imploring his present helpe against the Romans, who since his leauing Italie, had well neare dispossest them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, hee embarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie it selfe, by eigheteene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recouered Tarentum, hee fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was farre more valiant than constant, and had hee beene but a General of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had beene directed to haue conquered any one Countrie or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would haue purchased no lesse honour, than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valianter man, hath beene no where found. But he neuer staid vpon any enterprise; which was, indeede, the disease hee had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How ANTIQONVS, the sonne of DEMETRIVS, deliuered Macedon from the Gales. How PYRRHVS wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from ANTIQONVS.

HE vertue of Sophenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Bellus, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves vnto the government of Antigonus, than they had formerly beene desirous, to free themselves, from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His coming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nautie, and treasure, beferming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for hee was driuen to vsē against the Barbarians, only those forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good willes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to Spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delfos, hauing left no more behinde him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fiftene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their Fellows: and therefore sent vnto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceranus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was vnwilling to weaken his reputation, by condescending to their proud demands: yet hee judged it vsuit to exasperat their furious choler, by vn courteous words or vsage, as Ceranus had ouer-fondly done. Wherefore

he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous manner, with a roial feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such abundance of masse gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was serued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderstand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if neede required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them, his Camp and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauerie serued only to kindle their greedie appetites, who seeing his ships heauie loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferiour vnto the Gauls: thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors, to spend the riches, which they accompted assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoile and purchase: which tale, caried the Gauls head-long, to Antigonus his camp, where they expected a greater bootie, than the victorie ouer Cerannus had giuen to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it: who distrustful the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arriual, and conueighed himselfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adjoyning, where he lay close.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hastie to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the emptic Cabbinnes of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched euery place in vaine, angrie at their lost labour, they marched with all speede toward the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilst hee was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terror which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so carelesse of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert, and had saued it selfe by getting aboard the flect: in which number were some well experienced men of warre, who discovering the much aduantage offered vnto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, rooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manlie hold vpon the opportunitee. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disorderd Gauls, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driuen to cast themselves into the seruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and resistlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were ouerthrowne.

To speake more of the Gauls, in this place; and to shew how about these times, three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall giue better occasion, to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoeuer the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victorie, could not thereupon be perswaded, to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the seruice, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet, he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard termes, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he sure to get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauerie, meere necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an armie too little to be employed, by his careless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compoud with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers, reuolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the 10 courage of this daring Prince, to set vpon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight, with this hot warrior; but thought it the wisd way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrie. For Pyrrhus overtooke him in a straight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proofe that he was in retreat. The Gaules very brauely sustayned Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seemes, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not aduancing to their succour,ooke away 20 their courage, by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who, finding themselves exposed to the same violence, that had consumed so many of the Gaules, yielded them selues and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreame difficultie (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had scene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discouered so well their affections, that hee aduentured to draw neare in person, and exhorted them to yield. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower.
 30 All forsooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled a long with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and monie enough to entertaine a greater power, had he knowne where to leaue it. But whilest he was thinking, how to allure a sufficient number of the Gaules into his seruice; whereby hee might repaire his losse: Ptolome, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirots, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late misfortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Alexander (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come oter into Greece; where was more matter of conquest; and let the Italians shift for themselves.

§. V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without success. His enterprise vpon Argos, and his death.

50 PYRRHVS had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gaules, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, in deede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what Ccccc 3 he

he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of five and twentie thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giuing libertie to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, than warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost vitrly dejected. Especially the Lacedaemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrey, had betaken himselfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make thew 10 of any displeasure, that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours hee deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe, and his former dissembling words, with a iea; That he followed herein the Lacedaemonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedaemonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they fought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practised as wisdom, till it made them distrustful, for saken, and almost contemptible. Neuertheless, they were not wanting to 20 themselves, in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to reuerse themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailling.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soone after this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls; at the present, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three daies together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely, and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preferred the Towne the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the 30 second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of sauing the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though already they had tome in sunder the barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta, with a good strength of men; and drew the King returned out of Crete (where he had beene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrey stood, vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the 40 thin things worke shewed, how great his error had beene, in forbearing to assault the Towne at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that hee saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course, he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meet the enemy in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtful what way to take; being diuersly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilst hee was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither; with promise to deliuer that Citie into his hands.

Small dissension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of several factions, to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous, to rid their hands of such powerfull Assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argues, that he came to Quee them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus; and that hee would 50 be be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrrhus would, needes persuade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus, offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

10 The Argives tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to divert their powers some other way. Herunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gave H hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in neede of good-will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: H hostages he would give none, to his inferiours; especially, meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as, indeede, it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthe of assurance, by giuing such a bond, as hee intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. At the taking off, and setting on againe, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully Master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the waies, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passage: and setting vpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

20 Pyrrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noise, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darkenesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then beganne he to make his passage by force, and so farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had beene combatant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retreat.

30 Indee, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to haue retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had beene away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue back, so did others thrust forward, and the Argives pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat, with his owne sword. The tops of the houises were couered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne sonne in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, shee tooke a tile stone, or slate, and threw it so violently downe on the head of Pyrrhus, that hee fell to ground astonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

40 This ended the restless ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Chalcidion to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enemy. The bodie of Pyrrhus, had honourable funerall, and was giuen by Antigonus vnto Helene his sonnes; which young Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus, held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posteritie of Selencus, raigned ouer Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolonie had quiet possession of Egypt: vntill such time, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp digested these, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

CHAP. I.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

§. I.

A discussion of that probleme of LIVIE; Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great ALEXANDER. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

THAT question handled by LIVIE, Whether the great ALEXANDER could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath bene, and is, the subject of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen, of the Roman power, in his daies. For if he, a Commander (in Han-nibals iudgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of monie, or of other needfull helps in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their estate, when it was well setled, and held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was abundantly provided of all which is need-full

full to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, coming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well settled. It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiaticques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolome, Antigenus, and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, cury one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, 10 and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punicke warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to launch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farr too weak they would haue prou'd in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserue to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easteme world, more wealthy, indeede, than 20 valiant, could haue afforded vnto the Macedonian: lets only conjecture, how the States of Sicillia and Carthage, nearest neighbours, to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselves vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexander coming into those parts, would haue brought excessiue joy; to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Affrick, 30 put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall wee thinke that they would haue beene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I questi.n their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forsooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match, it is vn easie to finde in discouerie of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against 40 cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate; for whosoever contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enimie goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those daies the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armi- which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning 50 fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwaies hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Lucius hath judgd this a matter worthy of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three three yeares after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Liue to admire his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceipt should blind our judgment, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding such a controuersie, I think it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to giue such a sentence betwene the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betwene the Ardeates and Aricini, that Liue Dec. 13. strove about a peece of land; saying, that it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the best Warriour? I will answer: The Englishman. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no savage or vnmannie people; the enimie being farre superiour vnto vs in numbers, and all needfull prouisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In what sort Philip wanne his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were; whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armes as it commonly encountered: any man, that hath taken paines to read the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently vnderstand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer, or very seldome, able to stand, against the Roman Armies: which were embatailled in so excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation besides them haue vsed, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensible, were of greater vse, than those with which any other Nation hath serued, before the fierie instruments of Gunne-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe; we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom shee had little aduantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well obserueth) was a part of her happinesse; that shee was neuer ouer-laid, with two great warres at once.

Hereby it came to passe, that hauing at first increased her strength, by accession of the Sabines; hauing wonne the State of Alba, against which shee aduentured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and hauing thereby made her selfe Princesse of Latium: shee did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion ouer all Italie: The Carthaginians had well neare oppressed her: but their Souldiers were Mercinarie; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their owne doores. The Aetolians, and with them all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian: hee being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Aetolians. The warres against Antiochus, and other Asiaticques, were such as gaue to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as base of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicily, Spainne, and all Greece, fell into her hands by vsing her aide, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when shee had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say: that among all their warres, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my judgement seeme ouer-partiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First, therefore it is well knowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as Julius Caesar; and that no Roman armie, was comparable vnto that, which serued vnder the same Caesar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had given faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it first entred into Gauls, was neuertheless vterly diheartened, when Caesar led it against the Germans. So that we may iustly impute, all that was extraordinarie in the valour of Caesars men, to their long exercise, vnder so good a Leader, in so great a warre. Now let vs in generall, compare with the deedes done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall seruice; the things performed in the same Countrey, by our common English Souldier, leauied in halts, from following the Cart, or sitting on the hop-itall: so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairely, and beleuee Caesar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the English. In Caesars time, France was inhabited by the Gauls, a stout people, but inferior to the French, by whom they were subdued; euen when the Romans gaue them assistance. The Countrey of Gauls was rent in sunder (as Caesar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were gouerned by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it applicable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in generall through the whole Countrey, but betwene the petty States, yea in euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Arminius, with his Germans, had ouer-runne the Countrey, and held much part of it in a subjection, little different from meeere slauerie: yea, so often had the Germans preuailed in warre vpon the Gauls, that the Gauls (who had sometimes bene the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France bene so prepared vnto our English Kings, Rome it selfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would haue bene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, hee found the whole Countrey settled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no lesse, than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia, did serue in person; at whose call, the Geneueves, and other Neighbour States, were readie to take armes: finally, a King vnto whom one Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; another sold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for monie. The Countrey lying soopen to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed most therein (for it were meeere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Caesar himselfe doth witnesseth, that the Gauls complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardinelle was ouer-masted, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raised and planted against their walls, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valliant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worse, by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to haue regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gauls, or any great part of them, to one head, that with ioynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vse of opportunitie: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellows; and sometimes driuen, to giue or take battaile, vpon extreme disadvantages, for feare, least their Companies should fall a-finder: as indeede, vpon any little disaster, they were readie to breake, and returne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or what other worldly helpe, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in scats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs?

Let vs heare, what a French writer saith, of the inequality that was betwene the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-set, vpon the Black Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. JOHN had all advantages ouer EDWARD, IBAN auoit tous l'auantage par desus EDWARD, le nombre, la force, le labour, le pays, le prestige (qui n'est pas communément en ces contrées) et de peu d'avantage aux affaires du monde. & avec soi l'ordre de sa cavalerie, lors estance la victoire de tout son Royaume. John de Serres Barbri

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Army of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with fortie thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert warriors. This I am sure of; that neither Syllax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scyllions, as Luie rightly teames them, nor those cowardly Kings Perseus and Genius, are worthie patternes. All that haue read of Cresius and Agnocourt, will beare me witness, that I doe not allage the battaile of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proofe whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impure these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse bow: my answer is ready; that in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse, or sicknesse, or a fore finger, makes the long Bow vsueruicible. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blanc: and so shall hee perceiue, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most, can be deliuered, before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect, of an extraordinarie arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wanne so many great battailes, hauing no advantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victorie of our men at Crenant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, vseth these words; The English comes with a John de Serres tole de Serres conquerung braverie, as he, that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: hee forceth our garde, placed vpon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where hee tells, how the Britions, being inuaded by Charles the eight, King of France, thought it good policie, to apprell a thousand and two hundred of their owne men in English Cassacks; hoping that the very sight of the English red Crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Aemilius; report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I undertooke to maintain; That the military vertue of the English, preuailling against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preserved before that of Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Caesar had done? my answer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Acidae, of whom the old Poet Ennius gaue this note; Belli potentes sunt magis quam sapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde, that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: saue only King Henrie the fifth, the course of whose victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaul, before the time of Caesar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punic, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good le-sure: and then especially had they both leisure, and fit oportunitie, when vnder the conduct of Marius, they had vntiquely vanquished the Cimbri, and Tentones, by whom the Countrie of Gaul had beene pitoufully wasted. Surely, the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gauls, for preferation of their owne libertie.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaul, vntill they were Lords of all other Countreies, to them knowne. We on the other side, held only the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (vntill these parts in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) euery way equal to our selues; a Nation, anciently & strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, enemy to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwaies we feared, a stronger inuasion by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces ouer Sea.

It is vsuall, with men, that haue pleased themselves, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great iniurie done to their judgment, if any take vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the diuident vertue of this our Iland, hath giuen more noble proof of it selfe; than vnder so worthe a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cesar a Monarch, so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath conuerted our greatest hindrance, into our greatest helpe, the enemy that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde cause to wilth, that auoiding vs, hee had rather encountred as great a puillance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying aside comparisons, we returne to the rehearsal of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italy, to striue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punicke warre.

The estate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

HE Citie of Carthage had stood about six hundred yeares, when first it beganne to contend with Rome, for the maistrie of Sicily. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeares in antiquitie of foundation: but in the honor of great atchieuements, it excelled farre beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the iurights of Hiercules, about one thousand and fise hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subjected all Spaine, euen to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, to the west of Sicily, and of Sicily the better part. It flourished about seuen hundred and thirtie yeare, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who besides other spoiles, and all that the Souldiers referred, carried thence foure hundred and seuentie thousand weight of siluer, which make of our monie (if four pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie, ranne the same fortune, which many other great ones haue done. both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest peeces of the world, fore-shewes the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt: and by Gracchus it was called Iunonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and repeopleed, taken and retaken; by Gensericus the Vandal, by Belisarius vnder Iustinian, by the Persians, by the Aegyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and, while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compassed it about, sauing that it was tied to the maine by a neck of land, which passage had two miles and more of breadth (Aspin saith three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to belceue the common report, that the Citie it selfe, was about twentie mile in compass; compasse, if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have beene twice as great.

CHAP. I. §. 2. of the Historie of the World.

It had three walls, without the wall of the Citie, and betwene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults vnder ground, of thirtie foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food. Over these they had hables for foure thousand horse, and Granaries for all their prouender. They had also lodging in these streets, betwene these out-walls for foure thousand horse-men and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline vsed now by those of China) neuer peltred the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Callic of Byrsa; to which Seruius giues two and twentie furlongs in compasse, that make 10 the two mile and a halfe. This was the same peece of ground, which Dido obtained of the Libyans, when shee got leave to buy only so much land of them, as shee could copasse with an Oxes hide. On the west side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing pool; for a certaine arme of Land, fastned to the ground, on which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but scantie room open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Asencell, hauing their ships and gallies riding vnder it.

The forme of their Common-weale resembled that of Sparta; for they had triularie Kings, and the Aristocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the people in later times vsurped too great authoritie in their Councils. 20 This constitution in government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their distraction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their avarice and their crueltye. The avarice was the wed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinarie tributes) the one halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle and merciful persons, but vpon those who could best tyrannize ouer the people, to augment their treasures. Their crueltye appeared in putting them to death without mercie, that had offended through ignorance. The one of these rendered them odious to their vassalls, whom it made readie, vpon all occasions, to revolt from them; the other did breake the spirits of their Generalls, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad; the feare of a cruell death at home.

Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse received, had desperately killt themselves, with all that remained vnder their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessarie, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them haue dared, to manage their owne best projects, after that good forme, wherein they first conceived them, for feare lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not only the vnhappie Captaine, but euen him, whose bad counsaile had prospered euent. The faults, where with, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, crueltye, avarice, craft, vnfaithfullnesse, 40 and perurie. Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same crimes, let the triall be referred vnto their actions. The first league betwene Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: hauing beene made, the year following the expulsion of Tarquins. In that league, the Carthaginians had the superiouritie, as imposing vpon the Romans, the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as haue trade, in some part of Affric, nor suffer any ship of theirs, to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontorie, vnlesse it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (how soeuer it hath pleased * Linc to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans, to haue trade in any part of Affrica, or in the Iland of Sardinia.

50 By these two treaties it may appeare, that the Carthaginians had an intent, not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Affric; but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling all Italie, whereby in the first place, b The Tenth, which day, doe also take the one halfe of the poor mans corn, that laboure as the earth yearelye, they take it both of the bodies, and of the soules of the Christians their Vassals, by relievinge them of their childer, and bringinge them vp in the Mohometan Religion. The Tribes take the tenth of the saine, were wont to cate vp with their herds-men, footmen, and deys, what they pleased, of the edict the parts remaininge. The Indian man of England, are the fifth of all the World: And celesse goodly for of them haue the Ladies of our vniuersities beene christened. And it is the freewill, & not thollow, that both countries, they first of thine decreed by counsaile. How since the English yemen haue bene, in times, not long since past, Ferdinand hath shewed in his praise of our Countries lawes. But I may say, that they are more free now than euer; and our Nobilitie & Gentleme more feruile. For since the excessive brauerie, and vaine expence of our Grandes, hath taught them to rash their Mens, since by In-closures, and diminishing of Mannour, the Court Honour, and the Court Leer, the Incorporations of the Gentrie of England, haue bene abolished, the Romans, beinge paid vnto the Lords their rack Rent, owe them now no Justice at all, and (perchance) a little lesse, 1623 1624 1625 1626 1627 1628 1629 1630 1631 1632 1633 1634 1635 1636 1637 1638 1639 1640 1641 1642 1643 1644 1645 1646 1647 1648 1649 1650 1651 1652 1653 1654 1655 1656 1657 1658 1659 1660 1661 1662 1663 1664 1665 1666 1667 1668 1669 1670 1671 1672 1673 1674 1675 1676 1677 1678 1679 1680 1681 1682 1683 1684 1685 1686 1687 1688 1689 1690 1691 1692 1693 1694 1695 1696 1697 1698 1699 1700 1701 1702 1703 1704 1705 1706 1707 1708 1709 1710 1711 1712 1713 1714 1715 1716 1717 1718 1719 1720 1721 1722 1723 1724 1725 1726 1727 1728 1729 1730 1731 1732 1733 1734 1735 1736 1737 1738 1739 1740 1741 1742 1743 1744 1745 1746 1747 1748 1749 1750 1751 1752 1753 1754 1755 1756 1757 1758 1759 1760 1761 1762 1763 1764 1765 1766 1767 1768 1769 1770 1771 1772 1773 1774 1775 1776 1777 1778 1779 1780 1781 1782 1783 1784 1785 1786 1787 1788 1789 1790 1791 1792 1793 1794 1795 1796 1797 1798 1799 1800

whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupie all Sicill, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon wee finde good cause, of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twentie & five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Sannites were ouerthrowne. But the little state of Rome, prevailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mightie Armie, of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein; many great fleets were deuoured by tempests; and howloer the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, and take reuenge vpon these Inuadours. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope, of getting all Sicill, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busie, in making their aduantage, of this good oportunitie; Pyrrhus, inuited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where hee made sharpe warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnplesant to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicill, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To preuent this danger, they sent Mago Embassadour to Rome, who declared in their name, that they were forie to heare, what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Armie into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epiriots.

It was, indeede, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their businesse in Sicill: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, least it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renewed, with covenants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be, with reservation of libertie, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vsing all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon every new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicill: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor sauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them at his departure thence, as farre from any end, as when they first beganne.

So many disasters, in an enterprize, that from the first vndertaking, had bene so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthaginians to beleue, that an higher providence resisted their intendment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Island, was so inueterate; that with vnwearing patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an harvest, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had bene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practise, recovered in few yeares, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deale with

Some what before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had scrued vnder Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to

doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, slew those that had trusted them; which done they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wiues, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were; and like enough it is, that mere desperation, of finding any that would approve their barbarous treacherie, added rage vnto their stoutness. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they overranne the Countrey round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messena against the Cities of Sicill Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusans, and others, but they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusans wanne fall vpon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messena, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It happened ill, that about the same time, a contention beganne, betweene the Syracusan Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so farre that the Armie elected two Governours, among themselves; to wit, Artemiderus, and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrarie to the policie of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie hee vfed at his first entrance, was by general consent, established and made Governour. This Office, he rather vfed as a Scale, thereby to clime to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and easily moued to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Lepines, a man of the greatest estimation and authority among the Syracusans. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messena, he quartered all those Companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would haue assaulted it in two severall parts, he marched away vnder the covert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in peeces by the assieged: So returning home, and leauing an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hastid againe towards Messena, and was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Nyluum, where hee obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captiue into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves vterly infeebled, some of them resolu'd to giue themselves to the Carthaginians, others to craue assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the severall factions, dispatched Embassadors for the same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone readie, to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messena, whereof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of dores, and the Towne refused for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messena, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once bene theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom hee entered into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicill. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed vp within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the T owne, whilest Hieron with his Syracuzians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius, the Roman Confull, with an Armie to the streights of Sicily: which passing by night with notable audacity, hee put himselfe into the T owne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to giue them protection, euen by force of warre, if reason would not preuaile.

This message was vtterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betwene Rome 10 and Carthage; wherein, it will then be time to shew, on which part was the iustice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans, lately foregoing this, haue beene first considered.

ð. III.

The beginning of the first Punicke warre. That it was vnjustly vnderaken by the Romans.

WHEN Pyrrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirots, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize vpon it in that busie time, sought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of foure thousand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana, (a Citie in Sicily, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise diuided than by a narrow Sea, which seuereth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the 30 odiousnesse of the vilanie, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked courie. Considerating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; diuiding the spoile, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate & people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more leuere profession of iustice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatnesse) resolved, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie, by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for 40 the fouldnesse of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where after the vsuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrey, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberties and estates.

This execution of iustice being newly performed, and the fame thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messana, desiring helpe against the Carthaginians, and Syracuzians, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. 50 An impudent request it was, which they made: who hauing both giuen example of that vilanie, to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with ioynt force to make it good; intreat the Iudges to giue them that assistance, which they were wont to receiue from their fellow theecus.

The

6. The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the way of honour, or of profit, were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrarie the course of succouring the Mamertines was, to their former counsells, and actions: seeing for the same reasons they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and re-
 10. torted the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best parts of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicily selfe; whilst also they feared, that Syracuse therein seated (a Citie in beautie and riches,
 10. little, at that time, inferior to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safety of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver vp Messana, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians; then would nothing stand
 20. betwene Carthage, and the Lordship of all Sicily: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fallien vpon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the oportunitie of Messana was such, as would not only debarre, all
 30. courses out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicily; but would serve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

20. These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatened from a farre: did so preuaile, above all regard of honor, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consul, presently dispatcht away for Messana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the
 30. protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and lesse moued, with his requiring them, to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; the whole Iland was readie to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appian himselfe well understood: and
 30. against all this, he thought the blisse metall of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient reme-
 30. dy. Therefore, he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Towne; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in
 40. distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto hee had wilfully cast his owne: mutinous followers, not long before: only he was strong enough (or
 40. thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his
 40. trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee presented him.
 40. The Syracusan wanted not courage to fight; but surely, hee wanted good aduice; else would hee not have hazarded all his power against an enemy, of whom he had
 40. made no triall; when it had bene ealie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne
 40. Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten, and driven to saue himselfe within
 40. his Trenches: by which losse, hee learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdome in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of
 40. reuenge, that had made the Syracusians so bule, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana bene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must have sought
 50. helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities) but a small stock, which it behoued
 50. him to gouerne well: such another losse would haue made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them
 50. stand to their aduentsures, that had hope to bee gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of his souldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enimie forooke both field and campe, leauing all the Countrie open to the Romans; who hauing spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege vnto the great Citie of Syracuse.
 50. day,

These prosperous beginnings, how soeuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaying to greater matters, than at first they had expected. Yet did they not imprint any forme of terror, in the Citie of Carthage, that had wel enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had been prepared against the Amertines alone, without any suspicion of warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entered into this warre; not how profitabill they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honestie (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfullnesse, whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Amertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Sammites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the dissenters of those folke, wherof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendrie, in the publike name of all their Companie.

If therefore the Amertines, by no lawfull surrendrie of themselves and their possessions, were become subject vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assault the Amertines, against their moit ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might haue aided the Campanes, against the Sammites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it bee supposed, that some point seruing to clear this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no companie, of Pirates, Thieues, Out-lawes, Murderers, or such other malefactorious, can by any good successe of their vilanie, obtaine the priuilege of ciuill societies, to make leagur or truce, yea, or to require faire warre: but are by all means, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Ciuilians; that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can giue protection to such as these, as long as any other is vsing the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming accessarie to their crimes. Wherefore, we may esteeme this action of the Romans, so farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Thieues, into their protection, they justly deserued to be warred vpon themselves, by the people of Sicily; yea, although Messana had beene taken, and the Amertines all slaine, ere any newes of this Confederacie had beene brought vnto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farre persuaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiada (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were defended from a Companie of Malefians, who to gratifie King Alexes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countrie, which these of their posteritie enjoyed. Neuerthelessse, in course of humane iustice, long and peaceable possession giues in acquiescentiam, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was at first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the defendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose vilities they do not exercise. But that the same generation of Thieues, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by some some alliance with the ancient inheritors, hee can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scotts, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmond Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of justice, in this quarrell, than had the Gabres, Hunnets, Vandalis, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her selfe, in the time of her vilitation; was burnt to ground.

§. IIII.
Of the Island of Sicill.

¶ I.

The qualitie of the Island: and the first inhabitants thereof.

20 THe defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, since the first victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicill being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will be agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases we have obserued, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Island, which hath bene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present Warre.

30 That Sicill was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Iste, adjoynd to Italie, as a part of Bruttium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and after ward by violence of tempest feruered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquities. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memoriaall remayding, in any certain writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Silius, and Cassiodorus, doe thinke it to haue bene done by the rage and violence of the tide, and surges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Euboea leuered from Boeotia; Atalante and Macris, from Euboea; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornewall; and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Verstegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicill, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eusebius witnesseth) who with his three forked Mace, in fauour of Iocastus, the sonne of Æolus, diuided it
40 from the maine land, and so made it an Island, which before was but a Demie-Iste; that by that meanes, hee might the more safely inhabite, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of fundering it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountaines, first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did thole of Gibraltar.)

50 They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Eusebius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Island, Pamponius Mela, saith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle, which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Island was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. That Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corne: to Proserpina, nor so much, for that shee was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch

Con's

Plutarch

Arch and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Plato, as soone as shee, vncouering her selfe, first shewed her selfe to be scene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Storehouse of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vniuersal for. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasure. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath vsually clothed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoeuer Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Solinus) 10 whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-growne with grass. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields, neare vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it fixe Colonies, and sixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authours.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Ætna, Seylla and Charibæis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicily was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Leſtrigones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consent auctre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt only in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some doe so thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorus doe constantly aouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latiuim, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driuen by the Pelagi; from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to maister and inhabit, passed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeares before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eightie yeares before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zante, afterward called Messena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse it selfe, being from thence the Ætolians, who long before had set vpa Towne in that place. 40 As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arriuall dispossesse the Ætolians thereof, but some hundred yeares after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Naxos, Hybla, Trinacria, and diuers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italie, called Morgetes, who were thence driuen by the Oenotrians. These late downe in that part of Sicily, where they afterward raised the Cities of Adargentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill warre greatly infeeble. Among the ancient histories, we finde the last voiage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, 50 an Historian of vncquestionable sinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicily. But the common report is that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicily to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, neare unto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set vp in the Temple of Venus Eryema, which he did with so great art, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be huing, than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dadalus, prepares to invade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his owne strength, promiseth to deliuer Dadalus. This he performs not, but in the meane while, kills Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos's followers, to inhabit a part of Sicily; the better (as it seemes) to strengthen himselfe against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their consent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minos, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engyuum, now called Gange; and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicily, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand children of Atanos serued with the Greeks at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans vnderstood, that their King had by treason beeing made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus; and landing neare unto Cannicus, they beliged the same five yeares, but in vaine. In the end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italie; and having no meanes to repair their ships, nor the honor they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betwene the two famous Ports of Brundisium, and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Iapyges, and Messapij.

After the taking of Troy, Aegestus and Hyrimus, brought with them certaine troupes into Sicily, and seated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Aegestia and Elyma.

It is said, that Aeneas visited these places in his passage into Italie; and that some of the Troians, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicily; whereof there want not good Authours, that make Aeneas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phenicians seized vpon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybaeum, and vpon certaine small Isles adjoining to the maine land: which they fortified, to secure the trades, that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals haue done in the East India, at Goa, Ormuz, Mosambiq, and other places. But the Phenicians staid not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Isle of Sicily, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes one and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to be mightie and Giantlike men; and that, as Phoenicia, Egypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Oreller, Antau, Typhou, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchatericus; remembered by Saxo Grammaticus; as Seythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicily had her Lestrigones, and Cyclopes. This Discourse I could also reject for tained and fabulous; did not Aristotles make vs know, that the Zanzammis, Emis, Asakims, and Og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Deserts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, S. Augustine, Nephorus, Procopius, Isidorus, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solimus, Plutarch, and many other Authours, haue confirmed the opinion. Yea, Velutinus, in his second Navigation into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like men in those parts. Againe, whereas the selfe-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on a-comes and roats, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies, with the skins of beasts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first passages ouer great Riues, and armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together, and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leath, then of wood; first, with Oares, and then with saile; that they esteemed as Gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the same newnesse of time, which we call Oldtime, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were removed farre off from the Hebrewes, who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophic Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from cruelty and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For we haue now greater Giants, for vice and iniustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages and houles of clay and timber, we haue raised Palaces of stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; in somuch as men are rather knowne by their houles, than their houles by them; we are fallen from two diuers, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the couering of our bodies with the skinnes of beasts, not only to silke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will alio take reuenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorq; auexit, longissima subruit; Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall ouerthrow it.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicill.

WHEN the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicill: it happened, that one Theodes, a Greek, being driuen vpon that coast by an Easterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had beene thought fabulous, being deliuered only by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, and proposed vnto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theodes was as litle regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore hee tooke the same course, that Columbus afterwards did. Hee ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and indolent, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxos, and a Colonie planted of Eubarians.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the vniuersal places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubarians, and landed in Sicill, neare vnto that Citie, called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part only was then compassed with a

* Syracuse, as Cirro relates, was the greatest, and most goodly Citie of all that the Greekes possessed. For, the situation is both strong, and of an excellent prospect, from euery cantage, by Land, or Sea. The Port was (for the most part) enuironed with beautifull buildings: and that part which was without the Citie, was on both sides bankt vp, and sustained with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citie it selfe was one of the greatest of the about 18. It was compounded of foure Cities, (Strabo saith of five) to wit, Zejala, Acradina, Tyrche, and Naxos: of which the greatest, the ruines and foundations of the walls doe yet witness.

wall, which the Aetolians called Homerion; the Greeks, Nafos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corinthians having our-come the Siculi, draue them vp into the Countrey; and after a few years, their multitudes increasing, they added vnto the Citie of the Iland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commoditie of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertilitie of the soile; Syracuse grew vp in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Townes of the World. In short time the Greekes did possess the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the flat and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall residence in 10 Trinacia.

Some feuen years after the arrival of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the successe of the Corinthians, did forsake, and obtayne the Citie of Leontium, built and possess by the Siculi. In brieft, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their Associates, the Cities of Catana, and Hipbla, which, in honour of the Megarians that for't it, they called Megara.

About five and fortie years after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Creete, brought an Armie into Sicily, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned Citie of Agrigentum, governed according to the Lawes

20 of the Dorians.

The Syraculians also, in the seuentieth year after their plantation, did set vp the Citie of Acris, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth year Casmene, in the Plains adjoining; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina; and soone after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Comani, about the same time, recouer from the Siculi the Citie of Zante, which they had founded in the streight betweene Sicily and Italie. They of Zante had bene founders of Hmera.

30 Not long after this, Dorians the Lacedaemonian built Heraclia; which the Phenicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbour hood of the Spartans, soone after invaded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara; and Zante was taken by the Messenians; who hauing lost their owne Countrey, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Iland.

40 of the government and affaires of Sicily, before Dionysius his Tyrannie.

THE most part of the Cities in Sicily, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris beganne to vsurpe the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris; to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of brass, wherein to enclose men, and forthem them to death: prailing the deuce with this commendation; That the noise of one tormented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by causing the first trial to be made vpon himselfe. Hee reigned one and thirtie years, saith Ensebius; others giue him but sixteene: How soeuer it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zena,

After such time as the Dorians of Syracuse had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly Citie, for a long time became the seat of Tyrants. The first whereof was Gelo. The second, Hiera, the elder; The third, Thiaphilus; the fourth, and fifth, Dionysius, the elder, and younger; The first, Dion; The second, Apollonius; The eighth, Syraculius; The ninth, Hiera the younger; The tenth and last, Hieronymus: who being slaine at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct of Marcellus.

euen whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their libertie, and enjoyed it long, till Thero vsurped the government of the Common-weale: at which time also Panatus made himselfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled seuen yeares, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with diuers other of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them, by composition, the Citie of Camerina. But when he had reigned seuen yeares, he was slaine in a battaile against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of Governement, from Popular to Aristocraticall, a preparation towards a Principalltie, whereinto it was soone after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greekes, feated them selues in Sicily) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates in the former warre, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. Hee, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in possession of Gela, tooke the occasion and aduantage of a contention in Syracuse, betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Governours, driuen out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeede) the most famous, that euer gouerned the Syracusians. This change hapned in the second yeare of the threecore and twelth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also vsurped the state of Agrigentum.

Pasian. 16.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasylbulus: to the first of which hee gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtayned the Principalltie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts traualled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it; and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moued a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer sort he brought to Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaues. In like manner dealt he with other places vpon like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, hauing dispossessed Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena; Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon also was solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were ouerthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicily.

Herod. & Diod.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedaemonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellepont. Hee, for their reliefe hauing armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or by Land. So he vsed to their Embassadors only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accomping the Armie, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greeke Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse receiued, fearing the inuasion of their owne Countre, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him two thousand talents of silver; and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata; Gelon's wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicily in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the Gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successour his brother Thero. Philius and Plinie report, That, when his bodie was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, rane into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

- 321 X To Gelon, Thery his brother succeeded; a man rude, cruell, covetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasylbulus, as hee fought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conversation which hee had with Simandis, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Divers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agrirentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Gracians, against him. Hee also overthrow in bataille, Thimaleus the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrirentines, to their former libertie. But in the end hee lost the love of the Syracussians; and after hee had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrasylbulus, who became a most unjust and bloudie Tyrant. Thrasylbulus enjoyed his Principalltie no longer than ten months. For, notwithstanding the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acadina, he restored the gouernement, and was banished the Iland. From thence hee sailed into Greece, where hee died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracussians recovered againe their former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had neuer fought, had the Successours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalltie of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preferuation ought to answer the acquisition. Where a liberall, valiant, and advised Prince, hath obtayned any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a private man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behooveth the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and arte, by which it was gotten.

- 30 To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere shee could cleane her selfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistress of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well neare threescore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; though shee were in the meane while greatly indangered, by a Citizen of her owne, called Tyndario.

- Now, to prevent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new devised judgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein every one wrote vpon an Oliveleafe (as at Athens they wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would have expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five yeares. Hereby, in a short time, it came to passe, that those of judgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able either supprett, or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselves. And good reason they had so to doe; seeing there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessitie taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the wiser sort to the Gouernement; from which, the Nobilitie hauing practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Gracian Cities, and overthrowne the Armie of the Agregenines) the Syracuzians sent forces against him, commanded by an vnrworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcan. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to kinde Ducetius, against whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battaile. So, for want of conduct, the greatt number of the Syracuzians perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they leuie other troops: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitte himselfe, and is constrained to leaue the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere hee returned againe, and built the Citie Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greeke Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracuse: Trinacia excepted; which also by force of armes, in the foureth core and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendence. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppress'd by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the sixt yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they preuailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they invaded the Territories of the Syracuzians, and their Partisans; and lost diuers places rooke Messana; and, in the seuenth yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also, at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which invaded each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduise of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracuzians, and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to haue greatned themselves in Sicily, by the diuision and ciuill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laied an heauie fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicily: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selimumtines, and Syracuzians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppress'd the Egestians; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians vnderooke the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedamon was sent to the Syracuzians. The Lacedemonians dealt plainly, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craud their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to bee none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleue their owne eyes, which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this Expedition, the Citie of Athens had ingaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessitie of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedemonians (as hath already bene shewed in due place) food at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessarie, either to spare no cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindered by wars at home, if their proceedings were slack abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians bene ouer-passionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to releeueth their forces for a more needfull vsf. But yong counsailes preuailed, against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of saietie than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath bene already made, in that which wee haue written of the Peloponnesian warre. But what was there deliuered in generall termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, other wise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to haue felt a great conuulsion.

Though Alcibiades had preuailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Segestians, and to re-establish the Leontines, callt out of their places by the Syracusians; as also, by force of armes, to subiect the Syracusians, and all their adherents, in Sicily, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirrie Gallies, and fise thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirrie ships of burden, which 10 transported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, Mantinians, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirrie horse-men.

With these troups and fleets they arriue at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to giue them entrie; but sell them victuals for their monie. From thence they sent to the Eggestians, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing, for their sakes, they had entred thereto. But they found by their answers, that these Eggestians were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shewes of gold, hauing in all but thirrie talents. The Athenians further 20 were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and

30 allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduiceth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them, to an agreement with the Eggestians; as likewise to see what disburcements the Eggestians could make; and so to returne againe into Greece, and not to wast Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sicily to confederacie, against the Syracusians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, hee perswades them to assaile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end
40 (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they surprize Catania: and there they take new counsaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Eggestia, who received from them thirrie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Sommer being spent in idle consultations, and vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to assaile Syracuse.

But Alcibiades hauing bene accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians, to make his answer: and the Arme was ledt to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place, very neare vnto Syracuse, by this deuise.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catania, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracusians, that hee would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians, within Catania. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their 50 best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, letting faile from Catania, arriue at Syracuse, where they land at saie ease, and fortifie themselves against the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victorie to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Arme at Catania, for the winter-season.

From thence they made an attempt vpon Messana, hoping to haue taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had discouered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Messanians. This he now did, in despite of his owne Citizens the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to haue put him to death, or to haue banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he took his way towards the Lacedaemonians, and to them hee gaue mischieuous counsaile against his Countrey. While this Winter yet lasted, the Syracusians send Embassadors to Lacedamon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sicily, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian warre) the Athenians in Sicily, saile from the Port of Casana, to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence foraging the Countrey, they obtaine some small victories ouer the stragling Syracusians: and at their returne to Casana, they receiue a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Iland, from the Segestians; and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a companie of Archers, and with three hundred talents in monie.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neare Syracuse, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that sallied to impeach their intrenchments. They also receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at armes. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receiue diuers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the meane while, Gylippus, and Ejthoon, with the Lacedaemonian, and Corinthian forces arriue, and take land at Himera. The Citizens of Himera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; so that with these and his owne troups, Gylippus aduentured to march ouer-land towards Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arriual neare vnto the Citie, vpon a place of aduantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusan horse-men could not come to fight in those streights: but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians; shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would bee lost, together with the small Armie remaining. These letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Eurymedon, and Demosibenes, to joyne with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply; & the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he tooke from them their Fort, neare vnto Syracuse, at the Promontorie, called Plimymyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their prouisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedaemonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the warre in Sicily, and dispatched away Demosibenes with new succours. Demosibenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyarches the Carinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicias; the other, Gylippus. The losse betweene them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arriued to either, Gylippus and Ariflan had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosibe-

ner arriued with three score and thirteene Gallies, charged with foot-men; and (blaming the slouth of Nicias) he invaded the Syracuzians, the same day that he arriued. But he made more haste, than he had good speede, being shamefully beaten, and repulged with great losse. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon, determine to rise vp from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias distinguished to the contrarie, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arriual of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them deare. For the Syracuzians, Late Ionians, and Corinthians, with threescore and seuentene saile of Gallies, entered the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port, encountered them with fourescore and sixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slaine. Now, though it were so, that the Syracuzians receiued the more losse by Land (for the fight was generally yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themselves inuincible, they were wonderfully call downe. For it was well said of Cylius, to the Syracuzians; When any people doe finde themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they persuade themselves that they exceede all others, they not only loose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies funck and wrackt, had seuentene taken, and posselt by the enemy: and with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, having drawne them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, vnadvisedly; for it is as contrarie to a Sea-warre, to thrust ships into a freight roome and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting, by being at large; the other, by close imbattailing.

The Syracuzians, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, resolute to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Vessels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracuzian fleet; which lay but single, because they were fors to range themselves ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not only mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laied behind them againe certaine ships, which serued in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunke, or the chaine, which joyned them to their fellows, broken, the Athenians might yet finde themselves, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came in forme of a wedge, to break through, and force a passage, the Syracuzians had left within these Gallies and Ships, chained together, a certaine number of loose ones, to stop their course and furie. For where the way of any vessel, vñing oare or sailes, is broken, and their speede fore-flowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were vtterly lost, except with an inuincible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolute to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred and ten, of all forts) and with all the strength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stoppt by the ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracuzians, which were purposely left at large in the Sea, they

they were either taken or sunke. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no room to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having over-pestered their Gallies with Souldiers, who vsed offensive armes of darts and slings, they had not place vpon the decks to stretch their armes; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the laughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, with losse of threecore of their Gallies, broken, sunke, or abandoned. The Syracusians did also loole twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port, saved themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demophilus perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victory, to let vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counsaile. For, as we haue heard of many great Captaines (yea, the great ill number of all that haue bene victorious) that haue neglected the speedie prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who, having slept securely in the bosome of good success, haue bene suddenly awaked, by the re-alled Companies of a broken Armie, and haue ther by lost againe all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the aduice of Demophilus: Others say, that the Sea men were againe it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolute to march ouer land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more fauourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedemonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermocrates, exhorte the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were wearie, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Caduz, lost vs both the Indian fleet, and the Spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusian, finding it a lost labour, to perswade his Countreim to any hastie prosecution, deuised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenian faction) to giue him aduice not to march away ouer-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleging that the Syracusians had lodged their Armie, which could not long stay there, vpon the passages and places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily beleued, and put off his iourne to the third day. For men, newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wise; and to them, euery thistle in the field, appeares by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable our-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the River of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being euery day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusian horse-men, beaten in from foraging, and prouision of foode, they grow weake and heartlesse. The Syracusians also possesse the Mountain Lepus, by which they were to passe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall back againe towards the Sea-coast, and to take what what way they could : being vnable to proceede in their iourne intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as having none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vanguard; and Demosthenes conducted the Rear. At the Riuer Erimeus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leaving Demosthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demosthenes being dissolved, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage; who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the Riuer Asinarus, rendered himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preferre him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble enemy to the Lacedaemonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they receued at Plataea by the Athenians, had saved the liues of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedaemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Armie, dissuaded the rest, by all the arte he had, from using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victorie. But the cruel, and the cowardly sort, (cowardise and crueltie, being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these braue Captaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starued in lothsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaves. This was the success: of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the riuer Asinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourecore and cleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily; the Egeians (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had beene taken in hand) feiring the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their Vassalls. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperitie of the Syracusians, and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they staied a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolue vpon the enterprize; and (by a trick of their Punicke wile) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines; they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egeians, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a busines, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse, and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was overthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedie of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them hauing beene slaine by the Himerians; the other by those of Selinus. Both these Citie, Hannibal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, sackt them, and turnt them; and hauing taken three thousand of the Himerians prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was slaine and buried them there.

Hermocrates, who had lately bene General of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre pretailed with the ingrateful multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his mere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedemonians, in their warre against Athen; wherein hee did great seruice. All the honeste sort within Syracuse were sorie for the iniurie done vnto him, and sought to haue him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicily, gathered an Armie of sixe thousand; with which he beganne to repaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to winne the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was aduised to seize vpon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; wherby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to rise against the aduerse partie. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, and set vpon him; in which conflict hee was slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates aliuie againe.

of DIONYSIUS the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

The Syracusians had enjoyed their libertie about threescore yeares, from the death of Therastubulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltie towards strangers, as of their ingratitude, towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now bee taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the Principalltie of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it selfe. For, being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then beganne he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athen; obtaining a band of sixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his priuate enemies, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good seruices. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alleaging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had bene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefit. His first fauour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to raigine ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to breake downe, as feters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it vnder safe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found wher at hee aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needie, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyrannie; being but siue and twentie yeares of age when he obtayned it: belike, it was his desire to raigine long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadel; wherein was much good provision, and vnder it the Gallies were moored. This hee obtained by allowance of the people; and hauing obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare: The Armie; the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needie sort within Syracuse, that could not zhriue by honest courtes; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his establishing the faction, reigning at that present; were wholly affected to his assistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, saue to assure what hee had already. Hee strengthened himselfe by diuers marriages; taking first to wite the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Loerian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Ariflamache, the daughter of Hipparissus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse, which bare vnto him many children, that serued to fortifie him with new alliances.

- 10 Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicialian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waste all, that hee might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them to a desire to free themselves from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, rancked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof shee poisoned her selfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and siring a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedie riddance of them. For he spared none of his knownc, no, nor of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, nor so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vntript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people, that euer reigned in any State; and withall, the most vnrespectfully cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Island, from the rest; like as the Spaniards did the Citadell of Antwerp: therein he lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

- 30 He then beganne to make warre vpon the free Cities of Skil: but while hee lay before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie hee recouered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, hee againe recouered the maiestie ouer the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their Haruest, hee disarmed all the Townes-men remaying: and new strengthened the Fort of the Island, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipales; which, with threecore thousand labourers, hee finished in three weekes; being two leagues in compass. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-peeces, with foureteen thousand corslets, and all other futable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Skil, he would make warre vpon them: and, not staying for answere, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phenician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second, did of our Englishs, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with fourecore thousand foot and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yielded vnto him; sauing Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Amoyra, Motya, and Estella. Of these, he first wonne Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta hee lost a great part of his Armie, by a sallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himilco arriues; but, ere hee tooke land, hee lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, hee recouered againe Motya vpon his first descent. From thence marching towards Mef-

sen, sena, he took Lepara, and (soone after) Messena, and rased it to the ground. Now beganne Dionysius greatly to doubt his citize. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which hee supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse, and he himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Lepines, his brother, to encounter Ma- go. But Lepines was vtterly bearen by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authours tell vs; That one Citie should bee able to furnish fise hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ener hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to besiege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of ships, and therefore few Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carrie into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, of all that could beare armes, giuing them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not so; neither, in indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Di-onysius posles away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco follows him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, hauing receiued aide from the Lacedaemonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make pro-uision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twentie of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sink foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; hauing also at the present weapons in their hands; they consult how to recouer their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedaemonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding aduantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that about an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for a great summe of monie, on condition, that he should steale away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and lost many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell vnder the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselues, were (after their submission) entertained, and serued the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliuer vnto memorie the like practises, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monsieur de Piles, was very suitable to this treacherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present, when De Piles related the iniurie done vnto him. He had rendered St. Iohn d'Angelle, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. Hee rendered it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Aniun his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshalls of France, he was set vpon and broken in his march; spoiled of all that he had;
 and forced to saue his life by flight, leaving the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with ensignes displayed, and with all his goods and provisions, no whit auailing him. It needes not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus breake his faith, since Kings,

Kings, professing Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Diomyssus, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Messens. Mago, who staid in Sicily, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Diomyssus; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourescore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago; but they take egges for their monie, and make peace with Diomyssus, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Diomyssus, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

- 10 He then past into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourscore thousand crownes, to furnish him with threecore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future obseruance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearily bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them vtterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had giuen to them; he pretended to want victualle for his Armie, at such time as he seemed readie to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him therewith; promising to returne them the like quantitie, at his comming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, hee would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrell: if they yielded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of fooode, to endure a siege any long time against him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if he had done it fairely, and without breach of faith. For when, in the beginning of his raigne, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill decdes, than villainous words.

- 30 Alexander the Great forgaue many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no; though they told him but truely of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publique.

It is said, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that hee vied against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sauoyan: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords against him. The contemptuous words that St. Iohn Perret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So faired it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

- 40 To bee short, hee made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which hee continued to doe eleuen months, till hee wonne it by force. He vsed his victorie without mercie; specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking, and rasing of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For as in one encounter hee slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beate him, and slue his brother Leptines, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperitie and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When

When he had reigned eight and thirtie yeares, he died: some say, in his bedde, peaceably; which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man hee was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. Hee entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, hee gaue order to haue him laine, or sold for a slaue. For hee could endure no man, that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parallites therefore siled his crueltie, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iniurie. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better, than the worthiest and valiantest men doe: And I wonder not at it; for it is a world: and as our Saviour Christ hath told vs, The World will loue her owne.

Plato

Plato in conuict in her

To this Dionysius, his sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, hee pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had fastened vnto himselfe the peoples affections; hee callt off the Sheeps skinne, and put on that of the Wolfe. For, being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, hee caused them all to bee laine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath beene said) had two Wiues; Doris of Loeris; and Aristemachea Syracusan, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristemachea he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosyne, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the younger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theocides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that hee was wholly giuen ouer to sensuallitie, preuailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicill, to instruct the young King. And hauing perswaded the King to enertayne him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie into Monarchie; and to hold the Principallitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parallites, that hated Dionysius seuentie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to bee banished out of Sicill, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrells betwene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found means, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time, hauing furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusanians their former libertie, or to make himselfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serue the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had serued the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had alreadie bene raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to con-

seize it right. But these covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to stile his Loue and Liberaltie, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the yong King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoiles they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the first had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the braucst men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But hee had neuer good day after it. For they that enuid his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the west Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese fought to value himselfe about him; and to haue it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthie of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the reuenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moueables, at his owne pleasure: not without giving hope, to recall him in short time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue bene well pleased to liue well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-fale of this Noble-mans goods; and thereby vrged him to take another course; euent to seeke the restitution of his Countrey to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when hee fought to raise men, with whose helpe he might returne into Sicill. Yet he got not about eight hundred (for hee carried the matter closely) to follow him in this aduerture. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore hee landed boldly in Sicill; marched to Syracuse; entered the Citie without resistance, armed the multitude; and wonne all, saue the Citadell.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie; but hee quickly had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recouer the Towne, he was faine to depart, leaving yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollocrates, his eldest sonne. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philisus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouerie of his Countreys libertie, had the same reward, that all worthie men haue had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retireth himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great joy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troupes enter the Castle: they sallie out, assaile, spoile, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request; yet, ere he could arriue, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townsmen, thinking themselves secure, shut the Gates against Dion. But the next night, they of the Castle sallie againe, with greater furie than euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the loue of his Countrey surmounting all the injuries that he had receiued. He sets vpon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Armie; and quenchem the fire, euery-where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well-nere burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recouered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates, after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best deserued, and whom he had loued most, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For he was, soone after this his victorie, murdered by Calippus; who, after he had, with ill successe, a while gouerned Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italie, recouers his estate, and returnes to Syracuse, driving Nysanus thence, whom he found found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more than euer, his crueltie, flee to Ietes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Ietes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deservingly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Ietes also sends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as hee can, from intermedling in the businesse. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Ietes, more intraged than disswaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Ietes had entred Syracuse, and, with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driuen Dionysius into the Castle, wherein hee besieged him.

Ietes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arriued at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whose Captaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, than he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mattered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vsed to him in priuate; that hee might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtayned by a few faire wordes, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeilded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the presse; and hauing felt saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recouered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andramachus the Governour. From thence he marched towards Adranum, where surprising Ietes's his Armie, hee slue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne: It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranians joynd with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands: as thinking it better to yeeld vp himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Ietes, whom he disdaind, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arriual, had recouered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to liue there a priuate man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the praefices, of Ietes. For he besieged the Corinthians, within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are staid in Italie by foule weather. Ietes is strengthened with three score thousand *African*s, brought vnto him by Mago (all which hee lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Ietes assauleth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Ietes doe therefore resolute to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, filled out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arriue: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth

Ietes, being frighted out of Sicill (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much more affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Callie (which he called the necke of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feede on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

- 10 But a new storme ariseth. Asdrubal, and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybæum, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie upon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boisterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vterly broken, ten thousand slaine; five thousand taken; with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand corslets, gilt and grauen. After this, he gaue an ouerthrow to Ietes; and, following his victorie, tooke him, with his sonne Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners, whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great crueltie) he suffered Ietes his wiues and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Ietes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife, and a yong child of his, with Aristomache, Dions sister, to be cast into the Sea.

Plat. in vit. Tim.

- 20 He againe preuailed against Amamerus, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana itselfe. Amamerus fled to Hippion, Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, wonne the towne; deliuering Hippion to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Amamerus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicill.

- 30 Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should not passe the Riuer of Lycus. After this, he liued in great honour among the Syracusanians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them, in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funeralls, being for euer ordayned to be kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the Inhabitants enjoyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeares. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But, it was impossible, that a Nation, which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthe to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

- 40 Twentie yeares, after the death of Timoleon, there started vp an Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to bee a Prætor; hee finally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusanians. Many fortunes he ranne, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalltie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banished. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was imployed, as also for the Syracusanians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable seruice: and on the contrarie, as memorable seruice for the Murgastines, against the Syracusanians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and beliegeth Syracuse so strictly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace betwene himselfe and the Syracusan; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the state of Carthage, for euer alter. Amilcar entertayned the businesse, and compounded the quarrells betwene Agathocles, and the Syracusan. Agathocles is hofen Prator; he entertaines foue thousand African, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgatines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Syracusa. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusan (the Citie being also diuided into many factions) he assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; diuides the spoile of the rich among the poore; and giues libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to rauish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further subject to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sicknesse, by which the common-wealth was vtterly consumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had administered; and that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democritie, by which it had bene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew, that he had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had bene partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had bene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but, the one was of bale; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertie from a Common-wealth; the other sought only to succcede in a Monarchie; the one continued his crueltie to the end; the other, after he had obtained the Crowne, sought, by making of good lawes, to recover the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Dionorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracusa, and that had lent him fixe thousand men, to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyrannie, and to let him vex and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that hee should reduce all Sicily into such termes, as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But, when the Citie, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this dealing, to Carthage; the Punicke faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than mere fallhood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redresse. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his couenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africa, and a new Captain appointed to succcede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended, to saue their Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so reserved, vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrey. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusan, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cullome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practise; thinking to deale subtilly, and finely, they spinne their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into so much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his foregoers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what sort he thought best. This desperation Amilcar serued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolued to get the start of them in action. He dissembled no longer; but, instead of spoile and roberrie, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicill his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arriu'd: which thinking to haue encountered an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them sharpe entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their businesse vndone, and returne into Africk.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it calt away, euen whilst it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the sonne of Gisco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wrack, was bold to passe ouer into Sicill, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their comming. Many skirmishes passed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusan had the better. But his good successe begat presumption; whereby he lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduertise chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vp-held by great circumspection. The warre was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed vp, and driuen to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be judged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had bene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchised slaues, or base and needie people; helpers in establishing the present Governement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoile, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well obserued, and (withall) so fearfull, that they durst not stirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessitie, Agathocles aduented vpon a strange course, which the euent commended, as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Hauen; and committing the gouernement of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had be thought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was readie to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with corne, and other prouisions, were drawing neare vnto Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise saile, and launch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled back into the Citie, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten into Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieued by their coming, for that Agatholes had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceiued; first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had missed of them both; and secondly, that Agatholes returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leisure to doe mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) followed Agatholes directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard; and wearied themselues, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, and beat them; and, hauing sunke, or taken many, draue the rest to fite which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.

When Agatholes had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them vnderstand, that there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicily, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (said he) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one alreadye Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reseruing one or two, to vse as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicily. This impressiō so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agatholes to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemy; they raise a great Armie, and know not vnto whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied; which farre exceeded the forces of Agatholes. But it seldome happens, that dissension betwene Commanders produceth any fortunat euent. Necessitie draue Agatholes to fight; and the courage of his men, resolu'd to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stirre; but suffered Hanno to be cut in peeces.

The reputation of this victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian Societe, to take part with Agatholes: who pursuing his victorie, winnes many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicily, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the state of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilest he was traouailing in the conquest of Sicily. Amilcar sends them fiftethousand men: all his forces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agatholes back into Sicily, than to be drawne home home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracuzians: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surpris. It was a pretie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His huncie got this dreame, and he belieued it. He made more halte, than good speede, toward the Citie: and coming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, wherein to be kill. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that he had no great cheare to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

second Ambition too true

- This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. He had allured Ophellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countrie into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicily, wherein (after this warre ended) he might raigne quietly. Ophellus came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards, by good wordes, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villanie found good succelle; and he so prevailed in Africk, that he got leisure to make a step into Sicily. Many Townes in Sicily had imbraced a desire of recouering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long bene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. These had prevailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Sicily he returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a bataille; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoile. It had now bene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians; which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both monie enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicily. For their Citie had bene distressed, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage: it selic: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange euents following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the said Idoll, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappie men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings nearest vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult, as is vsuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vnto the Pavillion of Agathocles. Herevpon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleuing, that the noise in the aduerser Campe, was a signe of the enemies coming to inuade it.
- 800-014
- fit
- 50 But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Soldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) he beganne to assaile them, and was so stoutly resisted, that hee lost, in this blinde fight, about about foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neare hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weaknes, than lately he had knowne how to gouerne his Ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely aboard his ships, with his younger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flee into Sicill; thinking it the best course, to shift for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherin to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceiued his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leauing both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vpror; and extremitie of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but euen such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Archagathus was extremely safe; I neede not vse wordes to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriuing him of the succours which reason offered, the sequels doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse companie, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for ninetene talents. Likewise, Agathodes himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equal termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discovered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. He deuised new engines of torment; wherein struing to exceede the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brasse, that should serue to scorch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutish affections. In these mischiefes he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Affick. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Countrey, tooke armes against him, and draue him into such feare, that he was faine to seeke the Ioue at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might haue had in Sicill. He freely deliuered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phoenicians in Sicill, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him, honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebels, and setled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicill, he made a voiage into Italie. There he subdued the Bruttians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their Gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he belieue those to be Gods, that had continually giuen deaf eares to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grieuous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and linewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger sonne of his owne, beganne to contend about the Kingdome.

Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he flue his Vncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdome without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Agathocles with leare and sorrow. He saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngacious Nephew, from whom hee knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only hee now held deare, which were, Theogenia, and her children. Therefore hee aduised her and them to flie before they were surpris'd: for that otherwise they could by no means auoid, ei-10 ther death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speede into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease 70 confirmed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as he first beganne it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traite-roussly occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians beginne to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished.
 20 For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly champaigne field, wherin Rome and Carthage should fight for supe-rioritie. In which bulinesse, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our storie will declare.

¶ V.

30 A recontinuacion of the Roman warre in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsooke the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

HEN Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace; 1 knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfe by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once hee 40 had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masterie.
 In this good moode, the new Roman Confulls, M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vse of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Confulls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusian held them busied (which I finde not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the 50 whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straying

themselves to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathodes: and therefore knew, that it was able to bear out a very strong sieg. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had bene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vtermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into slaucric: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could withdraw it from the partie of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathodes, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as he might preferre his owne tyranie: the latter, as a iust and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enjoyed a long and happie raigne; lining deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compass it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first seffe, and first victerie by Sea. Of Sea-fight in general.

AGRIGENTUM, hauing sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victualls, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to beset them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arriued, they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the seat of the warre, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

* Agrigentum was a goodly Citie, built by the Gelsi, vnder conduct of Archias and Pylissus.

The compass was ten miles about the walls; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This Citie, by reason of the fertilitye of the soyle, and the neighbourhood of Carthage, grew in a short space, from small beginnings, to great glorie and riches. The plenty and luxurie thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the Agrigintines built Palaces of such sumptuous, as if they meant to liue for euer; and made such feasts, as if they meant to die the next day. But their greatest pompe and magnificence, was in their goodly Temples, and Theaters; Water-conduits, and Fish ponds: the ruines whereof at this day are sufficient argument, that Rome it selfe could neuer boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Iupiter Olympus, (by which we may iudge of the Temple it selfe) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Graues, fighting with the Gods, all cut out in polished marble of diuers colours; on the other side, the ruines of Troy, and the entrie thereto: he that seeth, with the personages of the Heros that were doers in that warre; all of the like beautiful forme, and of equal stature to the bodies of men in those ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter workes of that kind, are but petty things, and meere trifles. It would require a volume, to expresse the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, Zeus Olympus, Cerberus, Ianus Lacinia, Chastite, Proserpine, Cerberus, and Pallax; wherein the Master-pieces of those exquisite Painters, and Caruers, Phidias, Zexis, Myron, and Polycletus, were to be seene. But in process of time it rained the same fortune that it other great Cities, haue done, and was ruined by diuers calamities of warre, whereof this warre present brought vnto it not the least.

The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returned into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Manlius, arriued. They goe on towards Agrigentum; and finding no enemie in the field, they besiege it, though it were stufed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of haruell being come, a part of the Roman armie range the Countrey to gather corne, and those at the sieg grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse: but by the smart feult on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, & the besieged kept within their court. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betweene twene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter suddenly, by a fallie, nor those of the Countrie without, breake vpon them vnwares: which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiuing any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilist the Syracusan supplies the assails with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage: after they had bene in this fort pent vp five moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno; who arriues with it at Hierades, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesiu, a Citie wherein the Romans had bestowed all their prouision. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse straitly assailed by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: in so much, as if Hiero had not supplied them, they had bene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Hierades, he makes appoach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directes the Numidian horse-men to charge their Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne, as broken, till they came to the body of the Armie, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground.

20 The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beats thereto into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some oportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal, that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremity which he indured, was able to brooke such dilatorie courses. Hanno therupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight. But, his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recouered Hierades. Annibal perceiving this, and remaying hopelesse of succour, resolu'd to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and seared by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rust out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: sure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purpose henceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolu'd in the beginning of this Warre, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts:

40 but now they determine, to make themselves Lords of all Sicily; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile ouer into Africke. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and of priuate men, to cower the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vie and fruition of what we haue already. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World to this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius, and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many inland Townes gaue themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets as also to equall themselves in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in shipwrights-craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks, to the shore.

Now had the Romanes a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quingueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on euery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-sands many seats, in order of the banks in Gallies, wheront they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the strooke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consulls (for they changed euery yeare) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, than well aduised, past ouer to Messena with seuentene Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needs row alongt the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some peece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Governour in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea-mans arrival, sent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies, to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies and their Consull; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had bene. For he, fancying to himselfe to surprise the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; fought them out with a fleet of fiftie sail: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and, leaving the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but seuentene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but gae the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Dulius. Dulius, considering that the Roman vessells were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speede of them, deuised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, where by they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) board and board, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the weightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Marriners craft; the Vessells, wherain both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heuier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they, by reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may be giuen betwene one of the long boates of his Majesties great ships, and a London-barge.

Certainely, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, muſt be skilfull in making choice of Vessells to fight in: he muſt belecue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and muſt know, that there is a great deale of difference, betwene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Stroffie lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquisse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been lost in the yeare 1588, if he had not bene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with those great and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equal to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not bene worthe to haue held his head. Here to speake in generall of Seafight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands, than for the Presse) I say, That a fleet of twentie ships, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neare together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall back vpon their next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable, or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselves scope, after they haue giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may giue them the other: and fo the twentie ships batter them in peeces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vsf but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred saile giue themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellows keepe the winde: and if vpon a Leeflowe; the ships next the winde be constrained to fall back into their owne squadron, then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it selfe. That such aduantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speede, it hath bene well enough conceiued in old time; as by that Oration of Hieroclerates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians inuaded them, it may easily be obserued.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord HENRIE, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclypse of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall wordes and sorrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leues loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by loosing their aduantage of swift boats, and boording the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies, by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege laied vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Masella, with some other places.

Diuers enterfeats of warre, betwene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success. The Romans prepare to invade Africk: and obtaine a great victorie at Sea.

He victorie of Dulcius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naual triumph, that was euer seene in that City; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great encouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicily, but all the other Isles betwene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrarie side, Annicar the Carthaginian, lying in Parormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a-part, hee sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnwares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land warre in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately bene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith hee arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entrayned for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicily, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set vpon him vnwares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted, himselfe hardly escaping their danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were to ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voyage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath been said of old) Non est bis in bello peccator; in warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long creany thing of importance was done by the Confulls, till Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein belovved: they departed thence, and tooke certaine inland Townes, as Mytistratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, betwene Panormus and Messina. The year following, C. Atilius the Consul, who commanded the Roman fleet, discovered a Companie of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haste hee made, and lost all, save the Gallie which transported him: where-in himselfe escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Atilius his fleet was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victorie remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to trie at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirtie Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fittie,  Tiremes, Quadrimes, and Quingetemes.

The Romans resolve to transport the warre into Africk; the Carthaginians, to assault them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and fortie thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fittie thousand: reckoning one hundred and twentie Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers, to eury Gallie. one with the other. The Roman fleet was diuided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first Squadrons making the Flanks,

* If we may give credit to Antiquities, which Faxellus, a diligent writer, hath left vs in his Historie of Sicily; Panormus, now called Palerme, is one of the first Cities that hath bene built in all Sicily. For whereas Theopompus seems to make it a Colonie of the Phoenicians; Romanus, in his libelle de Panormo, lib. 6. affirms, that it was first, and long before the time which Theopompus takes to make it the Chaldees, and Dominians. To prove which, he tells vs of two inscriptions vpon marble, in the Hebreu Character, found at Panormus in the time of William the second, King of Sicily; that were then beheld of all the Citizens, and other strangers; which, being translated into Latine, say as followeth. Vincite Isaac filius Abrahæ, et regnate in Sidonia, atq; in Valle Damascena, Isaac filius Isaac; regem Hebreorum manus, quibus aduocati sunt multi Damasceni, atq; iudices, preseth in hoc triangularem Insulam, sedet per vna loca in vna domo, Isaac filius Isaac, regem Peru, manu romanorum. In the other marble table are found these wordes. Non est alius Deus præter unum Deum; non est alius Potens, præter eundem Deum, &c. Ihuu Turru Præfatus est Sapha, filius Eliphaz filij Isaac, fratris Isaac filij Isaac, filij Abrahæ; et Turri quidam ipse nomen est Rayth, sed Turri huius proxime nomen est Pharah. And this inscription (saith Faxellus) was found intire in the Castle of Byth, in the year one thousand five hundred, thirtie and foure. Now whether these inscriptions were truly so ancient, as they men beleue they were, I leave eury man to his owne faith. But that the Citie was of aged times, it appears by Theopompus, who affirmeth; when the Greekes past fr B into Sicily, that then the Iubians inhabited Panormus: which certaintie is that they did in the first Punic warre; to wit, the Carthaginians, who were Phoenicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilius and C. Cornelius, commanding this Army) tooke it. And when Marcellus besieged Syracusa, it sent him in aide three thou and Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than subiect to the Romans. For Cyros against Petres, names it among the free Cities of Sicily. After Syracusa destroyed, it became the fifth Citie and Ro-gallent, as well of the Gauls and Saracens in that Iland, as of the Emperours of Constantinople, of the Normans, French, and Aragonians: which honour it holds to this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which grows about it.

 The Quadrimes Gallies, where in eury one hath five men to draw it; the Quadrimes had foure to an Oare, and the Tiremes three. Some here thought, that the Quadrimes had five ranks of Oares one ouer another; and the other Gallies (scarcely) fewer. But had this been so, they must then haue had six decks, each ouer other: which hath seldom been seen in ships of a thousand Tonnes; neither could the third, fourth, and fifth ranks, haue reached vnto the water with their Oares, and the third Squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Consuls as Admirals) looking toward the enemie; and the middle space lying empty.

 Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third Squadron. After all came vp the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne: so that the horns of it inclosed all the third Squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceiue by the relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the Ei each call Combat en hay; a long front of horse, and thinne: which forme, since the *P*istoll 10 prevailed ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behind this first out-stretched front, their Battalions were more solide. For Amlicar, Admirall of the Carthaginians, had thus order'd them, of purpose, (his Gallies hauing the speede of the Romans) that, when the first fleet of the Romans halted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victorie) should themselves, and, for easynesse of taking the Runne-awaies, leaue their other three Squadrons farre behind them. For so must it needs fall out, seeing that the third Squadron tow'd their horse-boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rear-ward of all. According to Amlicars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Carthaginian first fleet, which ran 20 away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speede possible, not so much as looking behinde them for the second Squadron. Herby the Romans were drawne neare vnto the bodie of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amlicar, and by him (at the first) receiued great losse, till their second Squadron came vp, which forced Amlicar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, inuaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amlicar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to sustaine both Squadrons. The Rear being relieued, the Consuls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which tow'd their victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans; 30 but the Consuls, joyning their Squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running. This victorie fell to the Romans, partly by the hardnesse of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amlicar, being first beaten, could neuer after joyne himselfe to any of his other Squadrons, that remained as yet in faire like-hood of prevailing, so long as they fought vpon even termes, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amlicar, forsaking the fight, there by left a full fourth part of the Roman fleet vningaged, and readie to giue succour to any of the other parts that were opprest. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they 40 lost but foure and twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirte that were sunk, and threescore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amlicar who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also diuided his fleet into foure Squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front, to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, while hee himselfe fought with one Squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had bene at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second Squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amlicar was opprest; and Amlicar, being opprest and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieue both their third and fourth Squadron, and got the victorie.

Charles the first, among other his Precepts to Phillip the second his sonne, where he aduiseh him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes 50 betweene them and the Christians, he should neuer faile to charge the Tanisars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Tanisars, who are a waies refused intire, in the Rear of the battaile, and in whom the Turke repositeth his greatest confidence; come vp in a grosse body, when all the troupes, on both sides, are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victorie

victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reuerſation, did the Romans also preuaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triary in fore (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious advantage it hath euer bene found, to keepe some one or two good troups to looke on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Africa. ATILIVS the Consull proposeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

OW the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-vitalled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heraclae in Sicily, where Amilcar himselfe as yet laid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they disembarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yielded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inuasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither; but being aduertised, that they had taken Clypea, they made preparations of all sorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waite all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Consulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne with the fleet, into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Consull is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thousand African captiues, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, siterne thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse, that were left with Attilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vnwalled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adu. Yet I hold it worthe of relation, that nere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, he encountered with a Serpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, being driuen to vie against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adu he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Bostar, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicily sixe thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse, to succour his Countrey. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold them selves free, from necessity of coming to blowes; yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adu out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adu, they incampe nere vnto him, and strongly (as they thinke) on the top of an hill: but thereby they loose the seruices, both of their Elephants, and of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discouers, and makes vse of it. He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a-while; but in fine the Romans preuaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to * Tunisi, a Citie within sixteene miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

* This Citie was taken from the Turkes by Charles the fifth, in the yeare 1536, and was one of the three Keyes, which he gaue in charge to Philip the second his sonne to keepe safe; to wit, this Tamisi, the Key of Africa; Flisburgh, the Key of the Netherlands; and Calles, the Key of Spain.

But two of these Philip sold, that hee neuer found them againe; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to write out of his hands; where we find not so pickney's lock, but brake open the doores, and hauing rifled all, throw it into the fire.

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly diminished. The Nomisians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territories, and force those that inhabit abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Asilius findes his owne aduantage, and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet he feared least it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office, that was neare expired, should be quite runne out, whereby the new Confulls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthie and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so courageous and disdainfull, that they resolu'd, either to defend their libertie, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arriv'd at the sametime a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians received neare vnto Adis, gaue it out publicly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made General of the African forces, he puts him selfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more than twelve thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wiues, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misse-numbered; the one consisting of an hundred and fortie thousand, and the other of an hundred and sixtie thousand: were it not commonly found, that they which vse the service of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troupes vpon faire and leuell ground, fitted both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soone abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants: Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive back the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had bene accustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subject vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the enemy did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie, which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horse-men, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onfet was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the Squadrons neuertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing at the first encounter, by reason of their aduantage in number, driven those of Asilius out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who being forced to turne face euery way, could neither passe forward, nor yet retire; but had much a doe to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell vpon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good good array. It was no euen match. The one were a disorderd Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to haue dealt with the enimie vpon equall termes. Here was therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans haistily recoiling to the body of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enimie, and spent with traualle, fell all to rout, vpon the defeat of these troops, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtayned a full victorie; destroying the whole Roman Armie, saue two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Asilius the Consull. Of their owne they lost no more than eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans, that wheeling about, to auoide the Elephants, bare downe all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lesse her vassalls, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent foeuer they had bene in their propolition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which shee neuer gaue nor sold to any mortall man. With what joy these newes were well-commended, when they came to Carthage, we may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to prove, no lesse than this of Xanippus: all of them confirming that sentence of EVANGELISTES, Mens vna sapiens, plurimum vincit manus; Many mens hands equall not one wise minde.

After this great seruice done to the Carthaginians, Xanippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more enuid than honoured, or for what other cause, it is vnknowne.

Regulus
The death of Asilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorabile. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranfome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne, if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Countrie should looke by the bargain: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to haue the prisoners in Africa left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to haue judged him an obdinate and malicious enimie; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to perseuer himselfe and others, by yielding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatfoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word giuen, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appears, in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vaine glorious forwardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made soone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more grieuous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herin; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans deserved to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinarie practise to vse others in the like sort. Crueltye doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being custumarie. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were such, as had alwaies made faire warres with them. Wherefore fore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall insolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, wherinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by mere desperation; calls to remembrance the like intolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the liker resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath beene denied. In such cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carrie vs away.

- 10 In the year 1378. the Genovais wonne so fast vpon the Venetians, as they not only draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genovais (their state refused) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doris, blowne vp with many former victories, would hearken to no compulsion; saue the yielding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remayning power, and assailed Doris with such desperate furie, that they breake his fleet; kill Doris himselfe; take nineteene of his Gallies, fourecore boats of Padua, and foure thousand prisoners; recover Chiozza, and all the places taken
- 20 From them; and following their victorie, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genovais, basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flaners, in the year 1380. when hauing taken a notable, and withall an our-crueell reuenge vpon the Gantois, he refused mercie to the rest; who in all humilitie, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vnadvisedly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them vtterly; they issue out of their Citie with fiftethousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell)
- 30 with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe vnder an heape of straw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and laud himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

§. I X.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against ATILIVS: How the Romans hauing lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to forsake the Seas:

The great advantages of a good fleet in warre, betweene Nations diuided by the Sea.

- 40
- BY the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had bene lost in Africk, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Attilius with their forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was besieged, make readie a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and little Gallies, commanded by M. Emilius, and Ser. Fuluius, their Consuls. At the Promontorie of Mercurie two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans tooke
- 50 by force an hundred and foureene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had bene besieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this halitie voyage they despise the aduice of the

Pilots,

Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatened some violent stormes; which euer hapned betweene the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South-coast of Sicill had no good Ports, wherein to saue themselves vpon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that the winds and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselves. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were aduised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet; to take a few worthlesse Townes vpon the coast. The mercilesse winds in the meane while ouertake them, and neare vnto Camerina, ouertume and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but foure score of three hundred and fortie ships: so as their former great victorie was deuoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recoured Rome.

There is no Part of the World, which hath not some certayne times of outrageous weather beides their accidentall stormes. We haue vpon our coast a Michellmas flaw, that feldome or neuer failes: in the west Indies, in the moneths of August and September, those most horrible winds which the Spaniards call the Wertes, or Northwinds, are very fearefull: and therefore they that Nauigate in those parts, take harbour till those moneths take end. Charles the first being as ill aduised, in passing the Seas towards Agira, in the Winter quarters, contrary to the counsaile of A. Doria, as he was in like vncertaine times to continue his fleet before Mete in Loraine, lost an hundred and fortie ships by tempest, and likewise Gallies, with all an effect in them of men, vicuallies, horses, and munition: a losse no lesse great, than his retreat, both from before this one and the other, was extreme dishonourable.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Vessells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-²⁰ forces since the ouerthrow of Atilius. They send Afarbal into Sicill with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arriues at Lilybaum; where hee beginnes to vex the Partisans of Rome. But aduersitie doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicill, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leauing a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Serulius, and C. Semprenius, their Consulls. But these wrought no³⁰ wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to haue perished, neare vnto the lesse Syrtis, where they were faine to heaue all ouer-board, that so they might get off: then, having with much a doe doubled the Cape of Lilybaum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fiftie of their ships by soule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the warres fauoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enrich them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred and sixe ships and gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.⁴⁰

The exceeding damage hereby received, perswaded them to giue over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Sicill, vnder L. Cassius, and C. Furius, their Consulls. These they transported in some three score ordinarie passage-boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not about a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the ouerthrow which Atilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeares after they kept the high and woodie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicill, without a Naue, much lesse to maintain the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybaum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicill, making sometimes a march of about an hundred and fortie English mile by land, which which could not be performed with an Armie, and the provisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and fortie hours.

* An Old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, betwene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauiie and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and sailing to the West, landed in Dorset-shire, so drawing Edmond and his Armie thither. There finding ill entertainment, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcestershire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back againe to London: by means whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least helpe, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Matters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue bene able to doct. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages haue brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Besleuwe, or Gertruiden-Berg; which the enemy (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victuals. But as soone as the wind serued, he suddenly set saile, and arriuing in the mouth of the Meuse, turned vp the Rhine, and thence to Tiel, and fate downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march ouer land round about Holland, about fourefcore mile, and ouer many great Riuers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armie had ouercome this wearisome march, and were now farr from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vp the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spanish armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was no sooner arriued in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Hulst, set saile againe, and presented him selfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance, and maltred it.

And to say the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not hauing the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second, had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lisborne; and that he would haue kept off the English, by power of his land-forces, as being too weake at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mightie Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth; in the yeare foregoing. Surely, it had not bene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleuen thousand. But where should this his Armie haue bene bestowed? If about Lisborne, then would it haue bene ealie vnto the English, to take, ranfack, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waite the Countrie round about it. For the great and threating preparations, of the Earle of Altemira, the Marquesse of Serabes, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leaue of eight thousand, vnder the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Associates; considering, that the English charged the selfe, at Paenete de Burgois, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countrie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begunne beganne the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haile to the defence of their St. Iago, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir John Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they haue hindered his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Peniche, and march ouer the Countrie to Lysborne, lixe daies iourne? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the Riuer of Lysborne to Cascais, and there, hauing wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an invading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Cæsars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmatiue. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatiuely; as, that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemy from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him wish, that he had staied at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positiue, Whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is vnable to doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduerture. For the encouragement of a first victorie to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the intruded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Montuc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guenne, they of the Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncouster, entred that Coun-trie, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable meanes, eu si bien garde de Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire boire ses Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the Riuer of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrarie side, prefers the not fighting vpon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuers consideration to be had, betwene such a Countrie as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuasions vpon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vnertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported our Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countrie, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrie: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandie Bay. had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted;
 That Kent is able to furnish twelue thousand foot; and that those twelue thousand be laied in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and fixe thousand at Faulk-ston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall fee the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this prouision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Ile of Wight, in the first

first watch of the night, and towing their long boats at their sternes, shall arriue by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be had for three thousand that are at Margat (twentie and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foullston bee able to doe it, who are nearer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enimic, at his first arriuall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillerie, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to runne; or else giue them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to send for helpe to Foullston, and perhaps to Margat: where by those places will be left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arriue at the Nesse, ere the enimic can be readie to disimbarque his Armie, so that he shall finde it vnsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleue, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (hauing libertie to goe which way he list) vnder couert of the night, set saile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may bee said of Weymouth, Parbeck, Peale, and of all landing places on the South coast. For there is no man ignorant, that ships, without putting themselues out of breath, will easily out-runne the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne volent point en postes, Armes neither flee, nor runne poit, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lizard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in sixe daies. Again, when those troops, lodged on the Sea-floores, shall be forced to runne from place to place, in vaine, at a fleet of ships; they will at length sit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all aduenture. But say it were otherwise; that the invading enimic will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Armie of ours readie to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captaines, shall be drawne together (as they were at Tilburie in the year 1588) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should haue landed in England.

The Ile of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being euery where hard of access; hauing no good harbour wherem to shelter a Naue of friends; and vpon euery coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur de Chettes, that held it to the vse of Don Antonio, with sixe or sixte thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquess of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquess hauing the wedd himselfe in the Rode of Auera, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arriued at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where hee wanne a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chettes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stroffie, flaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chettes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquess his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would bee perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and back againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe, when they found themselves preuented by the more nimble ships of Spain.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England.

France, or elsewhere, vntlesse it be hindered, encountred, and shuffed together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeare 1597. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, myselfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may, by a ciuill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraude me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to vndertake it; and I hearkned vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they desired me, to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place; yea euen there where I landed, if I would haue taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honor of our Prince & Nation, that a few Ilanders should not thinke any advantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Country Captaines, and others, not of mine owne Squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would haue been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne taile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Haruey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thinne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vndertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we overcame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more private, than to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauerie, and take the shorter course; hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off, when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concerns the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember, that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he fought how to stop vs in place of his advantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had wonne good footing, would needs follow vs to the Towne, were driuen by him, to forsake the pace of a man of warre, and betake the themselves to an halting trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Majesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon upon their owne ground, or elsewhere, by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beeste in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Majestic, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

- 10 How the Romans attempt againe to get the mastery of the Seas. The victorie of Cæcilius the Roman Consull at Panormus. The siege of Lilybeum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybeum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous losses received, vnder CLAVDIVS and LVNIVS their Consulls, abandon the Seas againe.

- Men, without a strong Naue, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elsewhere, they resolu'd once againe, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of warre. So caulding fittie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consulls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwrack which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were lesse daring than they had bene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Consulls was returned into Italye, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with only the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybeum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consull was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approches somewhat neare the Towne, Cæcilius cauld a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betwene which and his trench he leif ground sufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should aduance them selues, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thru't vpon them. From those beaulls he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinck of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accotdingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawied and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vterly disordered them. Cæcilius, espying this aduantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he vterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.
- 40

The report of this victorie being brought to Rome, the whole state, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted fourteene years. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolu'd to attempt Lilybeum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all (indeed) saue Drepanum, that was neare adjoyning. They set downe before it, and possesse them selues of all the places of aduantage neare vnto it, especially of such as command the haue, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fix towres of defence; & by forceable engines weaken so many other parts of the citie, as the defendants begin to despair.

H h h h h

Yet

Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the furious attacks that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is revealed by an Achaean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saved Agrigentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to allure the hired Souldiers; and implieth Hannibal to appease the troupes of the Gauls, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enimie. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, which were able to performe what they had vnderaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal, the sonne of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible joy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolute set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the utmost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficulty defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybaeum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruice; and hauing received his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Egosa, a little Iland neare Lilybaeum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channell, and recouered the water gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thinke from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the court of the darke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipping his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recouered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being compassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprife, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre-off, the aduerture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no, though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouths against him, and threaten to teare him in peeces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at Warre; our East-Land fleet, bound for Leifland, was forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatened to sink their ships if they came through the straits of Ellenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of hey Asticities, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduerture; and, supplying some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could, to stop them, or sink them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Port of Ellenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound wound received. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to murther it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Cannon on the banke of the River, so well to purpose, and so euen with the face of the water, that he thought it impoſſible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne vp by any winde of glorie, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Antwerp, passed in boats of ten or twelue Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of floud fauoured them; as also with a contrarie

10 winde, and an ebbing water, they turned back againe: so as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the River, to his meruallous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeare 1596. when we entred the Port of Calix; neither did the Fort at Punal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaid vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blank, from six in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be giuen for prooffe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driuen to turne vpon a bow line towards it, wanting all 20 helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and fearefull: otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: He arriues in safetie at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilycum. Others also, after this, take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choke the channel; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides clears it againe in part: but they grounded so many of those great-bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Island, in the passage. Heraby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night,

30 and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne herselfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chace, and gathered vpon him; he findes what hee is, both by her forme, and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolved to fight with her: But hee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilycum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lilycum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vndertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellows of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to sterue the Defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Confull. He arriues at Messana, and marcheth ouer land to Lilycum: where hauing re-inforced the Armie; and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surpris of Drepanum, a Citie on the other

50 side of the Bay of Lilycum. This seruice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Confull imbarques his troops, and arriues on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arriued at Lilycum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but hauing recovered his spirits, he per-

swades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall hee promise th great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserue them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Hauing sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, de- ceiu'd of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now mar- shall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Aberhal findes and follows his aduantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, hauing the land on his back: hop- ing thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompass'd. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roume, so streightned, as he could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Aberhal for this seruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indis- cretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threescore Gallies, with which they send away L. Iunius, their Consull, to take charge of their businesse in Sicil. Iunius arriues at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaeum. One hundred and twentie Gallies he had; and besides these, he had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie provisions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arriues at Syracuse, where he staies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of sail; to keepe com- panie with him along from Messana. In the meane time, he dispatcheth away to- wards Lilybaeum, his Quessors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their conuoy.

Aberhal was not carelesse, after his late victorie: but studied how to vse it to the best aduantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies he deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten more vnder his owne charge, and sent him to trie, what good might be done against the Roman fleet, in the Haven of Lilybaeum. According to this direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he findes the Romans, more atten- tive to the keeping in of the besieg'd Carthaginians; than to the defence of their owne against another fleet. So he chargeth them, boords and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himileo, Governour of the Towne, is not behinde hand; who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans in great distresse, giues Carthalo good leisure to goe through with his enterprize.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicil, deuising how to worke himselfe to the enemy: wherein Fortune presented him with a faire oc- casion, which he wisely managed. He was aduertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neare at hand; a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessells. These were the victuallers, which the Consull Iunius, more hastily than prudently, had sent before him towards Lilybaeum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accom- pting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to seeke shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder covert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to saue them only from the present dan- ger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthagi- nians that assailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay wait- ing for the rest, that could not long ride vnder those rocks, but would be forced, by

- by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to save their men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilſt he was buied in this care; the Conſull Iunius drew neare, and was diſcovered. Againſt him Carthago makes out, and ſinides him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Conſull had neither meanes to ſiege, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewiſe ran into a very dangerous Creeke, thinking no danger ſo great, as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian, ſeeing this, betakes himſelfe to a Station betwene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to ſee which of them would firſt ſtirre, with a reſolution to aſſault that, which ſhould firſt dare to put it ſelfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coaſt of Stal, betwene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybaum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde ſtormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempeſt, and their ſigns, ſinding belike ſome ſwelling billow (for ſo we doc in the Weſt of England; before a Southerly ſtorme) halted to double the Cape of Pachinus; thereby to cover themſelves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Navigate, and neuer found a ny ſoule weather in the entrailles of their beaſts, their Spothfayers being all land-prophets, were ſuddenly overtaken with a boiſterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced againſt the rocks, and vicerly wrackt.
- 20 This calamitie ſo diſcouraged the Romans, that they reſolved againe to forſake the Seas, and truſt only to the ſervice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But ſuch a reſolution cannot long hold. Either they muſt be ſtrong at Sea, or elſe they muſt not make warre in an Iland, againſt thoſe that have a mightie fleet. Yet are they to be excuſed, in regard of the many great calamities which they had ſuffered, through their want of ſkill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We ſeldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured ſo many miſadventures and miſeries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Diſcoveries. Yet perſiſting in their enterpriſes, with an invincible conſtancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome ſo many goodly Prouinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers paſt. Tempeſts and ſhipwracks, famine, overthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, peſtilence, and all manner of diſeaſes, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, haue bene the enemies, wherewith every one of their moſt noble Diſcoverers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many yeares haue paſſed over ſome of their heads, in the ſearch of not ſo many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue ſpent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in ſearch of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their firſt ſetting forth: All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and ſixt vnder-takers, haue not bene diſheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with thoſe Treasuries, and Paradifes, which they enjoy; and well they deſerve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by AMILCAR; who stoutly holds waere with them five yeares. The Romans hauing emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet, at the charges of private men. The great victricie at Sea of LVCATIVS the Confull, whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace, whereby conditions of the peace betwene Rome and Carthage.

He Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Eryx, and seeke to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Confull Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had receiued, be thought him what enterprise to vndertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountayne and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betwene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making 20 roades into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the tenth yeare of this waere, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Barca, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italie, did thoroughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicill; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that serued fitly to infect the Romans, he occupied a peece of ground of great aduantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to 30 confront as well the Romans; that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betwene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, waisting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicill he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neare vnto Panormus, where in three yeares abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he vndertooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on 40 the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conceived his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middelt of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were mightily held (as it were) besieged. And as lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such ascamed to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeares more; hoping still to yeare out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrarie did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherin it seemes true (as Hannibal, in L. i. c. 3. l. 10. saies) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the waere, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had vterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistlesse; Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquitted himselfe, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the triall of five yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not superiour, to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had bene deuised and done, for the dislodging of this obdurate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the maiestie of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The common treasure was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprize. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purses. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme; which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, joynd with some others, and laying their monie together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another: with condition to be repaid, when the warre was finished. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Phoenician, in the Port of Lilybaeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lucilius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicily, the Spring following, and entered the Port of Drepanum: endeavouring by all means to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late losses which his Predecessours had receiued; he was careful to put himselfe in order, against their arriuall.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of seeming reuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I do not finde; but it was vpheld by a factious contradiction, of things vndertaken by men more worthie than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is auerse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by euery losse receiued. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grieuous oppressours of their subiect Provinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great losse. He had ere this bene employed against the Nomadic, and wild Africans, that were more like to Routers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsaile, when, hauing shewed himselfe an vnworthie Captaine, he betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Historics, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preferre the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he was deserued of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Naue, with all needfull provisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither bene carefull in trayning his Marriners, to the practise of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellows. Hee thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the resistlesse force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had either

Handwritten: Handwritten:

conceiued a-right, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to saile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and hauing thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the chemierpent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good course, if it could haue beene performed. But Catulus used all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this designe: not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian flect was delcried; yet he rather chose to fight with the enemy, that had the winde of him, than to suffer this conuoy to passe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better opportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should haue done, Catulus had performed. Hee had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; hee had lightned his Gallies of all vnnecessary burthen; and hee had taken aboard the choice men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were vterly broken and defeated; hauing loste of their Gallies stemed and sunke, and seuentie taken, wherein were few lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudder change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hierone.

321 The state of Carthage, vterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resoue. Meanes to repaire their flect in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, vpon whose valour and judgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicill, where he could not be relieued. In this extremitie, they make a dispatch vnto Amilcar himselfe, and authorize him to take what course should seeme best vnto his excellent wisdome; leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduersitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recouerie, had euer vanquished, looking ouer every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolu'd to make triall, whether his necessitie might be compounded vpon any reasonable termes. He therefore sent to Lucilius the Confull an Ouer-ture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present povertie of the Roman State, waited beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly hearkned vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearly abandon the Ile of Sicill. Secondly, that they should neuer vndertake vpon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send back into Italie, all the Romans, whom they hold prisoners, without ranfome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirtene hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the fame to be deliuered within twentie yeares next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not throughly approoued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicill, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former summe; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicill it selfe, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betwene it and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such

Such was the end of the first Punick Warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeares with out intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack, about seven hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about five hundred: the greatnesse of which losses, doth serve to proue the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius; That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the brauet Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthie Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

p. I.

Of the cruell warre begonne betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

THE Romans, hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and all the little Ilands thereunto adjacent, gaue them rather means and leisure to helpe themselves in a following warre, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is a true rule, Quid leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerers, and receiued of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Priuerates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this waighie bulinesse.

For when one of Prinerum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage ouer them; he answered in these words, Si bonam dederint, & fidem & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you giue vs, it will be perpetual; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiam; an credi posse, vilius populum, aut bonum deniq; in ea condicione, cuius eum patireat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who would beleue, that any people, or indeede any one man, would continue longer in an ouer-burdened estate, than mere necessity did enforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this judgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior vnto themselves, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour receiued than vntill they could recover their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only priuate men, but Kings and publique States, haue more prevailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue;

with-held the tempest from the Romans; for a time, and turned it most tearfully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punic Warre was ended; Amilcar, leauing Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conueniently the Armie might bee transported into Africa: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gesio, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiency, he deliuered ouer his charge. Gesio had an especial consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great difabilitie to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arriv'd. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not bene hard to per-15 wade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present empresse of the common Treasurie did require: so that the first might haue bene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilest their disunition had made them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique state, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detain'd the first and second commers; telling them, that they 20 would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, nor accustom'd vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might be lesse troublesome. This must be done by some colourable wordes of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiuing euery one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to dislodge; leauing 30 behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancy to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to doe, and therefore might easily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their monie came in; how much would fall to euery single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and he wasthought a man of worth, that could 40 finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very higheft, euen beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable wordes and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as if some obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arriv'd, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the account. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be maderich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to helpe his charges, wherat the common-wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally desires them to hold them selues contented with part of their pay, and out of the loone which they bare vnto the citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceiued the whole tenour of his speech, had informed the rest; what cold comfort hee brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, so that nothing would serue to appease them. Hanno would haueaine affwaged their furie, but he knew not how: for hee lesse vnderstood their dissonant lowde noises, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred vp to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters, and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some, for want of skill; others, of set purpose; and such as deliuer his errandes in the worst sense, are best beleued. Finally, they thinke them selues much abused, by the Carthaginians, and resolute to demand their owne, in peremptorie termes, at a nearer dillicance. In this moode they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a litle of Carthage, and there they incampe.
50 memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made vnto them; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a verie formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the povertie of Carthage; tellsthem, how great a summe of mony is to be paid vnto the Romans; reckons vp the excessiue

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne error. It is a good rule,

Cura dum in primis, ne magna iniuria sit Fortibus & miseris:

Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not opprest with too great iniurie.

But this proude citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath also bene carelesse in providing to secure her selfe against the inconuenience that might followe. She had suffered the whole multitude, wherunto shee was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily haue beene dispersed: shee hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of these poore men, which had thee retained in shewe of kindnesse, shee might haue vsed them, as Hostages, for her owne safetie; and by employing a miserable pennie father, in her negotiation with men of warre, shee hath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue serued to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be vsed as an instrument in defrauding his owne souldiours of their wages: especially considering, that as he best could beare witness of their merits, so was hee not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing thereunto. Here to may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter eacmie to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of this owne wretched counsaile, vpon the liberal promises made by the Captaines Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begunne. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the souldiours; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euer and anone some of their Senators into the Campe; who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus, by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the souldiours vnderstand, into what feare the city was driuen; which cannot but adde much insolencie to the passions already stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the

Armie, which thereupon grows wife, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great haruel. Monie must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their horses, in publique seruice of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had liued some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiuing their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat, therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in prouision; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not serue. They said that they had bene sometimes driuen to buy; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that whcar had borne, whilest the warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easly haue bene satisfied with fare lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the first. But now they make none end of craving. For whilest the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this come-monie; the Souldiers haue deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater summe of monie, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of these controuersies, which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Skil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choice of Geseo: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed him selfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk: partly out of dislike which they had conceiued of Amilcar; for that hee had not visited them in all this busie time. So Geseo comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without monie: which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calles vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then, the seuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; aduising them temperately concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaies be mindfull of their good seruices. After this he beganne to put hand to his purse: offering to giue them their whole paie in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings, at a more conuenient time. This had bene well accepted, and might haue serued to bring all to a quiet passe, if two seditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a sturdy fellowe, and audacious, but a slave; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whom hee serued, and therefore stood in feare, lest hee should be deliuered backe to his Master, at whose hands hee could expect no lesse, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raising such troubles, as might serue to withdraw men from care of priuate matters, and make his owne restitution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there associated him selfe one Atarbo; an hote-headed man, that had bene so forward in stirring vp the tumult, as hee could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should bee made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behaviour. This Atarbo deals with his countremen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worse condition, than either the Gauls, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreyn mercinaries. For (saith he) these our companions haue no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but wee, that are to stay behinde in Africk, shall bee called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; so that wee shall haue cause to wish, that wee had returned home beggars, rather than laden with the monie, which (little though it be) shall breake our backs. Ye are not ignorant, how tyrannically these our haughty Masters of CARTHAGE doe reigne ouer vs. They thinke it reasonable, that our liues and goods should bee at their disposition; which they haue at other times bene accustomed to take away from vs, euen without apparent cause, as it were to declare declare their Souerainty: what will they now doe, seeing that we haue demeaned our selues as free men, and beene bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others haue done? Ye all doe knowe, that it were a very shame for vs, if hauing bene as farward in curie danger of waere, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slanes, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithstanding we may assure your selues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as some of our selues are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to shallow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let vs therefore be wise, and consider, that they hate and feare vs. Their hatred will show it selfe, when their feare is once past: unlesse wee now take

- 10 our time, and whilst we are the stronger, enioyne them to gratitie, that their hatred shall not be able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in manie, wherewithall they haue hired others against vs, and vs against others. At the present they haue neither monie nor friends. The best Armie that euer serued them, wherof wee are no small part, lies at their gates, readie to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunitie cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawne, all AFRICK would rise on our side. As for the CARTHAGINIANS, whether can they send for helpe? The case it selfe is plaine: but we must quickly reioyce. Either we must prevent the diligence of GESCO, by incensing these GAVLES and SPANIARDS, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoueth vs to please our good masters, by ioyning with them against our fellowes, yea by offering to forgie vs into them all our wages; if so (peraduenture) they may be warne to forgie vs, or not ouercruelly to punish our faults already committed. He is worthy to reuelted slane, that neither hath care to winne his Masters loue, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By such persuasions Matho winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so gredie of monie, as of quarrell; which hee that seeks will not misse to finde. When Geseo therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuailes, to some other more convenient time; they brake into great outrage, and say that they will haue all, euen all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuel to the already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onlie men to whom the souldiours will hearken: if any other stand vpto make a speech, a shew of stoness, flying about his eares, puts him to silence, that hee shall neuer afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath bene saide already by the good spokemen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save onely tho one, throwe.

- Now the Rebellion beginnes to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, vnder faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Geseo is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but adventures himselfe vpon their furie. One while hee deales with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle wordes: another while he workes with the severall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fallen, as the Africans: indeed none of them had fo good cause. They require him peremptorie, to giue them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couetous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more then Geseo knowes: he sees not that Matho hath any more than bare wordes, to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he telles them, that they may doe well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Captaine, Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure that he had brought yea vpon him also, and all that are with him:

ne. It is intended as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they call into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde: that so the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open warre. Matho sollicites all Africa; and his Embassadors are euerie where well entertained. Neither is it needefull to vse persuasion: the verie fame of this rebellion sufficeth to drawe the whole cuntry into it. Now must the Carthaginians bee plagued for those oppressions, with which they haue plagued others. It is true that Admetus hath neuer bene vtold of her errors: and as she is euere assured to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne shee vndergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang vnder the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their come, that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted vpon their vassals the greatest punishments for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves haue forgotten: but the people, that haue suffered so much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely such as can beare armes, are ready to doe seruice in this great Commotion; but the verie women bring forth their iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for maintenance of so iust a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threescore and tenne thousand Africans: and are moreouer furnished with monie, not onely to satisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begunne, though it should bee of long endurance.

§. II.

Diuerse obseruations vpon this warre with the mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how tyrants are driven to vse helpe of mercenaries.

Here let vs rest awhile, as in a conuenient breathing place: whence we may take prospect of the subiect, ouer which we trauaile. Behold a tyrannicall Citie, persecuted by her owne mercenaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessaric, that a tyrannie should be vpheld by mercenarie forces: it is common that mercenaries should be false: and it is common, that all warre, made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and crueltie. Yet we seldome heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannie is procured or sought, by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or neuer doe we reade of any warre, that hath bene prosecuted with such inexpressible hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is a violent forme of government, not respecting the good of the subiect, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbore to say, that it is the vniuersall rule of one ouer many: for verie truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their subiects, was none other than a meere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselves were a great were a great Citie, and a Popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily bee conceiued, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardlesse of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practise of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very slaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might bee found betwene the worth of severall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee seeke out bounds, to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should haue riches in goodly abundance. Hee hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue spared more. Hee hath wrung all their purses, and now hee hath enough: but (as Cæcilius is neuer fatished) hee thinks that all this is too little for a stock, though it were indeede a good yearlie income. Therefore hee deuise th new tricks of roberie, and is not better pleased with the gaines, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this; and he knowes it well: but hee thinks by crueltie to change hatred in to feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocencie be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in feare, since the T raitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee can thinke vpon none other securitie, than to disarme all his Subjects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustie Souldiers as shall bee thought sufficient. These must not bee of his owne Countrey: for if not euery one, yet some one or other, might chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, hee allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vn honest that can be found; such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose only fauour they are maintayned. Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should bee drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as hee doth; to robbe, to rauish, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outragious manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more hee sees them grow hatefull to all men else. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some English-man perhaps, that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this leate, might suppose this discourse to be little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in neede of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured vnto the Tyrant.

†. I. I.

That the tyrannie of a Citie over her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: 102
and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercinarie

Beloficutio
fre 273

NOW concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subjects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: 10 but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the lesse neede hath shee therefore, to secure her selfe by crueltye. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needes the lesse, to pluck from her Subjects. If warre, or any other great ocasion, driue her to necessitie, of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie summes of monie: the same necessitie makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeede, no wrongs are so grieuous and hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperour, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Juvenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her slauces; that whilst these were whipping what, shee painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances, 20 wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liber-tie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villanie, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselues, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant lodeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. 30
Not without some apparance of truth, it may bee said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall haue neede to vse the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauitie, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtians, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practise, and generall approved custome, we are to censure the qualitie of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice, of any one man; nor by metaphysical abstraction, of the vniuersall from the singular, 40 or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, than vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; hee is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age, or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident, may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his Successeur may proue better. Many Tyrants haue bene changed into worthe Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becoming hereditarie, euen a lawfull Monarchie. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope: their Mistresse is immortal, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they be pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightie Chariotier. This is sofall: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull of the future. New flies, and hungrie ones, fall vpon the same fore, out of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who mean not to returne home empty to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and hony. These flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoeuer else, in all the Prouince, is worthe to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these matterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vnder-gone) and such as e-10 uery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what aualeth it?

The loue of one Governour is purchas'd with gifts: the Succesflour of this man, he is more louing than could be wilhed, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore goers, who seekes the ruine of all that have beene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyrannie are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recouerie, against extorting Magistrates: yet we finde, that it serued not wholly to restrain their Prouinciall Governours; who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groned vnder such oppressions; what must we thinke of those, that were vassalls vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthen some tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for hauing beene ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly deuised by one Magistrate, serued as presidents to instruct another; euery man resolued to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable statesman, whose robberies had bene such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practise, are not extant: the gouernement of Verres the Roman, in Sicily, that is liuely set out by Tullie, may serue to informe vs, what was the demeanour of these Punicke Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subject Prouinces so mildly, as a King: but it is enough to haue shewed, That the tyrannie of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Suteable to the crueltye of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and againe, suteable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the seruice of African souldiers; in Africke it selfe, they had rather bee beholding to others, that were farther fetched. For the same purpose did Lannibal, in the second Punicke Warre, shift his mercenaries out of their owne Countries; Vt Afrin Hispania, Hispani in Africk, melior prociat ab domo futurus vterq; miles, velat mutuis pignori bus obligati stipendia facerent.
 40 That the Africans might serue in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like so prone the better souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were oblig'd by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African, and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subject vnto Carthage and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere desire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand vpon propriete of a word, but 50 hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

The dangers growing from the use of mercinarie Souldiers, and forraigne Auxiliaries.

THE extreme danger, growing from the imployment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are feditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, denoucers, and destroyers of all places and countries, where into they are drawne, as being held by no other bond, than their owne commo-
 10 dity. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but revolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercinaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan; who being entertained by Queene Isabe of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first 20 of that race Duke of Milan: who, being entertained by the Milanois, forced them to become his slaues, euen with the same Armie which themselues had leuied for their owne defence. But Lodouick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the iust iudgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole estate by the trecherie of such faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had becme. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Duchie, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We 30 see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes, against his neighbour Princes; he could neuer, either by perswasion or force, set them againe ouer Sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian seruitude, that soone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, fought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracoz the Turke was called into Egypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his Successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What neede we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The 40 Britaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Alac Murrough drew the Englysh into Ireland: but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the vniued Prouinces of the 50 Netherland; vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. In those these Low Countries haue many goodly and strong Cities, in their late warre. Inhabitant, that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Sea men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified; but in open field they haue seldome beene able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessitie therefore compelled them to seeke helpe abroad: and the like 50 necessitie made them forbear to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raised by their Trade, they maintayned the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as

A might be, whilest they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt it to his grieue, in his retreat from Groeninghen; when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercenaries cried out aloud for monie, and so ranne away. This was not the only time, when the hired souldiers of the States, haue either fought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by mere couetousnesse, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I rouch the honour of Monseieur the Duke of Amian, brother to the French King; saue that it is so lollie to concale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraigne Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monseieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, hee liued to repent it, with grieue enough. Euen whilest he was counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie sorrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleuing the Towne to bee surprisid and wonne; the death of the Count

20 St. Stignon, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne rroupes, informed him better what had hapned, shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in neede of pittie. Then was his faired passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; wherein, finiting his breall, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what spilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlandes will not serue to proue, that there is litle danger in vsing mercinarie souldiers, or the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient vnto necessitie, and fought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger, when the Queen

30 of England refused to accept the Soueraigntie of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continuall warre; when the heire of England raigned in Scotland, a King too iust and wise (though not engaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to helpe those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receiue; but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, to the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order,

40 by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would haue rewarded him with death, if his faith had beene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, raigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may such a Countrey be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may

50 well hold true in general. That mercinarie, and forraigne auxiliairie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemies, against whom they are entertaind.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assurance to use the service of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hinders eith the use and benefit of the like moderation.

HERE may it be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse service of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subjects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoid the inconueniences about heareard? The answer is; That their Armies were compounded of viallie of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Sannites, or other of their subiects, as were either interested in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldome they did imple so many,) tenne Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting: which serue to keepe in good order their subiects, that were alwaies fewer in the Armie than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they enjoyed, made them assured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soeuer, seems trouble some to the necke that hath beene accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of severall advantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subiection. But still they haue beene reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharply punished; and the people, by degrees, haue obtained full libertie, as made them chieeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common cite of all Italie. Yea, in process of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off remooued, euen to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne. That all the Burgeses should bee free of Rome it selfe. This fauour was conferred absolute vpon some; vpon some, with restrainer of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Herunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to releafe vnto their new subiects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readie way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking inuouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, that when some, for their well-deseruing, haue had the offer to be made citizens of Rome, they haue refused it, and held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Petellus, a cite of the Bruitians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subiects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing beene faithfull to the vtmost. Such loue purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning therunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subiects: all or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vse of souereigne power being so effectually, in assuring the people vnto their Lords, and consequentlie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practise of tyrannie, whose effects are contrary, hath beene so common in all ages. The like, I knowe, may bee saide, of all Vice, and

and Irregularitie whatsoever. For it is lesse difficult (whosoeuer thinke othertwise) and more safe to keepe the way of Justice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it; yet commonly our passions lead vs into by-pathes. But where Lust, Anger, Fearing, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same vnrulie appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at leaste will taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we can hardly desier the passion, that is of force to insinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldom bene hereditarie, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which means the Gouernment hath bene reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? why did the Athenians? why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their general good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the faetie of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherein so many thousand citizens, diuided and subdiuided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of private hatred among them? Doubtles, we must be faime to say, That Tyrannie is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we knowe, is Animal politicum, apt, euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; euery one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankinde, are common likewise vnto bruit beastes; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Fearing, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise naturall, in conuenient measure, both vnto mankinde, and to all creatures that haue sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: euen so is this desire of ruling or obeying, engrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuile forme of iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vsfull. Neuertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkenesse, which, in reproach, are called beastlie, by an vnproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthe creatures than beastes, and are yet not so common in beastes, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than vnto bruit beastes, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grieuously by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath bene an old question in dispute, whether bee the worse; That all things, or That nothing, should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie distemper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to subsist: yet the defectiue dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrats; whereas Tyrannie is more actiue, and pleaceth it selfe in the excessse, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are euerie where found: for this qualitie troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is it not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknown, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: for it is proferum & felix scelus, a fortunate mischeif, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith PETER CHARRON) assigned to those, that know how to increase, or to preferre humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to assist, trouble, or destroy it. CAESAR, and ALEXANDER, haue vn-made and flaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the error of Mans judgement, in valuing things according to common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other, than Feritie: the fame that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed 10 than Perurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceede in villanie, the faults of Gluttonie and drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Heroof Seron, Procrustes, and Pitycampes, that vsed their bodily force to the destruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathocles, whose mischeiuous heades were assited by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and the latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the view of Rule, nor the difference betwene Freeman, and slaves.

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of parents over their children, is natural, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simple, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can haue over another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole countrie: which hee that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when he said, Haue dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowle of the aire, and ouer euerie liuing thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also he confirmed vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be vpon euerie beast of the earth, and vpon euerie fowle of the aire, vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue also an aptitude to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to gouerne themselves, proues them, according vnto Aristotle's doctrine, to be naturallic slaves. ††

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppress men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfullnesse thereof be sufficientlie intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a seruant, whom he hath slaine by correction, if the seruant liue a day or two, because he is his monies; or else by the captiuitie of 40 Midianische girls, which were made bondslaves, and the Sanctuarie had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doublelesse the custome hath bene very ancient: for Noah laid this curse vpon Canaan, that he should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men seruants, and maide seruants, which were none other than slaves. Christian Religion is said to haue abrogated this olde kinde of seruilitie: but surely, they are deceived, that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the libertie of Onesimus, whom he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote hee for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, craving it as a benefite, not vring it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let euery man abide in the same calling wherein hee was called: art thou called, being a seruant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, vse it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discouered by their slaves, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drew many many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbad it, as vnlawfull, vnto his sectatours, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; saue that by the practise of the Turks and Moores, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-seruants, vntill the times of our last ciuile warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning Violence are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaues were made free, which were of great vse and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurfes, and other the like Trades; slaues in Nature, though not in Lawe.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawfull, or not, Aristotle hath well proceeded, that it is naturall. And certainly we finde not such a latitude of difference, in any creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate, of the elect & reprobate) the wisest excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doeth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath giuen way to Reason; we shall find, that Nature is the ground euen of Masterly power, and of seruile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries haue subsisted long, without the vse of any seruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries haue not the vse of any tame cattaille. Indeede the affections which vphold ciuile rule, are (though more noble) not so simple needfull, vnto the sustentation either of our kinde, as are Lust, and the like; or of euerie one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and seruile dispositions, haue libertie to shew themselves begging in the streets; there may we more iustly wonder, how the dangerous toile of sea-faring men can finde enough to vndertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are wearie of their owne more painefull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaues.

This being so, we finde no cause to meruaile, how Tyrannic hath bene forso in all ages, and practised, not onely in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but euer by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices haue likewise gotten head, and borne a generall sway; notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vsed well the inferior Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? In the government of wife and children, some are vtterlie carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull conuiniencie: others, by masterlie rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of slaue. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publicke aboue all respects whatsoeuer, is the Vertue iustly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages afford not many exam- ples. Alex is named by Aristotle, as one of them, and deseruedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortune, vsed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we consider, that a lone of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodnesse: wee shall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great soeuer, can, by it selfe, deserue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof, such, as Dauid, Iosaphat, and Iosias were. Of Christian Kings if there were many such, the world would soone be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement either of aduerfitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not onely vseth his authoritie, but adds the trauaile of his eloquence, in admonishing his Iudges to doe iustice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, ciuilitie is infused, euen into those places, that had bene the dennes of sauage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite abolished a slauiish Brehan

Law, by which an whole Nation of his subiects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the prayse, not onely of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wines, and the goods, of those that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable: he, I say, that can finde such a King, findeth an example, worthe to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were for merlie wanting. Vnder such a King, it is likeli by Gods blessing, that a land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknewen; that Ciuilitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subiects, shall cause the Nations farre off remoued, to wish him their Soueraigne. I neede not adde hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodilie exercises, doe partake of vertue: since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vspeakable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Least any man should thinke mee transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason; I adde hereunto, that such a King is neuertheless a man must die, and may erre: yet wisdom and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefite (though there be many other besides) reouounding vnto this King, as the fruite of his goodnesse. The people that liue vnder a pleasant yoke, are not onely louing to their Soueraigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in multer of men, than of stout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrarie, he that ruleth as ouer slaues, shall bee attended, in time of necessitie, by slauish mindes, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may bee furious, and slaues outrageous, for a time: but among spirits that haue once yielded vnto slaerie, vniuersallie it is found true, that Homer saith, God bereauech a man of halfe his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonable haue spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so liuelie an example, of the calamitie following a tyrannicall rule, and the vfe of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barclied deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre against the Mercinarie was diuersly managed by HANNO and AMILCAR, with variable successse. The bloodie counsailes of the Mercinaries; and their finall destruction.

BEing now to retume vnto those Mercinaries, from whome I haue thus farre digressed, I cannot readilie finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seeke their wages alreadie due so that they are neither Mercinaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all beene subiects vnto Carthage, then might they iustly haue beene termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeouored to subuert. Wherefore I will borrowe the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercinaries, as Polybius also doth.

These

These vying the aduantage of their present strength, belieged Vrica, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated vpon the weiterne Hauen of Carthage, where it is diuided by a necke of land; Hippagreta standing inwards vpon the great Lake; Vrica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay filthy to hinder the Carthaginians, from passing vp into the countrey: for Matho and Spendius wanted not mean, to followe the warre in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the businesse it selfe awakes them hallicke. They are hardly preit on all sides; and therefore trauailed their braines to the vttermost, how to shake off these furious dogges from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came vnto the very walles of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoeuer was needfull, as well to relieue a Towne besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Vrica; so suddennlie that the enemies, as men surpris'd, forooke their Trenches, and retired themselves vnto a rising peece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of the beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Namiolians, whose custome was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies iourne off; presently entred the Towne; to shew him selfe, after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as neede required. Therefore as soone as they perceiued, that he knewe not how to vse a victorie; they assailed their owne Campe, and with great slaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it; forcing them to hide themselves within Vrica; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with futeable indifcretion: loosing the benefite of many faire opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession, of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

30 The Carthaginians, perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their shete anchor; sending to the field their great Captaine, Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foote of Sluippy, and seuentie Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the enimie vpon equal ground. For besides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to winne the onely Bridge, by which the Riuer Mauar, or Bagradas, was passable vnto these, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This Riuer had not many fords, nor thole easie for a single man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept such guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it selfe, Matho & his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiously, intending onely to the custodie thereof. But Amilcar had obserued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vsed to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine customarie windes, and could not be driuen out againe, by force of that slow Riuier, till the wind falling, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vse; and taking his opportunitie, passed the Riuer; contrarie to all expectation, either of the enimie, or of his owne Citizens.

That there was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with this newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improuident grantie of Hanno, but with an able spirit, euen with their owne Master in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was soone changed into presumption; when more than fiftene thousand of their owne Societie, were come from Vrica; and other tenne thousand from the gard of the Bridge. Their

Vrica is seated in the great Bay, that enters towards Carthage, not far within the Promontorie of Apollis. At this time it is called Porto Farina, so Differet; and by the Arabs these Isles, Gold Islands, Niger saith, that the Towne is selfe it name, and the place, whereon it stood, now called Margabon. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage faith Sidon. As it flourished before Carthage was set vp: it did at alter Carthage was throwne down by the Romans, in the third Punic Warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cicero, that worthy Durino was Bishop thereof, in the time of Augustus; who lived all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the story of his cruelties.

Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they resolved to charge him on all sides, and beate him downe, in despiht of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended vpon him; watching for some aduantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onset. Especiallie they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; wherunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the seruice of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armie. Neither made hee shewe of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increase, till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neare, as would bee little for their good, if hee should turne vpon them, he halted his march, euen to such a pace, as made a shewe little differing from plaine flight. The Mercinaries presentlie fell vpon his skirts; beleeuing, that for feare of them he was readie to runne away. But whilest they confusedly, as in sudder opinion of victorie, were driuing at the heeles of those that had the Rere; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, so that amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were six thousand of the Mercinaries slaine, and about two thousand taken; the rest fled some to the Campe at Pica; others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilcar follow'd them so fast, that he wanne the place easily: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Townes revolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africa, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the reuenerie of their freedome; hee perswaded Spendius, and Antaritus that was Captaine of the Gauls, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwaies to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and hee himselfe continued to presse the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessarie for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such waies as there were: for all the countrie lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who till coasted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie; the fame of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naransus, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion seruing to get the acquaintance & loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend; and promised vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naransus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe hee gaue battaile vnto Spendius; wherein the Numidian laboured to approue his owne valour, to his new friend. So the victorie was great: for there were slaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellows, and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Antaritus the Gauls, escaped to doe more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vnwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Antaritus, as

tending to winne from them, the hearts of their souldiers. Wherefore they refused to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilear, nor to hope for any safetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their companie, respectiue onely of their priuate benefit, and carelesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betraye them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligencie; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Gesca, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the souldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilear, toward some, was none other then a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enimie Gesca would prooue, if he might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midst of his tale; were letctes come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Antaritus, and speaks his minde plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were diuising to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those, that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Gesca's life, than to trouble themselues with looking to his custodie; that by such a course euerie one should be engaged in the present Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victorie alone; finally, that such as would speake here-against, were worthe to be reputed Traitors. This Antaritus was in great credit with the souldiours, and could speake fundrie languages, in such sort that he was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gesca, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuerthelesse there were some, that for loue of Gesca, sought to alter this intended crueltie; but they were forthwith sforced to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they herewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be serued in like sort: and that the subiects or friends of Carthage, should loose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they obserued euer afterwards.

Of this crueltie I need say no more, then that it was most execrable frotie, As for the counsaile of vsing it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Achilophel; All Israel shall beare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to auoide the punishment of lesse offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull spirits of those that haue bene wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to their degree of the feueral crimes. A coward thinks all prouision too little, for his owne securitie. If Phocas be a coward, saide the Emperour Mavritius; then is he murderous. To be bedfast and sure, in taking reuenge; is thought a point of honour, and a defensacie against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is oposite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise would haue repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Maiba, and his Africans, to suspect euery their gentleness, as the introduction to extreame rigour. Like vnto the errors of Princes and Governours, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment, is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath adu ventured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against the se inconueniences, Mercie and Seueritie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilear failed. For as long as these his owne souldiours were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanitie was readie to inuite them. But when they were transported with beauly outrage, beyond all regard of honor and thame, he rewarded their villanie with answereable vengeance; calling them vnto wilde beaulls, to be deuoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may seeme, for that nothing is remembered of him, since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorieto want his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremitie, as threatened vter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Lanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom hee ioyned his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: rather he could now performe nothing; such was the hatred betwene him and his vnworthie Colleague. The Townes of Vicia and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian partie, did now reuolt vnto the enemy, murdering all the fouldiours that they had in Garrison; and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in foule weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Masbo and Spentius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages bene vsed, as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practise of those two mighty Cities, Athenis and Rome; which other States and Princes haue often imitated; perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equall commission, vpon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For herof all Common-weales haue bene ielous, hauing bene taught by their examples, that haue made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue employed them. In this point, the Venitians haue bene so circumspect, as they haue, for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust: but in manning the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made neare vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph; which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeeres seruice; it is no meruaile, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end than victorie. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded other wise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vntlesse one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be ioyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their ioyned Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often bene such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equall authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and most dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punick warre wee shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldome failed to winne exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those tenne Generals, which serued the Athenians at the Battaille of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper bene better, than the iudgment of

of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicily: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so halitic, as all came to nought that they vnderooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, hauing sole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale most remarkable seruice. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of urie than of iudgement, and so the contrarie, by which the best occasions are as often ouerlipt, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably vndertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was slaine after the Battaille of Tarnas, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an aduancement, than a hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, outreach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoever the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to loose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present busines: who, though they were still sicke of their ill grounded loue to Hanno, and were willing to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe: which he did; and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neare vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much; hauing in their Campe about fittie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuertheless, the Citie was too strong for them to winne by assault: and the entrance of victuailes they could not hinder, if any should bee sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicily he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their Alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne; because if no other State gaue the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principallitie of Syracuse would soone be denoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some lender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kinde of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequel manifestly proued.

Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent, in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the field: where Spendius, and one Zares an African Captaine assisting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilcar worke; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Narasus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day:

day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the ouerthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disadvantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomach to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessitie might teach them to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and that them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and hauing spent all their victuales, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. Tis they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deserued any fauour from Carthage; and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremitie, that they were faine to deuoure their owne companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken; and they threatened their Captaines with what they had deserued, vnlesse they would goe foorth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarcas, and Antarius, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved, to obey the multitude; and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than to perish by the hands of their owne companions. Hereupon they send to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seems that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he choose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest hee forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought them selues betrayed: and therefore amazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same altonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Narusafus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places readie to yeelde: Vtica, and Hippagryeta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deserued vengeance; and Tunes, being held by Matbo, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemy. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the walles; to terrifie those of his olde companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the seige began; as if speedie victorie had bene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too farre asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matbo from the walles beheld his owne destinie, in the miserie of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwise, than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and vnexpected furie he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner, on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthagian prisoners, he presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing till till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the seige; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bigradas, where he incamped.

The terrour was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the fame of this losse; than had bene the ioy of the late great victorie. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines furruing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the employment of one sole General, neare vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hastic exigent, to deuise about repealing it. But thirte principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcars campe, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enimie to moderate his proceedings. Neuerthelesse after many conferences, the authoritie of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to followe good directions, though afterwards hee returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane season Matho was come abroad; as meaning to vse the reputation of his late successe, whilest it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, whercin Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did fo farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho, that hee refused to trie the fortune of one battaile: wherin either his desires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being wearie of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, wherunto the enimie had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the fieldes, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this Battaille might haue bene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whercon to presume, saue their daring spirits, which had bene well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherinto they had learned how to runne away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as hauing often bene victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of libertie should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude, as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians wanne a great victorie, wherin most of the Africans their enemies were slaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himselfe was taken aliue. Immediately vpon this victorie, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Pisa onely, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victors. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians whose subjects did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, haue prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrarie to the peace.

W^hilest Matho and Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Africa, other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vie. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Armie, (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the sudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safetie, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were alreadye revolted, than to endanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practise with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away ²⁰ all ieaoulie and distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practise it hath bene in all Ages, with those that have vnder taken the quarrell of an vnjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villanous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawns, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some such Actions, as are equally vnardonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineus murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedamonians, by Aratus, who, when hee had formerly posselt himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did ³⁰ not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equall freedome with the rest of the Cities vnited. These Reuolts are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of newe fortunes, and making of newe parties, and factions, without the depreffion or destruction of olde friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by old enemies. Ce sont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Ilanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they ⁴⁰ could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the souldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, betwene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vnlesse the riches of Carthage, had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuablereward, than possession and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to saue themselves in Italia. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieued Matho and Spendius with corne; of whom the

the Carthaginians tooke almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hercof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; and admonishing them to carrie all provisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vitua, offering it selfe vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had hee beene ouerthrowne by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of merciles villaines, or haue humbled her selfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom shee had lately striven for superiority. That extreame necessitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunus, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farr from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not wisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but sinking shippe, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was ended in Africa, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recouerie of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recouered her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enfeebled and impoucrished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for SARDINIA, were made indeede against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alleage) of the great feare which they had endured, of an intialion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of warre. But necessitie taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paid, how hardly soeuer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punicke faith, in breach of Couenants: shee her selfe hath broken the peace already; which Amilcar purpoueth to make her dearely repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall bee accomplished by Hannibal his renoued sonne.

How the affaires of Carthage went betwene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke Warre.

His inurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolute to be obedient vnto those that were more mightie. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easilie tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the ieaousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts vpon the Mediterranean seas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vknownen to Rome: wherefore that Province might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre and to repaire their decayed forces, with all needfull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and soueraine trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom whom his Countrie did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuius men, that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most worthie of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; and vsing men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amitie they laid, that the felicitie of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularitie: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glorie of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coast of Spaine; in which Countrie, during nine yeares that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar; Asdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practise and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow enuieous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not a little troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring them selues in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recover vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuence, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be innaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if hee request; since his request shall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans vntirely destitute of all good colours that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace betweene these two Citie; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howsoever the generallitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pills, to auoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the brauerie of one man might proue more fastidious, and, resenting the iniurie, returne such answere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, quartell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would have this insolent covenant inserted into the articles of peace; he took vpon him to doe it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformitie to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

10 If it had beene so, that the State of Carthage, therunto pressed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vnlesse an oath had also beene extorted, to make all true. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authoritie of Asdrubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more iustly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of peritric, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wanne some reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistresse ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiuing blowes from a stout-er Dame; there were soone found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South side of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuerthelesse, if wee consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal; wee shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit coucnant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discouerie or Conquest by them intended to bee made vpon Spaine: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were; this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginians, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after hee had commanded in Spaine eight yeeres: (being slaine by a slaue, whose master hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

The estate of Greece from the death of P. PYRRHVS, to the raigue of PHILIP the sonne of DEMETRIVS in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punic warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though faire weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole countrie had recouered, by degrees, a forme of libertie: the pette tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not onely serued to defend themselves, but to giue protection to others. This conuerfion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had bene in Greece, when Philip first began to inuade vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lyfmachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules; Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirte yeres; yet so, that hee was diuers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bene already shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epivot, from whose father he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him by the reuolt of his souldiours, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gaules, hee was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, whom hee compelled to receiue his Garrisons. But his yong sonne Demetrius raised an Armie; wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this yong Prince Demetrius (though in another kinde) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was iustly termed the seizer of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steep rockie hill on the North side of the towne; and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne, which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the isthmus, that running betweene the Egean and Ionique Seas, ioyne the Peloponnesus to the Maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon; and after his death, Cratespols his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexander Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander, of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceiued his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The deuce was this. Antigonus sent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and seeke her manage. The foolish olde widdow perceived not how vsit a match hee was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as readie to consent, as was his sonne to desire it, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the middelt of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whose seialousie had bene exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauitie becoming his old age. But as hee had stollen it, so was it againe stollen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius,

Nicea

CHAP. 2. S. 6. of the Historie of the World.

-399-

Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achaens, held him continually bulied in warre; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decaie: and the Grecians to caft off their yoke.

Philip, the onely sonne of Demetrius, was a young child when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his vncler, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minoritye of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though hee respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This

- 10 Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Dolon, that is as much as Will-giue, because he was low in his liberality. He repressed the Dardanians, and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his raigne. Vpon confidence of this good fertuice, hee tooke state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, than onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appeas'd by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaens took from him the Citie of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all or mozt that hee held in Greece, if their owne estate had not bene endangered by a nearer enemy. But ciuile dissention,
- 20 which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished mozt; ouerthrew it easly now againe, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sicknesse, and gaue to this Antigonus no lesse authoritie therein, than Philip, the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

- These Achaens, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and faimeso that they grew the mozt redoubted Nation of all the Grecques. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartians) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Citie of Peloponnesus, to bee gouerned by one Lawe; and to vse
- 30 one and the same sort of waightes, measure, and monie.

- Aratus*, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had bene by the Macedonian Captaines diuided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as mozt of the great Citie of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subiected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidae, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes possit the Territory of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whome, when his sonnes sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessours into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming mozt equall. This forme of Commonweale had continuance, with some small
- 40 changes according to the diuersitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Citie, called the Cities of alliance, whercof Heliæ, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battaille of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a warre, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neare it, Ptolomie the sonne of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Cernunus, left the world; two of the ten remaining Citie and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimai, vnited themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vniou, which after followed. For hauing
- 50 bene, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing bene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voiage into Italie. Now after the vniting of the Patrenses and Dimai, to whome also the Citie of Trisea, and Phara, ioyned themselves;

Agira chased out her Garrisons; and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceramauns into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie and five yeares, vied the same forme of Government with the Achauns; who by a Senatorie and two Pretors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and soone after, by one Pretor, or Commander of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in exile, whilst his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders, whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Genetas King of Macedon, a Prince more buisie in watching what to get among the Greekes, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaun league: which though at that time it received more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against Antigonus, whose subtletie was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industrie and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Countrie from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaun league: so further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuerfies, betweene the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The monie he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuerfation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous voiage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by some theues that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasure, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere hee could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne feare, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achauns were more in number, than in truth they were, and heauing lost the advantages of the place a readie, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kinde of night-seruices, ambushments, surprises, and practises, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might looke pale and tremble, when he beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diuersified, by the sundrie natures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto severall sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in neede of little practise; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrie he was vnproueeable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soone after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Confederation. So did the Traceniens, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new created State grew so powerfull, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians, and Argos, and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprife vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus waited the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the Citie by shew of loue; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slaves to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the adventure was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recouerie of their owne freedome; sundrie times, and with diuerse euent, they fought with the Tyrants (who rose vp one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: vntill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perlwaded, and hired,

- 10 Aratus, that he consented to resigne his estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phisians. Whilst this businesse with the Argiues was on foot, Lysias the Tyrant of Megalopolis was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that hee was chosen General of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two yeares together by one man) every second yeare, for a certaine while, Hee and Aratus succeeding one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysias and Aristomachus, were carried with priuate passion, from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare
- 20 in due time.

The Achaeans having obtayned so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemie King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) General of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Waite vpon Demetrius the Sonne of Antigonus Gonatas, for the libertie of Athens. It is strange and worthe of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter seruit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in seruite, or insolent in command. Neuerthelesse when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased libertie to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaeans, louing them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, fearing it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie.

- Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by iustice and honestie; so did the Aetolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it selfe, waxe very powerfull, by sturdinesse of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had stoutly defende themselves
- 40 against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and suffer much; partly by the naturall strength and saltasse of their Countrey; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other businesse; as hath bene related. They had molested Cassander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themselves as much plagued by him, and by the Aetolians, a little, but stout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the sonne of the first Antigonus, and more or lesse, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often Waite with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with perpetuall trouaile; seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardnesse ill deferred the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honestie or friendship; measuring all things by their owne insolent will, and thinking all people base minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.
- 50 These Aetolians had lately made great spoiles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Achaeans, taken and sacked

Pallene; where although they were foundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gaine made them greece of a new voyage thither, as to a Countrey wherin somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Gonatus: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driuen to seeke helpe of the Achaens; which they obtained. The warre which the Achaens made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Æ- tolians, at whose influence it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Ætolians, giuing thanks in wordes, deuifed how to requite the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achaens were delirous, to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedemoni- ans were very ialous. Wherefore these Ætolians laboured earnestly, to set the La- cedemonians and Achaens together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called into helpe (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that his Kingdom had sustained by the Achaens. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedemonians cause to take armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his owne power to hold. He had bene meddling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon: and thereby had prouoked the Lacedemonians to looke about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Ar- cadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaen.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subiect to the iniuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Auarice and Luxurie reigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, and the generallitie of Spirit, that had sometime bene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them.
 There were left in Sparta no more than seuen hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not about one hundred had lands: all the rest were needie people, and delirous of innouation. Here vpon followed intestine sedition, which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuision of lands. All the yonger, and the poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Coun-sailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commodi-
 tie. They were hastie to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they themselves were deeply in debted: but the diuision of lands they after wards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased, by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdom, and the two aduersel Kings driuen to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawne into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belongd, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and served to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannical oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope, to adioyne Lacedaemon to the Achaean Common-wealth; though it were great iniustice to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus; and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could have beene wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also require the iniust attempts of the *Achaean*s, even in their owne kinde: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedaemonians and their King, should haue bene the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to winne her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pityting his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming him selfe to be King, whilst he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all occasions of warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding forrally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephebi gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, so which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegæa and Orchomenus, Citie then confederate with the Lacedaemonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painefull nights traualle, and discouraged his enmitie to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing forric. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practise, and therefore would haue steered the quarrell from proceeding too farre. But Lyfias and Ariflornachus would needs fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them: especially seeing Cleomenes was so virgent. Ariflornachus was at that time General of the *Achaean*s, (He & Lyfias being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a iournee to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serue; therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed him selfe against Ariflornachus, who desired to giue battaile. Yet had the *Achaean*s twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than siue thousand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedaemonian, and raised an ill report vnto Aratus; which Lyfias helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuertheless the *Achaean*s would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the year following, against Lyfias, his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall him selfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous wordes of Lyfias. Therefore he purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neare vnto the Mount Lycau, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battaile, and drane him to hide him selfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to haue bene slaine. This misaduenture Aratus recompenced by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue been expected, had he been victorious. For whilst there was no suspition of any great matter that he could vndertake; he secretly wrought with some of the *Mantinean*s, who did let him into their Citie. The *Mantinean*s had once before ioyned themselves with the *Achaean*s; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselves to the Aetolians; and from the Aetolians, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achaean societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered neare vnto Megalopolis; where the *Achaean*s had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his aduantage. Thereupon Lysidas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedemonians, whom hee routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen back vpon their owne Companions; in such fort, that finally all the Armie was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the *Achaean*s against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheless; wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the *Achaean*s being wearie, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleomenes hauing led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull journies, forsooke the Achaean warre on a sudden, and came vnto Sparta, where hee slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lysurgus. Then gaue hee an accompt of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had inchoed vpon the power of Kings, and many disorders had growne in the Citie; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in neede of mercinarie helpe, as it lately had done, to saue it selfe from the Aetolians, Illyrians, and other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe readie in the field, ere his enemies could take aduantage of these his domestick troubles.

The *Achaean*s hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Manthinea, and readie to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeas'd them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, hee proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedemonians refused their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principallitie of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend, about the possession of a few Townes; but adventured to winne or loose all. The Aetolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Manthinea, Tegaea, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and saw that Antigonus with the Aetolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore hee deuised how to prouide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not bee) to saue all from vnter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, hee refused; fearing to bee so farre prest as to hazzard in one battaile all the force of his Countrie, to which as hee had neuer any affection, nor performance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surpris, and defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the trifles, and of all other Nations, over-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the weale publike, though in aiming at the generall good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of battaile; that Maninus had not only opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but laine the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yielded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Ariflamachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Achaean, was now revolted vnto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemie was too farre off to helpe; and the neareness of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be usefull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpose; and instructed them how to deale with both Antigonus, and the Achaean.

The Citie of Megalopolis had bene well affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay nearest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achaean, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leaue and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lack of what els to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecessours; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter; wherein Aratus had giuen them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Aetolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaean vnder the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentive care to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to giue it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the Achaean good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers, to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to haue bene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only vpon a iust and worthwhile to his owne Nation. With this answer they returne to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedie conclusion, as the necessitie of the time required.

The Achaean were glad to heare, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were readie to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisdom of his Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safetie; adding neuertheless, that it were not amisse, first of all to trie their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus hee shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that hee might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that he had not bene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that so leisurably, the generall consent.

Neuertheless in true estimation, this singleness of Aratus might haue bene vsed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie course. For it had bene more honourable, to make an end of the Warre, by yielding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: since thereby he should both haue freed his Countrey

Countrie from all further trouble; and withall should have restored vnto the vniuersall state of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue hauing risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principallitie, by length of time, and successe of many actions; can ill endure the hastic growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfe likely to bee ouer topped. Other causes to despise the Lacedaemonians there was none; than that they lately had been in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was iustly plagued, when he saw his owne honors reuerbered by the insolent Macedonians; and in stead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules, was faine to doe sacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of sue descents, and whom perhaps he might haue scene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberalitie, as hee had vsed to the Achaens; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more warye both intrusting and disburling. Cleomenes himselfe, whilst this businesse with Antigonus was a foot, passed through Areadia with an Armie, and laboured by al means to draw the Achaens to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where hee had fo great a victorie, that the enemye was no longer able to keepe the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take vpon him to be their General, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted vpon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedaemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ranom-free: also that they should enioy their owne Lawes and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaens: who desired him to come vnto the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had cuer bene since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warres, yea or since the Persian Inuasion: when God, who had other wise disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuertheless he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant non other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Achaens in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and fought by great wordes, and terrible threats, to make his Countymen afraid of resolving. When all would not serue turne he betooke himselfe to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that hee should doe well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing Hostages for fastie of his person. Cleomenes was alreadye farre on his way, when he met with this aduertisement: and tooke it in ill part, that hee should be thus deluded. For it had bene an easie matter, to haue told him so much at the first, and not haue made him come so farre with an Armie which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seemes to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with the selfe and their Messengers; or if he would adventure himselfe into the Citie, then to deprive him of all Royall shew, that might breede respect of him in the Multitude. This was that in deede which Aratus feared, and for which he fought to hinder his coming thither in person: left the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle wordes, and finish the bargaine without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Council, bitterly complaining against these iugling tricks: and Aratus was not farre behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration.

 So betweene feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake vp, leaving all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes 10 tooke his advantage of their present weaknesse, and renewed the Warr. Many Cit-ties yielded vnto him willingly; many hee forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gaue as good words as could be wished: sauing that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vntill he might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enimie the Stagge:
 but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himselfe to be ladd and bridled.
Aratus was here withall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing 20 the Corinthians had no way deferred, to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should bee readie to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes, who lost no time, but made halfe with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was in doing, he tooke special order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner; to whom hee sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agree-30 ment, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus:
 promising that if he would hearken to these persuasions, then would hee giue him double the same pension, which hee had bene wont to receiue of King Ptolemeus.
 As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraignie of the Countrey; he desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be ioyntly kept by the Lacedaemonians and Achaens. All this entreatie serued to no purpose. For Aratus, reiecting vtterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthus into his handes. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seized vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, 40 whereof this his Aduersarie was native.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neare to the Isthmus, having passed with his Armie through Eubaea, because the Atolians held the Isthmes of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, wherunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iourne. At his coming thither he found the Lacedaemonians readie to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which hee came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but hee was not able so to doe: hee secretly got into the Corinthian Hauens; but was 50 violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally hee resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexitie newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus,

genus, and no lesse troubled his Enemies. The Achaens were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not drinen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in neede of present helpe. Argos had alwaies bene enemie to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, hee forbore to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreatie of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperitie. They were glad indeede of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditours, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan Institution: in other places, where it would have bene tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, beganne to turne good Common-wealths-men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achaens; assailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Relfue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behinde his back. For when he vnderstood, by continuall messages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost lost: hee beganne to feare, lest his labour in guarding the entrie should grow fruitles; the Achaens in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee forooke his custodie of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if hee could saue, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he prevailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argius and Achaens were glad to house themselves, leauing him Master of the streets: when the horse-men of Antigonus were discovered a-farre off, halting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his back) following apac with the bodie of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no pore to doe, than to make a safe retreat. This hee did; and got him home into Laconia: loosing in short space all, or most, of that which he had bene long in getting.

Antigonus hauing shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadie; where he wanne such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his way to Aegium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaens: to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine General ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into couenant with him, that they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (for sooth) a very wise bargain, in stead of Cleomenes that would haue bene a King, it had obtayned the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen vpon the Achaens. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Neuertheless in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his owne passion by the aide of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments hee did put Ariflanachus to death, who had bene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards General of the Achaens; and from them resoluing vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled handled hee (though not as yet) the Mantineans; for their ingratitude and crueltie flew to the Achaens. For hee slew all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bond-slaves: dividing the spoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Towne it selfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argiues: who peopled it with a Colonie of their owne; and Aratus having charge of this businesse, caused it to be cenned Antigonia. Surely of this crueltie there can bee no better excuse; than euen the flatterie, which Aratus was driuen to vse to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of ferulitie, wherinto they had vrged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite.

10 But leauing to speake of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill state of the Achaens; Let vs returne vnto his warre against the Lacedemonian.

The next Sommer Antigonus wann Tegea, Mantineaa, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphusa. Mantineaa hee dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus hee placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest hee restored to the Achaens; with whom hee wintered at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where hee lay readie to defend his owne Territorie. The reason why hee stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to 20 Mantineaa, and to those other Townes that hee wanne, was this: Hee had few Souldiers, and not monie enough to wage more. Ptoleme the Ægyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, vnlesse he might haue Cleomenes his owne Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Ægypt; yet the aide came not. For Ptoleme was slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would serue. Hee manumifed all the Helotes, which were the Lacedemonian slaves: taking monie for their libertie, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, hee came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neare at hand in Ægium. The

30 Towne hee wanne: but after hee was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, rose hastily against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet faued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. Hee sent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would bee of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer: wherfore hee sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that hee found therein. These newes astonished the Achaens at Ægium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his

40 Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore hee returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of this vnliuck winter, some what

50 further from the eyes of the grieued Achaens. When hee had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argiues perceiving that their Countrie would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But hee was wiser, than to be moued with their clamours; and suffered them to see their villages burnt; to bid him resigne his Office of Protector, vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words; rather than hee would be ouer-come in fight, and thereby loose more honour than could easly be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his enimie: though hee thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto

M m m m m fuch

such hauck, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrey of the Argiues, Phliasiens, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keys. These were light things; yet serued to dishearten the Achaean side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard, of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; by setting vp his rest, without more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Armie eight and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundrie Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epirots, Bootians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achaens, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying lightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus coming to Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hills of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which hee greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Armie, in assaying their well-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolu'd to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the Hill Eua: but his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaean foot, that the Spartan horse, & light-armed foot, incamped in the straight vallie between those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts; and not only disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the bataile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Eucleidas, his brother, a more valiant than skillfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, serued then on horse, as a priuate yong man, among the Achaens. Hee seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall back vpon the Armie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achaean horse, to breake vpon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth, and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly, than well aduised; entreated some of his owne Countrymen to follow him; gaue a charge vpon the Spartans; and forced them not only to leaue the Illyrians, but seeke how to saue themselves. Being so farre aduanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to bee wonne, through the vnskillfullnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perswaded the men at armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Eucleidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euen termes. So hee recouered the Hill top; where though he was fore hurt, yet hee made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedaemonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Eucleidas, made Cleomenes loofe the day: who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe, was like to haue beene surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinary speede. In this battaile, ended the glorie of Lacedaemon; which, as a light readie to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where hee had no desire to stay, finding only two hundred left, of sixe thousand Spartans that hee had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any tyme in his owne power, for their good, he halted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before prouided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. He was louingly entertayned by Ptoleme Energetes; who vnderooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane season hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie talents, yearly. But this Ptoleme died; and his sonne Ptoleme Philopater succeeded him: a vicious yong Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnminde full of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptoleme, and his Minions, would neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because hee was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countymen, hee vnderooke a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell, and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that he met; and hauing walked vp and downe the streets, without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) He, and his Companions, agreed together to bee Ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptoleme was bold to heew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had beene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wiues of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leontidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudie end, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-children.

After the Victorie at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta; whereinto neuer the force of any Enemy, before him, coul'd make way. Hee kindly entreated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernement: carrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which hee halted out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedie departure was, an advertisement that hee receiued out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrie. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wile tarried, a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedemon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians; and ouer-came them. Yet therein hee caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-straying his voice; wherewith hee brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the sonne of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptoleme Philopater; beganne to raigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boies all. Of these, Ptoleme, though old enough to loue Harlots, when hee first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuentene yeares of his raigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsuall in the minoritye of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Ilyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Hilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilst the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselves worke among the Sardinians and Corsicans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Ilyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Lincie saith, a tumult than a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea; it hath bene shewed before: of their dealings with the Ilyrians and Gauls, it is not meet to be vterly silent.

The Ilyrians inhabited the COUNTRY, now called Slauonia: a troublefome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaîne, without other regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to helpe the Mydonians, his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians, for that they refused to be of their societie. Before the Ilyrian succours came, the Mydonians were so farr spent, that the Ætolians contended about the bootie: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honor of the victorie, and the diuision of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and at Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be ioynly intitled in the victorie, and haue equall and honor, in distribution of the gettings. But the Ilyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians; and though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydonians, that were not idle in their owne businesse, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne. Many of the Ætolians were laine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Ilyrians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydonians erected a Trophee, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The success of this voyage, highly pleased Ayron King of the Ilyrians: not only in regard of the monie, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the bootie that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Greekes, hee found it not vncleane, to enrich himselfe by letting vpon the lesse warlike. For joy of this, hee feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Tenta, his wife.

Tenta gaue her people free libertie, to robbe all Nations at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if shee had bene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing her Captaines, to make warre

Warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Elcans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and staid at the Citie of Phenice, to take in victuallies and other necessaries. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gauls; that having bene Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they neuertheless revolted, and were for their misdeedes difarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Towne. The Gauls were soone growne acquainted with the Ilyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice; which deserued none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in armes, and halsted to driue out these vnwelcome guests. But whilst the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Ilyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Scerdilasidas, whom Queene Teuta had sent to helpe his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good that Towne, and the freights adjoining, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped well in their businesse. For Scerdilasidas found meanes to ioyne with his fellowes; and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of sauing their Countrey, without great and speedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Acheans and Aetolians: crauing their helpe, with very pittifull termes of enreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long vnto an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was readie in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilasidas. But Scerdilasidas was called home, by letters from Teuta the Queene, that signified a rebellion of some Ilyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered composition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Ilyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaues. Having made this profitable and honourable bargaine; the Ilyrians returned into their owne Countrey by Land, sending their bootie away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voiage. For in fulfilling the commandment of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whilst they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Teuta, that shee should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that shee had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, saue only the towne of Issa, which her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperitie, shee could hardly afford a good looke to the vnmannery Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyrreie, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, shee vouchsafed to tell them, That injurie in publike shee would doe them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings, to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they best could, by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadours) we Romans haue a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those priuate wrongs, that are borne out by publike autoritie: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had bene the way, to set her heart at rest; which was indeede the meane, to disquiet and afflict it euer after.

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred faile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Postumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this injurie is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall warre. It is indeede contrary to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to bee this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, and in safetie, betwene enemies. Neuertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then is it as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadours (thus imployed, to make the warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subjects, of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slue the Lacedemonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoever. For whereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour doe it, without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Citizens, and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Cornelius.

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stirre against her. Shee was indeede in an error; that had vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than thee, both before and since: Having more regard vnto forme, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Aetolians and Epirats had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had thee easily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans thee should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that neuertheless, it prevailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; thee would haue continued to vse her aduantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that thee should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mightie than her selfe. But thee was a woman, and did what thee listed. Shee sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission, to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe, and one part of it fell with ^a Dyrachium; the other, with Coryra. Dyrachium was almost surprized by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In ^b Coryra the Illyrians landed; waited the Ile; and besieged the Towne. Hercupon the Aetolian and Abetens were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; loosing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Caryensis, the first Praetor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Coryra, dismayed with this overthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrachium. In the meane season, Tenta was angry with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euen readie to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Confull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Confull sailed thither; where hee found the Towne of Coryra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius; that it not only received him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

^a Dyrachium, sometime called Epidamnus, and now Durazzo; seated vpon the Adriaticke Sea, betwene the Ilands of Pharus and Coryra. ^b Coryra, an Iland of the Adriaticke Sea, not farre from Durazzo; called now Cassio, and in the possession of the Venicians.

CHAP. 2. §. 8. of the Historie of the World.

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed alongst the coast, to Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vied thenceforth as his counsaier and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Arme, numbered at twentie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they halten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twentie of their ships; and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Rijon, farre within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans halste them homeward, and leaue the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part stiaes behinde, and prosecute the warre, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to begge peace: which shee obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That shee should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of warre, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadours into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Countrey, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped be-like, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: to which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their owne games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, saue a little acquaintance, that shall be more heereafter.

§. VIII.

30 Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of HANNIBAL into Italie.

The Gauls that dwelt in Lumbar die, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that warre proued not answerable to the beginning, if we may giue credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad.

40 Many ouerthrowes they received; and if they got any victorie, it yielded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred vp to warre, and lightly giuing ouer. At the first burnt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwaies carefull heede to their approach, were it only brutish. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumultuous Galkies; tumults of the Gauls; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vied to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Hauing received an ouerthrow; they would rest ten, or twelue yeares, sometimes twentie or thirtie: till they were stirred vp againe, by younger heads, vnaacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested; the state of Rome, that against these made only defensiu warre, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon upon others. Herin God prouided well for that Monarchie, which hee intended to raise: that the Gaules neuer fell vpon Italie, with a mightie power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was traouailing in the same enterprife, or in either of the two former Punicke warres: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaulle. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punicke Warre. Once before this, the Romans had bene bold, to set vpon the Gaules in their owne Countrey: and that was three yeares before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, invading Etreturia, and besieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile, and slaine L. Caelius with the most of his Armie. Manius Curius the new Confull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ranfome of prisoners. But these Embassadours they flue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrey, and sent a Colonie of their owne to inhabit it. This caused the Boij, another people of Gaulle, to feare the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Etreturians to their side. But the Romans ouertrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted vntill this end of the Illyrian warre.

e There were diuers nations of the Boij, as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germanie, in Bourbonis in France, and in Aquitaine; but these Boij were of the French race, & dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Riuer of Po.

It vexed the Gaules, to see a Roman Colonie planted in their Countrey; who had bene accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpinis (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are nearer; like as they called Cisalpinis, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt betweene them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their partie: reasonably presuming, that as their diuision had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpinis and Transalpinis, fell together by the eares: putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of warre: Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colonie already planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be caried thither, as would serue to people the whole Countrey betweene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vtterly those Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Gallians it selfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome tooke this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joynd with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeas'd the Boij: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displacement. And because all the rest of the Gaules had reason to resolue, that themselves also should bee rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joynd with the Boij; and vpon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, waggable as the Svitzers in these times. The Gessates hauing receiued a great Imprest, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Conciliatus and Anerceslus: who with the Boij and Insubrians, compound an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twentie thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer invaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Senogalli, that had bene beaten out of their possessions, gaue a great increase of strength. On the contrary side the Ventians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleieving in their profperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscan. The Romans hearing of this danger, send f Cenomanni, are the people about Bregenz, on the North-side of the Riuer Po in Italie. There were also of this Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countie of Matin.

send Emilius to Romine, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Attius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they employ one of their Prators, for the defence of Tuscan.

- Being at this time greatly troubled, with the consideration of this powerfull Arme, which the Gaules had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not be prevented other wise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consuls they sent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne: euey Legion consisting of five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; which Arme was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Vmbri and Sarsinates, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twentie thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to invade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Arme of the Gaules should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be readie against all vnertaine chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fiftene hundred horse, garriison in Rome it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse.ouer and about these great troups; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbered fourescore thousand foot, and five thousand horse; in that of the Sammites, seuentie thousand foot, and of horse seuen thousand; in that of the Ulyppes, and Messappes, fiftie thousand foot, and sixtene thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Marsi, Marrucini, Ferentani, and the Veslini, of twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicily, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand foure hundred foot, and foure hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse, three and twentie thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and about sixe thousand horse. Calling vp the whole forces of all the Prouinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to seuen hundred thousand foot, and seuentie thousand horse. But the number is somewhat misse-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he falls short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.
- How great soeuer this Muster was, it seemes to haue bene like vnto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth inuaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subjects, hee tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trosymene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their flues, euen for want of other Soldiers, after their ouerthrow at Canna. Wherefore the maruaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way: and entering into Tuscan, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the g Ulyppes and Messappes seeme to be one Nation; who are also called Saltenates, Venetians, Apulians, and Calabrians; the Countie is now Apulia, containing the Northernmost head-land of Calabria.

h A people of the Kingdom of Naples.
i Pisomie calls them a people of Italy.
k A people of Campans, called to this day Venetians, south Lusitan.

Roman Armie, sent into Tuscane, hauing taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had misfed of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their iourne. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the same euening discovered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratageme: that shewed no great fineness of wit, but such, as well becomed those that had none other occupation than warre; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leaving their horse in guard, to whom they giue order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speede, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their hallic departure, as the Gaules desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules returne; charge them; and kill fixe thousand vpon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselves, till L. Aemilius, being at Arminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the coming of the Confull; the Gaules consult, whether they should giue the Romans battaile, or forbear. In which dispute, Aneroelus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, peller, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace; for seeing they that were Mercinaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wilddome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This inderede had beene a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had beene in sight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retreat in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, either straight hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Capitaine, that he which forakes the field, perceiues, and fears, some aduantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betrayer of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the retreat, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, feare to be engaged: and so the hindmost tread on his heeles that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, runne, and perish, if those that fauour the retreat, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable ouerthrow, that the French receiued in Naples, in the yeare 1503. vpon a retreat made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse, sustayned the pursuing enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot ouer-tooke, and defeated them vtterly. During the warres betwene the Imperialls, and the French; Bull and Mont were lost at Brignalles, who in a brauerie would needes see the enemy, before they left the field. So was Stross ouerthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arriuall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselves in case to giue battaile) haue done. Je ne trouue point (saith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'ome retrait; i'finie nothing in the arte of warre so difficult, as to make a safe retreat. A sure Rule it is, that there is lesse dishonour to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M^r. de la Noue giues this iudgement, of a daies retreat, made in France, presently before the battaile of Moncontour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in threw not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation in deede, by dislodging by day: whereby whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthie Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncountain with so great resolution, as hee faced the one halfe of the Protestant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse; and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turne their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Emilius follows them, as neare as he can, without ingaging himselfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Consull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gauls, inclosed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Reare, and Front. To sustaine Emilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois; in the Front, they range the Fremontous, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Pa. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Amerocius, with fortie thousand of their Vallalls.

After this fatal ouerthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were innaded the year following this ouerthrow, by the new Consulls, Fulsius, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vse their victorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeares time, to the Gauls, to reape their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consulls beat the Boj; but, by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that rigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second year, Furius, and Flaminius, invade the Milanois; and prouaile very farre, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Neuer thelesse these Consulls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resigne their Office: because the Angures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their diuination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen; but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being other wise aduertised of the contents, was not hastie to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countrey; then perused the letters; and returning home obtayned a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that hee sided in faction with the Commonalitie, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrey of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that vnderstanding the Majestie of Rome to be indeede wholly in the people, and no other wise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the fierer side: and found imitators, that rose by the same arte; which in proceesse of time, grew the only or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consulls, for the rest of that year. The Gauls about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtayned it: though the new Consulls were against it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joynd with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consulls hastied into their Prouince, where they besieged Acerra, a towne not farre from Nouaro (so farre had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them them from this siege, Britomarus late downe before Clastidium, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend vpon the Confulls at Aecra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Confulls coming; and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their iourne, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauerie, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but hee thought so well 10 of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring; than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute, he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He flue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: where by his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie.

This was the third and last time, that euery Roman Generall sine the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cassius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I date lay, that the two Scipios, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Casfar, 20 were better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered vp to IVPITER, Opima spolia; The Armour of a Generall slaine by themselves, when they were Generalls, nor perhaps affected so to doo.

After this victorie, Aecra was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soone after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpine, or Gaudes, that dwelt in Lumbardie. This was that valiant and mightie Nation, that had for so many yeares vexed the State of Rome; and in former times taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short 30 time; their pleasant and fertile Territory posselt by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountaines; like Out-lawes and Thieues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeares, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed vp the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) saue once, in the raigne of Numa; nor in long time after, vntill the raigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long:

a dangetous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended,
they might boldly vndertake, to extend their

Monarchie as farre, as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.
Of the second Punick Warre.

10 The warres of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians.
HANNIBAL bestigeteth and taketh Saguntum; whilest the Romans are buſied with the Ilyrians. Warre proclaimed betwene Rome and Carthage.

ANNIBAL, the sonne of Amilear, was about sixe and twentie yeares old, when hee was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. Hee was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead; and the election was ratified by the state at Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased.
This was now the third of the Barchine familie (so called of Amilear, whose surname was Barchas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps have beene lesse enui'd, by these domestically enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in gouernement, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This generall goodwill, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilear, in sauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures, and great reueneues; so was it retained by the same good artes, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisians, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreprouable; nor to performe the like seruices vnto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselues, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous aduice, of not prouoking the Romans. This they steaoned otherwhiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious wordes were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens, (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no securitie to Carthage; were these neuer so quiet, and officially vnlesse these would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could finde some good aduantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their owne state was in good case, the warre should beginne; than that in some vnhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driuen to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to giue away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, vpon termes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his Countymen, Hannibal well vnderstood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuised of this businesse) that in making warre with the Romans, it was no small aduantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistants, euen of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effe.

Nnnn fted,

ted, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginian, how glad soever they would be to hear that he had let the warre on foote, would neuertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which it should happen they were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discussed of, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege vnto Saguntum; which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly please the Carthaginians; that had fresh in mind the indignitie, of that Spanish Townes alliance with their false friends. So should hee assaile both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having thus concluded, he neuertheless went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approached vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Louis) to giue some colour to his proceedings; as if he had not principally intended the warre, against Saguntum, but had bene drawne thither by course of businesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the Conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the Oleades; and having besieged Althaa (Louis calleth it Cortica) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master not onely thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrey. This Nation which he first vnderooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he reuerted his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the Vaccæ: and without any great difficultie, wanne first Salamantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, Arbucela, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficultie. But in his returne, he was put to the heighth, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all such of the Vaccæ, as were able to beare armes, being made desperate by the spoiles of their Countrey, with those of Salamanca, and of the Oleades, that had escaped in the late ouerthrow, joyning themselves with the Toletans, compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men: and slayed Hannibal on the banks of the Riuer Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourne in Portugale. These foure Nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer saw enemy, vpon whom hee durst not giue charge; were thoroughly resolved, that his naturall valour would at this time no lesse neglect the cold aduice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vse it. But hee that makes himselfe a bodie of Crytiall, that all men may looke through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition; makes himselfe (withall) an Assle: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or driue him. While men, though they haue single hearts in all that is iust and vertuous; yet they are like coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudder, and at once. It is true, that this subtle Carthaginian, when he serued vnder Asdrubal, was, of all the men of marke in the most aduenturous. But that which may be seeme a Captaine, or inferior Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as haue bene found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diminish his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himselfe from the Riuer side, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their banks of aduantage. The Spaniards; apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should; thrust themselves in furie and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians; abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie side. But when Hannibal saw law them in their way, and well-near ouer; hee turned back his Elephants, to entertaine them at their landing: and thrust his Horſe-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the Riuer. Theſe, carrying a kinde of Lance de gay, ſharpe at both ends, which they held in the middle of the ſtaffe; had ſuch an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the Riuer, vnder their ſtrokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or ſhift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they ſlew all thoſe, (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were already entred into the water; and purſued the reſt, that fled like men amazed, with ſo great a ſlaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that ſide the Riuer of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to liſt vp their hands againſt the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiuing the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, and bemoaned themſelues, as likely to ſuffer that, which afterwards they ſuffered indeede; only becauſe of their alliance and friendſhip with this honourable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was already beſieged. Hereupon ſome crye out, that Warre ſhould bee proclaimed by Land and Sea; as alſo that the two Conſuls ſhould be ſent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carryed it. So it was only concluded; that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent into Spain, to view the ſtate of their Conſederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre againſt Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plauſible occaſion to take armes againſt him: if hee had no ſuch purpoſe; yet would it be in their power, to determine what they liſted themſelues, vpon the report of theſe Embaſſadours; and this their grauitie, in being not too rash at firſt, would ſerue to countenance their following Decree. Of theſe Embaſſadours Luic reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where alſo they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Hiſtorian of ſinceritie leſſe queſtionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagen; and had conference with him, though ſuch as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the reſt of Hannibal his whole courſe. And ſurely wee might wonder, why the Carthaginians ſhould afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embaſſage (as Luic confeſſeth) and fall to diſputation about the covenants of peace; if they had reſected that which was ſent vpon none other preſence, than preuention of warre.

Whileſt the Embaſſadours paſſed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but ſome Roman pretences, againſt Saguntum. He found out Mamerines, or people that ſhould doe as the Mamerines in Sicill had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe againſt the Saguntines. Theſe were the Turdetani; a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, and hauing many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himſelfe had hatched ſome. Finding therefore ſuch an occaſion, whatſoener it was, as made him able to ſay, that the Saguntines had firſt prouoked him, ere he medled with them; he made no more ado, but ſate downe with his whole power before their Towne. Hee was now more ſecure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embaſſadours, with any trembling reuerence, as of late yeares they had bene wont. Neuertheleſſe, he was glad of any handſome colour, to ſhadow his actions: not only becauſe the warre, which he ſo much deſired, was not proclaimed, but that he might not be checked in his courſe, as an open enemy, before hee could ſet foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrarie deſire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, ſhould thereby in ſhort ſpace become their owne. Yet were they not halitie to threaten, before they were readie to ſtrike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readineſſe to be ſent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the ſeate of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Ibryia, rebelled against them: either for that hee found himselfe ouerthemselves with the Gauls, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Emilius, was sent against him: who in seuen daies wan the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terror vpon the Countrey round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which it might haue done long, if the hot-headed Rebelle had not bene too foolish. Emilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in couert; presenting himselfe the next morning, with twentie ships before the Towne, and offering to force the Hauens. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul; and was soone intercluded from the Towne, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths, to a creeke, where he had shipping readie for him, and embarked himselfe: leaving all his estate vnto them, of whose liberallitie he first had it.

This buinesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal sat downe, ere Emilius was landed in Ibryia. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies vnable to moue. Neuertheless he was not vnmindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine mouable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and camp. Neuertheless the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wearie the townemen with continuall traualle, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindered from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-worke of the Saguntines, that were also readie to be won. In this extremitie, there was one Aleon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuer, and without all compasse of honour, as Aleon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, siluer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that hee would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carrie out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better haue submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue enjoyed their liues, and saued the honor of their wiues and daughters) daughters) than to haue eldest at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were deflowered before their faces; and all put to sword, that were about fourteen years of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them took; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures, in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying vnrueged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers; reseruing some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to bee angry at their owne slownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, in vaine. Wherefore they determined to reparaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadors againe to Carthage: demanding only, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that HANNIBAL had made warre vpon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embassage, how soeuer qualified with milde words, was indeede more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was vraged to pleade guiltie, or not guiltie. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, haue only followed his owne counsaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeede worthy examination or dispute, is; whether it were lawfull, or vnlawfull, for HANNIBAL to doe as hee hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors; to you, to challenge vs, if wee haue done any thing contrarie to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lutetius the 30 Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, betweene you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treatie betweene vs and Lutetius, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it bee lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concludung any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the same libertie may we also assume, and hold our selues no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commendement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere caull. For Lutetius the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore, much better, to haue dealt plainly; and to haue alleaged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Ile of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents; which perjure the state of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warre. As for the Saguntines; it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treatie of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie with Asdrubal, and all other business betweene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Doe whatsoever we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which wee haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polihias takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Linius himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought conuenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long bene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had bene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your selfe haue a fancie to offer vs. Marrie then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the Assembly willingly accepted.

This was his dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make warre, it was merely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer bene maintayned by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustie sword, and the emptie purse, doe alwaies plead performance of couenants. There haue bene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise vnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne advantage: and commonly (seeing peace betweene ambitious Princes, and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best-advised haue rather begunne with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henrie the second, of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brisac, to surpris as many places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don Iohn, with the Netherlandes; and Philip the second, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being readie to take his iourne into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischief, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeares old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no meruaile, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings; with whom we are now in peace, haue received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

HANNIBAL takes order for the defence of Spaine and Africk.
His iourne into Italie.

Arre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolued, not to put vp his sword, which hee had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill hee had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Pannick Warre; second to none, that euer the Senate and People of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthage; where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the gouernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troupes of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirte thousand, eight hundred, and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred lingers of the Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all yong men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garriisoned in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces; as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their severall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirte seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him aboue twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twentie Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he sent Discouersers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors, and Discouersers, being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, hee past over the Riuer of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued: and appointed Flanno (not that old enemy of his house, who fate fill at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, hee courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the iourne seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, hee past the Pyrenes, and entred into Gaul. Hee found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, readie in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molcistation, hee came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Volca. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vnaresis and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrie of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet such as remained, being desirous to free their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countreimen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattails wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer; and lent him guides. When the vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; he sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foerde below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gauls vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies disperfed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who meruailously feared the water. He was therefore druggn to make rasses of trees, and couer them with earth and turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another, of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Secundus in infans

Having past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gauls Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he receiued guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding; hee found himselfe extremely incumbered by the Saxons: and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely assailed by them, before he could recover the plaine Countries on the other side. And whereas this iourne ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trauaile, he was euery day, more or lesse, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grieuous weather and snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now readie to receiue them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gauls, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and resistance.

*How the Romans in vaine solicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part.
The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gauls against the Romans.*

THe Countries of Spaine and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Pollicians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they receiued by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answer. With what face (saith he) can yee Romans perswade vs to vallow your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith, and promised assistance, haue beene vterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they

they might else have held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spain have found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, T that for our parts (and so I think may answer for the rest of our Countymen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our hands: who are resolu'd, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadours tooke their way towards the Gaules; vsing their best arguments to perswade them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laugh't them to scorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italie, entertaine a warre which is not meant to be made against vs? Shall we hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne T erritorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedie pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Have the Romans deseru'd so well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our owne houses, to save theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper T erritorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor wethem.

10 With this vnpleasing answer the Embassadours returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Masilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gaue hastie proof. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boij, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cyrena, and Placentia, within their T erritories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrey) to flie to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, hauing little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed wearie, and seem'd desirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadours to treat with them, and to conlude a peace; whom they detayned.

40 Prtor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; march'd in all haste to the reliefe of the besieged. But the Gaules, hauing laid a strong ambush in a wood ioyning to the way, fel vpon the Prtor so opportunely as he was vterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running, a little village, but defensible, vpon the Riuer of Pa. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prtors, was hastily sent, to relieue the besieged, with one Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Armie, and supplied by a new leuie.

As the Gaules were too rash and hastie: so were the Romans too slow, and indeede too ill-aduis'd, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost seruenly endured for many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be so braue and couragious on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italie it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spain, the other in Affrick: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way ward Affrick, with an hundred and three score Quinqueremes, or Gallies, lies, of siue to an Oare; which preparation may seeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neare. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Prouince; and vsed such diligence, hauing the winde also fauourable, as in siue dayes he recovered Mastilia. There hee was aduertised, of Hannibal his hauing passed the Riuer of Rhodanus; whom hee thought to haue found busie yet awhile in Spain. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arriual: whereof hee was neither glad, nor forrie; as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about siue hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were 10 beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, hauing slaine only two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neare, to haue met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found assuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended voiage into Spain. Neuertheless hee sent a way thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armie, to trie what might bee done against Asdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisya; and fo passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troupes of Manlius and Attilius, that lately had bene beaten by the 20 Gauls: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painful iourne.

SCIPIO the Roman Consul ouer-come by HANNIBAL at Ticinam. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by HANNIBAL, in a great battaile at Trebia.

TWELVE moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious iourne from Carthage. 30 na; what great multer he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twentie thousand; others report them to haue beene only twentie thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirtie thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all saue those remembered by himselfe in 40 the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaynes; which mischiefs had deuoured, each, their seuerall shares.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont; he sought to winne the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insabrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three dayes. Their spoile serued well to hearten his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many 50 for good-wil, according to their former inclination. This his disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arriual, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the ROMANS was terrible in those quarters; what a These dwelt about Taurin, a goodly City, now subiect vnto the Duke of Savoy; which from thence took the name of Aazyris Taurinorum.

was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had been heard of his approach: many fate still, for very feare, who else would haue concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their seruice against the Carthaginians; whom neuertheless they wished well to speede.

This wauering affection of the Prouince, wherinto they were entred, made the two Generals halten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Paui; where each of them wondred at the others great expedition; Hannibal thinking it strange, that the Consul, whom he had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange aduenture of passing those Mountaynes, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome litle amazed, at Hannibals successe, and sudden arriual. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haite vnto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia; giuing him to vnderstand hercof; and letting him further know, that whereas he had beene directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that hee should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that hee should returne the Arme vnder his charge, with all possible speede, to saue Italia it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Libyuum; with direction to land the Arme at Ariminum, a Port Towne not farre from Raenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haite. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neare, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed vpon certaine prisoners of the Sarvians, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italia. For these, hauing bene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of present death; were brought into the middle of the Arme: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slaine; with condition, being the victor, to receiue his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gules were wont to vse in single combats. Euerone of these vnhappie men wished, that his owne lot might speede; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoever vneuen termes, to ridde themselves out of slauerie. T he same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them; wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordayne. For they deemed happie, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his libertie, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them; beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect. That he had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich, or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grievous) to liue in a perpetuall slauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Riuers,

uers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, mult needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore praised them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer bene broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to saue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessitie, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraïne them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane, betwene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captayne of France) la comodite de la retraicte aduance la fuite; The commoditie of a retreat, doth greatly aduance a flat running away.

Scipio, on the other side, after that he had giuen order for the laying of a bridge over the Riuer of Ticinus, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons hee could, to encourage the Armie he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theues, than an Armie like to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustayne the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (saith he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they have now remayning, after so many trauailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Rhone, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driuen back to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swordes of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Sicily.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met: each being farre advanced before the grosse of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gauls, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betwene their troupes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, following softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to trie the mettall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, thranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gauls maintayned the fight, and did more hurt than they received: as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consul vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deseruing his aide; and the haste flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee aduertured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had bene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue, to a Ligurian slaue. Whilst the Romans were busied in helping their Consul; an vnexpected storme came driuing at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Nubidian light horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compasse passè them about, whilst he with his men at armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and rowted: so that they all tooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horse thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of wisdomè, hauing lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first passe of winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest ouer-tooke him. For he saw by the lowring morning, what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, hee in a manner stole the reitrait; and recouered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, hee left sixe hundred of his Rare behinde him: who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videretur, tacitam miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort; If a Generall of an Armie, by some vnprofitous beginnings doubt the successe; or finde his Armie fearefull or wavering; it is more profitable to sicale a safe reitrait, than to abide the vncertaine enent of battaile.

It was two dayes after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilst refreshing his men, and ealing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their campe; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Anercobus, Briomarus, and the Gessates, were come to helpethem; if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman campe; wounded and slew many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled out to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruises. Hannibal receiued them exceeding courteously, and dismissè them to their owne places: As men likely to bee of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consul staid a reitrait, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had receiued a great blow. If the Numidians, greedie of spoile, had not staid to ransack their campe; and thereby given time to all, saue some few in Rare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and saue themselves: Scipio being both unable to passe the reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consul; incampes himselfe strangely vpon the banks of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For euery day, more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Bois, that brought with them the Roman Cōmissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceiued better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcitie of victuailes, attempted the taking of Clautidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brunclians, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather ther with a desire of hastie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse receiued; seeing that, in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, was as yet entire. They therefore bailed away Sempronius, that was newly arriv'd, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicily, awaited his comming. He therefore halted thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joynd in one, the Consuls deuided about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiuing from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibals arrivall; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of ambition maketh

the Gauls. Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; sought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victorie, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtain'd. He also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-near expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; objecting the vnskillfullnesse of the new-come Souldiers, and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him, that the Gauls, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting betwene the Riuer of Trebia, and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour, which he might other wisely haue avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal, who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius; it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls inhabiting neare vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that they might haue done; although hee daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at libertie, hee had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his wordes, he was hold to be his owne Carner; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Herevpon they fled to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their fallshood, and was assured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preferre the Consideration of suffering injuries; and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Ostets. Therefore he lent out a thousand horse; which comming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heauie laden, cut many of them in peeces, and chased the rest euen into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like: so that at length, all the Roman Armie was driue forth; and a battaile readie to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for so the Consul would haue it called) made the Romans in generall desirous to trie the maine chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gauls, his spies; that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces. He found in the hollow of a water-courle; ouer-grown with high reeds, a fit

trench to couer an ambush. Thereinto he call his brother Mago, with a thousand choice horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warn'd, and well fed themselves, in their campe, he led into the field, and marched to wards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Nu- midian light horse: to braue the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunitic to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his campe, but forded the Riuer of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of foode, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they would force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, sixtreen, of the other, twenty thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guard on the flanks with three thousand horse: thrusting their light armed, and Darters, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Nu- midians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies swords; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horse-men that pursued them, there escaped no more of sixe and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which every one deserted to be recompencd with the losse that followed. The first was, that hee fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferioriour in horse, and withall thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-even grounds, and woodlands, would haue bene of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grossly over-reachd, and influr'd, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his foot-men with emptic stomachs, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconuenient and perilsous, then to present an Armie, tyred with traualle, to an enemie fresh and fed; since where the strength of body saileth, the generositie of minde is but as an vnpreisable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding raynic, from the Carthaginians; who either perceiued him not, because of the frowers; or would not perceiue him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger; flying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight, yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemie had met with him. Neuertheless hee got away, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeare following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

The departure of HANNIBAL from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria.
FLAMINIUS the Roman Consulaine, and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymentum.

THe Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vsfit for seruice: to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet: but vexed them with continuall alarmes; assaying diuers places; taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Ligurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Quaestors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such Prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in strait places, loden with yrons, and miserably fed: those of their followers hee not only well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That he therefore vnderooke the Warre in Italie, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes hee hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such persuasions. They hee had in feare, lest hee should make their Countrie the seat of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territories. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soone after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that he might not be described, nor known, to those that should vndertake to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed the Apennines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till hee had seene more Swallows than one. At length, when the year was somewhat better opened, hee resolved to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more seruiceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Apennine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was traauiling through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremitie of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficulty in that journey. Neuertheless to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue beene crested vpon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fenues and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, hee loit all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes; by the moistnesse of the aire, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recouered the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where hee somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Scruilius had of late bene chosen Consuls for this year: Scruilius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate, Flaminius, an an hot-headed popular Orator; who hauing once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Consulship, by a deuce of the Senators, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnllesse hee quickly finished the warre. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, lest his aduerclaries, by faying some religious impediments, should detain him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Arimimum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeas'd with this, reuoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and halting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Strulus came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countrie betwene Esula and Arretium, hee put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him sure, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had bene quiet. It is true, that a great Captayne of France hath said; Pays gaste v'esle pas perdus. A walled Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to be much impaired; and therefore aduanced towards the Enemy. Many aduised him (which had indeede bene best) to haue patience awhile, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to heare: saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Carthaginians went, burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore heooke horse; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported, as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tullie makes a jeast: saying, that the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answeere of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto. For he commanded, that it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it: asking with all; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this jealousy, both hee, and the Senate that gaue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre east to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire; which whilest the Consul thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal so vnaduisedly, that he fell, with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all sides, (saue only where that great Lake of Perusia, permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flee from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee slaine in the place, accompanied with fiftene thousand dead carcasses of his Countermen. About sixe thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, tooke courage, as for the most part happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which, kindled by necessitie, had wrought the effects of hardnesse, was well allwaged, when they cealed to despaire, of sauing their liues by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweat, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not discouering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all the morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellows. But they said not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were descried, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner; since they had no time to returne vnto the fight. For deserted they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a village, which hee surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter covenants, or adde vnto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargaine; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidioussnelle gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looeth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his handes: of which all that were not Romans, he set free without ran some; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in freight prison, and in fetters; making them learne to cate hard meat. This was a good way, to breede in the people of Italy, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preserving of her owne neck from the yoke of slaueie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her, in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centenius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neare vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Seruilus the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but coming too late, he increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high peece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yielded to mercie, the next day. Seruilus himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gauls; against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes were brought him, of his Colleagues ouer-throw and death in Uetruvia; that made him halten back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular ieaousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearelie change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their fore-gors. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had bene taken but the yeare before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered he himselfe to be caught soon after in the same mannere. He had also be like forgotten, how Sempronius, tearing to be preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had bene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrarie to all good aduice, haue been so haiste to fight, before the arriual of Seruilus. If Sempronius had bene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush:
 both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Gouernment of France ten yeares, Caesar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, vnder the Roman yoke; into which parts had there bene euey yeare a new Lieutenant sent, they would

would hardly, if ever, have bene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeares compass, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeares; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them have returned as wife, as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they beganne but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Governement, sitting the COUNTRY, they have bene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever bene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Governours, to vp-hold their stobful ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and peoples, though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have perswaded the imitation.

¶ VI.

How Q. FABIVS the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of HANNIBAL, by longer warre. MINUTIVS, the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting, adventures rashly upon HANNIBAL; and a like to perswade with his Armie, but refused by FABIVS.

Greatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than ever did warre, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded upon hate: hee only sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a beaverie; demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, and his abilitie. Whitherto withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bene out of vse, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto compitroll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but vpon some extremity, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People rooke vpon them, as having supreme authoritie, to give the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citie. No vnum sacrum, novum consilium expetit; Contrarie vindes, contrarie courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse; which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion bene also good. But if it were true (as Livy reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of deuotion; then must we beleue, that those bookes of Sybil, preserved in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordayned, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before: all that great Places should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other such trumperie. This vehcvehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: wherof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sonnnes returne alive from Tyrasymene, may serue to beare witness; though it bee more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the Citie, were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken, for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilus the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome, and Ostia, to pursue them: whilest he, with the Legions attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leuied in haste: and from Ariminum he received the Armie, which Seruilus the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrey, and vfed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to beare armes. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trailed Companies; armed his *African*s; alter the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Having refreshed his Armie, fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heeles of the scratches, by walking their pallems in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea to wards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ran, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had assailed Spoletum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer.

The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the battaile of Moncouter; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Iean d'Angeley. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detain him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Citie would open their gates, without expecting any engine of batterie. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as soone as he saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betwene Souldiers bred vp, ever since they were Boies, in warre and in blood, trayned and hardened in Spain, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other seene the enemy, than been vanquished by him. Therefore hee attended the Carthaginian so neare, as hee kept him from stragling too farre; and preserved the countrey from vtter spoile. He inuaded him by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farr off, that in the end they might fit on his taile.

Now Mintius had a contrarie disposition, and was as fierce as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well-adused Commander. For wise men are no more moued with such noise, than with wind bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It wasteth it selfe sooner by suffrage, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and the the victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apenines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to adventure the Roman Armie in bataille: but being farre too weake in horse, he alwayes kept the Hills and fall grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no meanes draw this warie Dictator to fight; that the Winter came on; and that the towns stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though a-farre off; he resolved to rest his Armie, that was loaden with spoile, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Callis-cula, and Caslinum: for other way there was none, by which hee might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which hee had alreadye waited, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would haue beene directed vnto Caslinum, whence he might both assaye the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from coming neare it to prevent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Caslinum to Caslinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now beganne the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap; and wonne the victorie, without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe; by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the cuntry, he had gotten about two thousand Kine; whose hornes he dressed with drie faggots, and setting fire to them in the dark night, caused them to be driuen vp the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be the worke of a terrible enemy. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fierie Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ranne therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recovered sure ground, without molestation: where he stayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish: After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his Iourney towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the Citie, whilest the Carthaginian waited all the Plains. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Mintius, the Master of the horse.

Mintius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiency. Hee was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the African and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled alreadye twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought him selfe wise enough to prevent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by iudgement of the Soldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this jollitie of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee bene peremptorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee held vndoubtedly his owne; the loue of the Armie; and the friends that he had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to faue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer so haينously. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more a-luenerous gamester. Therefore hee drew neare: and to proucke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Armie to waite the Countrie.

Hannibal's camp
was on the hill

Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betwene the two camps; which because it would bee commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not onely for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Sommer: if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow; it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutus did not in many dayes issue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This aduantage Minutus wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angry Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assault his Trenches. They perceiued that it was mere weaknesse, which held him within his campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neither theesse hee did not furch hurt, as hee had receiued.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euerie man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that hee chole such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. Hee said that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise, and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other, taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euery one cryed out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to be wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee hath not chosen any new Consul for this while; Seruilus is sent away to Sca, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, haue as it were taken T race; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enemie and suspicion) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Governement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this mult not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthe. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, that the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equall authoritie, with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessarie, than was the electing of this Dictator, by the People.

- 10 Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authoritie, besides the Propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; nor one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthe Personage, and (there withall) vnto that Dignitie, whose great power had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the yeare before had bene Praetor, was glad of such an opportunity, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher; afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by litle and litle he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very baseless. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to giue an hard push at the Consullship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inuectiue, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, that it grieued them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Governement; that they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impoverish them by warre, especially by warre at their owne dores, which would soone consume every poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he had them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this worthe Master of the horse) that was better affected, vnto them and his Countrie, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authoritie, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begunne. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius; and having finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Aminius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius was so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authoritie; whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiueley, for some longer time, should command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, that it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equal to the Dictator; but that he should neuer be his superiour: He would therefore diuide the Kingdome with him, by lot, according to the custome. Aminius was not here with great displeas-
 50 sed; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless hee meant to doe his best; and fo taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Luca seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two severall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor ioyn-

ned in Commission, but have each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one campe shall not hold them both, without great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this diuision, nor yet reports that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successiually (as the two Consuls vsed) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractarie; and so proud of his aduancement, that continually hee opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to diuide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to bee true. For natures impatient of subjection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authoritie, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Matter of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countrey lying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoining, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered. But left by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground, that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eies and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture vpon the Carthaginians: Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troups with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilest the Romans defended themselues, loosing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neare, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrey, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, fought rather to approue himselfe, by haasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retyred: feareing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee conuicted his life to haue beene saued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilest his Office lasted; which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when hee deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Scipianus the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which hee came neuer within kenning. He ranne along all the coast of Italie; and tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed ouer into Affricke; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countrey, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, hee returned home by Sydrus; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthie Consul. Great forces leued against HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against HANNIBAL.

10 With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were giuen to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preferred them from receiving a great overthrow: but hee had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthie act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome, since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall, had willingly suffered the time of his command to runne away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe just nothing? T hus they suspected they knew not what; and were readie euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his owne

20 private losse, vpon the ill administration of the publike.

This affliction of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignitie. But the Commonaltie were then in such a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Pubius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the libertie of his place, in saying what he list, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stuck not to affirme, That Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to haue beene overthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all beene joynt together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when he commanded ouer all, as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since beene aduanced to honor by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meener sort, euer since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Consul, who should bee altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could with more, than to keep it, by well deseruing of them. By such persuasions, the Multitude was wonne, to be wholly for Terentius: to 40 the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honor; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alleaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successively, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Licitors, or Vigilers, carrying

50 the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only vpon the chiefe of them with these Engines of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualtie, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would have it, there needed no more, than to let slip five daies, and then was all to begin anew; by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well alluaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publicly declare themselves to seeke those Offices. But no deuce would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this meane, but worthie man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Herevpon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinarie make had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and bot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be joynd with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he who few years since had ouercome the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobilitie to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honorable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice; He, and M. Lulius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto iudgement: wherein Lulius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped. But of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde, each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grieuous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happie victorie, that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence, in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders hee would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to haue a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, traualled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Seruilus and Attilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is vncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and sixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantitie of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mightie Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them somewhat euently ballanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Titus Otacilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicily, that hee should accordingly passe ouer into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serue to declare their puissance, than any, though larger, account by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for seruice. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily; twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus another of the Prætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the sonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon; requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing bene their 10 subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was alreadye past. What answer they receiued, it is not knowne; only this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth beganne to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifts that they were driuen soone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (howe little soeuer) would haue bene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauill about forfeiture for non payment of the whole.

Whilic the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consul lay as near vnto Hannibal, as possibly they could, without incurring the necessitie of a battaile. Many 20 skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successe, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was indeede the occasion, to draw on the miserie following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neare him, lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessaries, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowd much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the towne was razed the yeare before. This place Hannibal wanne; and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnto
 30 tage, hee enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrie, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer than the Romans, hauing so many mouthes to feede, could well endure to tarric; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Seruilus had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command no small part of the Countrie adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduenture a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italye. Neuertheless, answer was returned vnto Seruilus, that hee should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as neede required.

40 When all things were readie in the Citie, and the season of the yeare comodious to take the field; the two Consuls, with their armies, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnitie: especially, when soeuer they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemne Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the rest of their Gods, for good successe and victorie: which being performed; the Generals, in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaryes, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leaue-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobilitie, waited vpon Emilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthe of 50 this honor, or likely to doe his countrie remarkable seruice. Terenius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greatnes, than the other was in dignitie. At the parting; Fabius the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many graue wordes, to shew his magnanimitie, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follie of his fellow-Consul. The answer of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to ruine into danger of condemnation, by offending the Multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrey; but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, Hee would thinke it lesse rashnesse to adventure vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.
 Ppppp a only

V. I. I. I.

§. VIII.

Dissension betwene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that HANNIBAL was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans possessed him to fight. The great battaile of Cannae.

THe new Generals, arising at the Camps, dismissed M. Attilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenes; Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessarie, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good wordes; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not only now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their owne great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrey stood; how the late and lastie thereof, relied vpon their hands; vying some such other common matter of persuasion. But the most effectuall part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Armie, had not yet obtained one victorie by plaine force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Here withall he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius, of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thicke mist, through the darkness: whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by vvhich he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Emilius was knowne to bee, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came faire short of them in all things else, save craft; which would not alwaies thraue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire, that they should haue heart to fight; not that they should loose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, hauing preconceiued a victorie, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; vvhich was, good conduct. They remembered vwhat talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected vwith the Vulgar desire, of ending the ywar quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to vic it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Teren- tilius, who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citie. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than vwhen the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to bee freed from the doubtful Passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Teren- tius, vvhich had first their desire to effect, was likely to winne more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in the performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than vvhich few are more dangerous; Dissension of

of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight; Æmilius would fo too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten vp his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Harvest? This would (said Varro) savour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth favour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably eury day. Æmilius lodged sixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thitherif the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to send them away in such halte, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italia. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless he sate downe close by Hannibal; who as an vnbidden guest gave him but a rude well come and intertainment. The Carthaginians florid, and light Armature, fell vpon the Roman Vant-courers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, while it was yet in march; but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had, among their Felites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handfomly withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lie vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. Hee neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present; because the ground serued wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom hee meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall termes. Therefore hee firred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Armie foraging the countrey, was not likely to carrie about with it sufficient quantitie, for any long time.

Here it would not bee passed ouer with silence, that Linie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the miserie into which Hannibal had bene driuen; and of base courses that hee deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. He had (saith Linie) but ten daies provision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnuly Rabble, gathered out of seuerall Nations, so that Hee knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readie to forsake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne a way into Gaulle with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length, for lack of all other counsaile, Hee resolved to get him as farre as hee could from the Romans; into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficultie in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilest hee was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him vnto that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open champaigne ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Linie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus hee saith; HANNIBAL de fuga in Galliam [dicitur] agisse; HANNIBAL [is said] to haue bethought himselfe of flying into Gaulle: where he makes it no more than a matter of heere-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the proecess it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaulle, through the Marishes and Bogs of Etruria, could finde victuailes enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Sommer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing hee had plaid the careful husband in making a great harvest; since he had long bene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surpris, no small part of the Romans provisions? Suteable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattails; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had so well increased his Rock, since he came into that Countrie, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoile: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemie; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easte to doe the like. In this point therefore, wee are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwaies kept his Armie free from sedition, though it were composed of sundrie Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe, hauing not only pronounced, That which of his men soeuer fought brauely with an Enemie, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested and sworne, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaulle, was a senselesse deuce. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrie and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should hee now doe there with his horse? or how could hee be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to liue; hauing betrayed all his Armie; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omiteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Liuie. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne Countreimen; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victorie taken from the Enemie, and giuen vnto blinde Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their owne forces: as if they might easily haue wonne all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemie can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne back to the two Armies, where they lie incamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authoritie; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day hee beganne to passe the Riuer, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and sought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrie to a needlesse hazard. Against whose wordes and substantiall arguments, Terentius could allege none other, than point of honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? Hee would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victorie. When Emilius perceiued, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; hee tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot hee caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leaue behinde him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucitie hee was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heat of fight. This done; the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesser Campe, whence whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the Riuer, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, passed like wife ouer, somewhat higher vp the streame, which ranne from the South; leauing in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He had them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune, than to ioyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prouaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thanke the Gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their liues, where they are sure to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first: but now yee may euen encourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee haue as often beaten as seene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as, to driue them before you out of Gaule; and to winne the open Countrey, and fields of Italie; both of which yee haue obtained: now are yee to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victorie shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall bee Lords of all that the Romans hold.

CHAP. 3. §. 8. of the Historie of the World.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom hee had sent to view the countenance of the Enemie. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that hee fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their 30
General would not be so merrie, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago about many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselfe merrie vnto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the first: saying, that of the Frenchmen, 40
there were enough to be killed; enough to be taken prisoners; and enough to runne away. Euen such wordes as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse; especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was great in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiounesse of the place, into which hee had long before conceiued the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; Hee marshalled his Armie in such conuenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where eury one might doe 50 best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Balaeres, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfants perdus; but when we vsed our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The groffe of his Armie following them he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betwene these hee ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countrie manner; their shields alike; but the Gauls vsing long broad swordes, that were forcible in a downe-right stroke; the Spaniards, shorft and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their nauell upwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse; the Spaniards, wearing white cafocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of body, and furious in giuing charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them haue inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to giue ground, when they were ouer-pressed; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one; and patience of the other; serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly vnto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians; and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spain, by their Conquests; and in Gaul, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamitie should fall vpon them, whilest the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to imploy the utmost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the Enemy could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Herunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse; by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so luckily, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gauls and Spaniards to aduance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should be ouerhardly pressed. So, calling them into the forme of a Crescent, hee made them as it were his Vanguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the emptie space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinne, as seruing only to guide it orderly back, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened and thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to haue bene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I haue seene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appear: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rere, to second the Gauls and Spaniards, when they were driuen to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betwene the last ranks of his long batallions, and in the head of his reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betwene the left battallion and the Riuer Aufidus, were the Gauls and Spanish horse, vnder the command of Astrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Linie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Rere. The whole summe of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and foure thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and hee, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armie was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had bene found conuenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was in deepe no bad way of resitance against Elephants to make the Ranks thick and shorft, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rere, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-allie themselves. Thus much it seems, that Terenius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailles accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailing, was very unprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Emilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Assilant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentions. Vpon the right hand, and toward the Riuer, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was G. Terentius Varrus the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latiues, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeares Consul, had the leading of the battaille. The Sunne was newly risen, and shined nether part; the Carthaginians hauing their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

- After some light skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and lingers of the Bleues: Asdrubal brake vpon the Consul Paulus and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of seruice on horse back, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giuing on in a right line, Pouldran to Pouldron, as hauing the Riuer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake through, Wherefore they not only vsed their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were out-borne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoil. This the Consul Paulus could not remedie. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailles came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and some what more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly, for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaille drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Oppolites were forced to disband, and flie back to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and sollic, pursued. Vpon the Africans, that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void roome enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was readie to re-entrench them, when time should require. In this battie retreat, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had stood in the limbe of wter compass of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thinne and broken; and the botome of it, none other than a throng of men rowted, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot been cast into this one great bodie, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victorie, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vniuitingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, that the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselves, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gauls, Neither is it credible, that they would haue bene so mad, as to runne head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashness of inuious Capitaines: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them along the Riuer side, beating downe, and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless hee cheered vp his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his owne stout behaviour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul receiued a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. Here vpon all his companie alighted, thinking that the Consul had giuen order so to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in distresse. When Hannibal (for he was neare at hand) perceiued this, and vnderstood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Associates, in the left wing, was meruailously troubled by Hanno (or Asdrubal) and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandie Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong South-winde, blowing there accustomedly, draue into the eyes and mouths of the Romans. These, vying their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him a happie day of it. For when the battailes were euen readie to ioyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendered themselves. This was good luck to beginne withall, if there had bene good meaning. Varro had not leasure to examine them; but caused them vnwounded as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where he had them rest quietly till all was done. These craftie aduenturers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Vnder their Iackets they had short swords and ponyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slaine, and there withall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romans, while all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the same hand which gaue the first. Asdrubal, hauing in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of Aemilius that rushed into the grolle of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, betwene the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not yet charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behinde the Rere of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom hee ioynd, and gaue vpon vpon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dimmall storme vnto those, vpon whom it was readie now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselues much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine; thought it the best way, to auoide the danger by present flight. The Consul was no lesse wise than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in strining to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many thranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue endured with their assistance. Now hee 10 found that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hastie flight, his present sicure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians: appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittest for that seruice. Asdrubal himselte, with the Gauls and Spanis horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else. He brake them easly; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne.

 Here beganne a pittifull laughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilest euery one fought to auoide 20 those enemies, whom hee saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got vp to horse, and faued themselues: which though it is hardly vnder-stood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleeeue it, than suppose that Liuie so reporteth to grace thereby his Historie with this following tale. CN. CORNELIUS LENTVLVS, galloping along by a place, where he saw the Consul sitting all bloodied vpon a horse, entreated him to rise and saue himselte; offering him his assistance and horse.
 But PAVLVS refused it; willing LENTVLVS to stist for himselte, and not to loose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into iudgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himselte of that dayes losse. Further hee 30 willed LENTVLVS to commenda him to the Senate, and in particular to FABIVS: willing them to fortifie Rome, as saie and well as they could; and telling FABIVS, that hee lined and died man: full of his wholesome counsaile. These wordes (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaille, or when hee beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselte in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew vwhat he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul and his troupe, in little better case than if they had beene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, vvas inclosed indeede as within a sack, vwhereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bot-tome; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part, they first 40 of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, vwherein all the rest followed.
Emilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilest the battaile yet lasted, and whilest the spaces vvere somewhat open, by which hee might haue vvitdrawne himselte; vvas now (had he neuer so vell benee mounted) vnable to fly, hauing in his vway so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell aspace in that great Carnage. It suffecth vnto his honour, That in the Battaille hee fought no lesse valiantly, than hee had vvarily before, both abstained himselte, and dissuaded his fellow Consul, from fighting at all. If, vwhen the day vvas vterly lost, it had laine in his power to saue his owne life, vnto the good of his Countrey, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much distempered himselte; or being too faintly minded, vvas vwearie of the World, and his vnthankefull Citizens. But if such a resolution vvere praise wortie in Emilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; that was the Englis vertue of the Lord Iohn Talbot, Viscount Lille, sonneto that famous Earle of Shrewesburie, who died in the Battaile of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was sold, grieuoufly, if not sensible, in the joy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently beene at an end. But hee believed not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a victorie.

Or without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their troubles, than the truth of things, and information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vied. For, to recompence his junioritie, (such as it was) hee produceth substantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanitie of those former Author: out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines it is to bee suspected, that hee would not haue taken, had hee bene borne in either of these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and bene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserued, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall haue cause to wish, that either they were some what lesse Roman, or else, that some Wokes of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of things; and belieue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probabilitie. This attentiu circumspection is needfull euē at the present: such is the repugnance, or forgetfulness, which we finde in the best Narration, of things following the Battaille of Cannæ. For it is said, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others, to the number of ten thousand, got into Cannusium, choosling for their Captaines yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terentius Varro, joyning his companie vnto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote vnto the Senate, that hee had now well-nere ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had bene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the ouerthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman campe, and trusted vp the spoiles, forthwith hee dilloged, and marched away into Sannium; finding a disposition in the Elipines, and many other people therabout, to forsake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Celssis, where he laid vp his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hastned into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grieuous losses, suttained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Countrey, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtserie (as it seemed) which he vied, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as arother times, so now also after his great victorie at Cannæ, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italians Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had fought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but seeking indeede, by all waies and means, to make them his; whilst all other motiues were concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by injuries, sought to right himselfe and his countrey; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fabrys about their ransom: and together with these, he sent Carthago a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoop vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes preuailed not, as shall bee shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceiueable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not only the Sannites, Lucians, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, beganne to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therr with as freightly conioyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrey, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves, like Iayes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons, and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the majestie of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so preuailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Papirius Calpurnius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held, by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourne into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the nearnes of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure, to treat about any articles of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the Multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yield vnto their towne to Hannibal & to meet him on the way, with some of their nobilitie, that should assure him of all faithfull meaning; were driuen to sit still, in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, felues, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize.

 The People, holding so tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginarie oppression; had no good cause to feare, lest the Senators would become their Lords in deede, and, by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more streight subiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they late in Council, 10 about these motions troubling the Citie; and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman; but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to joyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and save them harmless.
 This he spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and pri-uie vnto their delignes. Having thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuertheless to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning.
 20 They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leave; Hee called the People to assembly; and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare; hee told them, that these wicked Governours were surpris'd by his policie, and all fast, readie to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Only thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessitie required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearsing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their judgement was of those. Allcried out, that they were worthie of death, Choofe then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Mul-30 titude, vnprovided for such an election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some knowne fault, basenesse, and in-sufficiencie; or else euen because they were vknowne, and therefore held vnworthie. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be suborned, having bene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured 40 Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also, were governed by him: to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for sauing all their liues.
 Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obsequiosnesse, to court the People;
 giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to call them downe:
 All the Citie being thus of one minde; only feare of the Romans, kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Cunna, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouths to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Camp-50 pians, did then serue the Romans in the Isle of Steil: the Parents and Kinmen of these remained so farre, that Embassadors were sent vnto Tarentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, whereouer they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers.
 Yet they offered him formally the serueice of their State, and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them, the greatest of the Romans misfortune: saying, that all was lost; and that the Campians must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves; but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campans against the Sannites. Hereunto hee is said to haue added a foolish Inuective, against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcasses, and to feede vpon mans flesh; with such other stiffe, as only bewaithed his owne feare. As for the Campans themselves, He put them in minde of their present strength: they hauing thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all prouisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came: and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, vpon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizen of theirs should bee subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in Warre, or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themselves would choofe, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honorable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly; vsing, in vaine, many p[er]suasions, to the wisfull and head-strong multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garison was entering the Towne: at which time he gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it, and cut it in peeces, that, by such a notable peece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon basted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided, to lay siege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italy, and Rome it selfe, should bee driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campans, but a Traitor to the State; and vse him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This was granted; and Magius, deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if hee kept him aliuie, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Paucius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilest hee was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from making any such attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societe, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bathe.

The

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Cassine, and Acerre, were the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeede, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Cannae; and the griefe of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the losse already receiued, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senarors found worke enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, wherof the streets were full. Courriers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: they were so amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatall bookes, buried aliuie two men and women Gauls and Greekes, in their Ox-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions; we may iustly thinke, that Sibyl herselfe was instructed by the Deuill. Yet is it not improbable, that extremitie of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassidour was sent to Delphi, to consult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire, with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the Gods, and obtaine an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnesse of their feare, though not seruing to giue remedie. At the sametime came letters out of Sicil, from the Praetor Othacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian fleet, that walted the Kingdom of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Illes Agæciæ, which was in readinesse to set vpon Lilybæum; and the rest of the Roman Prouince, if the Praetor surred aside, to the rescue of Hieron.

In the middle of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessitie required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giuing him thanks for that he had not desistred of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doublelesse) prouided wisely for vp-holding the generall reputation. If his coming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those that were subject vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeede he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimitie and Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done: But whereas Linte would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleue him not. It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would haue struck off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthie, for a smaller offence. M. Titius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently vnto mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a thousand horse: though with much difficultie; as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boies. These foure Legions, are elsewhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leiuied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set downe, that had bene enrolled in the beginning of the yeare for custodie of the Citie. Wherefore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field; foure new ones of Prætoriani, or Striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them eight thousand sturdie slaues, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever ought monie and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith bee discharged of his debts, or punishment, if he would serue in the Warre. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bene there set vp: among which, were sixe thousand Armour of the Gauls, that had bene carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this Warre. To such mockerie had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their owne gates, in the habit of Strangers, when Hannibal was readie to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannæ, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the Citie, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territorie. To the Messengers of the captiues, audience was giuen by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poore kins-folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their suit; which yet they obtayned not: Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the Enemy; much was alleaged against these who now craued ransome: but the speciall point was, that they were willfully lost, since they might haue saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consul: they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted monie: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we haue recorded. Neither must wee regard it, that the slaues which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had bene seuerer; when as in deede they were futeable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly: Hereof it is no little proofe, that Hannibal valued those Roman slaues, whom he had taken in the campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the price, wherat he thought them current. But if wee should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaues might haue bene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet must we withall consider, that these priuate men did only lend these slaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forebare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the warre should bee ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would haue bene his chapmen: but seeing he dealt only for readie monie, they chose rather to buy. We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like austertie, vpon the same reason, but contrarie pretence, was vsed toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great Battaille. These were charged, for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if cuer) that which they call ragione del Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpeit selfe, by doing injuries to priuate private men. And so dealt the Romans now; condemning all those that had served at Canne, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serve, not as others did vntill they had fulfilled twentie yeares in the warres, or else were fiftie yeares of age; but vntill this warre should bee ended, how long soever it lasted, and that without reward. The same thrifftie censure, was afterwards laid vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of qualitie, saue only (agood while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cassius Metellus, and a few other bare-brained fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of so great a losse, were desisting, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequalitye of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonaltie: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; neuertheless it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with fiftie and twentie thousand men. What he did with this Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Praetors, lay at Olitia with a fleet, ready to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, and fiftene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces he was to defend that Island, and doe what harme hee could in Africa. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canne, hee sent these of his newe Levie to Rome, for defence of the Citie, and marched hastily with his Legion toward Canusium: deliuering the fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanians) to let in the Carthaginians; and knew not how to auoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore hee made great iourneys thitherward; and arrived euen time enough to prevent the Enemie. Many idle walks Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by faire wordes, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyaltie: it had also a sure Haucn; whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of sustayning much inconuenience, by spoil of the Landes and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, that Hannibal was Master of the field: which if hee laid waste, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and such talke vsed some, that had little feare of their owne private want or povertie, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginians. Of these, one L. Bantius was chiefe: a stout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of especiall marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good seruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canne, and after much gentie vsage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thanks hee could vnto so courteous an Enemie. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought vpon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman state, had not repaired vnto him the Praetor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts; and louing entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, hee made this Bantius so farre in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof hee had not presently aduertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and missed, as formerly hee had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went hee to Nuceria: which hee tooke by composition; and so returned back againe

Bantius

againe to Nola: Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. Hee therefore brought his Armie close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could bee trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, euen to finde him busied within the Citie, whi-lest the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three severall gates looking towards the Enemy: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discouraged, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon hee bad his men bring ladders, and make readie for the assault; which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Soldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noyse, to make his vnex-pected fallie the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, wherat in like sort issued they of the new-leued Companies, vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terrour was more available vnto the Romans, than their force; yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the brauest Acts performed in all that warre; foras-much as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be ouer-come. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict account of the Citizens of Nola: condemning aboue threescore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Aserra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdom to loose time in persuasions, but laid siege vnto it, and beganne on all sides to close it vp. This terrified the People, who knew themselves vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Towne empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Cassina, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling, that an Enemy so neare should disquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It seems, or rather indeede it is plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst vwith a small part of his Armie seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Romans strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that hauing three years since demanded at Carthage, the bodie of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre from

from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not resistlesse. At Cassinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towne, and held it. Five hundred of the Prænestines there were, and above foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latinis. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaille of Canna, being sent by their severall States to the campe: whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encouraged them, and sent them back sorrowfull; for they loved well their Lords the Romans; vnder whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Cassine, where they met and staid. Neither had they staid there long, ere they heard newes from Capua. How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campans into rebellion. The people of Cassine were afflicted as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Prænestines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one sterne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the River Volturnus) against the Enemy. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Cassine were, as the rest of the Campans, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Stamerines. But their constancie in defence of the place witnesseth, vpon what honest reasons they surprisid it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountered with greater forcés: but these few found him more worke than he expected. Diuers assaults hee gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable cunct. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much indutric to his force, that he was driuen to close them vp, and seeke to winnethem by famine. T. Sempronius Græchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Armie higher vp the River: who faime would haue relieved Cassine, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcus from Stæffula could not come: his way being stopped by the ouer-flowings of Volturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leaue them, who were in dangor of the Campans, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water staid his iourne, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Cassine. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrells of corne were sent by night, floating downe the River; and when some of these, being carried awy by an Eddie of the water, stuck among the Willoves on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was discovered and prevented; Græchus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length, when all food was spent, and whatsoever grew greene vnder the walls was gathered for sallies; and the Carthaginians 40 ploughed vp the ground: whercon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Cassine, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacie; yet now he was content, to graunt them their liues at an indifferent ranfome, which when they had paid, hee quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians hee placed in Cassine, as a Garrison for defence of the Campans; vnto whom he restored it. To the Prænestine Souldiers great thanks were giuen, and louing rewards; among which, they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present 50 condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Prænest: vvhich is no weake proof, of the good estate wherin the Citics flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Cassine was not a litle beneficiall to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise haue bene better spent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armie, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to HANNIBAL in Italie.
How by the malice of HANNO, and sloath or parsimonie of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of FABIVS and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the sonne of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Cannes, his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victorie.

He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls his brother had fought; what Consuls he had chased, wounded, or slaine; how the stout Romans, that in the former warre neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captaine, because he neuer durst adventure to come to battaile; that, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slaine of them about two hundred thousand, and taken about fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Sammites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not only (as alreadie it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had bene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He said it was euen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repair their broken forces. Hee willed them to consider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrie; that so many Battailles had much diminished his brothers Armie; that the Soldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberrall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage:

which the victorie would requite with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to bee poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, or (as others would rather haue it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitie, forasmuch as none but the * principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament,

Who so considers the former Punicke Warre, may easily finde, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the duration thereof, any such hopefull aduertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy, Homicus, a Senator aduerse to the fiction of Hanno, is said to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should bee yielded vp vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to giue thanks vnto the Gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it bee not likely that

* Thus Luit reports it, and credible it is, that while Rome was poore, the licentiousness of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwise Ant. Anals. The meaning of the King, was the generall privilege of the Roman Equites.

911

Hanno made the same formall answer, which Linie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senator's Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow received at the Ilands Ægates: yet the summe of his speech appears to have bene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal him selfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barbarines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill befecemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had bene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled forsooth with spoile, to make request for meat and monie. To these caulls, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other bootie than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine conveyance of monie and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Armie in some other Prouince, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards said to have done, when they wanne the campe of Ardubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italie;) then might such an objection more justly have bene made vnto his demand of a supply.

20 But the most likely part of Hanno's his Oration, and wherein hee best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilest they had so much the better in warre.

What would have bene the issue of this counsaile, if it had bene followed, it were not easie to say. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignitie, in seeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have bene kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of so many shamefull overthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissiue behaviour could preferre Carthage from ruine, longer than vntill such time, as Rome was at leisure from all other warres. This counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeede very peitlent; and serued only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that fortie thousand Nubians, fortie Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should bee sent ouer to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be leuied in Spain; not only to supply, as neede should require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it bene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to taxe the reckless improuidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannæ to Rome, or in refreshing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next yeares worke would have finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduerture; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanians, would have bene commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following warre. But either the too much carelesse of those, that were loth to make halte in laying out their monie, before extreme necessitie required it; or the craftie malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working vpon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commoditie, than sense of the publike neede; vtterly peruered, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the order that had bene so well set downe. The Elephants were sent: and some monie peraduerture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threecore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which already had bene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and sundrie accidents of warre. Only some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the iourne of Asinubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled therevnto, till many yeares were past, and the Romans had recouered their strength.

Here wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes receiued from their subiects, and by their wealthie Trade of merchandize. For it is not long, since the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidious tyrannic of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessitie twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impoueriued Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much monie, as was to beedisburled for redeming of peace, after the losse at Egastis. Yet wee see, what great Armies of Nu- midians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the seruice in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of monie in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeares together bene forced to some extraordinarie cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slauce, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meane to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthie merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, euen from Tyrus their Mother. Citie in the bottome of the strights vnto the great Ocean, about the Romans: who liued on the fruits of their ground; and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage, the impudence of Roman fallhood, in seeking an honest colour where with to shad- 20 ow the intended breach of faith, discouered plainly whence the ielousie was bred, that this mightie Citie would againe rebel. For the Carthaginians, hauing gi-uen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Arme did set forth, to performe whatoe-uer should be enioyned them, with condition that their Citie might not be des-troied; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yeilded vp all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne muil needs be demolished, and remoued into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which yee now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of husbandric; an wholesome kinde of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conuerfation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing wordes, plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoeuer it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seeme, not only to haue had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, and the great height where-vnto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not bene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skillfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euery one, or mozt of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in Victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had bene requisite in the execution. It was ealie for Hannu to perswade couetous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Arme into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisedome, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the Enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Governement of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so doe) finished the warre, might easily make Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that free had given them to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulitie, dulnesse, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disturbances in Spain, than to set vp all their rest at once in Italie. Yet was it indeede impossible, to hold a Countrie of so large extent, and so open a coast, as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturalls being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been to make a running warre, by which the Romans might have bene found occupied, euen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to deferre the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome: it selfe, vntill such time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province; then must Emporia haue bene besieged and forced: which by reason of alliance with the Messilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a readie and secure Harbour. But the Towne of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; having not about foure hundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Messilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would haue bene a worke of little lesse difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bene in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, neare vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being such, as caused it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much troubled about expelling the Romans vtterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawne homer to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Armie to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the seat of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spain. But the priuate affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accellarie to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunitie, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they let not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourse, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the peace full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to wearie themselves in traualle for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generally highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industrie of these Barthines had bene somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were farre lesse honorable than the People of Rome: not only in governement of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publicke about their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimonious vsed toward their owne Mercenaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complain, with seeing sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victorie at Canna; when gladly they would giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunitie, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spain.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly,

ly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Italie, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprechend, in that worthe Historian Liniæ, the tender love of his owne Countrie, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others: yet mult we not, for his sake, beleeue those lies, which the vnpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. Hee saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being cutt broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrarie hereunto we finde in the Liste of AMILCAR, set downe by Emilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to bee in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not bene any warre. These wordes, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall in insuling fuch spirit into them; may be taken as not ouerliberal. For in the Treatie of peace betweene Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise he would not take of any composition: Amilcar boldly bad him choofe, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Countrie had put into his handes to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their handes of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man confumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; saying, that how soeuer Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaued themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betweene Fabius (as also perhaps betweene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightie Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that how soeuer Liniæ introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands * Ægætes, with the great seruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet * elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was General. Now concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wisht, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Liniæ to his Rome, had not caufed him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Stranger reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before ASDRUBAL the sonne of ANILCAR, followed thence his brother HANNIBAL into Italie.

10 T hath bene shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armie, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with foure-thre hundred foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had bene allotted vnto this Consul, threewith to make warre in Spain against Han-10 nibal: who since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Armie, P. Scipio beleued, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanishe Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie some of the number back with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a fleet of thirtie Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat meruailous. For they continually prevailed in Spain, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from 20 their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we haue cause to wonder, how the Enemy could so often finde meanes to repair his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrie from the tyrannie of Carthage, might easily winne vnto their Confederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to break it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerours, might serue to arme the Naturalls against these Invaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans, were it only by the memorie of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treasure: which easily trased souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirstie Na-30 tions. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or seruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durst be bold to say it; the victories of the Scipios were neither so many, nor so great, as they are set out by Lince.
 This we may be bold to say, That the great Capitaine Fabius, or Lince in his person, maketh an objection vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Lince for him, doth answer;
 That if ASDRUBAL were vanquished, as SCIPIO would say, by him in Spain: so strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had bene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narra-40 tion, That ASDRUBAL being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of a battaile, saue only by the sleepe descent of Rocks, ouer a great River that lay at his back, ranne away with all his monie, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly toward the Pyrenees, and so toward Italie; vpon which hee fell with more than threescore thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a peece of ground very defensible, but most incommo-dious for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his monie and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy:
 Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to haue done in the last battaile betwene him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherefore we can no more than be forrie, that 50 all Carthaginian records of this warre, and Spanishe, (if there were any) being vterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to relvnto whom it were no wisdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipios in Spain; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certaintie.

Lib. 1. 3.

j: 2286

On Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven-towne not farre within the Pyrenees, retaining till the same name with little inflexion: That by the fame of his clemencie heallured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleuee, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had neede to vie his clemencie, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and hauing no iurisdiction in the Countrie. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practise had the better successe, for that hee seemed to haue none other errand, than setting them at libertie. This pretext auailed with some: others were to be hired with monie: and some hee compelled to yeld by force or feare; especially, when he had wonne a battaile against Hanno. In to all T reaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that hee remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past; and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conferent, which is, as Tullius interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) vphold the Maieste of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it in dedde an obscure coucnant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditiois Romanas; of the Roman iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrie wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Barguntians, Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore hee not only appointed Hanno Governour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Prouince betwene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalltie of their Countrie vnto Hanno and his Heires.) He made him not only Licutenant generall ouer them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; butooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno, at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanais, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, wherinto they ranne by seeking to auoide it. This bad affection of his Prouince, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces hee was able to raise out of his Prouince. Therefore hee aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein hee was overthrowne and taken. Following this victorie, Scipio besieged Sisium, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about *Taraco*n, whom hee found carelesse, as after a victorie, rousing abroad in the Countrie, and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, he ranne vp into the Countrie, where hee with-drew the Algeretes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his fleet: where hauing set things in order, hee returned back, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his comming, but with-drew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Algeretes were compelled by force, hauing lost Athanageria their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirtie daies;

daies; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were hinc at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacie, they were amerced twentie talents of siluer. During the siege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to bee the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembered, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that wee heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntari-
 10 ly ditionis Romane; subiect vnto Rome, should, in continuance of the storie, after a few lines, hold warre against Scipio, without any assistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Illergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take arms in his quarrell; whilst himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and fled himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Countrie, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence hee durst not stirre, untill Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing home few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning vpon
 20 them, vnlooked for, through a deepe snow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefite: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, vpon sense of injuries receiued, or apprehension of more grieuous tyrannie, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrie Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from henceforth vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; still when they were neuer throughly conquered.

30 The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians, in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too far on ground, hee tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victorie, about one hundred and twentie Nations, or pettie Estates, in Spain, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, and giuen Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the Land, and hide himselfe in Lusitania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing easily vanquished the Illergetes) went 40 not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subiects and had giuen him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes; wherein they slue fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand prisoners. Then arriued P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren jointly administred the businesse in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did, had contentment, without feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, and besiege Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal. Bojar, the Gouernour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered 50 himselfe to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and heartie good will of the Countrie, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the craftie Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all

all the Roman Generalls: perswading them, as hee had done Bostor, to make the Liberalitie their owne. Herby the Romans purchased much loue: if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward ere this we finde, that all the Spanissh Hoilages were left in new Carthage. I am wearie of rehearing for many particularities, whereof I can beleuee so few. But since wee finde no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The yeare following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and five hundred horse, out of Africk: Hee repairs his fleet, and prouides euery way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, reuolt vnto the Romans: because they had bene chidden the last yeare for their negligence, which had betrayed the Nauiie. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischief, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a iournee to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assault him, that they driue him, for very feare, to incamp himselfe strongly on an high peccce of ground; whence hee dares not come forth to giue them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein hee had laid vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrie round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beates them, kills the most of them, and disperleth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should leade his Armie forth-into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had bene informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus wee finde it reported; and that vpon the very rumour of this his iournee, almost all Spaine was readie to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or, if they will needes haue it so, that then they must send him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Armie, which to employ they should finde worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needes be gone; and Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice, both by Land and Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherefore Asdrubal hath new no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of monie, that hee might haue wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gaulles; through whose Countries hee must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he laies great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subjects: and hauing gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuer name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather bee vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were throughly joyned. Their campe the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionlesse) they are meruailously enriched; all the monie that could be raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes euent joynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrie stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so farre from all thought of traouailing into Italie, that it leaues him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to

Rome:

Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they have neither monie, apparel, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Armie and Fleet; That all is wanting; so as vnlesse they may bee supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarrie any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Cannæ, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent; how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that ioue and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke; that remember the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his owne safetie? They finde him, and Mago, and Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Armie of threefore thousand men, besieging Illurgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably conjecture to haue stood, where Cannæ is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illurgi, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Ibergetes their nearest Neighbour, for hauing revolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, with want of victuailes. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and hauing victualled the place, encourage the townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threefore thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, driue all the three Cartaginian Commanders, euery one, out of his quarter; and take that day, besides prisoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes. The Cartaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illurgi, fall vpon Incibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedie of earning monie by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Cartaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Cartaginians had monie to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Countrie, wanting monie of his owne; and being beaten in this iourne, had lost his wealthie carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. Howsoeuer it happens, the Cartaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there are of them about thirteene thousand slain, and about three thousand taken; besides two and fortie Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Lirius gaur credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeare, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeare, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are ouerthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haile ouer the Riuer. At Castrum Altum, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, P. Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuailes, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Countrie round about is too full of Enemies: the Cartaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also vpon some straglers, or such as lagged behinde their fellows in march, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Pub. withdrawes him selfe vnto Mons Vitloria: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouer-looks the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Cartaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesio, with a full Armie, arrives to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neare incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places therabouts, is discovered by the enemies : who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himselfe to an high peece of ground ; where they besiege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. Alter this (but I know not why) Casula, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans ; though being late distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Batis. Neerthelesse the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberis, to besiege Miturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison ; hoping to winne it by famine. Wee may iustly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Casula, yea and the Roman Armie lying so close by them, and to seeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had bene so grieuouly beaten the yeare before. But thither they goe : and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion : who enters the Towne by force, & breaks out vpon them the next day, and in two battailes kills aboute twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fixe and thirtie Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is rematkeable : considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra : but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Munda ; where the Romans ate soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victorie ; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio bene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed ; and twelue thousand men ; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fiftie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auriges ; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe : but kills not halfe so many of them, as before ; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these ourtthowes, the Spaniards, a people framed euen by nature to fed warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asarbal : who hauing also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and loofeth eight thousand of his men ; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen alhamed, to leaue Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians ; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this watre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum ; and were faine (as appears) to goe their way without it : so as they neede not to bluth, for hauing so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they winne Saguntum : and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour ; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had bene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their btaue exploits, wee can perceiue none, than this recouerie of Saguntum : excepting the stopping of Asarbal's iourne ; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporiae, an Haucn-towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phoceans, kinne to the Masilians, friends to the Romans ; They haue easily wonne to their partie, lost, recouered, and lost againe, some pette bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnletted passions ; and now finally they haue wonne a Towne, where of the Carthaginians held entire possession ; who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprife ; which is to be suspected, since in this Action wee finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal, they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembered, after cutting one of which Asdrubal laye downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed readie to rebel, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carrie the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriual of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had bene absolute Masters of the field, when they wanne Seguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeare following in praesiding only with the Celiberians the next adjoining people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeares businesse. Of these Celiberians we heare before, That they haue yielded vp themselves vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to seruise in the Roman Campe. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue; vnlesse perhaps in those dayes it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author, whom Luius follows, to call euery Messenger, or stragler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Armie of thirtie thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italia, there to deale with their Countreimen that follow Hannibal in his warres: But if any of these three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellows at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next haue a desire to leade them into Italia. Hereof wee finde more than probability, when these Mercinarie Celiberians meet the Carthaginian Armie in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this access of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; euen among the Celiberians, at Antorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their dilfance, which is fiae daies march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrey, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leauing the third part, and all the Celiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer iourne to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are not sludying how to runne away: they finde no such necessitie. They joyne their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driuen to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masaniſſa, Prince of the Masseſſi, Numidian; bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honour of this cruise is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederat with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is comming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suffetani, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and bescaged, He issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leauing T. Fonteus his Lieutenant, with a small companie, to defend the campe. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue been ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Rear, that P. Scipio, vnertaine taine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is struck through with a lance, and laine: very few of his Armie escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twentie daies after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warr in their owne Countrie. If Antorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it; a Celiberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly beleuee, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them; and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the Enemy, or to joyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keeps his men together. Asdrubal persereth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gesio, hauing made an end of Publius, halten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is ouer-taken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonie ground, where growes not so much as a shrub, vsit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes, of easie ascent on euery side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliade. These weake defences the Carthaginians loone care in sinder: and breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of them aliue; that sauing themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoining, else vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on euery side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to coer them, could breake out, and shrow themselves within woods adjoining, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who hauing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesio, comming vpon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men, (soudly weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie perhaps he might haue gotten, but that hee wisely founds the retrait; refusing the surie of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Romans dares not follow his aduantage, they returne to their former securitie; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps du garde, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neare. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with liuely wordes; and tells them, That there is no aduenteure more safe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of scruice. So hee leads them forth by night, and steales vpon the campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a-sleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their campe Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and runne away toward the campe of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay fixe miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley betweene twente their two camps he hath bellowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall euey one, and are cut in peeces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his coming; Martius hailets to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speede, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficultie he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and blondd with their former execution, He driues head-long into flight, all that can saue themselves from the furie of the sword. Thirtie seuen thousand of the enemies perish in this 10 nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirtie, that are taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antias adde, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were slaine ten thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie, taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Liue therefore hath else where well obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Liue reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Capitaine

 20 Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distresse, He could clearly get off from the Enemies, and giue them any paring blow, though it were farre lesse than that which is here set downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthe to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He filled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings, than the case required: and therefore took such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome; ere the Companies, leuiued to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for 30 Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in vsurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conuenient haste, into Spaine: carrying with him about sixethousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome beganne to prosper in Italie, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keepe footing in Spaine, or to 40 stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was vnder Martius and Fonteus; he found surer tokens of the ouerthrowes recited, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman partie was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it could not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, neare enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no
 50 issue, but only through a fireight, whereon the Roman seized at his first coming. What should haue tempted any man of vnderstanding to incamp in such a place, I doe not finde: and as little reason can I finde in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed; That he spent many daies, in enterprising parlee with Claudius about this businesse, That night by night hee conceiued his foot-men

(a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a milite day, Hee stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leauing his campe empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spain; wee shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicitie of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Countrey, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke milite day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger when in the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue bene of farre lesse value. Howfoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recouer the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their Election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same Familie. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the son of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrey. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie; and other Vertues that purchaseth loue, of which qualities what great vse he made, I shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, fauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanitie; How he ved to walke alone in the Capitall, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue bene one of the Gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entering her chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than meere fables, deuised by Historians, who sought thereby to adde vnto the glorie of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not only to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generalitie, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much astonished therat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them hauing the heart, to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twentie yeares of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be scene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was readie to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was joynd M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and

and a thousand horse, in thirtie Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emperia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a majestie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could give any reason of it. If we must beleue this, then must wee needes beleue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage: vpon which he came unexpected, with five and twentie thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. Hee assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wanne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue bene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walls; whereof the Townsmen them (thies were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-Island, betwene an Haven and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher men of Tarracon had founded; and finding in some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deepe, or (at most) wading vp to the Naui, Scipio thrust thertinto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the wals without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the natural strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootie was found within the Towne, Liuie himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was after ward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasurie, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanitie it was to say, That all the wealth of Africa and Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoining Prouinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtesie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celiberians, and two pettie Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, nearest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus, forlooke the Carthaginian partie; and joynd with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not want himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and inuited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was in deepe no vntrue token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian partie, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Scipio; then could nothing haue bene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should haue rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vnde. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoeuer the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer Masters of the Countrey, till this worthie Commander, by recouering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and

by

by his great munificence in sending them home, wanne vnto himselfe the assured loue and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this losse, were very forrie: yet neuertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a yong man, hauing stolne a Towne by surprize, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time bulie, in setting forth towards Italie; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, fate downe before Ihera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not bene much amisse, if the passage ouer the Lake had bene vndiscovered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howfoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generalitie of the businesse, betwene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should bee staied from going into Italie, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his iourne, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcor, went to a greater enterprize: euen to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fallshon; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italie: whither hee ranne for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal; his Vantcoursers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horle, that they draue them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not calie of access on the fore side; by which himselfe got vp; and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betwene the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauerie, than he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst aduenture his Armie to the hazard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such aduantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climbed vp the Hill to him; they recovered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill-top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long. I know not whether: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battaile, wherein he lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his disperfed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrenees, hauing sent away his Elephant: ere the fight beganne. Neuertheless Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue consulted with him about this warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needes must, were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italie; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

The great troubles that HANNIBAL raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome.
 POSTHUMIVS the Roman General, with his whole Armie, is slain by the Gauls.
 PHILIP King of Macedon, enters into a League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Romans, joining with the Italians, make warre vpon PHILIP in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

W left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where hee and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may bee thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mightie aide, as was decreed to bee sent thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattaile to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Armie, by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue fore'd some walled Townes, in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Cannae:
 but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Armie must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would haue grievously punished him for such imploiment of the Sommer. This may haue bene the reason, why hee forbore to aduerture vpon Rome after his victorie at Cannae. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carrie the Citie at his first coming; want of vittualles would haue compelled him to quit the enterprife. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had presented himselfe vnto

them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauaile was past, when so many States of Italie were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was passed ouer joyfully, sauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mightie forces, that were decreed and expected.

The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arriued no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: only we finde, that after this he had about thirtie of them; whereas all, save one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had bene lost in his iourne through the marishes of Helvetia. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the persuasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Other wise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as hee himselfe had done; and increase the Armie, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourne; than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the fleet that should carrie such a number of Men, Horses, and

Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year serued, He tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Casinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Haven-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Lucians, and Hanno to the Lucians: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italie, yea the Iles of Sicill and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome muſt needs bee deferred vnto another yeare, Hanno made an ill iourne of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue about two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped faire better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, hee wanne Petelia or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. Hee wanne likewise Consentia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the Citie of Laers, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Towne of Rhegium, ouer against Sith.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthe to be recorded, as a notable testimonie of the good gouernement, vnder which the Roman Subjects liued. As for the Sentines, Campanis, and others; whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrarie; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Souerainetie, and were now transported with ambition: which Reason can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers received answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left means, to relieue their Associates that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a private iurisdiction within themselves) fell downe to the ground, and humbly be sought the Fulbers, not to giue them away: promising to doe and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Towne against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their owne safetie; as hauing already discharged their faith to the yrmolt. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and hauing striven in vaine to defend themselves; when there was no apparent possibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assaultants.

The Romans at this time were indeede in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Cannæ; they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neare at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Pretor they had sent, with an Armie of five and twentie thousand, into Gauls; to the Ilyrian King Pineus they had sent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and so Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subject and Rebelle, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little succurable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Armie was cut in peeces by the Gauls, in such sort that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litanis, through which he was to passe. Against his coming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees so farre, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the Wood, beganne to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouerwhelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before.

How

How this tedious worke, of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceiued, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuiice was subject; I doe not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue bene done; and what failed in the stratageme, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthe to be omitted, as a monument of the favage condition, wherewith Lambradie, a Countrie now for ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleafed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessell, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse than the calamitie. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe; and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Ilyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Sceraleus Ilyrian Kings, as also with Genius, who raigned within a few yeares following, the Romans dealt vpon euen termes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Peisens; not commanding their dutie, as Vassalls. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For hauing assured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, Hee sent Embassadours to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, vpon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italie, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italie, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, vntill he had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving sensibly vnto him the full possession of that Countrie, and the Isles adioyning. But such predispotion of Kingdomes and Prouinces, is lightly controlled by the diuine Providence, which therein shewes it selfe not (as Hierodotus falsely termes it, and like an Atheist) enuious or malicious; but very iust and majesticall, in vp-holding that vnspcakable greatness of Soueraignerie, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their iourne towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, aduentured vpon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so wellcome, that the joy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquirie. So they were louingly feasted; and friendly dismissed, with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to auoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their iourne, fell wilfully into the 40 Campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse, about which they came, vpon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnluckily to be descried by the Roman fleet; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian partie, gaue them chace. They did their best to haue escaped; but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had serued them, said it againe, That hauing bene sent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying betwene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before:
 50 and (which marred all) Gisco, Bostar, and Adago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition serued to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chief of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedonia of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent; that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before; only with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heauie weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shouldres were ouer burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and suteable vnto that, whereby they kept off the forme, that else would haue beaten vpon them from Spaine. They judged it more easie, with small forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedonia, joyning with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegiance not only of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subjects, but euen of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twentie Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian: and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was bulie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence sailing vpon Oricum; which he wanne, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epiriots craued helpe of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne, and sent thence a thousand men, vnder Numerus Crispus an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable fallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the Riuier; so that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belke were no better than long botes) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Etolians, a Nation alwaies enemy to the Crowne of Macedonia: and easily persuaded them (being so affected, as hath elsewhere bene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Etolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberrall in making promise, as if already it had bene his owne. So a league was made betwene them: and afterward solemnely published at Olympia, by the Etolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Etolia to Coreyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrie should bee subdued, and left vnto the Etolians; the pillage only to bee giuen to the Romans. And that if the Etolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision, to hold no longer, than whilst hee obtained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the only point, whereat Valerius aimed: who promised as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vnlesse it were with like condition of including the Etolians. Into this League was place referred to the Lacedaemonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse readinesse which they discloſe ſo enter thereinto. The Aetolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet awhile the only men, of whom the Roman Generalls muſt make much; as the late French King, Henric the fourth, when he had only the title of Navarre, was ſaid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard wherunto the Aetolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Ilyrians; and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infeſt the Kingdome of Macedon; waſted the Countrie about Oricum and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagionians, *Dardanian*s, and others, whom he held ſuſpected, came downe into Theſſalie, whence hee made 10 ſhew as if he would invade Etolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to ſtirre vp all the Greekes adjoining, againſt the Aetolians; whom they generally deteſted as a neſt of Robbers, troubleſome to all the Countrie. To which purpoſe, and to hinder the Aetolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perſeus his ſonne and heire, with foure thouſand men, vpon their borders: with the reſt of his Armie, before greater buineſſe ſhould ouer-take and entangle him, He made a long iourne into Thrace, againſt a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whenſoeuer the King was abſent. The Aetolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could againſt the Acarnanians; in hope to ſubdue thoſe their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere hee ſhould bee able to returne. Hereto it 20 much auailed, that the Romans had alreadie taken Oeniada and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conveniently ſituated to let in an Armie, and conſigned them vnto the Aetolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the ſtout reſolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we ſay) euerie Mothers ſonne of them, in defence of their Countrie; together with the great haſte of the Macedonian (who laied aſide all other buineſſe) to ſuccour theſe his friends; cauſed the Aetolians to forſake their enterpriſe. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and Aetolians fell vpon Anticyra, which they tooke: the Romans aſſailing it by Sea; the Aetolians by Land. The Aetolians had the Towne; and the Romans the ſpoile.

 30 ſent in his ſteed, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But beſides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Aſia came ouer to aſſiſt the Aetolians. Hee was chiefly moued, by his owne iealouſie of Philips greatneſſe: though ſomewhat alſo tickled with the vanitie, of being choſen by the Aetolians their principall Magiſtrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, hee tooke in very louing part. Againſt the forces which Attalus and the Romans had ſent, being joyned with the maine power of Etolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon; theſe his troubleſome Neighbourſ desired peace of him; and vſed their beſt meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the concluſion thereof, was come: their Embaſſadours, in ſtead of making ſubmiſſion, propoſed vnto him ſuch intolerable 40 conditions, as ill beſeemed vanquiſhed men to offer; and might therefore well teſtifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being beſieged in their owne Townes, that had made them deſirous of ſeparation. This feare being taken away; by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thruſt a Garrilon of their owne, and ſome Roman friends, into Eliu; which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the ſtreight from Naupactis, waſted the Countrie in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them; comming vpon them in haſte from the Nemaeon Games (which hee waſt then celebrating) and ſending them faſter away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Pryſtas King of Bithynia, ſcaring the growth of Attalus, no leſſe than Attalus held ſuſpected the power of Philip; ſent a Nauie into Greece, to aſſiſt the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reaſon; as being more intereſted in the ſucceſſe of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and thought he could man ſome two hundred ſhips; yet the Veſſells were were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinquereemes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vse the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late; which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from falling vpon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowells of that Countrey. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbour to the Achaens his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Towne, hee was encountered by the Aetolian and Roman Garrison; which draue him back with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conuerfion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retreat from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattle, which they had brought together into a place of safety, as they thought, when their Countrey was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Aetolian; who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well known; and the tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an vpror: and not only the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Countrey, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Here vpon the King returned home; leaving not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaens. Hee also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom hee meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-faou-redly: especially in the Ile of Euboea, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arriue to helpe it; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue bene lost, if hee had not come the sooner.

 He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus.
 This Citie, lying ouer against Euboea, Attalus had wonne, more through the coward-ize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed. Now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilest he was busie, in drawing as much monie as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philips arriual, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships, finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this mis-aduenture; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuasion vpon the Kingdome of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends.
 So Philip recouered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonus, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Aetolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Laceda-demon, had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arriual, was returne home.

The Lacedaemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to choose two new Kings; and to conforme themselves to their old manner of Governement. But their estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnfortunate; than had bene their attempts of recouering a large Dominion abroad. Icyrgus a Tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Aetolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achaens; that were the chiefe Confederats of Philip, and hated extremely

truly the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedemonian. But of these wee shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entering into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assistance to that Countrey; spake braue wordes to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opas, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them; such haste they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, He said, was not alwaies prosperous: He should one day light vpon them; as ere this hee fundric times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these wordes; and much the more glad in regard of his good deedes accompanying them. For he restored vnto their Nation some Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, He rendred Asphera. The Dymians, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaues, He sought out, ranomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, Hee fell vpon the Etolians: whom hee drane into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Countrey. This done, Hee tooke leaue of the Achaians: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they rested fearelesse of any threatening danger. Then had hee leisure to make warre vpon the Dardaniens, ill Neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuerthelesse he was not so farre occupied, but that hee could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when hee lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonians; and emboldened him to make strong warre vpon the Etolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans; either some displeasure, conceined against their Confederates; or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was readie to fall vpon Italie; caused them to giue over the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Etolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie six Gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Etolia, hee turned aside to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces hee would worke wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him battaile: but he refused it; and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Countrey round a bout, before his eyes, kept himselfe close with in the walls of Apollonia; making some Ouertures of peace: which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeas'd with the Etolians, as had Philip, to take in cuill part the demeanour of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royall offer that hee made them, to serue their turne in Italie; and assist them in getting their hearts desire, before hee would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Arme, or to free his coast from the Roman and Etolian Pyracies. Only once they came to his helpe, which was, at his last iourne into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arriual: hauing done nothing; and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his owne Name, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This recklesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue bene one of Hanno his tricks; whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly; to heare, that so great a King made offer to serue in person vnder Hannibal,

Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at his pleasure. Therefore hee had reason, such as Enuic could suggest, to persuade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thrifite course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges; and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thanks. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within a while bee at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie should be free, so as the troublefome Greekes might adresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betwene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Affrick, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; even in that little courtseie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee beganne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had he not vainly giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Aetolians had submitted themselves alreadie: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him; with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, He might giue over the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselves. For hee had willfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerey his owne, and hee vnable to manage it. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeare following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Ilyria, which they had recouered in this warre, being part of their old Ilyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian, and therefore perhaps inserted into the couenants, that somewhat might seeme to haue been gotten. On the other side, the Atintanes were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably coniectures) the people of the Countie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Boeotians, Thessaions, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Ilyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedaemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Aetolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Aetolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much upon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the setting downe of their name in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busie people; and ministred occasion to renew the Warre, when means did better serue to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-wealth.

T was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the hailes: and wasted more men and monie to no purpose, than would haue frued (if good order had bene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error
 20 had bene the lesse harmefull, if their care of Italie had bene such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeare to yeare, caused as great Opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Posthumus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaul; the begonne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Florus their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Ile of Sicily; as also that Warre, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so nearely after their terrible ouerthrow at Cannæ, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates, would vtterly haue sunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeare, yet
 30 at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, admitted matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, wherupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their seuerall Armies. This had not bene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had bene thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue bene strengthened; whatsoeuer had become of the rest. But the slender 40 troups, wherewith the Carthaginians led the warre in Spain; the lingring aide which they sent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well neare beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastie catching at Sicily: little deserued to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, wherto all the rest had reference. Rather euery one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, that the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal; then must he patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with 50 so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home. Whatsoeuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessitie, to keede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Naples, Naples, Cume, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be referred for a worke of more importance. Many offers here made upon Nola; but alwaies with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battaile with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight loit: which was no great meruaile; his forces being then diuided, and implor'd in fundric parts of Italia at once. Naples was, euen in those daies, a strong Citie; and required a yeares worke to haue taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the Towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a solemne sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre; and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue bene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they iained so to haue done: because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intentiue to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had bene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, Hee continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exercises of warre; than to keepe it from quarrells, that might arise by vpraiding one another with their base condition.

Whilest the Consul was thus buied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word, of all that had passed betwene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Flama, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Albius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with foureene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surprize others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loosing not about an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to rife it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, Hee escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Flama, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde those yong souldiers, and slaues, buied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the booty. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the the Carthaginians and their fellows spent, about this Towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it: which they brought close vnto the walls; & thinking thereby to force an Entric. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an higher Tower: whence they made resistance; and found means at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busie in quenching the fire; the Romans, falling out of the Towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their Trenches, with the slaughter of about fourtreen hundred. The Consul wisely sounded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their seruite. Neither would He, in the pride of this good successe, aduenture forth against the Enemy; who presented him battaile the day following, neare vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old Campe at Tisfa. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small Townes were recouered by the Romans, and the people leuerly punished for their reuolt.

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yielded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supple from home; that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driuen in the meane time to alter his course of warre; and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a general inuasion vpon the whole Country, to passe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Country of the Abruzes and Sannites was grieuouly wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal; as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Apulie. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalle, to get the Souerignty. They held it treason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they 30 overburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more easie means, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship; and ioynd with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the year before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, that being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made; serued to put the Campanians in feare, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal at their earnest entreatie came from Arpi; (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the fudden vpon Puteoli; a Sea towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The Garrison in Puteoli was fixe thousand strong: and did their duetic so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had verie great intelligence.

50 Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a iourne against Beuentum; and T. Gracchus the last yeares Consul, halting from Nucerina, met him there; and fought with him a battaile. Hanno had with him about seuentene thousand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelue hundred Horse; verie few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moors. He held the Roman worke four houres; ere it could be perceiued, to which side the victorie would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed slaues, had recoiled from their Generall a peremptorie denunciation; That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their libertie, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of libertie was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slaine Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by employment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting of any more; for that all should haue libertie immediately after the battaile, if they wanne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong vpon the Enemy; whom their desperate furie had soone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horle could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hannu did what hee could; and pressed so hard vpon the Roman battaile, that foure thousand of the slaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatned before the battaile, vnto those that should not valiantly beaue themselves;) retired vnto a ground of strength: yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedie the losse. Leaving the field, hee was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were Horle; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of libertie, which hee had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the warres, they should neither eate nor drinke other wise than standing, vnlesse sicknesse forced them to breake his Order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publicke by the townefmen; some sitting, some standing, & all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumised) with Caps, or white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthie of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battaille, worthie of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the comming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through indoltrie, by little and little repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no indoltrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worke doe than before, as liuing vpon the same Trade, and subiect to the same inconueniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeild great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, euery one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Commonwealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnes of the war within the bowels of Italie, that could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies, the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, readie to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother our the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poveritie of the Common-wealth, which had not monie for any one of these mortall dangers: were driven almost euen to extreme want of counsaile. But being vrged by the violence of Swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolued vpon the only course, without which the Citie could not haue subsistid.

- They called the people to Assembly: wherein Q. Fabius the Pretor laide open the publique wants; and plainly said, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of monie for victuaille, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had tuffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntill the Warre were ended. Hereunto hee so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenuues, that the charge was vnder-taken by priuate men; and the Armie in Spain as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentiuē to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They beganne with L. Caecilius Metellus: who, after the battaile at Canna, had held discourse with some of his companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had lepped once back into his campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen whofoeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed. Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as other wise it had vied to bee) hurtfull only in reputation: but greater weight was added therunto, by this Decree of the Senate following; That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicily, there to serue vntill the end of the Warre, vnder the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The Office of the Censors was; to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnholitt or vnseemely behaviour fell not within compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publique Misbehaviour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of high waies, bridges, and water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man encroched vpon the streets, high-waies, or other places that ought to bee common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publique Reuenuues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office; as maintayning themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitie of the Senate: the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Cenſors; which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impoveriſhed by warre, and hauing ſmall ſtore of Lands to let, or of Coutimes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themſelves much with peruing the Temples, or other decayed Places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requiſite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to let any thing in hand, becauſe they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generalitic of the Romans. They that had bene accuſtomed, in more happie times, to vndertake ſuch peeces of worke, offered now themſelves as willingly to the Cenſors, as if there had bene no ſuch want: promiſing liberally their coſt and trauaile; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like ſort, the Maſters of thoſe ſlaues, that lately had bene enfranchiſed by Gracchus, were very well contented to forebore the price of them, vntill the Cite were in better caſe to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euery one was able, the common neceſſitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treaſurie; and there the Quæſtor kept a booke, of all that was laied out for the ſuſtenance of theſe Widdowes and Orphans: whileſt the whole ſtock was vſed by the Cite. This good example of thoſe which remained in the Towne, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: ſo that (the poorer fore-cepted) they reſuſed to take pay; and called thoſe Mercinaries, that did accept it, when their countrie was in ſo great want.

calamities of warre

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe ſo much commoditie, as might bee laied in balance againſt theſe miſeries, whereinto their Eſtate was now reduced. Neuertheleſſe if wee conſider things aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome, to deale with thoſe Enemies, whom ſhee forth-with vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto ſhee attained, ere the youngſt of thoſe men was dead, whoſe names wee haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and ſolide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Cite of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to aſhes, and taken from euery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which reſted in the common happineſſe of the vniuerſalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously obſerued) That a State whoſe dimention or ſtemme is ſmall, may aptly ſerue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to paſſe, where all regard of domeſticall proſperitie is laid aſide; and euery mans care adreſſed to the benefit of his countrie. Hereof I might ſay, that our Age hath ſcene a great example, in the vniſted Provinces in the Netherlands; whole preſent riches and ſtrength, grew chiefly from that ill aſſurance, which each of their Townes, or almoſt of their Families, perceiued it ſelfe to hold, whileſt the Generalitie was oppreſſed by the Duke of Ava; were it ſo, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme indurie, and ſtraining themſelves to fill their publike Treaſurie, they are all growne wealthy, ſtrong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their ſeruiſes by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at ſuch a rate as we ought, the patient Reſolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magiſtrates, with many other Vertues, and, aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in theſe dangerous times: we may truly ſay, That the Cite was neuer in greater likelihood to proſper. Nei-ther can it be deemed otherwiſe, than that if the ſame affection of the people had laſted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, ſhould in all reaſon haue been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Aſia had not infected, infected them with sensuallitie, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subjects of Rome, could have believed their owne interest to be as great, in those wars which the latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not have beene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though hee hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their

The Romans winne some Townes back from HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of HANNIBAL. The iournie of HANNIBAL to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

30 S the People of Rome strained themselves to the vtmost, for maintayning the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recouer what had bene lost. The Towne of Castine, Fabius beleiged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have bene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Neuertheless the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to giue it ouer: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrarie opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to have bene vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee prosecuted vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Towne was pressed so hard, that the campes dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craved parlee; offering to giue it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safetie, whither they pleased. Whilest they were thus treating of conditions: or whilest they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diuersly reported) Marcellus, seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Consul: wo saued them, and sent them to Capua in safetie; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserued commendations, by holding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the laughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as scaped the heat of execution, could bee excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsam in Gallioigne taken by the Marshall Mouline, when I was a yong man in France. For whilest he entertained parlee about composition; the beleiged ranne all from their severall guards, vpon hastie desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discouering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado; and put all saue the Governour vnto the sword. Herein that Governour of Mount Marsam committed two grosse errors; the one, in that hee gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for assurance giuen and received. Some such ouer-sight, the Governour of Castine seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Mouline, was very honourable. When this worke was ended, many small Townes of the Sarmites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slaine, about five and twentie thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrey grieuouly waited by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promised to giue vp the Towne. But M. Valerius, the Roman Propretor, had thrull so many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart; hauing wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrey; but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and beganne to victualle it, when Sommer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne; in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than otherwise neede required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessitie enforced, to make their Sommer last as long, as they were able to trauaile vp and downe the Countrey.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicill; whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Prouince, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike seruice, to imploy often-times their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meet him: eleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse back; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bad the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The father chearefully did so; saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest vnderstand by selfe to beee Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthie Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battaile at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him, if he might bee therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus patterne to all Traitors; vsing him, as Camilus and Fabricius had done those, that offered their vnfaithfull seruice against the Falsici, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the Towne of Gales, and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather seuer, than couctous, He sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitiue, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay. He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aliu; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalado, in a stormie and rainie night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust formost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the souldiers held the townsmen suspected;

- suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdome, to trull them at their backs. But after some litle resistance, the Arpines gaue over fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protelling, that they had beene betraied by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In proesse of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Consul: and receiving his faith for securitie of the Towne, presently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding; like it is, that Hannibal's men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and serue on the Roman side; it was yet coucanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe; with little other losse, than of him that had betraied it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tudubus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneius Fuluius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their seruice; vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their Citie should be recouered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campanians toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal: in when there was no appearance of those mightie succours, that had beene promised from Carthage.
- 20 Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Britians, that had yeelded themselves to Hannibal; returned againe to their old allegiance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of Publican had made himselfe a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some pettie exploits in foraging the countrie, was slaine by Hanna, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if hee could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing out that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to passe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where hee hoped to preuaile by intelligence; He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore Townes of the
- 30 Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassador, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conuicighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his companie were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they suffered death, as Traitors. By reason of this crueltie, or securitie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their buisnesse the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal: and acquainted him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nice and Philomenes, two of the chiefe among them, vsed much to goe forth of the Towne on hunting by night, as if they durst not take their pleasure by day; for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their handes, that they might not seeme to haue been abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies iourne to Tarentum, if hee should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure. He caused it to be giuen out, that he was sick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were
- 50 growne carelesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their buisnesse in order; He tooke with him ten thousand, the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before breake of day, made all speede thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the waies, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discouered.

covered. It had bene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouvernour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dilodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne; where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arriuall; Nico, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was readie. Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vp the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that hee had killed a great Bore, so heauie, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith cntred two yong men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to bee worthe the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ranne him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when he had slaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vprore: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskillfully founded by a Greeke in the Theater; which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Gouvernour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might easily perceiue the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inuighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done: and hauing gotten such spoile as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, He addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fallie out, he might giue them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Peeces. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he beganne to make his approches, the Romans in a brauerie falling forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst aduentione. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose: and fiercely setting vpon the Enemie, draue him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that a sterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was ioyned by a cawley. This cawley Hannibal intended to fortifie in like fort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few daies went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Peeces it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readie all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilet he was busied in his workes, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which tooke away all hope of preuailling; and made him returne to his former counsaile. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine licet lay within the Hauen, and could not passe forth, whilet the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the Towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea; whilet the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be relieue.

Bore

licued, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine grounds, and their streets being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he undertooke and effected: whereby the Roman Garrison was reduced into great needfullie; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

- 10 This with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twentie Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and battie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse at Canna had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they were faine to take vp young Boyes, that were vnder seuen-ene yeares of age: and to send Commissioners aboute little cities round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare seruiciable, and pressing them to the warres, making yet a Law, That their yeares of seruice, whereunto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had bene of lawfull age. Before the Roman Armie drew neare, the Campans felt great want of victuallies, as if they had alreadye bene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoile, which the Romans had in foregoing yeares made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to bee shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable wordes: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be readie with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victuallies, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more, than he performed. For hee caused great quantitie of graine, that had bene laid vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than forrie Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horses; as if this had bene enough to victualle Capua. Such was the richlinesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angry herat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore hee gaue them a longer day; against which hee made provision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Consul, taking with him sith strength as hee thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night; where with diligence hee made inquirie into the behauiour of the Enemy. Hee learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make provisions; that sometwo thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets; lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great Haruel. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves, to assaile the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Beneuentum, He marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By coming so vnexpected, Hee had well-near forced the campe on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fulvius to loose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore hee said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie; and to lie betweene Hanno and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to part from the retreat; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart.

w. 10. 17. 18.

There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominie, than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers aduenture so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had alreadie gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne: in which were slaine above fixe thousand; and taken, about seuen thousand; besides all the store of victuall, 10
Roman Confederates. This misaduenture, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to protest vnto their Citie; and how he had made the way to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Aspi was lately, if he gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keepe their grounds from spoile; whilest hee himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adjoining, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and, being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of 20 the Metapontines, and other Citiees of the Greekes, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Graecia. These people tooke to heart the death of their Hostages; and thought the punishment greater, than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurmes would haue done the like, vpon the like reason: had not some companies laine in their Towne; which they feared that they should not bee able to master. Neuertheless they helped themselves by cunning: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: against whom whilest they professed their seruice to Atinius, the Roman captaine, they drew him forth to fight; and 30 recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A litle formalitie they vsed, in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans; in suauing Atinius him selfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practise) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginians, or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily preuailed in the rest; and deliuered vp the Towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilest the Consuls, fortifying Beneuentum to secure their backs, addrested themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disaffers befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprife. S. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late bene twice Consul, was 40 slaine either by trecherie of some Lucans, that drew him into an ambush; or by some Carthaginian stragler, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honorably interred, either by Hannibal him selfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to secure the back of the Armie that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that businesse. The Volones, or Slaves lately manumised, forooke their Ensignes, and went euery one whither hee thought good, as if they had bene discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked 50 some labour to seeke them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuertheless the Consuls went forward with their worke: and drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostilitie which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, receiue them an hard welcome; wherein aboute fiftene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Consuls, and

and had the better; in so much that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went severall waies; Fulvius toward Came; Claudius, into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who having led him a great walk, leetch a compass about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one M. Centenius Penula a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hannibal relted, when hee was wearie of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vanta to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were unwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier; how meane soever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thousand; and he himselfe, being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betwene a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellows were all (in a manner) flaine; scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Pretor with eightene thousand men, was in Apulia, very carelesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. T his he therefor had, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Prouinces about vnder men of small abilitie. Coming vpon Fulvius, He found him and his men so follie, that needs they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee belowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places ther about most fit for ambush. Then offering battaile to Fulvius, Hee soone had him in the trap; whence hee made him glad to escape aliue; leaving all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, receiued one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuertheless all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls late downe before the towne: and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That who soever would issue forth of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, should haue his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the citie was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginians; which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long iourne, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citidell: of which expectation failing, He turned to Brundisium; vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earnest wordes; and were with wordes as braue recomforted. He had them consider, how a few daies since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that we would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned: and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time; and thereby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italie; whilst the Roman armie spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered; and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua; and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe,

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The towne men often sallied out: rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans vied to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercises the *Campan*s usually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some active and couragious yong men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increating within the Citie, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their campe. At the same time the *Capuan*s issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vnseruicable people on the walls; which, with a loud noise of Pannes and Bassons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the *Campan*s, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuertheless, in pursuing them to their gates, He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Publius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian Armie. The Roman campe was euen at point to haue beene lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitives, that could speake Latine well, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euerie one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next Hills, forasmuch as the campe was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Armie, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly entrenched it selfe; so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplexe the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-near lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citie of Tarentum, were to haue beene much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carrie to the walls of that proud Citie, the danger of ware that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generalls, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Armie; then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the *Campan*s, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his comming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citie. His only feare was, lest the *Campan*s, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and therupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, He sent letters to Capua by a subtle Namidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman campe, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The iourne to Rome, was to be performed with great celeritie: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddenesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten daies victualles; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Volturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that that the Romans Generalls by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate: which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importancce. Some gaue counsaile to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemie. Others were so farr from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge him selfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That, those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citie, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence; if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generalls at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citie of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius tooke fiftene thousand foote, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Armie: with which he hastned toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, having passed ouer Vulturinus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might serue to transport the Enemie, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then halted he a way toward Rome; staying no longer in any one place, then he needs must. Yet found he the bridges ouer Liris broken down; by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grieuouly to spoile their lands, whilst the bridges were in mending. The pearey that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages; that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of the newes came apace, one after another, into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assemlie, readie to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fulvius, with part of the Armie from Capua, was halting to defence of the Citie. The Office of a Protector did expire, at his returne home, and entrie into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the Citie in time of such fore, an Act was passed, That He should haue equall power with the Consuls, during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one foone after another: Fulvius having bene long held occupied in passing ouer Vulturinus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his journey, as much as the Countrey was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome: attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especiall order, against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne: whence He aduanced with two thousand Horse and rode along a great way vnder the walls; viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But He either went, or (as the Roman Storie saith) was driuen away; without doing, or receiuing any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. About the rest, one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians, that had shifted side, and fallen vpon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelue hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their seruice might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great vprore among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of carttaile, and husbandmen, which were fledde thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the passage was flopt vp: and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house-toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not bene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedie the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authoritie as Magistrats, till the Enemy departed. The day following, Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battaile to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vndertooke it. It is said, that a terrible showre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their severall Camps: and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking vp, and clearing, as soone as they were departed asunder. Certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten daies prouision, could not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to wait his time and prouisions, knowing that hee could not abide there long, did as became well-aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terrour of Hannibals coming to the Citie, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of his forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time, the supplie appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, was sent out of the towne, & went forth at one gate, whilst the Carthaginian lay before another. In all Punic terrours, as they are called, wherof there is either no cause known or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedie, to doe somewhat quite contrarie to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men haue fashioned in their amaled conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish vprore in his Armie, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Assc into the Campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimitie: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue bene diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their Enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recouered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that verie piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bene in time of peace. This indignitie comming to his care, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made Port-sale of the Silver-smithes shops, which were neare about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, then any Romans citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, whereon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seeke to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had propoosed vnto himselfe, this journey had brought forth forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his campe: and doing what spoile he could in the Roman Territorie, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, He passed like a Tempter over the Countrey; and ranne toward the Esterne Sea so fast that hee had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua hee gaue it loolt: and is likely to have curled the whole faction of Hanne, which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie; since he had no other way to vent his grieif.

- Q. Fulvius* returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who so would yeild, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of 10 Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To truit the Roman pardon proclaimed, euery mans conscience of his owne euill deserts, told him that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Boilar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if means could only be found, how to conuey such letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the letters was vndertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne into the Roman campe, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packets. But it happened, ere they could conuigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the 20 Towne; and the letters of Boilar and Hanno, were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions whersoever they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be readie to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning an other way; as if it were his only care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising, to make a desperate sallie, if he would once more aduerture to set vpon the Roman camp. Such were the hopes of Boilar and his fellow. But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint vnder the 30 burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were belieged in Capua, had bene sent out by the Stannoniens, to obserue the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so; justly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessitie. How soeuer it were, the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake
 40 the hearts of the Campans: so that the Multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few years since had bene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough where vnto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemie sought vpon their bodies. About seuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poison. All the rest, hoping for more mercie than they had deserued, yeilded simply to discretion.
 50 So one of the Towne gates was set open: whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe. At their comming thither, the Proconuls laid yrons vpon them all: and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custodie; some to Cales; others to Thebanum. Touching the generall Multitude; they were referu'd vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vsid by Fulsius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adueritie. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued: yet was hee not inexorable to the Campans; as hauing loued them well in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Facustus, of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fulsius the more haitie in taking vengeance: for feare, left, vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common safetie, and honour of their state. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Thebanum, and from thence to Cales: where hee caused all the Campans prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which hee struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Townes of Italie the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Astellens, Calatines, and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, and want of abilitie to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulsius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of vengeance, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to haue bene consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualitie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slaue, and other sufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out: and the Campans, being detected by a slaue of their owne (to whom, aboue his libertie promised, was giuen about the summe of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulsius herby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme serueticie caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolued in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poore women in Capua (of which one had bene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaues, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referu'd to further desolation: but the generallitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto seuerall places, as best liked the angrie Victors. As for the Towne of Capua, it was suffer'd to stand, in regard of the beautie and commodious site: but no corporation, or forme of politie, was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Prouest was euerie yeare sent, to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oyle being sparre spent; and that, which should haue reuiued his flame, being vnf Fortunately shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicill, held warre against the Romans in those Islands; and were overcome.

WHilest things passed thus in Italie; the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicill by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end, by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardi- 10 mian rebellion was great and sudden: about thirtie thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harpcoras with his sonne Histolus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Countrie.
Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprize so careless, as in the rest of their militarie undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had bee directed vnto the prosecution of that maine businesse in Italie; whereon this, and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hind-red the Romans from sending an Armie into Sardinia. Harpcoras with his followers might well enough have serued to driue out Quintus the Pretor; who lay sick 20 in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But witlest they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most griuous: they neglected the opportunite of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprize was such; as may seeme to have discouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For where as they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armie; assisted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Bur- chine house, and neare kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitie of foule weather was cast vpon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such euill 30 plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere the se their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and vp-hold in their feuerall Prouinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincialls, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or what soeuer accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conqueror; and his race after 40 him, were the most readie and best approued meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence in euery Prouince, and had alwaies in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harpcoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Marriners: without whom he could not have made vprhat number of two and twentie thousand, whereof we haue spoken before: He landed at Calais or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrie, and fought out the Ene-
mie. Hystus, the sonne of Harpcoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Ar-50 mie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrie, to draw in more friends to their side. This yong Gentleman would needes adventure to get honor, by giuing battaile to the Romans at his owne discretion. So he rashly ad-ventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible overthrow, and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hystus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defecature came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia, in such haste as he might haue done, if the tempeit had not hindred his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to saue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon with-drew himselfe back to Calaris: where he had not staid long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craved his assistance; their Countie being waied by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to joyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had staid a little longer, Asdrubal would haue fought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the sum: of Asdrubal and his companie, apperes to haue been greater than was their strength. For after some triall made, of them in a few skirmishes; Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile: wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four hundred of the battaile lasted: and victorie at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders; whose courages had bene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many daies before. The death of yong Hysistus, and of his father Hasstus; that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuitie of Asdrubal himselfe, with Stago and Elanno the Carthaginians; made the victorie the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in short space wanne the Towne. All other Cities of the Ile that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yielded vnto the Roman: who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their several offences, or their abilitie to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome; leauing Sardinia in quiet.

The warren in Sicily: was of greater length, and euery way more burdesome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only saucts of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countie; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracuse; to that which they enjoyed before. Soone after the battaile of Carma, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a stedfast friend vnto the Romans; and greatly relieved them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronimus his grand-child, that was about fiftene yeares of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bene his heire, being dead before. To this yong King his successor, Hiero appointed fiftene tutors: of which the principall were Anarondorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo: The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdome, by the famearte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while; Anarondorus, waxing wearie of so many Coadjutors, beganne to commend the sufficiency of the yong Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeares; and said, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he caused others to doe the like: hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to passe in a fort as hee desired. For Hieronimus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures; or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was only in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his soane. But much more hee offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, sutable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in course of life, he would reuiue the memorie of Tyrants d-dad long since, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. Hee grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late Tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being molt of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe.

Only

Only Andragoras, Zelus, and one Thrase continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoever they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about that maine point, of adhering either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change; but Thrase, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilic as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his Person, was detected by a groom of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby bringing out of him the whole practise, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing; but yielding (as is for med) in the end, vnto the extremity of the torture, he confessed, that he had beene set on by Thrase whom he approached of the treason, together with many more, that were on care in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death; being innocent of the crime where with they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and went in unke for the matter: dissembling themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all escaped, and soon after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thrase was taken out of the way, quickly resolved vpon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Yong men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers; by taking different courses. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, wth their great necessity, had of late beene such, as might haue beene termed excessiue; were it not in regard of his providence; wherein hee tooke order for his owne estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the yong Nephew, taking little heed of dangers fire ad, regarded only the things present; the weaknesse of Rome, the present fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laid out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hornobab: who feardly entred into good correspondance with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates & Ephidates.

30 Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when Appius Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betwene the People of Rome and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him, the order of the fight at Canna; that hee might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe: saying, That he could hardly beleeeue the Carthaginians; so wonderfull was the victorie as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion;

40 but afterward, that hee should raigne over all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italia. At these doings Ap. Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced vpon them by necessity; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had receiued such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his journey, as much discourtenanced him when he came into Sicily, and forbade him to looke big. The money that Hiero had bestowed vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carrie back vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But in steed of returning the monie with thanks, as he had beene directed, and as it had

50 beene noised abroad that hee should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glorie, and send word after him, that he should consigne that monie ouer to Marius Valerius; of whose voiage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare

perhaps of the King's secret. I should perhaps of a mild resolution

attention could imposed nothing

bear the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimitie; into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiving, as mult needs have bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of paffeime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolu'd how to beginne it: his owne death changed the forme of things; and bred a great inuouation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer; had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Countrey with two thousand men; to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fiftene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontion, a Citie of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators rooke him on the sudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betwene him and his guard, strooke him dead: Forthwith libertie was proclaimed; and the sound of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus; had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Armie, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carke to lie vnburied. These newes, raue quickly to Syracuse: whether some of the Conspirators, taking the Kings horses, potted a way; to signifie all that had passed; or to stirre vp the people to libertie; and to preuent Andronodorus, if he, or his fellows would make offer to vsurpe a Tyrannie. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes; and made themselves masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe; betwene desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprize miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the beeles, and not ride away from it on horse-back. But feare, and better counsaile preuailed so farre, that Andronodorus, hauing slept vpon the matter; dissembled his affections; and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People: telling them; That hee was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, least they would not haue contained themselves within bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their libertie perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered vp the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had bene an euill Master, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignetic: and so vehement were the instigations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries: hoping to make himselfe strong, by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides, had bene with the Syracusan Pretors, and told them, that, being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed: and with a conuoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Loari. This was easily easily granted: both for that the Syracusan Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little curtles; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublefome couple; which were good soldiers, and gracious with the Armie, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew: they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the armie with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Androniscus had great neede of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonis the sister of Hieronymus; readie to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents; he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the cuill which they had done, whilst Hieronymus lived, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurpe the tyrannie, the misdeeds. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo, were accessarie to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women, would neuer cease to worke; until they had recovered those Royall ornaments, and Soueraigne power, whereof their familie was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo, were also condemned to die: and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata, and Harmonia, had perhaps deserved this heauie sentence: but Hecacles, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sofippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sofippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to King Ptolemeus, he durst not returne home; but staid in Aegypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some other pittifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning the misdeeds) all cried out upon the authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfy their anger; they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Androniscus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowe, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of soldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a general crye forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors; did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betweene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius; and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicily; they gave way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some neede of a Garrison: and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor attended, by such fugitives, and mercinarie soldiers, as were most burdnesome to Syracuse. Whether when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans; first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, feareing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebel against the Syracusians.

sians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master; there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was slaine, and libertie first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion ouer those that had broken the chaine, wherewith both the one, and the other were bound; his aduice was, that such their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was giuen by one article of the league, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had beene subject to HIERO and HIERONYMVS, should beneuently be Passals vnto the state of Syracuse. Againt this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noueltie of change, they had fit opportunitie to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this craftie Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had bene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded vnto Syracuse, and beene subject vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was governed; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable than iust. Neuerthelesse the motion of Epicides was highly approved: so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done againt the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Loeri, or whither else they listed, so that they laied not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requelled the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to obserue the couenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptorie answer, was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians: who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition that when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand; which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night conuicied themselves into the Towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captaines vied after victorie; to seeke out the fugitiue Roman slaues and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he tooke to mercie; forbearing also to strip or spoile them. But the fame of his doings was bruted after a contrarie sort. It was said, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to sack. These newes met the Syracusian Armie vpon the way, as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had bene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sosis and Dinnemus two of the Pretors, to serue againt the Leontines and other Rebels. These Captaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those againt whom they went) had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and let them aworke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no neede of their seruice. So toward Herbesus they marched: where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischief, deuising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakely accompanied, that they seemed vnstable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore aduentured vpon a remedie little lesse desperat deperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus unarmed, with olive branches in their hands, in manner of supplicants; and so presented themselves to the Armie. Six hundred men of Creete were in the vanguard; that had been viled by Licronymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and loudly dismissed them. These Cretans therefore welcomed the two bretheren, and bad them be of good cheare; saying, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vse their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by seueritie; which would not serue. For when they commanded these two Traitors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was so violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick; whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused letters of his owne penning; to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans; directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusan Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines; but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the Mecinaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in generall, to the libertie of the Cite; and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly reuealed; the vppore was such, that Sofis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the campe, and flie for their liues. All the Syracusans remainyng behinde, had been cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued among the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus his cruelty; and to carrie home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (said some) was the avarice and crueltie of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse; where their greedie appetites might haue beene tempted with a farre greater bootie. While they were thus discouraging, and deuising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Armie came to the gates; exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnto for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong furie of those within the Towne; that laboured to breake it open. So he entered, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors; whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gauc libertie to all slaves and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the word and basist fort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse; that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew hee neare with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusans, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthe men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enjoy enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuer'd vp. Hereto Epicles briefly answered, That if their errand had bene to him, he could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernment in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; hee told them, they should finde by experience, that to besiege Syracuse was another manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned back into the Citie. Immediately beganne the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of walls, as compassed Syracuse, being manned with 10 no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom hee had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neerthelcse all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of battie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinman, had framed such engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vfe, did more mischief to the Romans than could haue bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age bene knownc. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, where on a man might stand. For proofe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vfe; that might preserve the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injurie done vnto the liberrall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to profane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious aueritic, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath bene the vnhappie fate of great inuentions, to be vilified as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to bee vnder-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wits, and things, that every one, could well haue performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proofe. He that looks vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuentors any whit the lesse, for that the labour of workmanship grows to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wise men, grew after ward corrupted by those, to whom the practise fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of injustice, that the long trauells of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; or yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meeke strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and and naturall, as haue Anger, Feare, and other the like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serueth against those, which would vlturpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to endue them. Neuertheless if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generallie of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine vpon the iust and vniust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their own bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning; that may be peruerted by euill men to a 10 mischievous vse. For if the secret of any rare Antidot, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irreuerable payson: better it were, that such a Jewell remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man; than being made common, bind all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischief. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended to vary commendable ends. They were engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracuzians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but reserved so much to his own direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, 20 that hee had approoued, euen vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanical trade, or teach the art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinguereme Gallies to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had sundrie deuices; of which any one sort might haue repelled the assaillants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitee of his great wit. He thot heauie stones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These assailed such as lay farre off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual voly of shot, which 30 they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoisted vp; thaking out all the men; and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rockes: and all of them were so beaten; that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In like sort was the Land-armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not onely overwhelm the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could earely before day get nere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanc, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which 40 were woound vp hard to shoote a great compass. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaillants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great laughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to stay by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans; that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might haue holpen it by some deuice, to make them vnser-
 50 uiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight; being erected in the streets behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vse them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate peece of worke.

For the enemies hauing so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely so soon to be confumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a Citie, hauing no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage; and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twentie thousand foot, threethousand horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge; wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many, that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelorus and Herbessus, which yeelded vnto him. Hee tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusanians; or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrigentum: whither hee came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he vsed, in regard of Himilco; stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse; intending to joyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the disperd and halfe vnarmed Syracusanians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure; and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse; and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe; that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco; and safely arriued at Marcellus his campe: yet many places reuolted vnto the Carthaginians; and flue or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile: and Marcellus leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that he might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium; where he lay intenciuē to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt; whether it were better to continue the laborious worke of besieging Syracuse; or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to preuaile: and he himselfe was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not faillible, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially hee aspired to preuaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end, he dealt with the Syracusan Gentlemen that were in his campe; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not calie for them to doe; because the towne would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where where he talked in private with some few, as he had beene intrusted. Thus beganne Marcellus to haue intelligenc within the Citie : whence the Conspirators vied to send him aduertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night. But when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought them selues able to effect somewhat of importance : all was discouered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while; one Damasippus a Lacedaemonian, that had bene sent out of the Towne as an Embassadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, nor farre from the walls.

10 I here, one of the Romans, looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones; and, making an estimate of the height, judged it lesse than it had bene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things readie, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprize. But a fugitiue out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of wine. A better opportunitie could not bee wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the festiual night, came vnto the walls, which he rooke by Sesado. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or fivie, if Eppole were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina and the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to hearken vnto composition; as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans

20 had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those, that were sheltered vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues, and Renegados, were more carefull than euer to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whilest Epicides sallied out of Acradina vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defense in each part, that the *A*ssailants were repelled. Neuertheless, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as freightly besieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no delire to doe his Countrie service: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid; being loath to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serue the enimie than him. Thither sailed Epicides out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the 30 Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreacie, at length hee came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, he stood off into the deepe; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

to good will

The Sicilian souldiers, that remained alie of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as neare as they could safely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicily was giuen as desolate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne: Hereunto Marcellus willingly gaue care: for he had staied there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their libertie and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possesse, whatsoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen readie to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiuing their owne condition to be desolate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke armes, and fell vpon the new-chosen Pretors: whom they slue; and made election of sixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the souldiers; excepting only the fugitiues. The treatie therefore was againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman avarice in the sack of Epipola, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vse the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subiect vnto Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the sixe Captaines, that had bene chosen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: hauing a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in companie with the Roman Embassadours, daily passing too and fro. This craftie Agent, perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where else; it was now the only time to doe it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Captaine was easily wonne: and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadours, to ratifie the couenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had bene such, as deserued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Armie of Mercinaries, should minister vnto the people of Rome, a aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had bene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascalitie, and some ill aduised Persons, joynd with the Souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain vnder-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne turne home. But the Senators, thought it a great deale better, to comfourt the Syracuzians with gentle wordes, and promises of good vsage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthie, strong, and many waies important. Neuerthelesse if we consider the many inconueniences and great mischiefs, whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by euill neighbours, and by that very forme of pollicie, after which it was gouerned: we may truly affirme, That it receiued no small benefit, by becoming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all forraine enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthie Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the iea-10 lousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that Citie, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whercof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make in iustice the more excusable: vntill we should approve the answer of that Troie, who being found to haue stolen a siluer cup from a sick man, said, He neuer leanes in drinking.

By the treason of Marius, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse:
 20 wherein the bootie that it found, was said to haue bene no lesse, than could haue bene hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was maruailously adorned; were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; save only the houles of those banished men, that had escaped from Lippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes, was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so builie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that he hearkned not to the noise, and vprare in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him, Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caused his body to bee honourably
 30 buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion betweene them; which hee first found out. An Invention of so little vs, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artift better, than the deuising of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is betweene the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost, that had been spent vpon a sonne, whose studies, in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion betweene a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicill yielded vnto the Romans; except Agrippentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrippentum lay Epicides with 40 one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines, by many good peeces of seruice, had addeed some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and droue them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that hauing bene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly 50 by Hannibal; in that he had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines, being to step aside vnto Heraclus, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides;) not to meddle with the enemy, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Armie was left behinde in Syracuse, as neede required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the oddes betweene the Captaines. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authoritie by favour; yet could they not give worth, and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numbians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Captaines: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclæa; were much more offended, when they saw that the vainglorious eniue of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countreman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bad him be confident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day; but only looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had bene misused. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set vpon the Enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them back into Agriuentum.

If Hanno could haue bene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battaile without neede; the Romans would shortly haue been reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre: For Marcellus, was shortly after to leaue the Prouince; and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foot, and three thousand Numbidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very hainouly, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, and not suffered to returne back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countreman the Numbians; and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Armie lately ouerthrowne had bene entire. M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recouered those inland Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Countrie; yet hee hindred the Countre from revolting vnto Mutines. About threecore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicill: of which, Agriuentum was the principall; and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despite of the Romans: not only to the succour of his owne adherents; but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with eniue, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instructions from old Hanno at Carthage; not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honour of these Sicilian warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should haue bene regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assitant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discontentance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among his Numbians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spightfull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicill. For the Numbians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countreman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were therefore absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Leuinius, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage; He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and for sake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countreimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Aduersaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening; and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them, to deliuer vp Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicil. The Consul was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had vnder-taken. For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neare in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, though it had bene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as hee had bene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forth with he betooke himselfe to flight; and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, set saile for Africke; leaving all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans; that henceforward continued matters of the w hole Land.

Laenus the Consul hauing taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of justice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessitie of gold, than of Steele: which may haue bene the reason, why Laenus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they fought to make their peace. About fourtie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treason; and fixe only staid to be wonne by force. These things done, Laenus returned home to Rome: carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agatirna; that were a companie of out-laws, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoile of others, in these troublefome times. He befellowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their occupation against the Brutians; a theuillish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, hee was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where hee liued in good account; accompanying the two Scipios in their iourne against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especial seruice. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue bene employed in Italie: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it beganne.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betwene the Romans and HANNIBAL in Italie; from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metaurus.

50 Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcus came to Rome: where, for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicil, hee had granted vnto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovatius. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Province. Hee staid not long in Rome; before hee was againe chosen Consul together with

with M. Valerius Laninus, who succeeded him in the gouernment of Sicill, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned vp the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians: that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the Romans: whom they had kept out. Thus each part hauing some good matter to alleage, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Commonwealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the boote that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection; but comforting them, with gentle wordes, and hopefull promises, as hath bene shewed before. The two new Consuls, Marcellus and Launus, were appointed to make warre, as their loths should fall out; the one in Italie; the other in Sicill. The Isle of Sicill, fell vnto Marcellus: which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet bene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindered by feare, from vttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatcht, hee gently vnderooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie; to the great benefit of their Countrie in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicill, whose doings there haue bene already rehearfed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the warre; and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer sort, that vsed to be employed in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. These could not liue without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to giue them pay: Wherefore, it was ordained, that they should be let out at the expence of priuate men; who, in this necessitie of the state, were driuen to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured: and were readie to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could vnder-goe; and somewhat more, than could with honestie haue been imposed vpon it. Neuerthelesse it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasurie was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls beganne to say, That no perswasions would be so effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the monie that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessel of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one salt-seller, and a boule wherewith to make their offerings vnto the Gods: as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euerie one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the readie performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly doone before them. For since the publike necessitie could no otherwise be holpen; euery one was contented, that his private estate should runne the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wrack, in vaine could any particular man man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimie deferred well that greatness of Empire, wherof it was the foundation.

Conuent order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Cite against Hannibal; and Lanus toward Sicily. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard seruice: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as hee needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the losse of Capua: which gaue them cause to looke vnto themselves; as if in his helpe there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in neede. This hee well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedie. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or else hee must leaue them to their owne fidelitie; which now beganne to wauer. At length his jealousie grew so outrageous, that he sacked, and waited, those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe; and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia yielded vnto Marcellus: and betraied vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, then the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion; could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dalsus, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dalsus in private; and was by him acutely denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accusor with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuided out of mere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any prooffe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such lively reasons; that hee who could not be belieued by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the fauour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Maronia and Meles, Townes of the Sannites: wherein hee slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch aduantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than hee. The best was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themselves with ill speede in many petty enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italy, to follow businesse of farre lesse importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had bene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might haue bene stricken downe, the next year after that great blow received at Cannae. But since that which is past cannot be amended: Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masaniissa was at Carthage with sixe thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spain: whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iourne into Italy, of which there had bene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to prevent the threatening mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay neare vnto Herdonia to get the Towne by practise. It was not long, since, neare vnto the same place, another Cn. Fuluius had lost his armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonia ere Fuluius heard newes of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more halte than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance awhile, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horle. Then fell they to rowt; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himselfe, with twelue Tribunes or Covenells, were lost: of the common souldiers that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting seven, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdones, because it was at point to haue yielded vnto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carrie away the multitude; whom hee bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouer-taking him at Nussistro in the countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darknesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Marcellus remoued often; and fought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeare to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yeare before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge; for hee thought no Roman siter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the comming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunite of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitie of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hoer-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet, vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hercupon followed a battaile: wherin Hannibal had the victorie; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pefants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had bene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like wordes, which they were alhamed to heare, he did so vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they fought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so; and placing those Companies forme first, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victorie; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was readie to fight againe, since all other motives continued the same; and his men had bene heartned by the late victorie. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victorie, was readie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie: which hee purchased at so deare deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the later received ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romians that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fuluius, the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscentes, that willingly yeelded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fuluius entertained in louing fort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had been authors, or bulie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theues, which Lauius had lately brought from Agaterna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, late downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carrie it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation: This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, shee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutians were farr in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Militrie; to doe what shee would haue him. The Consul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a sicutine; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne persuasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaine in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noyse did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe, with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate; whereas the Armie was let in. The Tarentines, and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place; but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is alreadie taken away) nor very oblutinate. Nico, Democrates, and Philomones, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans: Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vsed, because of hospitalitie that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius: The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue bene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glorie which he expected, nor preferred his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great needs. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being being told of some Idolls; that legined worthe to be carried away, being very goodly peeces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie Gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming; but he was so neare, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill; which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a litle while, and then they yielded. When this buisnesse was done, he baited away to relieue Tarentum. But when hee came within siue miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he laid no more than this? The Romans haue also their HANNIBAL; wee haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne back amafed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few daies together, so neare as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, he thought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie: who did their errand so well; that the Consul wrote back by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made readie his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discouered all.

This yeare was happie to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where; save only at Caulonia; where they lost a companie of such riewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so bene rid of them. But their common power, and disability to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirtie Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered; that the Legions of Cunna; and those unhappie Companies, that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fulvius; were transported into Sicily; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeares together they had beene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of monie: in euery of which yeares, they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the Enemie to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him; whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe with in awhile, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, that they should boldly denie vnto the Romans, their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these townes make such declaration, and protest their disability of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amafed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer. forasmuch as this, was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that their people were not Campans, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they

they had already done what they could; and that they had remayning, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eightene Colonies did not imitate these twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergoe whatsoever should be layed vpon them, without shynking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismiss them, nor to take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill deserting.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve People would haue wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had beene then comming into Italie. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasurie; and thence take out the golde, that had beene layed vp for seruice them in cases of greatest extremitie.

20 Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consul, to let him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest, was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likeli that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal, neither the money sent into Spaine, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the People of Rome; that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driuen to furnish the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre lesse than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoever Liue rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arriuall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fuluius. In their yeare it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeare following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cume and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haue, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had beene readie to come. But since this hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had beene expedient) readie to arriue: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from hearkening to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouertie of the Romans, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselves; without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of this conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeare following they were deuling how to breake out : as contrariwise the Roman Propretors ; partly by terror of severer judgements and inquisitions ; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places , kept them honest against their wills ; and tooke many Hostages for better assurance . The two Consuls had an earnest desire , to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising ; perswading themselves , that in battaile they should bee too strong for him . Crispinus had further his particular desire , to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne : as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum . Therefore he went about the siege of Loeri ; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italia : and brought thither all sorts of engines ; sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him . But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the Citie : the fame of whose approach , made Crispinus desist from his enterprize , and retire vnto his Colleague , that lay at Venusia . Thither followed Hannibal ; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile . This great man of Warre had no neede to stand vpon his reputation : which was alreadie so confirmed , that his refusing to fight , was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare ; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom .

 He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes , and sought to take them at some advantage ; referring his owne numbers as full as he could , vnto a time of greater employment . In this lingring manner of Warre , Marcellus took no pleasure ; but sought to compell the Enemy to battaile , whether he would or no . The Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily , L. Cincius , was commanded againe to assaile the Towne of Loeri : which might well enough be forced , if Hannibal continued as he beganne ; to trifle away the time at Venusia . To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum , was appointed to goe by Land to the assistance of Cincius . But Hannibal had an eye behinde him . He laid an ambush in the way , be-twene Tarentum and Loeri , whereto the Romans fell : and having lost about three thousand of their companie , were well glad , the rest of them , to quit their enterprise , and save their owne liues within Tarentum . As for the Consuls , it was the desire of Hannibal , to walte their Armie by litle and litle : which to doe , hee neglected no advantage . There lay betwene him and them an Hillock , ouer-growne with wood , that seemed fit to couer a number of men : who lying there vndis-cerned , might fall vpon such , as should straggle from the Roman campe ; and cut them off . Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians : whom he willed to keepe themselves close , and attend their best advantage . To this peece of ground , the Consuls thought it fit to remove their campe : Marcellus thinking that the neuer lay neare enough vnto Hannibal . Thither therefore both of them roode , to view the place , accompanied with the sonne of Marcellus , a few Colonells and other principall men ; and not many more than two hundred horse , most of them Hetrurians . The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellows ; who discouered not themselves , vntill they had surrounded the Consuls and their traine . The Consuls , as necessitie compelled them , defended themselves :
 hoping to bee quickly relieved from their campe that was neare at hand . But the Hetrurians ranne away from them , at the first : and left them in that great danger , to the weake assistance of no more than fortie horse-men , that were of the Colonie of Fregella . These Fregellans abode by the Consuls ; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off . But when Marcellus was stricken through with a Lance , and fell downe dead ; then beganne euery one to shift for himselfe , and escape as they might . Crispinus the other Consul , had his deaths wound , being stricken with two Darts ; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded ; yet these two recovered their campe . The rest of the Colonells and Officers ; together with the Lifters that carried the bundells of Rods and Axes before the Consuls , were all slaine or taken . To the dead bodie of the Consul Marcellus , Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall , according to the custome of those times : and bestowing

bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus beought himselfe, how that the ligner Ring of Marcellus, was fallen into the custodie of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, cre that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore hee left word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was slaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring; wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus, was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another

- 10 Messenger arriued there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Atuelus, and sealed with the captiue Ring: whereof the contents were, That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employments as hee should thinke needfull. The deuice was plaine; and no lesse plaine was the reuengefull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein bene betrayed. The Salapians hereupon beought themselues, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such
- 20 a friend. Late in the night he came thither, with a troupe of Roman fugitiues, armed Roman like, leading the way. These all talking Latin together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gates; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer reached with this stratageme, halted away to Locri; whereunto Cneius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sirell, did lay hard siege.

30 The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrours, made the Romans, in all confused halte, runne to their ships; leauing all their engines, and whatsoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

- The Roman Senate, hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator: that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurt. Hee did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies, lay so neare vnto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that election should be made of such men as were
- 40 not only valiant, but well aduised: iuice the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by loosing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero was the most eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many feruices in this present warre; did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staid wit. The Fathers therefore endeouored to ioyne vnto him in the Consulship M. Linius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Linius had bene Consul with L. Emilius Paulus, in the yeare foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did
- 50 good seruice, they had both of them been called into iudgement by the People: and this Linius condemned; Emilius hardly escaping. Though it hath bene once alreadie noted, yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Canna, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Amylius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Tertentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Linius, he is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeares together after his condemnation had hee bene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrey Grange; vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Laninus, being Consuls two or three yeares agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued priuate, in discontented sort, as might appeare, both by his carelesnesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that age werethe badges of men afflicted. Vry lately he was compelled by the Ceniors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vsed to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed; either in short formall wordes, or in passing from side to side, when the house was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some buisnesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood vp, and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bad them inquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather serued to fill vp the number, than to answer to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all beganne to say; that it was great pittie, so worthie and able a man, as this Linius, had bene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Commonwealth stood in great neede, yet had not vsed, in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Laninus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Linius. But Linie would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had one ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases hee resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather, but runne vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulness, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Auvs. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. This is wisdom often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yeare toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius were chosen Consuls. Asarbal was already come into France, and waited only, to haue the waies of the Aper thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italie. The Romans vsed at this time the seruice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spaine, two in Sicill, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italie, where neede seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution, execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obseruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Linius would not stirre out of Rome, against he mightie power as followed Asdrubal; vntill hee had first obtained, that hee might carrie with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies: It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that year, among the Cisalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Linius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neare vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie; that was sent against Hannibal. Neuertheless the Consuls, by the speciall instance of Linius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was alreadye passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genus, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioyne with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would aduenture no further, than hee safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each, his severall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had bene, when L. Scipius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generalls; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie bytimes: but rather they stood in feare; least all diligence, wisdom, and valour, should proue too little. For since few years had passed, wherein some one of their Generalls had not bene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst, the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held vp her head, ever since the battaile of Cannae: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italy. But there was now arriued another forme of Amour; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencye than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Rivers, and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow ball, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a penfull traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispin, vpon whom in the like sort they had giuen attendance the last year; but saw neither of them returne a liue, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduise to M. Linius, that he should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a forward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day; for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victorie; or by seeing the overthrow of his owne vnjust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spain, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his iourne into Italy, such mention hath alreadye bene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Linius. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie, concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficultie; in Spain, by reason of those Captaines that were sent from the Citie of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-

uantage of their owne side, before the good of their Commonwealt. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courses vnder taken, it can not be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters; there are to vs remaining, only a few broken peeces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicily with Mantine, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partisans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuertheless Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mantine could not long digest. His iourne into Italy being resolved vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of Silver; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue bene so great, as it must haue bene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man: and seeing that his Campe was likely to bee forced, sent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him: but staid behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might bee out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tagnas. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenes: leauing the care of Spain vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio haue stopped him on his iourne, by sending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether Asdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keepe the Pyrenes (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voiage by any such impediment. Coming into Gaul, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: hee found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countrie; whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iourne ouer the Alpes: were easily wonne to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first coming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to robbe them of their cattaille; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had painfullly scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proceesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also ioyined with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arriued in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie neare, than L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible; by the destruction of that Towne. But there hee lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprize: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure, to make readie for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leave his wintering camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede hee could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about fortie thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrie of the Brutians, there to increase his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the iourne intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprofitably with Nero the Consul. Neuertheless he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore hee was driven to returne to Metapontum; where ioyning with Hanno, that had made readie a good Armie; hee assaid againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, having Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Aufidus to Canusium, where he sate downe, not farre from the place in which he had obtained, his most memorable victorie. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouercome the way to Canusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victorie; as once he had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so fallen out, Rome would have bene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to win any second victorie, in the naked Champains about Canna; if such an armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when hee was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italia; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilest Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could bee made by Linie the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioynd as head, vnto that great bodie of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that how soeuer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamities; yet the very continuance of so strong a waire at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirte Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore hee resolved, that it were better to make any desperate aduventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeares, was like to worke most lamentable effect. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Herevpon hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the waire against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessitie required; and to carrie part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in truit, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would only step aside, to doe some small peece of seruice neare at hand; away hee posted as fast as hee could, to assist assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which he was to passe, that they should be readie to meet him, with vituals, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neare vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe daies Nero had finished his iourne thither; and when he drew neare, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his comming. Linus thought it fittest that hee should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: leaſt the Enemy, perceiuing this acceſſe of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token giuen, that the Colonells, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horſe as foot, that Nero had brought with him; 10 should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was ſomewhat increaſed by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way, Neuertheleſſe, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should bee enlarged; ſince they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counſaile of warre: wherein ſome were of opinion, that it was beſt for theſe new-arrived Companies, to reſreſh themſelues a few daies after their wearie iourne, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But againſt this, Nero was very earnest: and beſought his Colleague, to make uſe of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his abſence. The ſouldiers alſo of Nero, were full of ſpirit; perceiuing that the honour 20 of the victorie was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vnderaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counſaile brake vp, that the ſigne of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate over the Generalls pavilion.

Asdrubal was no leſſe willing than the Romans to come to battaile: hauing long deſired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it ſeemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and ſome of their armes and horſes, looked as though they had wanted dreſſing, after a long iourne. Hereupon he beganne to with-draw his Armie back into the Campe; 30 and gaue order, that if no priſoners could be taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good obſeruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might ſhew their forces to be increaſed. The campe, as hath beene ſaid, was not extended: but the trumpet, that ſounded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrarie to former cuſtome, ſound twice in the quarter of Linus the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly muſed: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a ſure token, that the other Consul, was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good caſe, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the beſt way, to goe leiſurely to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon 40 confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neare hee lay to the Romans; nor troubled himſelfe perhaps with ouer-ſtrongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceiued, that ſomewhat was fallen out beſide his expectation: he changed his reſolution; and held it no diſhonour to remove a little further off. So he diſlodged ſecretly by night: intending to get ouer the Riuer McLourus; whereby to keepe himſelfe as long as he could, from neceſſitie of battaile.
 But whether it were ſo, that his guides did ſteale away from him in the darke, ſo that he could not finde the way to the Foards; or whether his carriages were too heaue, and hindred his ſpeece: ſarre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horſe, and ſlaid him from paſſing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon 50 with all the Legions; in good order, and readie for battaile. Asdrubal, ſeing him-ſelfe over-taken with neceſſitie to fight, omitted no care and circumſpection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed leaſt confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which

which the Enemy should not, without much difficultie, bee able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe, with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians hee placed in the midt; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linus of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safetie there was vnto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauerie, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victorie seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout souldiers; and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardie Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their firstranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steep Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gauls; that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; and tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Linus: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flank. Here beganne the victorie to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding noue to resist him in front, ranne all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on euery side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gauls escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aliue: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, beganne to wexe vnruly, and rush back vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betwene the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith hee killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedie way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the Squadrons following them; is said to haue bene the deuiice of Asdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Linus. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthe of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue striuen with great patience, against many difficulties, wherinto he fell by the meanes of those Captaines, that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthe Generall; and finally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting brauely, hee was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linus, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Luise saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an ouerthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Canna; that fiftie sixe thousand of them were slaine, fise thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and aboute four thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes; but in gold and siluer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it.

Likely

Likely it is to have bene as rich as Linie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a paralel vnto that of Canna) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to have bene slaine. The number of the prisoners he doeth not mention; but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive, and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme, that they were all Berchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countrey, above their liues.

The joy of this victorie, was no lesse in Rome, than had bene the feare of the euent. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Armie; the whole Citie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great aduerture, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staid behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall? Thus did they talk; yet referring their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approve or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-place; and the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were dailly in counsaile, waiting still readie hand vpon the Magistrates: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require euerie ones helpe. In briefe, they were all full of melancholie, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would belecue it. Afterwards when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters contayning all that had passed: there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their private businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners, might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of this misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howeuer the People of Carthage, wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Common weale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot him selfe, being ouer-joyced with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the balance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrey of the Brittians: and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compass in the utmost corner of Italie; it being a Countrey of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnted; or because it is likely

How P. CORNELIVS SCIPIO the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

¶. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by SCIPIO from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

MAGO and ASDRUBAL the sonne of Gesco, tooke vpon them the charge of Spaine, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italic. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voiage to the Baleares; there to leuie a supply of men: and Asdrubal with-draw himselfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately bene employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to succede in place of Asdrubal the Ethereine. It is not vnlike-ly that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of Amilcar, whose authoritie had bene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men.
Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought out: Hanno tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entered into the Countrie of the Celiberians, not very farre from new Carthage:
where, by monie, and other persuasions, he leuied aboue nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine:
attentiuely, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Ita-lie, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celiberians: hee sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celiberians, who became his guides, that their Countymen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neare to these Celiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an oner-throw, that Hanno and Mago comming to their succour, in stead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago saued himselfe, with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and intended dayes journey brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to bee taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saued most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no other wise bee, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherewith Italic stood, by the comming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, attentiuely to the necessitie and successe of his Countymen at home. But when had word of the great victorie at Me-tawrus, which fell out long before the end of this Sommer, then might hee well aduenture,

venture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spain; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Soldiers that served vnder Hannibal, and those that had been sent ouer into Africk; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrey had been sent ouer into Afrubal into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie, was closed vp in a streight, whence hee could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, vntill the Sommer, was almost spent. Afrubal therefore vied the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindered the Enemy, from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by assault the Towne of Oringiu.

Against the next yeares danger, Afrubal prepared a great Armie: and spared nor cost, nor trauaile, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spain. With seuentie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie 20 Elephants, hee tooke the field: which number I beleeeue that hee could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee judged it needfull to vse the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries; made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Colechas, that was Lord of eight and twentie Townes, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his seruice: hee resolved to make vse of those, and some few others; that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee
 30 able to doe great harme, if they would revolt. So with five and fortie thousand foot, and three thousand horse, hee fought out the Enemy; neare to whom hee incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masaniissa fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whilst hee was making his lodgings. But hee laid certaine troupes of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardy pressed, they shortly betooke themselves to plaine fight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmishes betweene the horse, and light armature, on both sides; where in was nothing done of importance. Afrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio, each of them to shew that hee durst fight; yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: Afrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning, and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries, were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midle, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before designed. But Scipio, when hee purpose d indeede to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier than hee had beene wont. Hee caused his men, and horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traîne out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptie: vsing here in the same trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards,

In the battaile, Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilst he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat vnto their foot; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemie. But about noone, he caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards farre behind them; that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, saue only in number, to the Latin and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leued in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose: they were sorely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine haue succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battaile which was coming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle; vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduenced to meet with the Spaniards; he must haue cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betwene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arriued, he should haue found himselfe inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Canna. Wherefore hee did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies; than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer bee ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In proceesse of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiuing their aduantage, they followed it the more hotly: and gaue not ouer, till they had forst the enemie to change his pace and runne from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderly retreat; and afterward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to bee so extorred from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obstinate passion of feare which hearkens to no persuasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day bene taken; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the suddaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night, Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungry, and ouer-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein hee feared to bee assaulted. But little assurance could hee haue in the strength of his Trenches; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetans, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subjects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yielded vnto Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest; bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleue the more easly those reports which they heard from Italie. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiuing this, with-drew himselfe, and marched away, faster than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning: and ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make fland; that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue only seuen thousand, that with Asdrubal himselfe recovered a very strong peece of ground, which they fortified in haste.

This

This place he made shift awhile to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustaine himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one: and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence; hee tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio understood that Asdrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot and a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masaniha staid in it) whilest he with the rest of the Armenians what was needfull in the Countrey abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masaniha followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Armie disperfed 10 it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were only three Townes left, Ulliturgi, Castulo, and Asiapa, that made countenance of warre against the Romans: of which only Castulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had saved themselves by flight, in the late ouerthrowes. Hereby it seemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yeelded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out, on the Carthaginian side. Ulliturgi had sometimes bene inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipios, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not only rebelled; but 20 with great crueltie betrayed, and slue, the poore men that escaped thither from the ouerthrowes. Asiapa was a Towne, that had still adhe:ed to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thrinen by spoile of the Romans and their Conquerates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next year) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Ulliturgi and Castulo: Ulliturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cordabellus. Asiapa was taken by Lucius Martinius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, and siluer, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being 30 made: all the Inhabitants that could beare armes, rushed forth desperately: and fell vpon the Roman campe; where struiuing beyond their power, they were eury one slaine. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doeit: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilest they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies; leauing Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, if any should be offered. Hee visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Masaniha, a people of the Numidians, hoping to winne him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driven the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bekinke himselfe, how to finish the warre; by putting them to the like distresse in Affrike. Hereunto it seemed, that the helpe of Syphax would be much auailable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also bene beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio that sent him ouer a Captaine into Affrike; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadours to 50 Rome, and made league with the Citie, in a time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceiued hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Affrike; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour, to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lelius his Embassadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine; easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested, that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthie of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies heeooke Sea: and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would have bene very dangerous to him, had hee bene discried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in Carthagen, they forbore to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud, seeing at one time, two 10 such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. Hee would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

†. II.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A duell betwene two Spanish Princes.
 A digression, concerning Duells. 20

Scipio returning into Spaine, and reling that winter, tooke vengeance the next year, vpon those of Ibiturgi, Castulo, and Aslape, as hath bene said before. The Conquest of the Countrey being then in a manner at an end: hee performed at new Carthage, with great solemnitie, some Vowes that he had made; and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at Sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their lives, as was vsed in the Citie of Rome: for there were enough, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to giue proofe in single combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countreies. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controversies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corbis, and Orsus, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principalltie of a Towne called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orsus hood lately seized of the Principalltie: which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe back; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio have compounded the matter.
 But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the younger.

Such combats have bene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Thescus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy; the one, betwene Paris and Menelaus; the other, betwene Hector and Ajax. Neither want 50 there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betwene David and Goliath; and others performed by some of Dauids Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betwene twelue of the Tribe of Jude, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, against the three brethren Curiatij that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great combat fought, betwene Edmond Ironside and Canutus the Dane, for no lesse than the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the raigne of Edward the third, who sustained the partie of Montfort against the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Duchie of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, betwene thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie Englisb: two of which Englisb, were Caluerie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knoller, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knoller is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in Englisb, French, and Italian Histories. Moit of them haue bene combats of brauerie, and of gayeté de cœur, as the French terme it; for honor of severall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatsoeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats, which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of Right.

10 And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee spake euen now, betwene Corbis and Orsua. Vnto these (me thinkes) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betwene Dauid and Goliath; or that betwene the Horatij and Curiatij: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betwene the Lord Henric of Bouilnbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Anley and one Caltrington: whom Anley charged with treason; and proued it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betwene Robert of Mountfort and Henric of Essex.

30 And one Wale of Grimby, whom the Nauarros accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battaile doe determine, that the fals accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had bene due to the offender, if the accusation had bene proued, I cannot affirme. But we euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) bee ouercome, He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may trye it by his Champion; as did Paramor and Love, or offered to doe, in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth only his caule, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in empe close, that is, within pails. Now this triall by combat was ordinary in France, before the time of St. Lewis, and Philip the saue his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Jurisdiction. And it seemeth that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the Memorialls of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings sixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe; which they vse when any man hath had an hard or vnjust judgement; saying, That hee was tried by the Law of Lars; or Berne; or le battin peye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Vno, Bishop of Chartrei, did often complaine, and specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch bishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie, and kinde of triall, was retented by Saint Lewis, and Philip the faire; so that no man should decree, or grant it, saue the King himselfe. It hath since bene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carouges against laques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, as to the Lord of Aoro, his Countinman: wherein Sir Henrie Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie, and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deferring death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ses defenses per vne dementir; The Defendant was bound to pleade not guilty, by giuing the accusor the Lie: other wise it was concluded, that the Defendant did iustiblement confesse le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the first, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euery petty Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giuing of the Lie mortallitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the first had patiently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knownto the Ancient. For, the Honor of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champsions, or the Objection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, not all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duells, as are founded vpon meere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthe of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrells. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnapardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that giues it. Thus the fashion; taken vp in hate by the French Gentlemen after the patterne of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kinde of Arte and Philofophie of quarrell, with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many other no lesse ridiculous) some so myffical curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a slave, the other, to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretie; though, for mine owne part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions, who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their fwords to all that giue it them; vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsely. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and bluffe in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed and sworne to pay the monies and other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Liars by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised, that he will pay monie by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath bene made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice, and of all they haue, vsed in their of-

dinaric complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid but good-morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and courtlike kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French-man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Countrie) une marche & complot fait ensemble les se mequer, mentir, & piper les vms les autres; A kinde of merchandize, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other: and so farre now-a-daies in fashion, and in vse; as he that vseth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinctions) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessitie vpon breach of promise; and those which men 10 vice out of cowardize and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other filed the most villainous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I say, That who so giues another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promieth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when himselfe knows that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I
 20 say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's mid-night; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Russian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; giues it impertinently, and Russian-like. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vntruth is vttered) but all that is rude, ought not to be ciuiliized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, That these discourtes fauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize, to feare God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wise, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For a-
 30 gainst an Enemies sword wee shall find ten thousand seven-penic-men (waged at that price in the warres) that feare it as little, and perchance lesse, than any professe Sword-man in the World. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitudo is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem penna: sic nec fortem pugna; sed cuncta; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countie; as hee may iustly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious
 40 hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe we indeede take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our owne consciences; animasq; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and bloud of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries? I say that I doe not; if the injuries bee violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law; and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the Assailant. You will secondly aske 50 me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentle-man, being challenged by Carrel by one of like qualitie, bee not bound in point of honour to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer that he is not: because (omitting the greater it, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposit to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can judge

judge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Artes honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conquerour; and the Lawes of God appointed the Devill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Curtel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, haue seldome taken any such advantage ouer men of qualitie; who vpon euen termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentle-men in former ages, in all important injuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselves by battaile and publique combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law: so did they disdain to submit themselves to the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it detaileth murder) that it hath declared againt a common Cut-purse or other Theeves. May let it be granted that a pardon bee procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Manslaier freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require iustice by Grand Affize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (saith St. Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I vse his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Manslaier) be convinced either by Great Affize or by Battaille, vpon that appeale; the Manslaier shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men & Gentle-men shall be repaired in honour, where an enemy, taking the start either in wordes or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vsufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recouerie of our Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, and children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may bee felonnie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues to the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet againe it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to be so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publique good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loofeth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult; because euen and equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publique good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame and reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine iniurie by wordes, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill wordes that we haue giuen, and to confesse that we haue done him wrong to whom we haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For hee that giues ill wordes in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduise; hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeede not to be giuen but to those that are seruile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appere by a notable example of a most worthie Gentleman Monsieur du Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, ment, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls late: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgell or bastinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one before hand in point of honour, who struck M. de Plessis, like 10 a Russian comming behinde him, and (hauing aduantage of companie, and his horses readie) shifted himselfe away on the suddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner; Or whether Monsieur de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not faire iust cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgane him; let any wise man iudge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of the force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sinnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthie of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay voluntarie repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weaknesse. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride petty iniuries or suddaine iniuries, that are not offered from malice forethought, then reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valour; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe

 30 to be a valiant man, seemes to hunt after the opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preserved; wee may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as wee doe submit our selues in all controuersies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chivalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honey-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous Beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of severall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God vpon supreme Governours, than the permission.

His Majestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessours could neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer more. And we haue cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse happie in preventing the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous vanitie of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthe of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their severall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and such such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weaknesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or peruersitates; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene coming presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, primarily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestic now reigning, haue giuen notable testimonie of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talarde: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances, who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especial fauour with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the handes of the Hang man. Queene Marie, vpon a noble man of her owne Religion; and in many other respects so very deare vnto her. Hut Maieftie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans; euery Age hath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Authour of the French Recherches giues vs two notable instances: the one of des Esbars, who (saith Pasquire) fit mourir Montaigne grand Maistre de France, pour contente l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors s'absteiz, & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & estrangle; Who caused Montaigne great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Esbars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poret: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chobot, a man most nobly defended, and of great seruice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue grows old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charg'd him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Murzeilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike triall. Hercupon the King (it being cause to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with to faire promises; as, albeit nothing could be proved against the Admirall, worthe of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor (subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the Forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating fallhood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leon certes (saith Pasquire) à tout iuge pour demeurer toujours en ioy, & ne laisser fluctuer sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imagine fauueur, qui pour fin de se le submerger; A faire selon to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waues of imaginarie fauour, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall; though it might haue beene answered answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamities vnderfcrud, That he was tried, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Countrey, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iustice, fcrmounting all other his passions, gaue back vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

The last Aēs of SCIPIO in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

THE last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sick, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Suesetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and waited their Countrey. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Suero, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had notreaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought ealie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Carners. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported: they thought, that the time serued very well; to enrich themselves with spoile of the Countrey. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, drining away their Colonells, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellows, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Vinobes, to their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had bene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whilest they were deuising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion, as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonells, sent vnto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further over-shot themselves; led them to Carthagen, there to receiue their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserued. Therefore hee caused syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; He caused Albius and Atrius with some thirtie oother of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to assembly; and having them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; hee bitterly inuicighed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albius, and Atrius, with the other Romans, were hald to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued e-

Mandonius, and Indibilis continued in armes; notwith standing that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue bene contented to be quiet: but by the feueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers; they stood in feare, as being being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and sending Laelius with all his horse to fetch a compass about the Hills, and charge them in reare; hee overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaying, to preferue themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtayned his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, then they formerly had bene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masaniissa; who secretly promised to doe him all seruice, if the People of Rome would send him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gauls, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasure, or the Temples. In his voiage thence, hee landed at Carthagena: hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But hee failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his taking leave of them, would not suffer him to enter againe into their Citie. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, hee allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voiage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bene granted vnto no Proconful; excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Caesar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were itayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the Warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loofe that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of emplotment so farre off.

§. XVIII.

SCIPIO obtains leave to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of MASANISSA who joyned with SCIPIO. The victories against ASDRUBAL and SYPHAX.

PV. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, and P. LICINIUS CRASSUS, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the monie which he had brought out of Spain into the treasure; upon the setting forth of soleme plaies, that he had vowed to make, whilest he was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to revive the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to give hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish embassages auail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deferredly; saying, That they were the most happie of all their Countymen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carrie home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadors, were lovingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though easily it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deserved. Neuertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Province: there wanted not many, even of the principall men, that vehemently gaue said him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who seemes to haue been troubled with that dislike; which too often caueth men renowned for long approved vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. He allaged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasure was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled, vnto the defence of Rome it selfe, if neede required. Hereunto he added many wordes concerning the danger wherein Italie stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italie free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to euate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Asdrubal to passe into Italie: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, least the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yeare a Province: which the Consul neuertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians; who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of monie, with leues made abroad. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague, would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuie of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprize; hee proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: forasmuch as it was noised abroad, that if hee could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carrie it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honorable man a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates

good will and pleasure; whereby hee obtained thus much, That the life of Stiù might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of monie, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Here-withall it fell out, that Mage, comming on the fuddaine from the Baleares to Genna, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italie, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeede raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore he was driuen to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This trouble some businesse, though it occupied more of his time, than he could willingly haue spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnlcaded Gauls readie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay readie to be employed where hee need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie, and Liguria, there to make head against Mage. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) loaden with the bootie that hee had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much displeasur to him; and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of monie, hearing him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatal voiage of Scipio into Africk, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bene pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent the sommer by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where hee raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the loosing hand, a cause both of the fame for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian, and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeares idleness: which fell not out much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empouered by this warre; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeares since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receiue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other monie, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voiage; neither did hee ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vially found in Councils of estate; that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times, men make a surrender of their owne judgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forpast. Therefore, hee that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde him selfe deceived: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empetr of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fabius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one courle; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) apprehently embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such fort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italie about seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canus for sailes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Fire for building of ships, many thousands of *T*argets, Helmets, and Speares of all kinds: every place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford. In the compasse of siue and fortie daies, he had both feld his *T*imber, built, and lanched, twentie *T*riempe, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee transported his Armie into Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as hee himselfe well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauie censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus, and Lauinius, at the taking of many Cities, and strong peeces: in which regard, they were like to bee of good vse to him in Africk; where would bee store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, hee pressed three hundred Scythians, all wealthie young men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen; which hee brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilst hee was prouiding, to haue things in a readinesse for Africk; the banished Loerians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadells of Loeri (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ranfomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surpris'd. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison: which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like fort, fearing least their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Townsmen, were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Loerians vnto the Roman Senate; not only against those of the Garrison, but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example; and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoiled by these barbarous Theeues. The Loerians therefore aduised the Senate, to make present amends to the Goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had neuer been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good care to this complaint; comforted the Loerians, and redressed the injuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principall offenders, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her monie twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Loeri; and had not carefully hearkned to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp inuectiue that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased: as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that ten Legates were sent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Aediles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or con-

time him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him lo well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journey; and gave him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lulius in Africa; rather to make discoverie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie: and struck no little terror into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to bee vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masanissa, he well informed himselfe of the state of Africa; and knew what was to bee expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder hand with the Romans: Lulius doth professe, That there was no such evident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferior to Lulius, both in Worth and Time) gives one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessarie truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Lulius, if it had bene true: vntill wee should beleue, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things done confirme it.

Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loued. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to be his sonne-in-law. When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spain, and there did great seruice. But after wards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubals daughter to be a matter of State; and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Here of Masanissa was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as was thought; yet not so secretly, but that some notice was taken of it; which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home in to his fathers Kingdome. This was farre forth we may beleue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seemes, that howsoever Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet since this their courtlesie proceeded from feare, He thought it wisdom to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Lulius, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken peeces of his works remaining) Lulius did follow; it will be no offence, to take litle heed vnto his reports.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crowne descended, by order of the Countrey, vnto Desalees the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this vncle of Masanissa shortly died; and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel; that made him selfe Protector ouer the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: He, and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should haue bene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not bene guilty of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilst his vncle or Cousen reigned, and hee seemed vniuely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Contriuall warred warred vpon him; and over-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheless Masaniſſa ſtill retain'd the hearts of his people: and thereby remayned ſtrong enough, to inſelt both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in diſtreſſe, by great forces that were ſent againſt him. He therefore keeping much about the leſſer Syria, betwene the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet ſo, as he made long roades over all the Countrey, euen as farre as to Hippe; and when Lelius arriued thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him, to haſten on Scipio to the inuaſion of Africke.

- 10 But Syphax, in whole great aide and ſuccour was repoſed more hope of good ſucceſſe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Masaniſſa; ſent an Embaſſage into Sicill about the ſame time, which was little pleaſing vnto Scipio. He excuſed himſelfe of his promiſe lately made: and ſignified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That hee could not chooſe but fight for the defence of Africke, wherein he was borne and raign'd; and for defence of his beloved wiues Countrey, if it were inuaied. Neuertheless he promiſed to remaine a Neuter; ſo long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africke, as hitherto they had done. This meſſage haſtned Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perſwaſion could haue done. For the promiſed aſſiſtance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterpriſe; in procuring both the aſſent of the Senate, and the forwardneſſe of many Aduenturers. Left therefore the failing of this hope, ſhould worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the beſt way, to preſent all diſcourſe, and ſet the warre vnder taken immediately on foot. The Embaſſadours he diſmiſſed in all haſte, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to conſider, that what he had promiſed he had alſo ſworne; and therefore ſhould doe well to make it good. Hauing ſent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voiage; which he intended no longer to deſerre. For, ſaid he, Masaniſſa hath bene with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly ſent to me; greatly wondering vpon what I ſhould thus ſtay; and ſaying, that they will prouide for themſelues, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This ſure tale preuented all further inquiſition, that might elſe haue bene made concerning the meſſage of theſe Embaſſadours; whoſe followers had bene ſcene walking vp and downe Syracufe. And leſt any thing ſhould afterwards breake out, that might hinder the buſineſſe, Scipio immediately ſent about his fleet vnto Lilybaum: and requeſting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicill, to meet him there; haſting thither with his Armie. At Lilybaum he agreed with the Pretor, about the diuiſion of the Legions betwene them; which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carrie with him into Africke. What numbers hee transported, it is not certaine: ſome Hiſtorians reckoning only ten thouſand foot, and two and twentie hundred horſe; others increaſing them to five and thirtie thouſand, horſe and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their courſe, I hold it needleſſe to ſet them downe ſince they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when he tooke his voiage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occaſions, haue omitted; they being alſo word for word ſet downe by an Hiſtorian, who borrowed them from Lince, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Armie landed in Africke, neare vnto a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compaſſe, I cannot preciſely affirme, becauſe it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-eaſt of Carthage; or whether that of Apello, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by Weſt. The coming of Masaniſſa vnto Scipio at his firſt arrivall, helpeſ to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue bene the ſame, that was alſo called Mercuries Cape, ſince with little difficultie Masaniſſa might come thither from the lesser Syria, whereabouts was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment, soone after his arriual, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the Riuer Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apello; whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masaniissa, that roued about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vsually resorted, like as before he had met with Latus at Hippo that was farther off: as it would haue beene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the trouble of a long iournie, and fetch a great compasse to Vtica by Land; when hee might haue disembarked nearer vnto it. Neuertheless it may passe as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Rejon about the lesser Syria; since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the letting forth from Lybicum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustentance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make resistance. This much perhaps Masaniissa had signified vnto Latus, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoeuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to be such, as not only serued to inuade the Lands of Carthage; but threatened a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might hee better aduise them to set saile for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Soldiers; that were leui'd, or to bee leui'd in haste. Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately bene chased out of Spaine by Scipio, was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinitie of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was at that present with the King his sonne-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance; and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where hee was chosen Generall. But ere these could be readie, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which hee conuoyed aboard his Fulkes or ships of burden, and sent them back laden into Sicily. Hee tooke likewise a Towne called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Nuimidian horse: whose seruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places; made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfulnesse of their Leader, that had thus bousted them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a Braudo, trained out the improuident Hanno so farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was easily gotten; and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entered pell-mell into the Towne; which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath bene formerly made; and fate downe before it. Fortie daies hee spent about it: assailing it both by Land and Sea, and vsing all his engines of Batterie wherof hee had plentie; yet was in no likelihood of preuailling. And now the Sommer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which must bee well stored against the yeare following. Whilest thus necessitie vrged him to leaue Vtica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better success, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Armie to draw neare vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fiftie thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby rooke occasion to dilodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauiue. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottoome of the Creeke he moored his ships; and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the fleet. The whole Campe he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the yeare, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattails and other bootie Masaniissa had brought in great store; by driving the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Come also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicily and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Soldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare; especially with Captiues, to bee sold for slaues. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neare vnto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the seuerer institution, which the Romans vsed in discipline of Warre, or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neare; Scipio thought it good to assy his old friend the Nu-midian King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen proofe before this of his much leuicie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no lesse wearie with fatiue of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: Hee might bee moued with a little entreatie, to with-draw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Winter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honored in the Citie of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had beene inuited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe awhile: his wife Queene Sophoniba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoeuer it were, Syphax did only make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Annibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africke; and so mak an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africke and Europe were diuicted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue care: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadours: He beganne to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, and covered with boughes: and that the Nu-midians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed coverings of Mats and Reedes; others, that came later, had chatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelesly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire; and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, Hee foresaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought

vpon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Embassadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surpris. With these Embassadours he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like flaues; that wandring (as it were) idly vp and downe the Campe, might obserue the waies and entrances, with what soeuer else was needfull. When hee had learned as much as hee desired: vpon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer T reatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This hee did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his designe in execution. The T ruce being thus cut off: Asdrubal and Syphax were very pensie; as hauing lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better: they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did M. Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches: what else remained than to besiege him? which they themselves were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making readie for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompening in conceit the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that, consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger; but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, Hee was not idle: but made preparation out of hand; as it were to doe somewhat against Niua. Two thousand Souldiers he had made readie; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon hee lay against Niua before. This hee did, partly to keepe secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Niua from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leaue behinde him in his campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readie for the iourne. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vnto the defence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lelius and Masanissa, whom hee sent before him to set vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualtie vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Asdrubal, it would bee suspected as the doing of enemies; and giue Syphax warning to looke vnto himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire vnd softly; that Lelius and Masanissa, who had a longer iourne, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of Syphax beganne to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualtie; as thinking themselves safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger: Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe sleepe; and others, that had litten vp late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But such was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were; nor giue remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vpon the Enemies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masaniſſa, that best knew the Countrey, did great execution vpon them; hauing laid all the waies, by which he foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiuing this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would serue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the grettnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell outright as Scipio would haue it. Flee therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians,

10 be killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted only for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him: If Hannibal, or any of the Barthine faction, had bene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue judged him worthe to be crucified. It would then haue been said, That with lesse than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires; had he not bene only carefull how to saue his owne fearefull head. Neuertheless

20 Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue bene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would haue striuen to shew valour, when the campe was once on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good; because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not neede to tell what a fearefull thing it was; to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their severall waies of flight. Besides these al so there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saued themselves in the darke: but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Sorely it mult needes haue bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made

30 away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Lutic, who itt the rest of this Relation, as often els-where, doth follow Polybius; may seeme to haue followed some lesse worthe Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in calling vp the summe. For hee reckons only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to haue escaped; fortie thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and about six thousand to haue bene taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of foure score and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next Towne that was very strongly fortified; thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw that the arrivall of Scipio would soone giue an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; Hee shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the Towne, which hee left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preferred it selfe from all manner of warre: but 50 their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege of Nica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable lamentable overthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make haſtie prouision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them ſaw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to ſend for Hannibal out of Italye; but the moſt, and they which finally preuailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the loſſe of this Armie, they might well defend themſelues againſt the Romans; by railing new forces; eſpecially, if Syphax would not leaue them. It was therefore concluded, That they ſhould bend all their care this way: leuying in all haſte another Armie; and ſending Embaſſadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not paſſing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the ſame their infortunate Commander, Aſdrubal the ſonne of Giſco, was imploied to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embaſſadors to her huſband Syphax; who hauing gathered together as many as he could, of his ſubjects that had eſcaped from the late ſlaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophonisba laboured ſo with her huſband, that at length ſhee wonne him to her owne deſire. And it fell out at the ſame time, that foure thouſand Spaniards, waied by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to ſerue in Africa. Of theſe were made ſuch braue reports; as if their courage, and the armes which they vſed, were not to be reſiſted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleued theſe tales, and were more glad than they had cauſe to be; which is great wonder, ſince in one Age, the whole Countrey of Spaine had bene twice conquered, firſt, by the Carthaginians themſelues, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax theſe tales preuailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaſſadors helped with a lie; ſaying, that there were come ten thouſand of theſe terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered ſuch ſpirit, that in thirde daies they made vp an Armie conſiſting neere of thirte thouſand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great ſelds, about ſiue daies iourne from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to viſit them: leauing behind him his impediments, with ſome part of his Armie; to make a ſhew of continuing the ſiege. Two or three daies, after the meeting of both Armies, paſſed away in ſkirmiſh; without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Aſdrubal, to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius; and ſeek to wearie out the Enemy by delaias. But either (which is likely) hee was a farre worſe Commander; or elſe it was not in his power, to giue ſuch directions as beſt pleaſed himſelfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were maſſed by Scipio after their wonted manner; hauing their Italian horſe in the right wing; and Masaniſſa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary ſide, Aſdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the Battaille. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphax and Aſdrubal, could not ſuſtaine the firſt charge of the Italians, or of Masaniſſa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, euen till they were all in a manner ſlaine: rather as men deſperate, and not hoping for mercie, ſince they were thus come ouer to fight againſt Scipio, who had otherwiſe deſerued of them; than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victorie. This their obſtinacie was beneficiall vnto thoſe that fled; for that it hindered the Romans, from making any great purſuit. Hereby Aſdrubal and Syphax eſcaped: Aſdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his owne Kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus gotten the maſtrie of the field, tooke counſaile about the proſecution of the Warre. It was reſolued vpon as the beſt courſe, That hee himſelfe, with part of the Armie, ſhould attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masaniſſa, with his Numidians, and Lalio, with ſome of the Roman Legions, ſhould follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take reſt within his owne Kingdome, where eaſily elſe he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice it ſeemes that Masaniſſa gaue: who knew beſt the qualitie of the Numidians; and

- and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victorie. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne Kingdome, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lalius was sent away with Mamissa and Scipio staid behinde; carrying the warre from Towne to Towne. Many places yeelded for feare: many were taken by force: and all the subjects of Carthage wauered in their fidelitie; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid vpon them, for maintenance of the warre in Spain and Italie. What to doe in this case the
- 10 Carthaginians could hardly resolue. Fortune was their Enemy: they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or monie; who neuertheless of their owne free will were likely to giue little helpe. Very much it grieued them, to send for Hannibal out of Italie: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, that Embassadors should bee forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to fit out a fleet against that of Scipio; that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the Citie of Carthage: vpon the safetie whereof they said that all depended; adding, that whilst they were true, and at vnitie among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doublelesse) would present them. These counsailes were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheless it was considered, that hereby they should only protract the warre: without any way aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie; no, though it should fall out, that all the ships at Vtica might bee taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Africa, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to fortification of the Towne: some, to make readie the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to imbarque themselves for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those daies very strong, and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible peece adjoining, He easily tooke; the Garrison forsaking it, and running away, as soone as he drew neare. But whilst hee was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the Citie: He might perceiue the Carthaginian fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued: and stood in great feare, lest his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily loden with engines of batterie, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the Towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall seruice. Wherefore hee hastned away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not hee now made great expedition, hee should haue come too late. Neither could he indeede haue bene there in due time; if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence, as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; presenting themselves in order of battaile, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: He thought it would be sufficient, if he could preferre his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea: it should little auaille the Carthaginians; if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden; and, fastning them together with cables, in foue ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge ouer the

the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choise men, with store of Darts and other calling weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces hee left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Yessels, might runne out and back againe vpon any aduantage, or neede: but these he couered with planks; vying the maits and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to ioyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne aunder. Scarcely was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assailing of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnladie, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, aduenturing forth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouer-boine by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them; nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them graping hookes, hanging at Iron chaioes. These they threw vpon the maits and yards which serued as Arches to ioyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all aunder; in such sort that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to saue themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke; but hauing haled away sixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their well-come was greater than their victorie; because among so many precious losses, only this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage, Lelius and Masanissa, in their iourne against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without further contention: but here they staied not: neither in dedde would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past; and, therefore being sollicit for Asarubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But belide the instigation of his beloved wife, the losse of the Masafyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lelius and Masanissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession; bee the title vnto some part neuer to vnail. Hereunto alludes the fable of the yong Kite: which thought that shee had vomited vp her owne guts; when it was only the garbage of some other fowle, that shee had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the yong Kite, beleued the Kingdome of the Masafyli to be part of his entrailes: Lelius and Masanissa will shortly giue him somewhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farr. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King: whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had bene conuerted into strong enmitie; as also to set in his place another, who might doe them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, euen to this day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax: who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though hee could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haist: and few of them had seene the warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small Troupes of Horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemie, came vp with all his Horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouercharged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victorie: some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of Horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their Battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemie, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue back. Herewithall the Legions came in sight; which terrified so the Numidian Horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhappy, that he was cast from his Horse, which receiued a wound; and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsooke the place, and fled: and that their King, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Laelius, that this victorie should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they halted away to Cirta the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome; whither hee himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Laelius agreed. Masanissa comming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arriued, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he preuailed so far that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one stroue to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queene Sophonisba yeelded her selfe into his hands: and vehemently besought him, that she might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beautie, so commended her suit, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that verie day: thereby to preuent Laelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Laelius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously; so that at first he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-entreated by Masanissa, hee suffered the matter to rest awhile as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other Captiues immediatly; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needefull in the Kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune; ministering to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, vnprovoked. He briefly answered, that his wife had moued him so to doe: calling her a Furie, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and flooding great doubt, lest this perilous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as shee had done of Syphax. It was not long ere Masanissa and Lalius came vnto him:

 both of whom together he lovingly welcommed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, shee brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had title to her head; and that shee was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore hee entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memorie of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio; whom he neuerthelessse entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deli-uered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agonie, he called vnto him a seruant of his, that had the custodie of his poison (which Princes then vsed to haue in readines, against all mischances that might make them vwillig to liue): and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife:
 but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preferue her from falling aliue into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the recit of this Message and Present, shee onely said, That if her Husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, shee must accept of this; adding, That shee might haue died more honourably, if shee had not wedded so late. ly before her Funerall. And herewithall shee boldly dranke off the poison. Thus Lalius reports it. But Appian varies from this: and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the precontract betwene Masanissa and Sophonisba. Hee saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Circa met with Lalius and Masanissa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their Citie, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to ex-ceuse her marriage with Syphax; as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power shee was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage: he fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootie belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, shee was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this:
 or if it were true; yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom the might appertaine. Wherefore hee willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein he should haue no wrong. Herewithall hee sent to fetch her away; and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her; but making her acquainted with the necessitie, gaue vnto her a cup of poison, wherewith shee ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So hee shewed vnto the Romans her dead body; which hee royally entered. The sudden violence of Masanissa his loue, and the readie consent of Sophonisba to marrie with him: made not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other eui-dent cause (which Lalius notes) of the sudden falling out betwene him and the Carthaginians; vnder whom he had bin trained vp, & don them great seruice. How soeuer it were: Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could; lest his melancholie should lead him to some inconuenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, hee brought him forth in presence of the Armie: where extolling his noble acts; and shewing how highly hee had deserued of the Citie of Rome, hee proclaimed him King; and gaue vnto to him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the readie way, to diuert his thoughts from the sadde remembrance of that which was paist vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to miſt vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Masaniſſa well deſerued: yet would not the Tiſſo haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should he haue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recouered poſſeſſion of his Countrie, together with the greateſt part of Syphax his Dominions. It ſeemes not vnlike, that had he remained a Neuter in theſe warres, and ſuſtained himſelfe with his Troupe of Horſe, in ſuch ſort as hee did before the comming of the Romans; hee might neuertheleſſe haue recouered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne ſubiects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice bene vniſhed. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deſerued: neither were the Romans then in caſe, to make a conqueſt of Numidia for themſelues; neither could they haue wiſhed a fitter opportunitie, than of ſuch a man, vpon whom to beſtow it, that was their allured friend, and paſſable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masaniſſi were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the ſame Nation. Yet this liberaltie of the Romans, was noyed abroad as verie glorious; and the Romans themſelues, in a politicke ſort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their ſaluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great conſequence. Hee thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mightie in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all ſides; but moſt of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little diſpleaſed. Hence it grew that Vermina the ſonne of Syphax (of whom wee ſhall ſhortly ſpeake more) which held ſome peece of his Fathers Kingdome, deſiring friendſhip of the Romans, and promiſing by all meanes to deſerue their loue, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were ſo, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of ſuit: yet the Roman Senate was punctilious herein; and answered very grauely, That it was not their cuſtome to giue the honour of that appellation, ſaue onely vnto ſuch Kings, as had greatly deſerued of their Citie. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in proceſſe of time grew ſo proud of this their imaginarie prerogative, that they imputed as a ſingular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the ſalutation by that name; though it were not accompanied, with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

The Carthaginians deſire Truce: and breake it.

THe Carthaginians were extremely diſmaied, when they heard of the great calamitie, that was befallen their good friend Syphax; and vnderſtood that Masaniſſa, their mortall enemy, had got poſſeſſion of his Kingdome. To increaſe their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citie: where hee made an end of that Fortification, which hee had begunne at his laſt being there. The Carthaginians, had neither forces, nor courage, to withſtand him: but their hearts ſo failed them, that they ſent forth vnto him thirtie Embaſſadors, Princes of the Citie, which were their Priue Councell, to make ſuit for peace. Theſe being admitted into the preſence of Scipio, did not onely prostrate themſelues on the ground; but kiſſed the feet of him, and of thoſe that ſate in Councell with him.

felled themselves to have vnjustly broken the Peace betwene them and Rome; and to have deserued whatsoeuer punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that, in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subiect, they would heare mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their clemencie; which, by the foliie of her Citizens, had now twice deserued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno and the choice of his companie; who had now their long desired worke in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. 10

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poore case the Citie of Rome then was; and how vnable to defraie the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had monie enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage; though Ytica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them That though he came into Africa, to make a Conquest, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, hee would not denie to grant them the Peace, which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and fugitive slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaulle: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any lland between Italie & Africa: That they should desliuer vp all their ships of warre, saue twentie; and That they should pay a great summe of monie, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barlie. To consider of these Articles, hee gaue them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors vnto the Roman Senate. 20

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the warre had bene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lelius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy; and gaue hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an holy day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their Gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happie successe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome; that they might be bestowed vpon him; who by rendering them to libertie, should doe an act verie plausible that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Masanissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should doe for him; they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captiues; and sent him two purple Callocks, that had each of them one gold button; with such other Presents, as in time of their pouerty might serue to relisue their good will. 30 will. Scarcely were these and Laelius gone from Rome; when the newes came, that Embassadours from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadours were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: untill Laelius being sent for, came backe from Offia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was Peace: but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was onely to winne time, and get respite from warre; untill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italie, either to chase the Romans out of Africk, or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Lucitius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since bene any warre at all, betweene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like fort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italie. This being so: their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale; hearing these Embassadours make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had bene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lucitius, and other passages following betweene the two Cities. But they excused them selves by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gaine time; untill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Laelius; without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate receiuing advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approved the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason be believed: since it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battaile betweene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadours came backe from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Africk, to victualle the Roman Campe, was overtaken by soule weather at Sea; and hardly escaping wracke, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage: which cauled the people to crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a bootie escape them; saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedie desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the Rascalitie, together with women and boyes, to be meddling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out vnder Ashurbanol, to gather vp the dispersed Roman ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recoured the station whereto their Campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage: which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby releued; but for that by this breach of truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Where fore hee sent Embassadours vnto them: both to require satisfaction for the iniurie done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conlude the peace; vpon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That yet, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, and kissed our feet, after an vnusuall manner of humilitie, confessing your selues to haue perfiously broken the league that was betwene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels; should so soone forget what yee then vttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selues worthe to be destroyed, hauing only recourse vnto our merce. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in HANNIBAL that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long he hath bene pent up in a corner of Italie, among the Britains; where he is in a manner besieged, and vnable to stirre: so that yee are like to finde his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Affricke, and readie to giue vs battaile; yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is a man, and not insinible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against hereafter? What gods will yee either sweare by, to be beleued, or call vpon in your miserie? What wordes, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth use, to moue compassion? Surely yee haue already wasted all your forces of persuasion, and shall not againe deceiue vs, if ye refuse the grace, wherof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselues vpbraid with the base demeanour of their Embassadours. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselues: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his Faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadours were verie much delighted, in the rehearsal of that point which was yeilded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians took this in so ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the furie of the multitude was in some sort appeased; eyther by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calls Hanno the great; or by the verie reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberall wordes. So they were dismissed in friendly sort; though it were without answere to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe Conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Nica. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed; or whether directed by publike order, to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safetie; since the Roman Campe was euen in sight. The Embassadours tooke this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselues too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they descended the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose; which was, to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal; they slippt away, and made him ouer-hoor himselfe. Yet hee gaue them chace; and had well-nere surprisid them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shore ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to run their vessell aground: whereby they saued their own liues; though a great part of their companie were slaine, or hurt. This practise of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartened in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victorie, as hauing none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not bene giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort HANNIBAL spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of MAGO in Italie. HANNIBAL and MAGO called out of Italie. How the Romans were diuersly affected by HANNIBALS departure.

Ver since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Country of the Brutians; waiting for another supplie from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Linus, by whom Asdrubal was ouercome and slaine, were contented to bee quiet all their yeare. Neither did Linus the Colleague of Scipio ought wortheie of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul who followed Linus, and Gn. Seruilus Capius, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preferue his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so manie great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemy was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africk, wherein they were at no small charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happie conclusion. They stood neuertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paine among the Ligurians and Gauls to raise an Armie, where with to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe colde. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians; and found them so ready to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Country strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ourcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrie of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Praetors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe wortheie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull fully in such sort that the Roman Commanders beganne to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Praetor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout, and strained themselves hard as if that brunt the victorie should haue beene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the seruice of those beasts being fitter for such vs, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to mannage them. Herby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whole manner of fight was more auailable against those that were loose, than against the Troops that were close and thick. Then fel the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shoure of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gauls, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gauls discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men beganne to shrinke, Hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length hee receiued a greuous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, prouidd every one for himselfe. So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about fise thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Praetors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hotte peece of seruice. Neyther were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. Howeuer it were, this victorie hadt haue much imported for the assurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amitcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by cause iourmies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal shoud presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was readie to bee lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarked shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homeward.

About the same time Hannibal receiued the like command from Carthage to returne into Affrick. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and growning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readie to burst out, whilst the Embassadours were deliuering their errand. When their message was done; Hee told them, That this was yet plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italie, though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled mee to manage the Warre here. Scipio therefore shall not need to bragge, that hee hath draine mee home by the heels: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the House of the Barchines, for lacke of other meanes to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein hee embarked, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as hee could take take he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked, backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and curling his owne dulcnesse, in that he had not led his Armie from Canna, hotte and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit Hee quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

- If it could haue bene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holiday was appointed for thanksgiuing vnto their gods; & extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for joy of such happie tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had bene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countrie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers.
- 20 The remoue of the watre from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Golde and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surprisid it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had bene borrowed in time of more necessitie from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the seuer chastisement, laid vpon those twelue Colonies, that for want eyther of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the
- 30 Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had bene wont to set out for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the verie most of their abilitie. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet suteable to the greatness of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the Battaile at Metaurus; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had bene few dayes since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would bee found a true Propheet. For finding themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Asdrubal no specialitie of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were eyther of those two. The Numidian King had bene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-souldiers, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such souldiors. Likewise Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie, of men hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, slayed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoiles not onely of good souldiors, but of braue Captaines, by them slaine. Such talke vsed the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battaile, with many that had slaine Roman Pretors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had bene first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the seige of Townes; breifly, that that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had euer serued in warre, and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

HANNIBAL in Africke prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vaine, loseth a battaile at Nadagera, and persuades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

ANNIBAL disembarked his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horſe; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Enemy; that he might furnish himselfe with this and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Abrumetum, and so along through the In-Land Countrie; gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tycheus a Nuimidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horſes of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him there fore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should be easie for Masaniſſa, by their countenance and helpe to oppress both him, and as manie other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the fame of him that vied it, prevailed with Tycheus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horſe. Appian further adds, That Mezetulus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masaniſſa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduerse to the Nuimidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Hannibal another thousand Horſe: as likewise that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obedience to Masaniſſa. This Vermina, as we finde in Liuie, came with more than sixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion aliuie, to maintaine their cause by warre. But when they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of *Rome*s magnanimitie to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, cyther good or bad. And to this purpose, they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since hee was General of their forces, He thought it resonable, that they should suffer him to doe as a General ought to doe; and to chooſe his owne times. Neuertheless, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embassadors: and the newes of *Hannibal*s being landed in Africk; made Scipio vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masaniſſa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other buinesca-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masinissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces would little auail him; if Hannibal should driue the Romans out of Africke. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the safetie of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and sixethousand Foot, hee made all haile vnto Scipio.

10 Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadours that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lalius and Fulsius; who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and vnderstood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themselves towards the Roman Embassadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion,

M. Babius one of the late Embassadours that had been in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands vpon them, and detained them; sending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrey, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might bee repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to 20 heare of this; and commanded Babius to vse them with all possible courtesie, and send them safe home. By thus doing He brakethe hearts of his Enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves, (which was a great victorie) farre lesse honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force, and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towne by assault, to put all that came in their way, to the sword, whatsoeuer they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible; and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the verie Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no peece of cruelty; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengefull mindes, for the iniuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Excerpt. 2 P.
16. 11. 10.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trussing them vp, gaue them free leaue to vie w. his Campe at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This 40 done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauerie and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personal conference; and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well; and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in place conuenient. The next day Masinissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him removed vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neare vnto which hee sat downe, in a place other wise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence he sent word vnto the Carthaginians, That the time and place did sitly serue, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemy: where hee encamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generalls, each of them with a troupe of

Horse,

Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well searched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had bene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africa and of Italia; for that the Countries of Sicill and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so manie Fleets as had bene lost, and of so much bloud as had bene shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had bene exposed, by the greedie desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his mind vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yet (said He) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same HANNIBAL, who after my victorie at Cannae wonne the greatest part of Italia: and desired with my selfe, what I should doe with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes insubilitie. I fought with thy Father, SCIPIO: He was the first of the Roman Generalls, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I should haue such businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, wherof shee hath many. And thou maist haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone! Thinke vpon M. ATILIVS if hee would haue hearkened vnto such persuasions, as I now use to thee; he might haue returned home to Rome, an happie man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicill, Sardinia, and whatsoeuer Islands are situate betwene Italia and Africa, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans, to beare Dominion therin? Thou shalt haue glorie enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargaine. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the same consentment of ours, shall make vs fastidiously obserue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too litle, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must vndergoe, for the obtaining of a verie little more, than that which thou maist haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but till to morrow night, and thou maist take such fortune, as it shall please the gods. The issue of battaile is vncertaine; and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele we shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more doe, make peace. And doe not tel me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is HANNIBAL that now desire peace with thee, which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Country. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I haue maintained vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie mee, the Warre by mee begunne. Hereunto Scipio made answere, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicill and in Spaine, which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Namertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to pur on those armes; which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to be most iust. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of infolence, or over-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countreies, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from them by the Romans? If, said Hee, these Conditions had bene propounded wholely as yett detained some part of Italie, they might peradventure not have bene received. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit unto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought mee to deale graciously in being so moderate. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthie of obtaining peace upon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in like sort it concernes me in honour, not to let them bee gainers or savers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransom-free all prisoners that they have of ours; to pay us five thousand Talents; to deliver up their Gallies; and so deliver hostages for assurance of safe dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce, their spoiling of our Fleets; and their violating our Embassadours? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done: then will I take advice with my Council what answer to give you; otherwise, you may enen prepare for warre, and blame your owne selves, for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiours prepare for a battaille, wherein should be decided the quartell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a notable Match, and such as hath very seldom beene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes oppositely unto the void spaces betwene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vsuall, might fall backe betwene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, as it were in file. This Hee did because of the Elephants; whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beastes the danger was lesse, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order; that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, Hee gaue direction, that when they found themselves over-charged, eyther by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betwene the Maniples: and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; thereby leaving roome enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third Battalies, without cloying vpon the way betweene the Maniples, which he desired to keepe open. His Italian Horse he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; saying words not many, but verie forcible. He bade them remember what they had achieved, since their coming into Africke. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victorie in this warre, should make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary; if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neyther was there any place in

Africks

Africk, that would give them shelter; if they fell into the Carthaginians bands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory: vntlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most merciflesse Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, haue neuer bene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front of his Battaille. Next behinde these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercinaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battaille: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interested in the quarrell than were those Mercinaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Laluis, in his own right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians were placed in his left wing against Masaniissa. He was indeede farre too weak for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Mezelullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the foure thousand of Masaniissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leued in the haile of a few daies; and the remainder of those, that had of late bene often vanquished, and accustomed to flie. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritic, to make these his companions alight and serue on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Verrinus the sonne of Siphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteene thousand and vppwards, the most of them Horse: the advantage of number might haue serued wel to supplie all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their severall conditions: promising vnto the Mercinaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with inuitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farr greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundric battailes, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countre. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chased. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, vpon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strue to make good their honour; and to purchase the same of Men inuincible.

Such exhortations vsed the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew near together: the Numidian Horsemen on both sides beganne to skirmish. The Trumpets and other instruments of warre, founded to battaille: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an vncertaine kinde of helpe) those that stood neare vnto the point of the left wing, turned backe for feare: and rann vpon their owne Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masaniissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-allie themselves, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Pelites, whom they

they followed into the spaces betwene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lelusus the same aduantage, that Masinissa had against the Nymidians; which he vsed in like sort. In the meane while, the Battels of foote aduanced, and drew neere together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gaue a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows; and shewed themelues ready, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries receiued no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leued Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired souldiours giue backe, did also themelues retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to thinke themselves betraied: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaille was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head against the enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellows, to turne their armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indifferency, by their owne Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themelues. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily flie. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Runne awaies. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaille, and saue themelues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was couered with such thick heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slippery with bloud: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if hee should fight with that warlike Armie, which he saw before him, remaying yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured to receiue a notable ouerthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite vnto the maine battaile of the Hannibalsians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarij: He placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer he had beene receiued in his life before. All the daies worke till now, seemed to haue beene onely a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betwene these notable souldiours. The Romans were encouraged, by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also farr the more in number. But the old souldiours of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obdinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chose to die vpon the ground, whereon he stood. So that, af-

after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; forasmuch as the returne of Masaniſſa and Lalius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue bene most happye and in a needfull time. Theſe vpon the sudden charged the Hannibalian in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaille there dyed of the Romans fiftene hundred and vpwards: on the Carthaginian side, aboue twentie thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians, was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Liuie reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse; and being enioyned, as hee was, by the state of Carthage to take battaile with such disadvantage, he could worke no maruels. He saued him selfe with a few Horse; and staid not in his iournie, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage, from which he had bene absent fixe and thirtie yeares. At his coming into the Senate He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, resolute to send Embassadours againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arriued, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed vnto Cn. Oſtanius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lalius away to Rome with newes of the victorie, He set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. Hee was encountred on the way by ten Embassadours from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vse the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Oſtanius thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their iournie thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was coming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seemes to haue bene both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that hee hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leauing fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good companie had bene with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should haue bene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day, which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, though it were no great access vnto the former; yet serued well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtie Embassadours from Carthage: whose behauiour though it was more pittifull than it had bene before; yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort bumbled themselves. Neuertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Seruilus Capius, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicill (as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africke, and taken from Scipio the Command

mand of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to reſtraine the ambition of this Conſul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made ſuit for the ſame Province of Africa: and was therein ſo earneſt, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his deſire; yet he needed would be going, procuring onely leave of the Senate, that he being Conſul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hce could haue his Fleet and all things in a readineſſe for the iourne, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and he was onely toſt at Sea with ſoule weather, firſt vpon the Coaſt of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Conſullſhip expired, and ſo he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victorie obtained againſt Hannibal, and that the warre was now euen at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Conſul ſo paſſionate, in deſiring Africa for his Province, That he ſaid he would ſuffer nothing to paſſe in the Senate, vntill he had firſt his wil. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at laſt it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it ſhould be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio ſhould haue command therein by Land, and the Conſul at Sea. The ambition of theſe men, cauſed Scipio to giue the more favourable anſwer vnto the Carthaginian Embaſſadors. Hce willed them to conſider what they had deſerued: and in regard thereof to thinke themſelues wel dealt withall, in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their own Lawes, without appointing any Governour ouer them, or Garrifon to hold them in ſubiectiō; leauiſe alſo vnto them their poſſeſſions in Africa, ſuch as they were at the beginning of this warre. As touching the reſt hee was at a point, That, before he yther granted them Peace or truce, they ſhould make ſatisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whill the late Treatie was in dependence. Hereunto if they would yeeld, then required He That immediately they ſhould deliver vp vnto the Romans all Priſoners, Engelines, and Renegades, that they had of theirs: like wiſe all their Gallies, excepting tenne: and all their Elephants: That they ſhould make no warre at all thenceforth out of Africa, neither yet within Africa, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Townes, goods whatſoener, belonging any wiſe vnto MASANISSA or to any of his Anceſters, which were in their poſſeſſion, ſhould be all by them reſtored vnto him: That they ſhould finde corne for the Roman Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they ſhould pay tenne thouſand Talents of Sijner, in the terme of fiſtie yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obſeruaunce of Conditions, they ſhould giue an hundred hoſtages, ſuch as Scipio would chooſe, being none of them vnder foureteene yeares of age, nor above thirrie.

With theſe conditions the Embaſſadors returned home; and reported theſe vnto the Citie. They were verie vnpleaſing, and therefore one Giſco ſtood vp to ſpeake againſt them: and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they ſhould not conſideend vnto ſuch intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what favourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his ſtanding, by plaine force. Hereat all the people murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by ſuch inſolence of this preſumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, roſe vp and ſpake vnto them: ſaying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwiſe than the cuſtomes of the Citie would allow, for ſmuch as he had been thence abſent euer ſince he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man of ſiue and fortie. Hauing thus exuſed himſelfe of the diſorder, He diſcourſed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perſwaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themſelues; had the demands of the Enemy beene yet more rigorous. Finally vpon good aduice, they reſolued to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand ſiue and twentie thouſand pound weight of Siluer, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Hee gaue injunction, that they should neyther in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yett dismisse any Embassadours to them sent; without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counsailes. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in companie of Scipio his Embassadours; who related vnto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon; that had lately bene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellowes; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betwene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrymen, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africke were kept in bonds by Scipio; might bee released, and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharpe answer. He said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as hee might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sopater: He affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsaile, and verie inward with him; one that serued not for monie, but carried monie with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the aide of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answer: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre hee fought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as he had begonne. For in two maine pointes He had broken the League, that was betwene him and the Romans: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had aided their Enemies against them with men and monie.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Easterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a verie reuerend companie, when they entered into the Senate: and Asdrubal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessitie of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romans side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could hee not altogether excuse the Citie; that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and him selfe might haue had their wils: the Carthaginians, even at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had bene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Pence ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough enough to endure such reproofe of Perjurie, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romans; if their diligence and fortune had beene such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keep the peace hereafter: Astrubal made answer; Euen by the same gods, that are so seuer unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Consul interposing the authority of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to loose the honour, which he purposed to get by making warre in Africke. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which hee had alreadye propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginians Embassadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might visite their Countreimen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransom, and carrie home with them some, that were their especial friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordeined, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would choofe, should be sent ouer into Africke, and be freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was lully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in companie of the tenne Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their comming into Africke, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without anye controuersie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romans, than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines hee beheaded: the Romans hee crucified. About the first payment of their monie, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeares; it was thought meet to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collecting of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Romans yoke had begun to pinch them: so as many, euen of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not restraîne from laughter. For which when he was checked by Astrubal Nadus and tolde, That it worl of all befemed him to laugh, since he had beene the cause why all others did weepe; Hee answered, That laughter did not alwaies proceed from ioy, but sometime from extremitie of indignation. Yet Hee, My Laughter is more reasonable, and lesse absurd, than your teares. For 40 ye should haue wept, when ye gave up your Shippes and Elyphants, and when ye bound your owne hands from the vse of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps vs vnder, and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little monie is wrung out of your private purses, ye haue therof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, That it was the very lesst part of your miserie, for which ye haue shed these teares. Thus discoursed Hannibal vnto those, whotalking the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this greivous disease, accused that Phylition, whose noble endeavours had beene employed in procuring the remedie.

50 Scipio being to take leaue of Africke, produced Masaniissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vnderstoodly. To him also hee consigned ouer those Townes of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein, to say truth, hee gaue him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, and friendship of

Scipio,

Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the desertings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tookes his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His iourney through Italy was no lesse glorious than any Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the city in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether he were dead a while before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous war. But herof wee shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grieuous warre past, whereof the Romans had bene in a manner without hope, that euer they should see Italy free. This made them looke cheerfully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion; and filled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Whereof they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: filling him by the name of that Prouince which he had subdued. This honourable kind of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

The great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath bene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnboundèd; the workes of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependencè vpon the wil of man, we are lesse to wonder, if we find lesse variety: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious vnto human power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wils of sundry men are o-

ner-ruled, in manning the affaires of our daily life. It may be obserued in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thousand foote and three score thousand horse; but sayling in their intended conquest, they became subiect within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Serxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such numbers of men, as might haue seemd resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leasure from intestine war deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old souldiours, had vndertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the illustre might, in humane reason, haue bene farre different. Yet would it then haue bene expedient for them, to employ the travell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vsed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyons, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-vnderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noise, aduention to prouoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foyled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Serxes, and before him (as I take it) Ezibero Asch, had stumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirat hath dasht his foot. Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of make, and a better souldier than any other Greckish King, when he entred into war against the Romans. This war he vnderooke as it were for his mindes sake: hauing receiued no iniurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that serued vnder him, to prouaile so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicill and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to be of richer metall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirat (his Elephants and whatsoever else had serued to make him terrible) serue onely to make the Romans; in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves.

* For since they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compass of twelue yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had won?

40 Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion, by some good meanes, the whole Countrey of Greece: all the rest, thus done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skillful Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Tentis made at the same time cruell war vpon the Greekes: waisting their Countrey, and sieking their Townes, onely because they were vnable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queene was not slow to giue them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with

Her,

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the loue of Greece they had vnderaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards increased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose busines with them being now the subiect of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first A&tions.

It was like to proue a busie time in the world, when, within the space of foure yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countreies knowne; and three of them yong boies, in three of the greatest kingdomes. This happened from the third yeere of the hundred thirte ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Aegypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being sixteene or seuentene yeeres old, receiued the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens and most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countreies about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia. Eyurgus found means to make himself King ouer the Lacedemonians, whose Common-weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaens, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebel vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the state of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeeres of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open warre brake out betwene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italye. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shal speake hereafter, when the Romans finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an ealie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue beene to the Spartan; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Aetolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. These Aetolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians, that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vnjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoile of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly; because the Aetolians, passing without leaue through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Old Aratus could ill abide these Aetolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries, wherewith most vngratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that he could hardly endure to stay a few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prator of the Achaens for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage; and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath bene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrie, whererein he might easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie.

So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achaens; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Aetolians invaded Peloponnesus againe; having no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulfe of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There ioynd with them in this their second Inuasion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke adventures againe, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of

- 10 the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, hauing gotten what they could else-where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Aetolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater hauocke in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any resistance.

- Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were delirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy reuenge: there were that vrged to haue some grieuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedaemonians: who were thought vnder-hand to haue fauoured the Aetolians, in meere despite of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately bene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedaemonians had bene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they shew such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they wel commit themselves to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from coming to them with an Armie: since their towne was lately much disquieted with ciuill discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant alwaies to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did misse vnderstand the Lacedaemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Boetians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Aetolians: and desiring to haue war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Aetolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some conuenient time: if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should beholden at Rhium for that purpose: whether if it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day.
- 40 But when the Aetolians vnderstood this for certainty, they adiourned the Council vnto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, saue in the great Parliament of all Aetolia. This tricke of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserued it, made election of Scopas to be their Pretor, that was Author of these inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a sort, vpon whom they must haue laied the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifed it from the publick

- After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises: whom he easily won from the Aetolian side, forasmuch as the Aetolians had coufened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the war in their owne Country, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedaemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves & to denounce war vnto the Aetolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they receiued

diuerſe anſwers, according to the qualities of thoſe with whom they dealt. The Aetolians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a ſmall Nation, and bordering vpon the Aetolians, of whom they ſtood in continual danger; ſaid, that they could not honeſtly reſuſe to ſhew their faithfull meaning in that war, which was concluded by generall aſſent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheleſſe more cunning and reſerued: ſo that they ſtood vpon a needleſſe point; and deſired to be held excuſed, vntill Philip (of whoſe meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) ſhould firſt proclaim the war. The Meſſenians, for whoſe cauſe the warre was vnder taken, excuſed themſelues, by reaſon of a Towne which the Aetolians held vpon their borders; and ſaid, that they durſt not be over-bold, vntill that bridle were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedaemonians; the chief of them ſtudied onely how to mannaage that treaſon, for which their City had bene ſo lately pardoned: and therefore diſmiſſed the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, without any anſwer at all. They had three yeeres together continued ſubiect againſt their wiſt to the Macedonians, expecting ſtill when Cleomenes ſhould returne out of Egypt to raigne ouer them againe; and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they choſe not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of theſe there were ſome, that thought the publicke ſafety to conſiſt, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preferred them: And hereto they referred all their counſailes; being perhaps not a little moued with reſpect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themſelues, by adhering firmly to thoſe which at the preſent bore rule ouer them. Others, and thoſe the greater part, were ſtill deuiling, how to make all ready for Cleomenes againſt his returne; and therefore fought to ioyne with the Aetolians, which were the moſt likely to giue him ſtrong aſſiſtance. The Macedonians faction had the more authority, and durſt more freely ſpeake their mindes; but the contrary ſide was the more paſſionate; and ſpared not by murders, or any other violent courſes, to ſet forward their deſire. Neither did it ſuffice, that about theſe times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which theſe intended: fancying vnto themſelues the glory of their Anceſſors in ſuch Ages paſt, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moſt able man to reſtore them vnto their greatneſſe and luſtre; which once he had in a manner performed: But ſince he was dead, and that, without iniury to his well-deſeruing vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and thoſe of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without ſuch helpes, they muſt continue little better than ſubiects vnto the Macedonian, and far leſſe by him reſpected, than were the Achaens. Thus were they transported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moſt working ſpirits among them, procured the Aetolians to ſend an Embaſſie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durſt haue made himſelfe the Author. Much diſputation and hot there was, betweene thoſe of the Macedonian partie and theſe their oppoſites: in ſuch wiſe that nothing could be concluded; vntill by maſſacre or baniſhment of all, or the chiefe, that ſpake againſt the Aetolians, the diuerſitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedaemonians and Aetolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaens; who had ſpared the Cite, when they might haue deſtroyed it. Then alſo they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was ſo nice, and ſo regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the chooſing of the one King; that we may iuſtly wonder, how they grew ſo careleſſe in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royall families they found Agelipolis the ſonne of Agelipolis the ſon of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his Grandfather. This Agelipolis was a yong boy, ſtanding in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet becauſe the Law required, that the ſonne, how yong ſouer, ſhould haue his fathers thers whole right and title: the Lacedemonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law; that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vncle Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime; but made election of one Lycurgus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdom, bestowed vpon each of the Ephori a Talent, and thereby made himselfe to be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Parrifans, and to sprinne his worth by Action; invaded the Countrie of the Argiues: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and wanne diuers Townes; wherof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedaemon. After such open hostilitie, the Lacedemonians declared themselves on the Aetolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Achaens.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Achaens and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not readie; the Epirots gaue vncertaine answer: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselves and the poore Acarnonians, whom the Aetolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedaemonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Aetolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surpris'd the Towne of Argira: which if they could haue held, they shoud thereby grievously haue molested the Achaens; for that it stood in the mid-way betwene Argium and Sicyon two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrie. But as Argira was taken by surpris: so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile, whilest they that should haue made it their first care to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedlesly to ransack private houses, and thereby gaue the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Aetolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; waiting all the Territorie of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achaean Confederacie. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so wel beaten that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe vnto their Pretor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achaens hauing lately bene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had couciously with-held part of their due from those that seru'd them therein. So through this disability of the Achaens, and insufficiency of their Pretor, the Dymeans, with others, were driuen to with hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike seruice, and to conuert the monie to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedemonians, began to winne vpon the Arcadians; that they should confederate with Philip and the Achaens.

Philip came to the borders of the Aetolians, whilst their Armie was thus employ'd a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the seige of a Frontier towne, which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambrycia. There he spent fortie dayes, ere he could end the business, which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the hart of Aetolia at his first coming; it was thought that he might haue made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunitie of Associates, to haue their own delites fulfilled, conuerts the preparations of great Kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their maine deffignes. Thus was our King Henrie the eight led aside, and quite out of his waie, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Tournay: at such time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the strong Citie of Terwin was lost, and that of his Cavallerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The day that Philip made at Ambraeus, did wondrously embolden the Aetolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Countrey; and therewith not onely to ouer runne Theffalitie, but to make impression into Macedon. Hee ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Aegean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, Hee rooke, and razed to the ground. Hee spared neyther Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, he threw downe the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honored by his Countreine at his returne; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambraeus, made a strong inuasion vpon Aetolia. Hee tooke Ploetia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Panimum, Elaus, and diuers other Townes and Castles of theirs: of which hee burnt some, and fortified others. Hee also beat the Aetolians in sundrie skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrey ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Straights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently sollicited by the Achaean Embassadours: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were readie with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrey. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hemus from the Northerne part of Macedon; and were accustomed to secke bootie in that wealthie Kingdome, when they found their owne times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourne into Peloponnesus: they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey; as had bene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to dismisse the Achaean Embassadours, (whom hee should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeare. So Hee rooke his way home: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Dofon, in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose Counsailler he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, to wardes which they were already on their way.

All that Sommer following the King rested at Larissa in Theffalitie, whilest his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Aetolians rested not. They auenged themselves vpon the Epnots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Aetolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vntill another yeare was laid aside; Philip stole a iourne into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horse. As soone as hee was within Corinth; He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried forth of his arriual. He sent priuily for old Stratus to come thither vnto him: with whom hee tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achaean Souldiours readie to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with some-

- somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horses; little thinking to meeete with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to feare; since the Achaens them selves were not a ware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Aetolians, and their fellows, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first coming, Philip got verie much reputation: as likewise hee purchased both reputation and loue, by auers actions immediately following. He wanne Psophis, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadis; which the Eleans and Aetolians then held. Hee wanne it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemy, not beleeuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeare, was careless of providing euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preserued by the King from sack, and giuen to the Achaens, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lafion, which yeelded for verie feares; hearing how easily he had taken Psophis. This Towne also hee gaue to the Achaens. The like liberalitie he vsed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So hee came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes; Hee proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Aetolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-deferuing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattail hee tooke, with great numbers of flaes, and much wealth of all fotts; such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some presented the labour of his iourne, by sending Embassadors to yeeld before hee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to set themselves at libertie, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patroage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Aetolian Captaines; because they distrusted their abilitie to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpnesse of Winter would suffer him to slay there dayes. Faine he would haue fought with the Aetolians: but they made such hast from him, that he could not ouertake them, vntill they had couered themselves within the Towne of Samieum; where they thought to haue beene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that hee made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this Expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then remoued to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.
- 40 Before the Kings arriual in Peloponnesus, the Lacedaemonians with Lycorgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Acadia; and threatened to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycorgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which hee could buy with monie: so was hee neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealouities, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall bloud, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by
- 50 propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. He wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycorgus urgus his house: who perceiuing the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their mindes being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst he was vniing his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So hee liued afterwards among the Achaens a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to driue our his fellow-King yong Aggesipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such sort as once he should haue bene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue bene defended; yet rather than to aduerture himselfe into iudgement, he chose to flie for a time, and sojourne among his friends the Etolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne furmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not bee in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that hee chased Aggesipolis out of the Citie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vipers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three verie justly deserued. Whatsoeuer hee was to wards some priuate Citizens: in the war against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countreys good.

§. II.

How PHILIP was misleadisid by ill Counsaillers: Who afterwards wrought treason against him, and were iustly punished. He inuaded the Etolians a second time: And forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted vnto them.

Whilst the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following; some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently their own greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Deseon had left vnto Philip such Counsaillers, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. The cheife of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if he could reduce the Achaens vnto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians liued. To bring this to passe; during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaens out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to helpe their fellowes; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habire of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vniust that pleased the King. But these Achaens were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereof if they could haue bene contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them them in the warre against Cleomenes: They bemoaned themselves vnto old Aratus, and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King, as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King be followd gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choller for a time. He thought so well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside, being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head, since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Achaens there were some, who bore no heatie affection to Aratus. These he enquired out: and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court, promising to become their especial friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Achaens, and, as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achaens, and all other Peloponnesians, bee quickly brought to conforme themselves, vnto the dutie of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, He drew the King to be present at Aegium, where the Achaens were to hold election of a new Pretor. There with much more labour, than would haue bene needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King, by faire words and the eatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a vice insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Favorites, was chosen Pretor, instead of one more worthe for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Paras and Dyma, to a verie strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yielded it vp for feare, at his first comming: where of hee was glad; for that hee had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymaens, as hee presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he had of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrie the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vnderooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Etolians, and joyne with him vpon reasonable termes. If they could be cōtented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That he would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forcin inuasion; and that they should hold their libertie entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrie: then began the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleene such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breeda mutual diffidence betweene them and the Etolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him Prisoner into Etolia. But hee perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marrailling what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made vnto them

30 by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsaillor, thereby tooke occasion for to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be verie præjudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonians; And this was the true cause, why neyther Amphidamus was verie carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie; deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee sent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already conuicted. And when hee had said all the rest, ere yther Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaens; and therein hauing made it knowne what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your selues. Olde Aratus grauely admonished the King; That whensoever hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth; He should forbear a while to giue credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and hee should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a verie absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yes, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles deliaed to bring in the prooffe, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when hee found no better than a meere deuce against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The varesfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. Hee betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Arati so laying of them he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimney; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtile workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Tarqueters, and Megalas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to be at Apelles his disposition. This Politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumination and priue detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vsed more finnesse, loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such art he thought to haue removed him, as wee say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe, and sought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Pretor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the Kings; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilest Philip wanted both the monie and the Corne, wherewith he should haue bene furnished by the Achaens. This made the King understand his owne error, which he wisely sought to reforme betimes. Hee perswaded the Achaens to rejourne their Parliament from Argium, to Sicyon the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: perswading them to forget what was past; & laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthe men, Hee easilie obtained what he would of the Achaens. Fiftie talents they gave him out of hand, with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, he should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might invade the Aetolians, Eleans, and Lacedemonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; euen by the ministerie of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entered into conspiracie with Leontius and Megalas: binding himselfe and them by oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing they thought to bring it to passe, that verie want of abilitie to doe any thing without them, should make him speake them faire; and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilest he was a child: and therefore these wise men perswaded themselves, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their owne misgouernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needes goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two fraid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readines: Philip made countenance, as if he would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Aetolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would haue fallen, as soone after it did, vpon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leaue the Achaens, with some part of his and their Mercinaries. Hee himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephalonia: whence the Eleans, dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palaea, that had bene very seruicable to the Enemy against him and his Confederate; and might be very vsfull to him, if hee could get it. Whilest hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fiftene ships of war from Sceerdlaidas; and many good footdiets, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts laue one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he ouerthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targetiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his covenant with Apelles, did both willfully forbear to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slaine; not of the worst soldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this: but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Townes-men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed, and vncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrie. The Messenians all eadged, that Lyseurgus was busie in waiting their Coniecture: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etesian windes which then blew, seruing fitly for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carrie him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-daies) and make him spend the Sommer

Sommer to small purpose. But Stratus gave better counsaile, and prevailed. Hee shewed how visiting it were, to let the Ætolians ouer-run all Theffalite againe, and some part of Macedoz, whilest the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small adventures. Rather, he said, that the time now serued well to carry the war into Ætolia; since the Prator was gone thence abroad on routing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lyceurgus; hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achaens were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King lets saile for Ætolia; and enters the Bay of Ambrocia, which diuided the Ætolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vp into the in-land Countrie: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retrait; He passed on to Thermum; which was the Receptacle of the Ætolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with roockie Mountains of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Ætolians vse to hold all their chief meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their sollemne games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careless in looking vnto it. When Phillip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there was nothing else to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that he thought the paines of his iourne well recompenced. So hee loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging vnto the Ætolians; in remembrance of the like their courtesie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue bene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Antonieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him; which that they would doe, he beleued before; and therefore was not taken vnawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laid a Counter-ambush for them of his Ilyrians; who slaying behind the rest, did set vpon the backs of the Ætolians, whilest they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also waisting the Countrey round about him, Hee safely carried all that hee had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Ætolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their verie gates.

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euerie way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleus. They came, because they could not chooſe: but their heauie looks argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It greued them to thinke, that they should be able to giueno better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings bynesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. The sorrow and indignation, which they could ill dissemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselves with drinke, into open riot. Finding Stratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reculing him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleus, and another with him, came. The King began to raze them for their disorder; and they, to give him froward answers: inſomuch as they ſaid at length, That they would neuer give out, till they had rewarded Aratus with a miſchiefe as he deſerved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targetters at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megaleas, yea and to caſt him into priſon? Why, ſaid the King, It was I. This reſolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both ſad and angry, ſeeing himſelfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leſſe touching Leontius, that ſtood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accuſed. In concluſion, the preſumptions againſt him were ſo ſtrong, and his answers thereto ſo weak; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crinon being remanded backe to priſon; and Leontius becoming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip diſpatched well a great deale of buſineſſe this yeere. For as ſoone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition againſt the Lacedemonians. Theſe and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponneſus; whileſt the King was abſent. The Achaens had oppoſed them as well as they could; with ill ſucceſſe: yee ſo, as they hindered them from doing ſuch harme as elſe they would haue done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrie about Lacedemon: and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleue that he was returned out of Ætolia. Hee tooke not in this expedition any Cities, but made great waite in the fields: and hauing beaten the enimie in ſome ſkirmiſhes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, ſlaues, and other Countrie-ſpoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embaſſadors from the Rhodiens & Chians: that requeſted him to ſet Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and hee willed them to deale firſt with the Ætolians; who, if they would make the ſame requeſt, ſhould not finde him vnreaſonable. The Ætolians had ſped ill that yeere: neither ſaw they any likelie hopes for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had ſent forth to waite Theſſalie and Macedon, found ſuch oppoſition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane ſeaſon they had beene grieuouſly afflicted, as beſore is ſhewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrie. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes againſt them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedemonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of theſe their Peloponneſian friends ſhould be able to hold out; ſince they were not ſtrong enough to keepe the field, but had alreadie ſuffered thoſe miſeries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each, to ſecke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readilie entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King; dealt with him by interceſſion of the ſame Embaſſadours, to entreat his preſence at a Diet of their Nation, that ſhould be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchſafe to come, they promiſed that hee ſhould finde them conformable to any good reaſon.

Whileſt theſe things were in hand; Leontius and Megaleas thought to haue terrified the King, by railing ſedition againſt him in the Armie. But this deuice ſorted to no good effect. The ſouldiours were eaſily and quickly incenſed againſt many of the Kings friends; who were ſaid to be the cauſe, why they were not rewarded with ſo much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger ſpent it ſelfe in a noiſe, and breaking open of doores; without further harme done. This was enough to informe the king (who eaſilie pacified his men with gentle words) that ſome about him were verie falſe. Yea the ſouldiours themſelues, repenting of their inſolence, deſired to haue the Authors of the tumult fought sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made them as if hee had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were sore afraid, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Archetect of their treason; requesting him speedilie to repaire to Corinth, where he might stand betweene them and the kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while bene wanting to the businesse, vnderaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was he growne into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themselves vnto him; and received from him their dispatch in euerie busines. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles; making slight mention (onely for fashion sake) of the king: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in manning the kings affaires, he made his especial care, that monie, and all things needfull for the publicke seruice, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the king, for verie neede, to sell his owne Plate and household velleils: thinking to resolute these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, be ruled vnto what I mee, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the king would giue assent; then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his iournie from Chalces in the Isle of Euboea, to the Citie of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetche in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captaines and soukdiours; which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the Citie with a goodly traine; he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride; and had vehement suspicion of his fallshood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should waite awhile, or come another time, for the king was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretie thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants for sake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him saue his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megaleas to looke vnto himselfe, and runne away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurian his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to doe some peece of seruice; but in deed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to trial before their returne: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they said that they were readie to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiours, made Philip more hastie than else he would haue bene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote vnto the Aetolians; viliifying the king with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out awhile, for that Philip was euen readie to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the king vnderstood mote perfectly the fallshood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore hee sent one to pursue Megaleas, that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megaleas also, neither daring to stand to trial, nor knowing whither to flie, was wearie of his owne life, and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Aetolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonnage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought verie effectually to ward their overthrow;

ouerthrow; they grew verie desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and readie to lay hold vpon all advantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Magaleus, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by the Kings Targetters; they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhym. Of this was Philip nothing sorie. For being in good hope throughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre should rest vpon themselfes. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay a 10 fide all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; when he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian souldiours, by yielding to let them winter in their owne Countie. In his returne homeward, he called into iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the map worthe to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vsie to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

20 the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome when hee had thus provided for safetie of his owne, the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Egypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former solicitation about the Peace. This fashion had bene taken vp in matters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countie at libertie: No sooner was any Province or Citie in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of war, but presently there were found intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad

30 sought to binde vnto them those people, that were, howsoever weak in numbers, yet verie good souldiours. But hereby it came to passe, that the more forward sort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to fallhood and roberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, Theloue of Greece would be sufficient to redecme their quiet. They had, since the late Treatie of peac, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achaens, and standing in feare to be more foundlie beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestlie than before to make an end of the warre as soone as they might. Philip made such offer to the 40 Embassadors, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue no occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first be dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whether himselfe would re- turne such answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daileie got by the warre. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battaile at Trafymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly

50 encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naspaetus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing war between them- selves selues: without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrey should be at peace within it selfe: and that Phillip, if he were desirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly seeruing, to enlarge his dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie. Such aduice could the Etolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatning them at hand: but being soone after wearie of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their owne good counsell, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, wherby they brought themselves and the whole Countrey, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrey) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

PHILIP, at the persuasion of DEMETRIUS PHARIUS, enters into League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betwene HANNIBAL, and PHILIP.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Phillip, to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which he toynd in League with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had other wife beene farre more expedient for Phillip, to haue supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of cheife place in his freindship. The issue of the counsaile which he followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Etolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place as belonging vnto the second Punick warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betwene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthie to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to haue been inserted into a more busie peece.

We shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtiltie, VVe shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Townes, and Hauens, with which VVe haue already league and freindship. VVe also shall be enemies to the enemies of King PHILIP, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which VVee haue already league and freindship. The war that VVe haue with the Romans, haue Ye also with them, vntill the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. Ye shall aide Vs with those things whereof VVe haue neede, and shall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer freindship, VVe shall make freindship in such wise that Ye shall be partakers of the same freindship, VVith Condition, That they shall not haue power to make war vpon you: Neither shall the Romans bee Lords ouer the Corcyreans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Partibini, nor Arintania. They shall also render vnto DEMETRIVS PHARIVS all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make war vpon Ye or Vs; We will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue neede. The same shall be obserued in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings,

Kings, Cities, and States, with whom VVe hold already league and friendship. To this League if VVe or Ye shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIII.

- 10 How PHILIP yielded to his naturall desires, being therein soothed by DEMETRIUS PHARIUS. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punicke warre. He poisoneth APPELUS: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

- 20 Itherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, he might haue offered his freindship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath bene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking thoroughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him, euen as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudie, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listig to doe what hee ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in
- 30 men such a good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Heereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if hee might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and
- 40 more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, hee supplanted Apelles: that the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a verie hote Faction among the Messeniens, betwene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forrein war) vnto domesticall objects: than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In proesse of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strue any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messeniens as repaired vnto him. He asked the Governours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heades of the popular pular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be oppressed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to go roundly to worke, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Oratours, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the People tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediatly found out. Neyther did the younger Aratus forbear, to tell him of it in publick, with verie bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand where in hee should need the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Itbome, that was ouer Messene. There he pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vses; for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which hee had already, commaunded the entrance into that Countie. Whilst hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; Hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being no win possession of this place, hee should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a little; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou bee a Southsayer, thou maist goe thy wayes, and let slippe this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the oportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake, resembling Itbome and Aerocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Itbome, Hee must loose all the other Castles that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betwene Him and the Arati; whom hee thought more forward than becomed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as hee plainly discouered his Tyrannous purposes: so like wise hee perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had become dishonest with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countreiman, and a temperate Prince, hee had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him companie. In this iourne He found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnbonest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But He would needes haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will, Hee seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of setting the countrey, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench; vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. While hee was thus labouring to bind the hands that should haue fought for him in Italy: M. Vletrius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

10 This began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in place whereto it belonged. In manning wherof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, Hee made it apparant that hee was a vicious King. Hee had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another iourne into their Countrey, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not hastie to trust him too faire. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprife. In this attempt vpon Messene hee lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his 20 Counsaillor, and Flatterer, not his perorter; as appares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worke that he sped, the more angrie hee waxed against those, that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministerie of Taurion, his Lieutenant, hee poysoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, hee poysoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue bene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselves were more sure, than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymmes, and Processions, to be celebrated euerie yeare twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be 30 translated into the number of the Gods. Hereunto they are said to haue bene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to haue bene true; since the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achaens a maruailous dislike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsaile for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or belieued: neither were they in case to subfist, without his help that had committed it. The Aetolians were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were soone
40 diuulged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make; namely, That the Aetolians should haue the countrey and townes; but the Romans the spoile, and carrie away the people to sell for slaues. The Achaens, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make streight alliance with the Aetolians, as knowing their vnciuill dispositions; were much the more auerfe from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauock of the Countrey. The same consideration moued also the Lacedaemonians, to stand off awaile, before they would declare themselves for the Aetolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industrie therefore of Philip, and the great care
50 which he seemed to take of the Achaens his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymeans, by an inestimable benefit: recouering their Towne, after it had bene taken by the Romans and Aetolians; and redeeming their people wherefoeuer they might bee found, that had bene carried away

Captive, and sold abroad for slaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past, if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not alhamed, He tooke Polyxena the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time for of that which happened in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make repetition.

Of PHILOPOEMEN General of the Achaens: and MACHANIDAS, Tyrant of Lacedemon. A battaile betweene them, where MACHANIDAS is slaine.

IT happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discouers the verue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopomen: 20 whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achaens redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopomen: who being then a yong man, and having no command; did especial seruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Selasia against Cleomenes. Thence forward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldome or neuer at peace betweene themselves; Hee bettered among them his knowledge, and practise in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: 30 wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, traouailing with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all peeces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of seruice, that hee made the Achaens verie strong in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prator or General of the Nation, Hee had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the 40 Achaens to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparrell, household stuffe, and curious farr, and to bestow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiors; and suteable in behaviour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast farre off: that were vsfull in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hattie Expedition; whereto Aratus had bene most accustomed. But when they came to handie strokes, they were good for nothing: so as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercinaries. Philopomen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightily, to vse a larger kind of sheild, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for seruice at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order; and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deepe as had bene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the seruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which hee first was Prator of the Achaens; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedemon caused him to make triall, how his souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successor vnto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a strong Armie of Mercinaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to hold 50 the the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Achaens, that were fauourers of libertie; but to strengthen himselfe by freindship of the Aetolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedaemon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argines, Achaens, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Aetolian Faction. Verie vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recovering the Maitrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne securitie, and no small hope of good that would follow, suitered not Machaniidas to beidle; but made him alwaies readie to fall vpon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilet they were enforced, by greater necessitie, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had vsually made him fall of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Achaens; and thought his owne men better souldiours than were theirs.

Whilet Philip therefore was busied els-where, hee entred the Countrie of the Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger freindes, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopomen was readie to entertaine him at Mantineas; where was fought betwene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the fielde vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopomen sent forth his light-armature a good way before him, so as Machaniidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continuall supplie, till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaens and of Machaniidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so far aduanced, each before their owne Phalaxes, that it could no otherwisc be discerned which prest forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machaniidas his Engines made vsferuicable, by the interposition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courages wherewith usually the hired souldiours of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which liue oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best fight (as it were) to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne seruitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his insolperitie, haue good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their owne, whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellows, will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him stand in neede of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as hauing more subjects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seeke to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Achaens, being forced to giue ground, were wraged so violently in their retreat by those of Machaniidas, that shortly they beooke themselves to flight; and could not be staid by any persuasions of Philopomen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Achaens. This disaster had bene sufficient to take from Philopomen the honour of the day; had hee not wisely obserued the demeanour of Machaniidas, and found in him that error which might restore retire the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gaue chace vnto those that fled: leauing behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedemonians; whom he thought sufficient to deale with the Achaens, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight: Philopomen aduanced towards the Lacedemonians that stood before him. There lay betweene them atwart the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedemonians aduentered ouer it, as thinking themselues better fouldiers than the Achaens; who had in a manner alreadie loit the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaille; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Achaens, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrinke: so as Philopomen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopomen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Machanidas had done. He suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chace, looked verie heauily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustie Troupe of Horse about him hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achaens in disorder; and to set vpon their backs, as they were carelesly pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie saw Philopomen readie to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, which way he might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discouered by his purple Gaslocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopomen therefore leauing the charge of the bridge vnto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaille on the Lacedemonians side about foure thousand; and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achaen Mercenaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should haue need.

§. VI.

PHILIP having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victorie the Achaens learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after awhile (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of warre inferior to any, that should haue brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, hee made no great vse of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Aetolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or verie nearely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achaens would haue done him seruice; they must, by helping him to oppresse others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with them selues. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Aetolians in warre against him.

- This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble man, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetarus his Vncle: who being gueldd, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more clemenc: as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wives or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lyfimachus King of Thrace. Lyfimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truit with his monie and accompts: But when at length he stood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant: He fled into Asia, where he seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lyfimachus. The towne and monie, together with his owne seruice, He offered vnto Seleucus the first, that then was readie to give Lyfimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleucus hauing slaine Lyfimachus, died shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Philetarus or his monie. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue been a poore Carter; and the younger perhaps was not much better; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetarus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his advantage of the dissension, betwene Seleucus Callinius and Antiochus Hierax the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes; and wan the victorie. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that serued under his Enemy, he vfed a pretie deuice. He wrote the word VICTORIE vpon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off: and when the hoteliour of the beatt that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainly fore-lheuing that the gods would be assistant in that Battaille.
- After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to reconer from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally when he had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a surfeit of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom wee now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the youngest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an vnder-taking Prince, verie bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grieuouly molested by Achæus: who setting vp himselfe, as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his owne Citie of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Teltesages, a Nation of the Gauls, whom hee called ouer out of Thrace, He recoured all that he had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themselves, without invitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Wherevnto when he had condescended; they incurthelesse within a while after inuaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vfed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the sworne of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellepont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuerthelesse, presuming afterwards vpon their strength; they forced their neighbur Princes and Citie to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserued of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following, ing, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill vnto the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritie of such, as had sused themselves and their Prouinces, in the slothful reigne of the Persians, or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were verie ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrey was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it ouer to his ofspring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian 10 Empire; and are said to haue issued from the royall house of Achemenes. The Phlagonians deriued themselves from Phlamenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves vnto the times, were alwaies conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bithynia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonian way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calanus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrey; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they flourish, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom wee haue already some- 20 times mentioned.

The Towne of Cius taken by PHILIP, at the instance of PRASIAS King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, PHILIP grows hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by ATTALVS King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodiens.

PRASIAS as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected. He therefore strengthened himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip, as Attalus, on the contrary side, entered into a strict Confederacie with the Etolians, Rhodiens, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Etolian warre, and was deuiuing with Antiochus about sharing betwene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomee Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Cians, and bestow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor just matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and there withall rich. Philip came; and as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilest hee lay at the seige, from the Rhodiens, and diuers other States: entreating him to forsake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condiscend to their request; when he intended nothing lesse. At length hee got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation he had flemmed so regardfull, He omitted no part of crueltie. Hereby hee rendered himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his Fact was detested of the Rhodiens: who had made vehement intercession for the poore Cians; and were aduertised by Embassadors of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howsoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as soone as hee listed: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodiens, Hee was contented to

gine it over. And by this his clemencie the Embassadours said, that he would manifest vnto the World, what slanderous tongues they were; which noysed abroad such reports, as went of his fallhood and oppressions. Whilest the Embassadours were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had happed: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Towne of Civros, and, after a cruell slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians rooke this in great despight, no lesse were the Aetolians inflamed against him: since they had lent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moued, with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne estate. He had much to loose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchaling with much liberalitie the loue of the Athenians, which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, hauing lost their owne. On the freindship of the Aetolians he had cause to presume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held verie good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, Hee easily drew into a straight Alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceiued against Philip.

- Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all in the readie assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open warre. It had bene vnseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemie tended; since his desire to fasten vpon Asia was manifest, and his fallhood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battaile rooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the shore: Yet forasmuch as Hee had suffered farre greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemie: and since Hee durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victorie was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwarde besieged and wanne some Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to despight his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull desire of conquest; it is vncertaine. The stratageme, by which hee wonne Prinassus, is worthie of noting. Hee attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth so stonie, that it resisted his worke, Hee neuerthelesse commaunded the Pyoners to make a noyse vnder ground, and secretly in the night-time Hee rayed great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went meruailously forward. At length he sent word to the Townemen, that by his vnder-myning, two acres of their wall stood onely vpon wooden props: to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercie. The Prinassians little thought, that hee had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had bene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-faced; and gaue vp the Towne as lost, which the Enemie had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stae to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make hast back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

D. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against PHILIP. The Athenians, upon slight cause, proclaime warre against PHILIP, moued thereto by ATTALUS; whom they flatter. PHILIP winnes diuers Townes:
and makes peremptorie answer to the Roman Embassadour. The furious resolution of the Aegypti.

THese Asiaticke matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ser-ued well to make a noyse in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedonia, at least with a conceipt that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay betwene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were factious, and seldom or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euer since the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betwene him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because Hee was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had bene most beholding vnto him, were neuertheless wearie of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Countrey were such, that euerie petty Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generalitie. But the poore Commonaltie of Rome, had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that greivous warre with Hannibal: wherein they had giuen by Loane to the Repub-like all their monie: neyther had they as yet receiued, neyther did they receive vntill fifteene or sixteene yeares after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest awhile, and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M.
Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous e-nemie, that solicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Aetolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of fill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than him selfe. Hee was too vnskilfull, or other wise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would hee needes bee seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he desired to haue them: for hee offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to haue strained his forces to the utmost in making warre vpon them; or, in desisting from that injurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But Hee, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most natural,

natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they think themselves iustly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that he might wel be secure of the Romans, because of the written Couenants of peace between him & them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can be held inuiolable, saue onely* by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it bindes one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent that hee shall bee a looser who flirts from the Conditions, it may so long (and so long onely) bee presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkned after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace

10 with Carthage, then was this Riuer of Styx dried vp: and then could they sweare, as * Mercure did in the Comedie, by their owne selves, euen by their good swords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopater into Affricke, and the present warre against Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

* Plant. Xenophon.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Territory, tooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acartonia entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous superstition, vainly said to bee auailable vnto felicitie after this life) discouered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Herevpon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by mere error, not thinking to haue therein done amiss; yet, as it had bene for some hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrymen at home tooke this in ill part, and sought to reuenge it as a publike injury, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip two Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Africa: who waisted it with fire and swords; and carried thence away with them a great bootie. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe.

30 All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadours to King Attalus; gratulating his happie successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because He understood, that the Roman Embassadours, hauing about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they reioycing that he continued enemie to Philip; and He being no lesse glad, when hee heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came forth of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wiues and children, in as solemne pompe as they could deuise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in verie louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obseruance, which their flatterie could suggest. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused him selfe; saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliuer in writing, what he would haue to bee proponed. Hee did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what hee had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed between him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation

50 vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest Hee with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and readie to take their part: which if they now refused to doe. He protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaim the warre, as He to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours:

and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodiens they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodiens free Citizens of Athens.

Thus beganne a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodiens taking all vpon them. But while these were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Attolians to their partie: that contrarie to their olde manner were glad to bee at quiet: Philip waerne the Townes of Maronea and Enus, with many other strong places about the Hellepont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellepont, Hee laid siege vnto Abydus; and wanne it, though Hee was faine to staie there long. The Towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodiens, than any great abilitie to defend it selfe against so mightie an Enemie. But the Rhodiens sent thither onely one Quadrimere Gallie; and Attalus no more than three hundred men; fate to weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Amylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolemeus Epiphanes King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their Victorie against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thanke him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that warre; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should neede it against Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopator had done before him) Hee beganne a verie young boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, That out of Egypt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme dearth, when the miseries of Warre had made all their owne Prouinces vnable to relieue them. This message could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason bee hoped, that Hee, or his Councill for him, should offer to supplie the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition, concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leisure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Amylius the youngest of them should stepp aside, and visit Philip, to trie if Hee could make him leaue the siege of Abydus; which else Hee was like to carrie. Amylius, coming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodiens, vpon whom Hee made Warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the Towne of Abydus, which Hee was now besieging, had a kind of dependencie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodiens had made Warre vpon him: and that Hee did onely requite them with the like. Doe you also (sayd Amylius) requite these poore Abydians with such terrible Warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angrie to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answer to Amylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (above all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wishe you to remember the League that you haue made with me, and to keepe it: if you doe otherwise, I will make you understand, that the Kingdome and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Towne immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euerie one of them and set their Towne on fire; binding themselves hereto by by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatt number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the Citie, to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip about which whilet they were busie, the memorie of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had but little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leasure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; to or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

§. I X.

The Romans decree warre against PHILIP, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time, both in qualitie and estate.

- 20 His calamitie of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it nearly resembled; though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that he should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five monethes, but in the short space of five dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Consul tolde the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip, which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrhus was by him alleadged; to shew, what 30 Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africa, to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrie. By such arguments was the Commonaltie of Rome induced to beleieue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both iust and necessarie. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul halted away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to the Athenian Embassadors, for their constancie (as was said) in not changing their faith that such time as they stood in danger of being beleiged. And indeed great thanks were 40 due to them; though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne partes; had reason to giue thanks vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntire suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italie: and since neyther Attalus, the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, about a matter of Meygame, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemie of Egypt, and to the 50 Romans, as well as to Attalus and other their neighbours, must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authours of the benefit theee redounding.

Neuerthelesse as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpicius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athens to bee the least part of his care. Hee failed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the readie way to Macedon; and landing about the Riuer of Apsus, betwene Dyrrachium and Apolonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was so farre from them. They bemoaned themselues as men besieged, and entreated him to deliuer them. For which cause He sent vnto them C. Claudius, with twentie Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces He retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: only some Rouers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Eubœa, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vsed to take their shippes and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselues against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Townes. The Robberies done by these Pyrats and free booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Seige. From such detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preferred them. As for the Athenians themselues; they that had bene wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the Conquests of Agypt, Cyprus, and Sicily, to make warre vpon the great Persian King; and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest: had now no more than three Shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long Boates. Yet thought they not themselues whit the worse men; but stood as highly vpon the glorie and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had bene still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Eubœa, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. PHILIP attempteth to take Athens by Surpryse: wasteth the Countrey about, and makes a iourne into Peloponnesus. Of NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. PHILIP offers to make warre against NABIS for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he possesseth againe: and prouideth against his Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the warre.

PHILIP, returning home from Abydos, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apolonia. But cre he stirred forth to giue him entertainment, or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best awhile to sit still, and trie what might bee done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inaders with all his forces: He received advertisement from Chalcis of a grieuous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne employment better. Hee grew soone wearie of sitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to saue the Athenians grounds from spoile; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, for that there was no enemy at hand; and more negligently by the Townsmen, who reposed themselues vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, sailed thither by night for feare of being descried; and, arriving there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. He vsed no mercie but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it (vnlesse hee should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) He set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouidings for warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented contented with the great abundance of spoile which they carried aboard their ships; and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned; but to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in peeces the Statues vnto him there erected. This done, they hastned away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to be ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twentie miles thence: whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haile to take reuenge. Hee thought to haue taken the Athenians with their trustie friends, busie at worke in ransacking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoile: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed foot hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whercof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched thence away speedily towards Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their victorie, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation; if a Foot-post, that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not defcried him a far off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was midnight when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarum; and with all speed made readie for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the wals. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compass about by Sea, and had no cause of halt) yet hauing in the Towne some mercinarie souldiours, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. He therefore soley willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight he gaue singular prooffe of his valour; and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the verie gate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vt their casting weapons against him, without endangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Egina; too late, in regard of what was alreadye past: but in good time, to prevent him of satisfiying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth: and hearing that the Achaens held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achaens were deuising vpon warre, which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaem: who being started vp in the roome of Archonides, did greater mischief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercenaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedie extortioner vpon those that liued vnder him; and one, that in his naturall condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Aggea was very firely matched with him: since his dexteritie was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleeing their wives; whom shee would neuer suffer to bee at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewells and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her proprietie, that hee caused an Image to bee made liuely representing her;

were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses: then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife A- pege (who late by in achaire) could perswade more effectually. So hee led him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for embracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nailes, the like whereof were also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herwith she griped the poore wretch; to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Government. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Aetolians, as Machanidas and Lycorgus had done before him. By these hee grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopamens vertue hee stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achaens, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cy- clidas, a farre worse Capitaine, was their Prætor; and all or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloued Occupation of warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territorie; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their owne fastetic in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Achaens were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of souldiours euerie Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse, forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That, whilest hee made warre vpon Lacedæmon, Hee ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Ile of Eubæa; that so he might securely pursue the war against Nabis. Immediately they found out his detiue: which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his war against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cyela- des made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing war against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assemblie, with euerie mans good liking: whereas in former times, Hee had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieued the King to haue thus fayled in his purpose with the Achaens. Ne-therlesse he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Co- rinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philoteles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Elcusine, the Haven of Pyraus, and euen the Citie of Athens. But the Romans made such hast after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into euerie of these places; that he could no more than wreak his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So He destroyed all the workes of their notable Artif-cers, wrought in excellent Marble: which they had in plentie, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe beene Masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe: but caused his men to breake the verie stones, that they might be vnseruicable to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon; and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardaniens, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to in-felt him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Aetolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage; requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

- 10 Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the Riuer of Aspus. Thence he sent forth Aspustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armeie to walt the borders of Macedon. Aspustius tooke sundrie Castles and Townes; wing such extremtie of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wan by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vnlesse they knew themselves able to hold our. Returning towards the Consul with his spoile, He was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a Brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captaine: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their bootie, with which they arriued in safetie at their Campe. The success of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdidaites the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Athamians; and Bato, the sonne of Longorus, a Prince of the Dardaniens. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That he would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the freindship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betwene the Aetolians and

- So the present care, was wholly set vpon the Aetolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Atheniens. Of which, the Macedonian spake first: and said, That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betwene his Master and the Aetolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves without good cause, to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the Aetolians: and yet notwithstanding had bene angry, that the Aetolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer neede of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so bulie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they leant their helpe to the Mamertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleaged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Aetolians: who, if they drew such Masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would eate them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went euerie yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which stil continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who sought to breake it now.

- It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the verie truth, in shewing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Atheniens were set on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of retrimination enough; to make Philip odious.
- 30 These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes past, made war vpon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithal they made a pitifull rehearsal of their

owne calamities : and said, that if Philip might have his will : Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt ; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerva, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans : who exulting, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken armes, went roundly to the point in hand. They said, that they had of late made warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace : whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselves, by alleging that the Romans, being busied with Cathage, wanted leisure to giue them aid conuenient : so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their war and victorie, vlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceiued, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired : were themselves carried vnto the war by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue bene the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor sliited them off awhile with a diatrioue answer : though hee told his Countreim, That by reseruing the misdeeds, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes ; That ouer-much haist was an enemie to good counsell : for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assemblies of the States, and therein conclude vpon this businesse, any Law to the contrary notwithstanding : whereas other wise it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

D. X I.

The meeting of PHILIP with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of ATTALVS and the Roman Fleet.

PHILIP was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the streights of Pelagenia against the Dardanians; hauing with him some of the Kings Councill, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least beleue, that he was not weakly attended. And this may haue been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeares before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whome earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand : it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heralides, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodian and Romans, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his iourne Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the countrey of the Dassarety, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candania; that running along from Hemus in the North vntill they ioyn in the South with Pinus, in close the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three daies they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open feild. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horle, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no lesse vnwilling to loose too much in reputation; He made thew a day after, as if he would haue fought. He had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselves respectively, as opportunitie should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush; hauing fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hotly, that they draue him to an hallic flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not laying to let them runne into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Armie, and setting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer vied before, but had taken the of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about fourecore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to allright the Romans, who had neuer seene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans, (whilst possibly some were yet aliue, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to see the Consul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater neede to fight, than Hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to loose time: neither could be without great danger, lying so neere the Enemy, that was strong in horle, send his men to fetch in corne out of the feilds. Wherefore he removed eight miles off: presuming that Philip would not aduentione to meet him on euen ground; and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to ouer run the Countrey. The King was nothing sorrye of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euen till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them carelesse. When this was come to passe, he tooke all his horse and light-armed-foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betwene the Forragers and their Campe. There he stayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages that none should escape. The rest hee sent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scoure the feilds, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellows where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horle diided themselves, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were causing the feild, tooke their taske where they found it. But the maïne bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disadvantage: as coming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So they were beaten away: as their fellows also might haue bene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an haruelt, he was too greedie about a poore gleaming: the Roman Legions appeared in light: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne safetie. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in wait for others, are seldom heere full of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were loit. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had he bene cast away, if a louing subiect of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was ouertaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improouident rashnesse; and the Consul, with as much dulnesse; for this daies seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the King from these enemies without any blow: since when all the feilds about them were wasted, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side it was not thought vnlike, That if the Romans following the King, had set vpon his Campe, at such times as he fled thither halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken; they might haue won it. But that noble Historian Livie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this daies worke. For the maine bodie of the Kings Armie laie safe in his Campe; and could not be so astonish'd with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe; He was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereto open, after Perseus was called away from custodie of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans goe the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose he sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of dooing, he marched away by night; and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woodie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalangis was of little vse; being a square battaile of pikes, not fit for euerie ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruicable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victorie (such as it was) laid open vnto the Consul some poore Townes there about; which partly were taken by strong hand; partly yielded for feare. But the spoile of these, and of the feilds adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Albenagoras to wait vpon them home; whilest he himselfe went against the Atolians. For Damocritus the Pretor of the Atolians, who had reserved himselfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe; as also that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no lesse bule on the sudden, than before he had bene wife. He perswaded his Nation to take their time; and so, not staying to proclaim war, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamantian; and made intaile on vpon Thessalie. They tooke and cruelly sacked a few Townes; whereby they grew confident, as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to haue taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Ile of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen to Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were giuen to the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; eyther by foule weather at Seas; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

§. XII.

VILLIUS the Roman Consul wastes a year to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italie; An Embasie of the Romans to Carthage, MASANISSA, and VERMINA. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome:

and T. QUINTIVS FLAMINIUS is sent against him.

us the time ranne away: and P. Villius, a new Consul, tooke charge of the Warre in Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiours; whereof two thousand, hauing serued long in Sicily and Africa, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home.

They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Cannæ: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing beene long absent from Italie; whither faime they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Historie of his yeare is lost: whereof the misse is not great; since hee did nothing memorabile. Valerius Antias, as wee find in Liuius, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuius himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably believe, that Villius his yeare was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue bin expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neyther Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had beene able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved herselfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that had staid behind Asdrubal, or Mage, in those parts; was now become Capitaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard: they sent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, that, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizzen Amilcar, who made warre in Italie. Herevnto it was added (perhaps left the message might seeme otherwise to haue sauoured a little of some feare) that of the Fugitiue slaues belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walk vp and down in Carthage; which if it were so, then ought they to bee restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Masanissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masanissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse; to serue in their Warre against against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King; and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing bene, and being fill (as they rooke it) their Enemie, Hee ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vfed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as manie as they could finde; and would in that point, as farreas was requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corneto Rome; and the like vnto the Armic that was in Macedon. King Masaniissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horle: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls: they laid seige vnto Cremona, where L. Furius a Roman Pretor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwarde should haue the manning of warre among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsaillour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Achaens, by rendering vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led threinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a iourne (as Sulpirius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintus Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince, whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arriued at the Armic.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintus winnes a passage against Philip. The Salie wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Aeolians. The Achaens for taking the Macedonian take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip deliuereth Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

The Romans had not bene wont in formertimes, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation: wherein wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a litle while they proued. Their treasure was poore, and stood in debted, * manie yeares after this, vnto private men, for part of those monies that had bene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerfe from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators greedie of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being wearie of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse need to relye vpon their Confederates. So they leaued eight thousand foot and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauię, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too manie and too farr from home) haue bred some ieaousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was verie requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that eyther they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it vncourteously, that he quitted the Warre with Philip; and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vse the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitee, and could also bee well contented to afford it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though hee were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally, at their entreatie, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome

30 of Attalus. But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philipp; it will verie soone appeare.

T. Quintius halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had serued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villus the old Consul, (whom at his coming hee presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the Riuer of Apfus or Aous. It was manifest, that eyther the Romans must fetch a compass about, and seeke their way into Macedon through the poore Countrie of the Dassarettans; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeares together mispent their time, and bene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountains, which diuided the South of Epirus from Theffalie: then should they enter into a plentifull Countrie; and which, by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuertheless the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the Riuer of Apfus, running along through that Valley which alone was open betwene the Mountaines, made it al a deep Maril and vnpassable Bogge; a verie narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand.

50 Wherefore Quintius assaid to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the gard of them that was verie easie, Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing, for the space of fortie dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the warre might bee ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had bene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and Dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare, that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the judgment of some free State, that had not bene interessed in those quarrels. But here withall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed, (hee said) no judgment or compromise, forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwayes bene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one pronoked, in his owne defence. After this alteration, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Townes, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that hee named were the Thessalians. These had bene subiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the dayes of Alexander the Great and of Philip his father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the King in a rage demanded, what sharper Condition hee would haue laid vpon him, had hee bene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this, the Consul stroue in vaine, two or three dayes together, to haue prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolue what course to take: there came to him an Headsmen, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths; and therefore vnderooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemie. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and, being promised great reward, in case he made good his word, had such Companies, as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trauielled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-toppes, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscovered by them because at their backs) they raised a great smoke; whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their iourne, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent: He pressed as neare as he could vnto the Enemies Campe; and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times; vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, attornished to the Macedonians, that they tooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himself. Yet anon considering, that the difficultie of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: He made a stand at the end of fise miles; and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such aduantage, they should hardly make good their partie against the Enemie, vpon equall ground. Neyther was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore hee caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his haltier trait he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrie; carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be persuaded, swaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him: which they might the better doe, for that hee could not flay to vlc any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it verie grieuouly, that he was driuen to make such wast of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countie, which had euer been well affected vnto him: so that a little hinderance d'd serue, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Assacion.

- The Tholians and Abasmanians, when this fell out, were euen in a redinesse to inuade Thessalie; whereinto the waies lay more open, out of their feuerall Countie. When therefore they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they forelloved not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while; but they had gotten so much before his coming, that He, in gleaming after their haruel, could not finde enough to maintaine his Armie. Thus werethe poore Thessalians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies since had made thew to beverie desirous, waisted by the same Romans and their Confederates, not knowing wch way to turne themselves, or whom to auoid. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded vnto him. Rhage he beleiged; and hauing made a faire breach yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the inhabitants, and by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recollecte his spirits, hoouered about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing well neare spent his victuailles, & seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his liges, and departed out of the Thessalie. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meet him at Antioyra, an Hauen towne of Phocis, on the Gulfe of Corinth: which Countie being freind to the Macedonian, he presently inuaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conueniently seated betweene Thessalie and other Regions, wherein he had buines, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wan by assault: many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this war, ioyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Eubæa; and afterward laid siege vnto Cenchree, an Hauen and Arceall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprife did somewhat helpe forward the Abasians, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertayning to Corinth, now verie shortly should be rendered vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

- 40 But there were other Motiues, inducing the Abasians, to prefer the freindship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; where to they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilst being entangled in a dangerous war, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poisoning of Aratus their old Governour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirians, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants; together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as a necessarie euill, euen whilst they were vnable to bee without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopamen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to freind: then did they onely thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessarie. It angred him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopamen. But sayling in this enterprise, and being detected:

then called the Malan, or Lamian Bay; now (as is supposed) the Golfe of Ziron, in the Aegean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embassidor of Attalus; the Admirall of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Aetolians and Achaens. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliades, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal gods: yet misdoubting some treacherie in the Aetolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he should set all cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewise whatsoeuer he held 10 of theirs in Ilyria; and whatsoeuer about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptoleme then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoiled in the late warre betwene them. The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Peras, lying ouer against their land; as also that hee should withdraw his Garrisons, out of diuers Townes about the Hellepont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achaens desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuilly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their consent. The Aetolians tooke vpon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Countrie, leaving it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatsoeuer he held that had at any time bene theirs. Neither were they here-withall content: but insolently declaymed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaie; corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Aetolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to row nearer the shore. But they began to plic him a fresh telling him, that he must obey his betters; vnlesse he were able to defend himselfe by force of armes. He answered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with sundrie scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul vnderstand, what manner of companions these Aetolians were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise, the rest of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoile from spoile: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Etolia out of Etolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened betwene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serue on both sides, that should spoile both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece; He said it was strange that the Aetolians should be so carefull thereof, since diuers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeed no Gracians: wherefore he would faine know, whether the Romans would giue him leaue to make slanes of those Aetolians, which were no
 20 Greekes. Titus hereat smiled; and was no whit offended, to heare the Aetolians well ratled vp; touching whom he began to vnderstand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that general demand of setting all Greece at libertie; Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might become his owne dignitie. But that the Aetolians, Rhodians, and other petty Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee should be hereunto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Achaens he charged with much ingratitude: reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honors.
 30 Neuertheless he said, that he would render Argos vnto them: but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe. Thus he addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall: vnto whom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late warre, (he said) was onely defence; they hauing bene the offenders: or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did hee see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoiling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Grove and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than send Gardiners thither with yong Plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence. Thus he iusted the matter out: but offered neuertheless, in honour of the Romans, to giue backe the Region of Perrato to the Rhodiens; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, wherof he had then possession. Thus ended that daies conference, because it was late: Philipp requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many; and he ill prouided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill prouided of counsaile, said TITVS, you may euen thank your selfe; as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philipp came not, vntill it was late at night: excusing his long stay by the waightinesse of the things propounded; whercon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was beleued, that hee thereby sought to abridge the Aetolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely; for that hee desired conference in priuate with the Roman General. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would giue to the Acheans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodiens, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Aetolians that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it: saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philipp's care: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, hee would suffer himselfe to be perfwaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King entreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had alreadie tendered; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadours to Rome, where hee would referre himselfe to the courtesie of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintus would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Conflic might happen to defraud him of the honour, which hee expected by ending of the warre. So he easily prevailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnhit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in warre or peace. Further he willed them to send their severall Embassadours to Rome: which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philipp, from obtaining any thing to their preiudice. Among the rest he perswaded King Antiochus, to make a iournie to Rome in person: knowing wel, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had alreadie (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleagued vnto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victory, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vndertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they sayd) could neuer be effected; vntill especial care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcedon, and Demetrius. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrey, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruitud litie; that the Senate agreed to haue it euen so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadours of Philip were brought in, and began to haue made a long Oration; they were breifly cut off in the middle of their Præface, with this one demand: Whether their Master should yeeld vp Corinth, Chalcis and Demetrius: Hæreto they made answer, That, concerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadours haue truly said, That neither the Ætoliens, Achaens, nor any of their followes, had in the late Treatie required by name, that

- 10 Chalcis and Demetrius should be yeeldd vp. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of these Townes? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaens had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain vnto an Other) Philip had alreadye condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene allredgd, euen against the Greekes in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Successor had bene decreed vnto him. But since He was appointed to continue General: neither his friends at Rome, nor Hee himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to giue eare vnto 20 any talk of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achaens had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeares past, since the Lacedæmonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians; and Achaens; together.

But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his reconstituted in a manner wholly in his Mercinaries: for he was a Tyrant; though sluing himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaens: and therefore seemed vnto Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that

- 30 the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwile be easily defended, should be consigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philoteles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a freight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the citizens themselves He might be called into it. Hereabout Philoteles dealt with the Argues: but found them so averse; that, in open assemblie of the people, they detested the verie name

- 40 of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to rob and serce them. So hee willed Philoteles, without more ado, to make ouer the Towne which he was ready to recieue. Philoteles accordingly did let him with his Armie into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argines: who for verie loue had forsaken the Achaens, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staid behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of monie was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to

- 50 pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or plaid the theiues, in purloinyng their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating

gating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such hart of oppressing the great ones, it hath bene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius, and offered to ioyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as hee tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauilt touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans sixe hundred of his Mercinaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Acheans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the finall conclusion of peace betweene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended, which after this continued not long.

§ XIII.

The battaile at Cynoscephala, wherein PHILIP was vanquished by T. QUINTIVS.

TITUS QUINTIVS, as soone as he vnderstood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate, made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwarde wholly to relie vpon himselfe.

Q. Flam.*

Titus had in his Armie about six and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neyther of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie; and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, neare vnto the Citie of Phera: where the vant-courriers on both sides discovered each other; and sent word thereof vnto their severall Captaines. But neither of them were over-hastie, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discoverie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their severall Campes, with little aduantage vnto eyther side. The Countrie about Phera was thicke set with Trees; and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-wals; which made it vnproper for seruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue back vnto Scathysa in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessaries. Titus conceiued aright his meaning; and therefore purposed also to march thitherward; were it onely to wait the Countrie. There lay betweene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke: Neuertheless they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neyther of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third daie was verie tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discoverers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not bene desperate, the Romans their fellows had bene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came came to him thick and tumultuously, how the enemies fled; and how the day was his own; if he could use an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: inasmuch as he embattailed his men; and climbed up those hills, which for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynosephala. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. He had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his aduantage: forasmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, seruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheless hee found conuenient room, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with therelt; embattailing them as they might. While hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrink; as being fallen vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. He sets forward to helpe them: and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour; hauing the Romans not farre behind them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult peece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warrs: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in verie close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points aduanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no maruel, if the Romans gaue back: euerie one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come nearer vnto the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Thus finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able, through the much vneuenesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as eyther they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) vpon desire eyther of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the worke, ranne foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder He made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against thele ill ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground wheron they stood, made their weapons vnfesfull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing six and twentie thousand in his Armie (as he is said to haue beene equal to the Enemy in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so that there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof hee himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintus is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing vsually sixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, haue well nere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to euerie man of them three foot of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foot, or two hundred and fortie paces; that that is, verie neare a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champane free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that mult of necessitie diloyne this close battaile of the Phalans; was not euer to be found. Here at Cynosephale Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men: the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them; being hindered from putting themselues in order, by the roughnesse of the Degges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming vp vnto them; nor found any difficultie in mairting those enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the difcommoditie of the place. The verie firmit impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the comming on of the Legions, to betake themselues vnto flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victorie on that part assured, left the prosecution of it vnto others: and being followed by twente Enignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fallout) by some two thousand men,ooke in hand a notable peece of woike, and mainly helpfull to making of the Victorie complete. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on so farre, as that himselfe with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten about the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand; and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalans, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindmost ranks of the Phalans, all of them indeed saue the first five, were accustomed, when the batailles came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vpright; and wth the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their foremen: and so were they doing at the present. This was an other great inconuenience in the Macedonian Phalans, That it serued neyther for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mesopotania, arranged his Phalans in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many Fronts looking sundrie ways, because hee expected that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsual forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their own ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemy, vnlesse their hindmost ranks could haue marched back wards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselues, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King himselfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euerie where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee presently betooke himselfe to flight. Neyther staid he after wards in any place (except onely a small while about Tempe there to collect such as were disperited in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and five thousand taken Prisoners.

§. XV.

T. QUINTIVS falleth out with the Ætoliens; and grants truce vnto
 PHILIP, with conditions, vpon which the peace is raised.
 Libertie proclaimed vnto the Greekes.
 The Romans quarrell with ANTIOCHVS.

10 THe Ætoliens wonderfully wanted themselves; and desired to haue it noised through all Greece, that the victorie at Cynosephala was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilst the Romans were builed in the chace. Titus therefore being offended both at their vaine glorie, and at their rauous condition; purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceiued, that by viling them with any extraordinary fauor, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætoliens much more vchemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet awhile.

20 After the battaile Titus made halt vnto Larissa, a Citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others, of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersitie, he forgot not to provide for the safetie of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceiue, that he gaue them as alreadie lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet: and verie soone after, all the Acarnanians, a watlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætoliens euer true to Philip; gaue vp themselves vnto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynosephala. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Peras, a Region of the Continent ouer against their Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatie of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leifure of the Romans; but with an Armie of their owne, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Abasians and other their friends, gaue battaile to Dinocrates, the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the victorie, and consequently recouered the whole Prouince. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to inuade his Kingdome; waiting and spoiling, as if all had beene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all hast, of six thousand foot and five hundred horse: wherewith comming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome.
 Which done, he returned to Thessalonia.

30 In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yeeld vnto necessitie; and therefore sent in all hast Limneus and De-mofthenes, with Cyclidas the banished Abasian, in whom hee reposed much confidence, Embassadors vnto Titus. These had conference along while in private, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in verie freindly wise dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few daies after did.
 There was granted vnto them a Truce for fiftene daies: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman General. In the meane season name

nie suspicious rumors went of Titus as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of these bruits the Aetolians were chief authors: who being wont to regard neither freindship nor honestie, where profit led them a wrong way, iudged a like of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Associates; willing them to haue their Agents readie by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treatie should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entred into consultation before the Kings arriual, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every Estate in particular. The poore King Aminander besought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would think vpon him; and considering his weaknes which he confessed, make such prouision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Aetolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliuer their mindes freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which hee had in hand, he was vtterly decciued: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greekes of their libertie. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the war, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Titus himselfe vnto the Greekes, than the chacing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Aetolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the vtter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And herof he alleaged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That Victorie, to generous mindes, was only an inducement vnto moderation. As concerning the publik benefit of Greece: it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; nor that it should be vtterly destroyed: forasmuch as it serued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other savage Nations, which would soone overflow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treatie; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Aetolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, an other of the Aetolians, to say, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no lesse than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leaue his babling; saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he neuer so delirious, should thenceforth not haue it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vfed freindly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had bene required at his hands; offering yet further, to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Aetolian, insulting ouer him, said it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length giue vp to the Aetolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him speake, whether he would, or not. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himselfe, said it should be otherwise; These were Thessalian Townes, and should all be free: one of them only excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be giuen to the Aetolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out that it was too great an iniurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had sometime belonged belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betweene them and the Romans; all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had bene such a Condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Aetolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand, asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Aetolians. Therest of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with these angry passages betweene the Romans and the Aetolians: neither had they great reason, to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to giue them libertie; though they had stood out against him, euen till verie feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a T peace for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that moued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonians, besides that laudable custome by him before alleadged; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. He had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his successer might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And hee was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundrie States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood verie earnestly against the peace; alleadging frivulous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of coneluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip offering to stand to whatsoeuer was demanded; and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senatours hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assemblies of the People; by whose soueraigne authoritie it was coneluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. Soten Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had bene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would verie fine haue retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achaens; and all the other Greeke Townes which Philip held, as well in Asias as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Isthmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greeke Townes which he held, and consigne them ouer to the Romans: That he should deliuer vp vnto them all Captiues that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of war, referring to himselfe onely five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinarie greatnesse, wherein fixteene men laboured at euery oare. Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres next following, by euen portions. Hereto Linus addes, That he was forbidden to make war out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Foure hundred talents hee had already deliuered vnto Titus, together with his younger sonne Demetrias, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the monie, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this monie were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot find : and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who together with those foure hundred Talents was giuen for hostage, remained still in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bithynia : giuing him to vnderstand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bithynian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie; and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materiall, since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they had not leisure, to examine the conformitie of Prusias to their wil.

Al Greece joyced at the good bargaine, which Titus had made with Philip. One-ly the Aetolians found themselves agrieved that they were vterly neglected; which was to the rest no smal part of their contentment. The Baotians continued to fauour the Macedonians; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to haue an hand in the execution, yet neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrey. This was detected with- in awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Herevpon Titus requires of the Baotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for five hundred souldi- ors, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadours to the Achaens and Athenians, in- forming them what had happened; and requested them not to take it amiss, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserued. Herewithal he sets on waisting their Countrey; and besiegeth two such Townes of theirs, as did seeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadours of the Achaens and Athenians, (especially of the Achaens who offered, if hee needed them, to helpe him in this war; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Baotians) preuailed so farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted. Some among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Aetolians would haue beene glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and manie other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnitie and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, hauing vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did wil to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Eubœans, Achæans of Phibiotia, Magnetians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians. The suddenesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their own eares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-near smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

- This good will of all the Greekes, was like to bee much more available vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue bene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in their Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof; no sooner were these Spanish games at an end, than
- 10 Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Stegesanax and Lysias King Antiochus his Embassadors; whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with warre: as also to restore whatsoeuer he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptoleme or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe ouer his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to take with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes; to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Loerians they gaue vnto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wisdome to offend ouer-much, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Achæans of Phibiotia they annexed vnto the Thessalians; all saue the Towne of Thebes in Phibiotia, the same which had bene abandoned by T. Quintius in the last Treatie with Philip. The Ætolians contended verie earnestly about Pharsalus and Lencæ. But they were put off with a dilatorie answer, and rejected vnto the Senate: for howsoeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Achæans were restored Corintho, Triphytia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede (though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the
 - 30 Achæan Commonwealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Ilyrian were giuen one or two places, taken By the Romans from Philip: and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athenians. The Rhodiens had bin their owne Caruers. Atalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his sonne and successeur King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should bee suffered to enjoy their libertie. Oreitia, a little Prouince of the Kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded vnto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free Estate by it selfe.
 - 40 These busineses being dispatche: it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the war with King Antiochus; but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperitie. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to pick matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to predispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Warres of the Romans with ANTIQCHVS
the great, and his adherents.

§. I.

What Kinges, of the races of SELEVCVS and PTOLEMIE, raigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the great.

SELEVCVS Nicator, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentic and fourth Olympiad. Hee was treacherously slaine by Ptolemie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos, hauing (as is said) bene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath bene preferred, or any mischance avoided, by the preditions of such Deuillish Oracles. Rather I beleeue, That many such preditions of the Heathen Gods, haue bene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father: who surrendered vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonicus, when hee vnder-stood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ce-raunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vengenced by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, eyther with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ce-raunus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Seleu-cus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonicus in his Fathers life; yet out of modelic hee forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue vrged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia.
Also Lutarus and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gauls, were set vpon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great bataille: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horles and them, hee wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolemie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, hee soone gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his Historie of the Kings of Assyria; the same, which hath since bene excellently falsified by the Friar Annus. Hee left behind him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the King of Cyrene. So hee died about the end of the hundred twentic and ninth Olympi-ad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the sixtith or one and fiftith year of the King daue of the Greekes; when hee had raigned nineteene yeares.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos; or the god, had this vaine and impious tide giuen vnto him, by flatterie of the Astrologians; whom hee deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. Hee held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolemie Philadelphus King of Aegypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptoleme.

Of these two Kings, and of this Ladie Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters have vnderstood that Prophecie of DANIEL: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Dan. 11. 7. 6.

Ptoleme Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arfinoe) a verie excellent Prince: howsoever, the worst of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furnished with 10 Books, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, He sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Jewes for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Jewes, had formerly bin verie great: for He had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slaueerie throughout all Aegypt; and hee had sent vnto the * Temple of God in Ierusalem verie rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptoleme caused to be translated into Greece, by seuerie two of the most graue and learned persons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the seuerie two Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuentic; Iesus the sonne of Sirach, is thought by Genebrard to haue bene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seemes to me verie sufficiently proued by Lan-
 20 senius, in his preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this buisnesse betweene Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as Josephus affirms) by Aristeus that was employed therein. Fortie yeares Ptoleme Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he ioyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had bene in his former yeares: in which time he boasted, that hee alone had found out the way how to liue for ever. If this had bene referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowt, with which he was often troubled, was enough to reach him
 30 his owne error. He was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Offspring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as hee married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptoleme. After his second marriage, hee vied his first wife with no better regard, than if shee had bene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet aduentured not to seek reuenge, vntill her owne sonne Seleucus Callinicus, was of abilitie to be King. This was two or three yeares after the death of Ptoleme Philadelphus: at what time shee poysoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her sonne, murdered Berenice, together with a sonne that shee had borne to Antiochus. In some reports, that Berenice saved herselfe, together with the 40 young Prince her child, awhile in the Sanctuary at Daphnie: and that not onely some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptoleme Evergetes, King of Aegypt, came to rescue her with an Armie; though too late, for shee was slaine before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding vnto his Father that had fifteene yeares bene King, beganne his Reigne. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discouered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue bene much endangered, if Ptoleme Evergetes, who came against him, had not bene drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by some 50 Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptoleme in defence of their owne King: but rather they sided with the Aegyptians; who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as shee had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this inuasion, by occasion of those domestical troubles which recalled Evergetes home into Aegypt; went about a dar-

Concerning that Booke which now goes vnder the name of Aristeus; many learned men, and among the rest Leobanus Pios, hold suspicion that it is counterfeit, & the inuention of some later Author. Surely if it were to be suspected in the time of Ptoleme; it may be now much more iustly suspected: since a new Edition of it is come forth, purged from faults (as the Papists terme those bookes, wherein they haue changed what they please) & set forth by Middendorpius at Colen. gerous peeces of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne Subjects becaufe of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bene much better, by well deferring, to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet hee prepared in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that hee scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miserie. Herein hee imbarqued himselfe; and, putting to Sea, met with such a tempest, as denoured all saue himselfe, and a verie few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamitie, hauing left him nothing else in a māner than his naked bodie, turned neuertheless to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his Subjects vnderstood, in what sort the Gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his estate; and, presuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuiued him, and filled him with such spirits; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptian, he made readie a mightie Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had bene at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great bataille; whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwrack. Halting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemy would soone be at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen yeares olde, yet extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. He leuied a mightie Armie of the Gauls; wherewith he set forward to helpe his brother; or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised; and hauing no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed, tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeares. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saued himselfe, with so few about him, that hee was verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. Thus did Gods iustice take reuenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and setled (as might haue bene thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brothers death; as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him; and desired how to stripp him of all that hee had, they thought it verie likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should best bee pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himselfe with monie, as if he had bene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to trie his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great meruaile; since he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gauls his owne soldiers, than of the enemy with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battaile, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hanke, (which surname was given him, becaufe he fought his prey vpon euerie one, without care whether hee were prouoked or not) soared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gauls. Having fetcht a great compassse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained verie louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This he soone perceiued : and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolued to bestow himselfe vpon Ptolemie: his owne conscience telling him, what euill he had meant vnto Seleucus, his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him vp in close prison: whence though by means of an harlot hee got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of the eues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his warrs with his brother. Hee therefore made a iourne against Asaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was take prisoner. Asaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment; but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappie reigne of twentie yeeres. He had to wife Laodice, the sister of Andromachus one of his most trustie Captaines: which was father vnto that Achaus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he filled himself) a king; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice hee had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres: in which time he made war vpon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of bodie through sickness, and in want of monie, He could not keepe his men of war in good order: and finally he was slaine by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturnus a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Achaus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled verie wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus; being then a Child.

ANTIOCHVS was scarcely fifteene yeeres old, when hee began his reigne, which lasted six and thirtie yeeres. In his Minoritie, Hee was wholly governed by one Hermus, an ambitious man; and one which maligned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull seruants. This wilde qualitie in a Counsaillor of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe; the successe of things wil shortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong boy likewise, as hath often where bene remembered. This was that Euergetes, who relieued Aratus and the Achaens: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race.

The

The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given him by the Aegyptians; not so much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that hee recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Aegypt, had carried into Persia. He was readie to haue made war vpon the Iewes, for that Omis their high Priest, out of meeke couetousnes of monie, refused to pay vnto him his yeerely tribute of twentie talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Iosephus a Iew; vnto whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes, that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Calesyria, with Palaestina and all those parts of the Countrey that lay nearest vnto Aegypt, were held by the Aegyptian; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptolemie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battaile at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and vnhappie reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucidae; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. T his Ptolemie Euergetes reigned six and twentie yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirte and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there saith, that he came into Aegypt in the eight and thirte yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirte yeeres, were the yeeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes; Hermias the Counsailler, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Aegyptian; for the recouerie of Calesyria and the Countreies adioyning. T his counsaile was verie vnseasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and fought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrey. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained listly, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain other Captaines that were faithfully whilest He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenetas an Achaean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebells; whilest in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Calesyria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Defarts into the Vallie of Marsyas, between the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Esolian, that terted vnder Ptolemie. So hee consumed the time there a while to none effect; and then came newes, that Xenetas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenetas, whilest he was yet on his iourne, and drew neare to the Riuer of Tigris; recieued many aduertisements, by such as fled ouer vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commandr to beare armes against the King. T his report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessitie. Xenetas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Botes in face of his Enemie: left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tigris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe, Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment; but hearing that Xenetas could not so be stopped, He himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourne towards Media; leauing all his baggage behind him in his Campe. Whether hee did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne soldioiurs:

souldiours : or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemy ; the great follie of Xenetas made his stratagem prosperous . For Xenetas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword . Wherefore he suffered his men to fealt, with the provisions which they found readie in the forsaken Campe : or rather hee commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselves against the iournie, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled . And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other side of Tigris. But Molo went no further that day, than hee could easily returne the same night . Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept : hee made such hast back vnto them, that hee came vpon them early in the mornings, whilst they were yet heauie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had spent at supper . So Xenetas and a verie few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe : the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance ; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake . Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tigris, was easily taken by Molo : the Captaines flying thence, to saue their owne liues . In the heat of this victorie, the Rebelle marched vnto Seleucia, which he presently tooke : and, mastering within a litle while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red Sea, or Bay of Persia, He halted vnto Susa ; where at his first coming hee wan the Citie : but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this buline.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marsyas ; filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble . He tooke counsaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Celestria ; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them . This counsaile was put in execution with all conuenient hast . Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soone after slaine , by the practise of Hermias ; who could not endure to heare good counsaile giuen, contrarie to his owne good liking and allowance . In the iournie against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any odde which hee had of the Rebelle in strength . Molo distrusted his owne followers : and thought, that neither his late good successe, nor any other consideration, would serue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience ; if once they beheld his person . Wherefore hee thought it safest for him, to assaile the Kings Campe in the night time . But going in hand with this ; Hee was discovered by some that fled ouer from him to the King . This caused him to returne backe to his Campe : which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne ; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight . The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which hee had that many would reuolt vnto him . Neither was hee deceiued in this his beleefe . For nota few men, or Ensignes : but all the left wing of the Enemy, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forth with as soone as euer they had sight of the kings person ; and were readie to doe him seruite against Molo . This was enough to haue won the victorie; but Molo shortned the worke by killing himselfe; as did also diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne swords.

After this victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithradates king of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus awhile before, had brought forth a sonne . Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the king ; and therefore he purposed to make what vse hee could, of her frendly disposition while it lasted . Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdom, He iudged it conuenient to visit his Frontiers; were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him . Here vnto his Counsaile Hermias gaue assent: not so much respecting the Kings honours as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the king were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made hee no doubt of becoming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthning his owne Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greatest part of his kingdom, situate betwene the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous king was verie old and fearefull; and therefore yeelded vnto whatsoever Conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourne Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly, how odious he was vnto the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly vnto the kings owne life. Antiochus beleiued this, having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done; he being trained forth by a sleight a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The king needed not to haue vied so much arte, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howeouer hee seemed gracious whilst he was aliue: yett he that for feare had bene most obsequious to him, whilst he was in safe to doe them hurt, were as readie as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserved; when once they were secure of him. Ya his wife and children, lying then at Aparca, were stoned to death by the wiues and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had bene concealed.

About these times, Achuzus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprife; and studie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is verie strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achuzus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traitorous purposes; but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew aland vpbaying him with such infidelitic, as any offender might know to be vnardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Celestria or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopator in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a verie strong Citie neare vnto the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Euergetes having lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemias. Such is the vanitie of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Aetolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Celestria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne sorrie, that he had vied so much faith and diligence, in seruice of an vnthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie, he began to haue regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthie of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemias. Whilst he was deuiling about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus; his practise was detected; and he besieged in Ptolemias by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus halting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession,

not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleet of the Ægyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Country, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a iournie into Ægypt it selfe. Agathocles and Solibus bore all the sway in Ægypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the warre: and neuertheless, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this busines, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes; desiring to take vp the quarrell. These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Solibus: who entreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this Treatie lasted great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsaillers perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victorie would be their owne; if they could get, for monie, a sufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard onely what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Ægypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the reader beleefe, not onely for that hee knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadours, coming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceived, by the cunning of Agathocles and his fellow. Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not win: and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Selucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Ægyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promise that he would be readie to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would faine haue seemed; but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilst he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Ægyptian would haue vsed, He vsed himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeare better serued, little force would be needfull: for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemie provided not for their defence. Neuertheless he gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Ægypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which hee purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. He said, that it was agreed between Selucus his Ancestor and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be giuen in possession to Selucus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Issus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargaine. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had won Calesyria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Selucus; by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farr from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needs haue Achæus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming againe it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seek to ioyne him in Confederacie with his owne foueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrarie to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a verie puissant Armie, was coming vp against him out of Ægypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the yeere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuertheless he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iourne, was so many places that he greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people; to become his followers. As the two Kings drew near together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forsooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his Enemy in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiatiques were the better souldiors (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arsmoe his sister 10 on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deedes of their Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to vaiew themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the aduantage of these beasts, He draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein hee fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Groesse of his Enemies battaile, and wan the victorie; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the feild aboue seuentie thousand foot, 20 and six thousand Horse: whereof though hee lost fcatcen thousand foote, and not foure hundred horse; yet the same of his ouerthrow, tooke from him all those places which he had lately wonne. When therefore hee was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achans, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors vnto the Egyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie, to vex himselfe thus with the tedious busines of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing slaid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subiects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achans was not comprised in the League betweene these two Kings: or if hee had bene included therein; yet would not the Egyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deal with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason. For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was he, as Melo the Rebel had bene, one of meaner regard other wife, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cozen german to the King, as hath bene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laudice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a litle for him, That King Ptolemie of Egypt held him in the nature of a freind: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing. For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell betweene his sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian: Hee was not onely slothfull, but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition; began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior 30
to

to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in strict subjection. Thus brake out a warre, betwene that King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie there by wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have been spent, as he thought, much better in quellling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus: He had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he trained all his care to the preparation of warre against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebel, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent vp Achæus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres beleiged. The Citie was verie strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres seige. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was vpon a verie high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable: as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner situated vpon steepe Rockes, and hardly accessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, wherinto the dead carcases of Horses and other beasts, yea and sometimes of men, used to be throwne. Now it was obserued by Lagoras, That the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hunted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, used to flie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch vpon the wals; where they rested without any disturbance. Obseruing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those partes of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Heereof hee informed the King: who approued his iudgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as hee desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and, though with much labour, yet without resistance, he sealed those Rockes, and 30 (whilest a generall assalt was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was, at other times vnguarded, then vnto that vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Craesus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past; and therefore out of memorie. Achæus held still the Castle: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was verie well stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as wereto him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to wail much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the vsual tediousnesse of expectation; his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and Partians with the Hircanians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still encroched. But he thought it not safe to let Achæus breake loose againe. On the other side, there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Egyptian, and good friends vnto Achæus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this beleiged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countries vnder Taurus, he would soone haue an Armie at command; and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke, as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolus a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the waies in the Countrey; and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receiue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Achæus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vndertooke the businesse: and gaue such likelie reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote vnto Achæus by one Arianus a trustie messenger; whom Bolus found meanes to conueigh into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none saue he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained deuice of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messengers, he was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achæus found, by examination, heartily affected vnto the side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolus, and of one Cambylus whom Bolus had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus, vnder whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked vp the Castle of Sardes. Neuertheless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to some aduerture. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolus himselfe should come speake with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, saue onely by Bolus and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countreymen, * some few excepted, had bene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a consultation together, that was, as ^a Polybius obserues it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safetie of him whose deliuerance they vnderooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most, with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betwene them ten Talents, which they had alreadie receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Achæus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present monie, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad; than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolus. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolus with Arianus was to get vp into the Castle, and conueigh Achæus thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him verie priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom he long had serued; Hee accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his coming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But hee discouered so well, and with such grauitie, that there appeared no reason, of distrustful cyther his faith or judgment. Hee was an old Souldior, had long benea Capitaine vnder Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countreymen of his: who kept a Fort that lay in their way; and thereby had alreadie fundrie times, giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduerture stirred vp some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and said, That hee would yet stay in the Castle a litle longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolus three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee receiued better aduertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would hee issue forth himselfe. Hereby heeooke order, not to commit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But, as Polybius well notes, Hee did not consider that he plaid the Cretian with a man of Crete: which isto say, That he had to doe with one, whose knaueerie could not be auoided by circumspection. Bolus and Cambylus had laid their plot thus; That if Achæus came forth alone, then should hee easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; and Bolus following behind, should haue an eye vpon Achæus, to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from bracking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Present.

* Among these few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Eukleides Iohn Andrew, a Cretan: who in one of his late shamelesse libels, wherein hee traduced our King, Religion, and Countrey, and Countrey, with all the good & worthy men of whom hee could learne the names, hath by inserting my name, twice belied me, in calling mee a Puritan. & one that haue been dangerous vnto my Soueraignes. It is an honour to bee ill spoken of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons, and Architect of Lies: in regard whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Creticisme no lesse volumnous, than hee in multiplicitee of name is beyond any of the Cretians in elder times, that were alwaies Lyers, coull beards, and slow bellies. k. Polybius. lib. 8.

sent. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the verie instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his wife Ladice; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall freinds to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greeke tongue, speaking and answering, as need should require, for all, as if the rest had bene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuising vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius;) Though hee were of Crete, and prone to iurmise anything to the mischeife of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know 10 *which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himselfe were there. The way was verie vneasie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to staine in diuers places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occasion, they were all of them verie officious toward Achæus, lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that he was the man; and so by their vnseasonable dute, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait; Bolis whistled, and presently clasped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the ambush, and carried forthwith to* 20 Antiochus*: who sat vp watching in his Paulion, expecting the euent. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the King, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes assembling his friends together, He condemned Achæus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pittie towards this vnhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes; that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischeiuous knaues against one Traitour, doth not rarely succeed* 30 *well; according to that Spanish Proverbe, Aun traydor dos alienos. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themselves vnto the King; whereby hee got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.*

Some yeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was redie for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings; and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces after the death of Alexander, the Government ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes: then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whose posteritie they continued vntill the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus; being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to bee slaine by the Gauls; did stirre vp Arfaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to seeke reuenge of injuries done, and animate him to rebel. So he slew the Kings Lieutenants; made himselfe King of the Parthians; and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battale, whom heroically entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wanne reputation as a lawfull King: and by good government of his Countrie, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his subiects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors; like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt; and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. 50 Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Selenida beyond Euphrates, encreased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Army, that they durst not meet him in plaine feild; but kept themselves in Woods, or places of strength, and defended

fended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistances they made auailed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well sorted, as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights betwene their Mountaines; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might cyther get about the Enemies heads; or come behind, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often employ against them his light ar mature: wherewith hee caused them to dislodge, and giue way vnto his Phalans; vpon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Asaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelitie of his owne subiects; yet feared to encounter with so mightie an Inuader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and desarts, would haue caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue ouer the iourne without proceeding much further. This not so falling out; He caused the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemie must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, He withdrew himselfe out of the way, suffering the Enemie to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrie; wherein, without some victorie obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Asaces was nothing strongly provided for the warre. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Elyreania; where hee wanne Tambrace the chiefe Citie of that Province. This indignitie and many other losses; caused Asaces at length, when hee had gathered an Armie that seemed feithfull enough, to adventure a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Asaces craued peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom Hee could not make a subiect.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had rebelled against him or his Ancestors, but hauing gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthydemus hee fought a battaile by the Riuer Arius, where hee had the victorie. But the victorie was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which hee gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to haue demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was slaine vnder him: and hee himselfe receiued a wound in his mouth, whereby hee lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus; Hee withdrew himselfe back into the further parts of his Kingdome, and after wards protracted the Warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadours passed betwene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrie of his was vniuilly vsurped from him; Euthydemus answering, That Hee had wonneit from the children of the Vsurers; and further, That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Sythians, with whom if they should ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus; and made him willing to grant peace vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father as Embassadour in this Treatie of peace, was not a little auaileable vnto a good conclusion. For Antiochus liked him so well, that hee promised to giue him in marriage one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the kingdome; causing him neuertheless to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by oath to such Couenants as hee thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a iourne ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India: where hee renewed with Sophagesenus, King of the Indians, the Societie that had bene betwene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained remained subject vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warre against Antigonus, rayed part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Westward, and was obscured in a great ciuill Warre: then did one Sandroctatus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrey to Rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title hee soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestie of a King. Finally hee got vnto himselfe, (having an Armie of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had bene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe, 10 ere Seleucus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account. Neyther did He faint, or humble himselfe, at the coming of Seleucus: but met him in field, as ready to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking onely a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of loue betweene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent a ster him; which hee left one to receive. Thus parted these two great Kingdome Neyther had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any bulinisse worthe of remembrance with the Westerne Countreies. The posteritie of Sandroctatus, is thought to haue retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with Presents: and an Epistle written in Greece: wherein, among other things, Hee said, That Hee had command ouer six hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophaenesus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmatia, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the higher side of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeares ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same in deed, that his was onely in seeming.

§. III.

40 The lewd reigne of PTOLEMIE PHILOPATOR in Egypt: with the tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. ANTIOCHUS prepares to warre on the young child PTOLEMIE EPIPHANES, the sonne of PHILOPATOR. His resolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His Voyage toward the Hellespont. Hee seeks to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly show to him; intending neuertheless to haue warre with him. His doings about the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrells to him.

50 His Expedition being finished; Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe awhile, and studie which way to conuert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeares Ptolemie Philopator died: leaving his soine Ptolemie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; vnlike by him to bee well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Ptolemie surnamed Philopator, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname giuen him in meere derision, as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His young yeares, being newly past his childhood when hee beganne to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death : yet the beaillinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischiefe, whereof he could be accused. Hauing wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensuality; was wholly gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathocles. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister ; which had aduertured herselfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vnder taken and performed with honor. The Lieutenant-ships of his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatsoever; were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathocles, and her brother Agathocles, and of Oenambe a filthy Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to 10 the great greife of all the Countrie, till Philopator died ; who hauing reigned seuen- teene yeares, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes a childe of five yeares old, begotten on Arsinoe that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death ; Agathocles beganne to take vpon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Governour of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his sister, but vnto the 20 faith of them on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relie. He besought them therefore that they would bee faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to set the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meece stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall hee produced before them a witnesse, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting of teares : yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that hee spake ; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the 30 Assembly: Hee that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, when the old Kings fauour had made mightie, but neyther wife nor wel qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly bene his manner, by vsing his authoritie, to the suppression of those that hee distrusted. Hee haled out of a Temple the mother in-law of Tlepolemus; & cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and vtter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moued with feare of 40 harme; which, in way of frequitall, Tlepolemus was likly to doe vnto the Citie. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernment, as afterwards hee proued ; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of vittuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motiues wrought with the people : so by the remedie which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vpror. Hee secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him ; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace and there stripped out of all his apparell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose: there was brought vnto the Minister 50 of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturres, one after another, went out of the roome ; leaving Xeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the doores open. Hee perceiving this, naked as he was, conuighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Maccedonians, of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Maccedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turkes Janizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus bene vied; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and beganne to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with loud clamours, made no lesse adoe than the Souldiers; though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathodes himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the strettees; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in peeces.

he

These troubles in Egypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had verie good leisure though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon yong Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire, to get what part he could of the childes citate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craued helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into covenants, to diuide betwene them, all that belinged vnto this Orphan, whose Father had bene Confederate with them both. So M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Maccedonians Hee was verie soone found busied, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Etolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptians, was sent into Greece to rayle an Armie of Mercinaries: What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not find: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was sent thither onely one of the three Embassadours, in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath bene shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Jenes; who seeme to haue yeided themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the verie next yeare following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeare that Philip was beaten at Cynosephala, Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bene lost. Among the rest, the Jenes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him verie gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbear to inuade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Countrey would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appears that he was verie much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betwene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to afford him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellepont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easie to be swallowed wth at once. One while therefore hee tooke what hee could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Jenes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. An other while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadours, sadors, and desisted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpasse, That these his Embassadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour; they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria: and shortly prepares to win some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a Spoile. Thus was heacting and deliberating at once: being carried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling fortunes. Howsoeuer it was, He sent an Armie to Sardis by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them there to stay for him; whilest he himselfe with a Fleete of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Aegyptian. It was notable A^o of the *Rhodian*s, that, whilest the war of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they adventured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because hee should not ioyn with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it other wise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King. yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadors; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought, there needed no better prooffe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The *Rhodian*s appeare to haue bene a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed betweene his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them nota whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian war was ended at the battaile of Cynosephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vnlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had euer bene greatly beholding, to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aid they could vnto all the subiects of the Aegyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betweene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a freindly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetarus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile.

uaile. Wherefore he said, That by ablayning from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee muſt be partaker in his overthrow; so was he ſure to be oppreſſed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie.

Antiochus himſelfe wintered about Ephesus: where hee tooke ſuch order as hee thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smirna and Lampſacus to obedience; that had viſurped their libertie, and obſtinately ſtroue to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would proteſt them. In the beginning of the Spring hee failed vnto the 10 Helleſpont: where hauing won ſome Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he paſſed ouer into Europe ſide; and in ſhort ſpace mattered the Cherſoneſus. Thence went hee to Lyſimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and deſtroied, when Philip withdrew his Garrifon thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Aetolians objected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quinius, that he had oppreſſed Lyſimachia, by thruſting therinto a Garrifon. Herunto Philip made anſwer, that his Garrifon did not oppreſſe the Towne, but ſaue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and ſackt it, as ſoone as the Macedonians were gone. That this anſwer was good and ſubſtantiall, though it were not accepted as ſuch; might 20 appeare by the miſerable caſe, in which Antiochus found Lyſimachia at his coming thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, carried away into ſlauerie. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reſtored: as alſo to redeme thoſe that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were diſperſed in the Countrey thereabout. Likewiſe he was careful to allure thither, by hopefull promiſes, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequentie. Now to the end that men ſhould not be terrified from 30 coming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: hee tooke a iourne in hand againſt thoſe barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leauing the other halfe, to repaire the Citie. Theſe paines hee tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient ſituation, and former glorie of Lyſimachia; partly for that hee thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer and eſtabliſh the dominion in thoſe parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lyſimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition hee ſhall dearly pay: and as after that victorie againſt Lyſimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed ſhortly; ſo ſhall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus enſue verie ſpedily, after the reconquiſt of the ſame Countrey, which was the laſt of Seleucus his purchaſes.

50 R Or the Romans, though they were vnable to ſmother their deſire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was alreadie taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much againſt their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant ſhortly to make good, of this intended warre, ſo long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furniſhed, by this enterpriſe of the Kings about Lyſimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than verie friendly. Antiochus, at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also verie shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilest as yet they were busied with Philip; and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or mozt of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Cl- 10 ients vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worse, but more plaine, meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsaillers sent from Rome, required (as hath beene shewed before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victorie; as also his long-proffessed amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

* ch. 4. S. vii.

These ten Counsaillers were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seems that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindfull of the busines: wherein left T. Quintius, with his ten Assitants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome of purpose, to deale with the King about those controuerfies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other private instructions Cornelius had; wee may conjecture by the managing of this his Embassage. For comming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having beene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He halsted thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsaillers) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegelianax and Lysias 30 were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the busines in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that verie earnestly, That he must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the 40 Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that war, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourne there was none probable, than a purpose to make war vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should fo trouble themselves, with thinking vpon the matters of Asia: wherewith He prayed them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what busines had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recouerie of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victorie against Lysimachus. Neither was it fo, that any of the places in controuerfie 50

betwene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had beene seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindered by multiplicitie of busines, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his sonnes, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieued with his proceedings in Asia either against the free Cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptoleme, not onely in freindship, but in a bond of neare affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refuse it; would needs heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampfacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betwene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few daies, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laide their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace; were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallia-Greekes, pretend onely the goodnes of their swordes; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their iustice, forbore the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptoleme was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome; and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador, both to Antiochus and to Ptoleme: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King forthwith made readie, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Arme; and left him to ouer-see the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintus: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honoric and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptoleme was alive. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a greivous shipwracke, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman war.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lysimachia, (at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had bene sent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, asin a point highly tending to his good; Not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should bee bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weakc excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were solicited; and particularly the Aetolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the freindship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to say plain-ly ly whereto this entreatie tended: the forward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well vnderstood the purpose. They cry complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victorie, as they had bene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had bene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpbroyding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victorie ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle answers; telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriuing at Carthage, gaue mater vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the liues, goods; and fame of all the rest. Neyther did they vse this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superiour vnto them during that yeare: yet had it not bene their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annual Magistrate, as at the yeares end must be acceptable to them, if sought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Questors, or officers of the Treasure, to come and speake with him: the proud Questor set slightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduerser Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place, were to be chosen into the Order of Judges; in contemplation whereof, he was filled a headie with the spirit of his future Greatnesse. But he had not to doe with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Pursiuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publique assemblie of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vndutifull stubbornesse of this Questor had bene; but how vn sufferable the insolencie of all the Judges at the present was: whose vnbridled power, made them to regard neyther Laws nor Magistrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable, He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from yeare to yeare, & no one man be continued in that Office two yeares together. If this Law had bene passed, before he passed our Iberus: it would not perhaps haue bene in the power of Hannibal, to haue brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another grieuance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation laied vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting monie in their publique Treasure, wherewith to defray eather that, or diuers other needfull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasure, by wayes and means whatfocuer; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasure: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to load the people with needlelike burdens. Hereof he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie; and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts; as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens; so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their i-gotten goods, and il-employed authoritie, both at once, euen when they thought themselves to haue beene in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchene Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasure, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these enemies to the Barchines might well crie out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alledge, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wild beaust, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages pass betwene him, and King Antiochus: and that hee was wont to complaine of idlenessse, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, eue ricone to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neyther publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vsed their Victorie in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadours they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Seruilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus; whose verie names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their commings and, being by them instructed how to carrie themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controuersies, betwene the Carthaginians and Masinissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That hee escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne, when it beganne to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as hee might well trust. Hee had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, Hee came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had hee a Ship furnished with all things needfull; as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such iourne. So Hee had Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cercina, hee found there in the Haven some Marchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither he was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a Geniuee, where to Hee invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather; and therefore Hee would needs hold his Healt vpon the shore; where, because there wanted court, Hee made them bring thither all their sailles and yards to be vied in stead of Tents. They did so, and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time hee left them there asleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, Hee was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haft to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadour: neyther could they, without some losse of time, looke of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cecina, being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuersly construed. Some ghessef aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where hee had bin seene: and then the Roman Embassadours, hauing none other errand thither accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace, where by they onely disco- uered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; misting the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderland, that Hee fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal, comming to Tyre the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affini- tie betweene their Cities, thought themselues to haue interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friend- ly welcommed him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly re- joyced at his comming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore forric; or otherwise than as they had much dis- graced themselves, by discouerie of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout souldiors of base Asiaticques; as it had bene by his trayning and disci- pline, to make verie seruiceable and skillfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinarie, could alter the nature of a cowardly people; yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thou- sand other such vexations, would be farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man, than had bene the vil- lanie of Hianno and his Complices, hindering him in those Actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to avoid the warre; then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeede, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadours to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not proba- ble, that Hee had any meaning to take armes; vntill by meeere violence hee were thereto enforced. Onely the Asiaticans were greatly suspected, as a turbulent peo- ple, desirous of inuouation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late bene answered with gentle words by one of the tenne Counsaillours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoeuer with reason they should aske, But this promise was too large, and vnauided. For when their Embassadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might halten the Romans out of Greece for verie shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrie. For the Asiaticans were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed: saying, That these their Deliuerers had laid heauier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did wear; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greekes their chains, & tie it about their necks. There was indeede no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other mening than what they pretended. For Philip had made no de- laie, laie, in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him : all the Townes of Greece were at libertie; and the whole Countrie at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus : He made it his daily suit, T hat the Peace betwene him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed, and strenghtned by a League of more assurance. Neuerthelesse T. Quintus would needs feare that Antiochus meant forth with to seize vpon Greece, as soone as he and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained still in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrius, and the Acocorinthus : by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Sutable vnto the doings of Quintus were the reports of the renne Embassadours, that had bene sent out to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall vpon Greece : wherein he should find not onely the Stolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, readie to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies : especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intente to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the vulgar : but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeare, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should bee readie to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would be a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment; whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be sorrie; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeares before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had warre with Philip; and had further beane contented for the Romans like to bee at peace with the Achaens, neyther since that time had he done any thing, whereby hee should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant; and hated of the Achaens; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme; whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which hee caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their inuines apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at libertie; which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble Citie of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes; diligently consider, whether they thought the eluersion of Argos a matter worthe to be vnder taken; or whether otherwise to auoid all further trouble, they could bee well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans; who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Embassador made answer hereunto verie eloquently; and as pleasing as he could deuise. He gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition; wherein vnrquested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue and high deserts ill spoken of by some : which tooke vpon them; out of their owne imaginations to foretell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter : when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgment, ment, of the benefits and pleasures already receiued. Euerie one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Aetolians. Wherefore Alexander the Aetolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their Citie had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recouerie of the libertie generall: from which honour they were now so farre fallen, that they became Paraites vnto those whom they thought mo^t mightie, and by their bare assentation, would lead all the rest into seruitude. Then spake He against the Achaens, Clients that had beene a long time vnto the Macedonians and souldiors of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These Hee said had gotten Corinth; and must now haue warre be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Aetolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes beene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neyther did hee thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrius Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing beene alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse whetewith to find themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrey? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Aetolians themselves did promise, and would vndertake, That they would eyther cause him to yeild to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece; that was now at vnitie. These words had beene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertie wrought so much with these Aetolians; as did their owne rauenous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worse would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neyther could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their greiuaunce, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene covenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Aetolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Achaens, cry out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Aetolian theues be enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discourtenancing the Aetolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well, that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsailes which had beene sent vnto him from Rome to be his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedaemonian warre; it was verie soone ended. For Titus vied the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Nauie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get fauour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Aetolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispositions, sitions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Aiolians from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted by the same Lacedaemonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives more bold than wise, began a conspiracie against the Lacedaemonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and slaine: excepting a verie few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stirre within the Walles; the execution done vpon the first movers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assault Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedaemon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedome whereof since the war was made pittie it were, that the calamities of the war should thereon fall most heauily.

Nabis had in readines an Armie of fiftene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumifed slaves, malefactors, and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthie Citizens he stood in doubt: and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Assemblie: and compassing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest before hand and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should hee keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preferre not onely the Citie and his owne person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Heereupon he cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom he leads a way to prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was hee sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it els doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose, his crueltie extended it selfe vnto some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and slaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens; Hee turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a sallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the souldiours of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodiens, laid siege vnto Gythium, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force; when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Governours within the Towne, equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gythium: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safetie to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government with a thousand souldiors Mercinaries, and two thousand Argines: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Cytheum: which hee thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost: then began they to thinke vpon finishing the war, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent Embassador to Titus: requesting onely, that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speake with him. This was granted. In that Parle the Tyrant spake verie reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none; and that by many good arguments; whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could, obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleaged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindred them, in time of their more need of him, from entering into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannic; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alleaged. Wherefore hee said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to ioyne with Philip, when he was their enemy, not onely in League, but also in affinitie: and That his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may seeme to haue bene obiected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise verie frivoulous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betwene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristanus, the Prator of the Achaens, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate; and to settle his fortunes, whilst he might doe it without hazard: alleading the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, & therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happines, as private men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the Citie of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them verie greiuous. He would not suffer the Lacedamonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete, no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Iland or elfe where; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne lands; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome iniunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yeerely, for eight yeares next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants he demanded fiftie hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the

the Tyrants owne sonne . If it had bene the meaning of Titus , to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him ; which hee himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp . But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense little with the Roman faith , in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best freinds in Greece , by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprise, whenonce it was taken in hand, haue bene prosecuted vnto the verie vtmost . As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them , to enrich themselves by the spoile 10 of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Achaens, who iudged it euill after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minuter vnto the Aetolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and defended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterlie Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors: it was thought verie strange, that Lacedaemon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday: and He therein rooted by their authoritie, as their freind and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vn-
 20 mercifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same Romans , whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the lone and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But fallily had he dealt with the Macedonian: and fallily was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; save only that for the banished Lacedaemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Agelapides the naturall King of Sparta, that being a yong child was driuen out by Lycorgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates ; but only leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be so contented, to liue abroad 30 with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to giue consent vnto the se demands: and sustained an assault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these iniuries had put into him . So yielding vnto all that had bene propounded, He deliuered the hostages ; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed after wards at Rome by the Senate and People . From this time forward, Hee thought the Romans more wicked than himselfe ; and was readie vpon the first advantage, to doe them all mischief that he could.

The Argines had heard newes that Lacedaemon was euen at point of being taken.
 40 This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remoue of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should set their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deferuedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Cittizens had laied hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto, hee caused the libertie of the Argines to be proclaimed at the Nemean games; as ratifying it by his authoritie. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councell of Achaia; whereby the Achaens were not more strengthened, than the Argines
 50 themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little busines or none wherewith to set on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance who-ly

ly disposed vnto quiet, Scipio the African, that was cholen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vnincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthe of regard; yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of consulting the Ætolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leauing the Nation vnto it self, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer again. Wherfore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, eyther found, or at anie neare distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsaile; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocrinthus to the Achaens; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to doe the like (which verie soone hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might bee knowne, what lers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to raise and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leauing the Countrey before his departure was vrged, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefits; vntainted by jealousie and suspicion of any euill meaning. At his coming to the Citie, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three dayes together the shew of his pompe continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthe of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious peeces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in diuerse sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of fundrie kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Siluer; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuerse Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifices; the Prisoners, and the hostages; among which, Demetrias the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis; were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slaerie in Greece.

Not long after his Triumph He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all verie fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the tenneth that had bene his Counsaillers, because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus and his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betwene the Victor and the vanquished; betwene those, that hauing warrd together were vpon equall termes of aduantages; or betwene those that had liued alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the the imposition of some Coucnants; that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had beene made; and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsuall to demand and make restitution, of things and places clamed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee propos'd: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne, and neyther carrie it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the League and friendship that had bene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange that the Romans

- 10 should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at libertie, from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; cyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintus answered, That since they went so distantly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaued them their choice whether to accept: Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then Hee should abandon whatsoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, so that which the Kings Embassadours had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abtaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampsacus, or any other Asiatiques, whome they were pleas'd to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them injurie. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lysimachia, whereon of late he had bin at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and re-peopling it with inhabitants, that had all bene disperd, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadours with great indignation alladged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at libertie those Townes, which the King would oppresse and hold in subjection: especially since those Townes were of Greekish blood and language; and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had affoorded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soone haue left Antiochus King of not many subjects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be vnderstood) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadours to come to a point, and tel them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadours could not hereto make; little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had bene alreadye with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receiue a small answer, whether these demands made by Quintus and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeares, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no disposition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. PORCIVS CATO. Injuries done by MASA-

NISSA to the Carthaginians: that sue to the Romans for iustice
in waime.

He Insulrians, Boyans, and other of the Cisalpine, Gaules, together with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such times as they themselves were vtterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations, having serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath bene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards eyther the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to second them. How the Romans first preuailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina now called Lumbardie; it hath bene long since rehearsed, betweene the first and second Punicke Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neyther is it likely that the reconquest would haue bene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase; if besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not bene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of bodie; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow; but forthwith readie to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, woodie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles; exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neyther bee taken nor besieged. They were also verie poor; and had litle or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Arme; that should spoile their Land. In these respects they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiours to hardnesse and militarie patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a litle. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their Ioue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, seemes to haue bene grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgment: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their advantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, vs commonly this answer, It hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrie they did litle harm:

not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make war, but on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Prouinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Ox-hide: and the Romans found in it the properie of that Ox-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts, from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion.

10 The Spaniards were a verie hardie Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hindrance) good intelligence among themselves: and being diuided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrey; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such priuate respects made them often to fall vnto one another; when many had vnited themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of libertie, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

20 The Carthaginians had beene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Colleckrick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vled them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they rayfed vpon the whole Countrey; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise the Romans, vsing the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spaine was too farre distant, and withall too great, for them to send ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the courst that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrey, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such herdfull Captaines, as might be still readie to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrey; though seldome in peace.

Verie soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrey, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subiection, brought peace vpon the Countrey; which lasted few yeares. This Victorie of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre; yet left it still remaining the cause of the warre; which after few yeares brake out againe.

The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconsul, whom they slew, and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither two Pretors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the yeare following, and sent into that Prouince; found at his coming little lesse to doe; than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victorie vpon the chiefe of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him to much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a iourne against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen readie to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselves for verie griefe. Hearing of this, and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their own great losse, Hee praied them to deuise what course might be takē, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Hauing therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kind of Subiect, He gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industrie finished it in short time. Neyther thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celiberians, against other of their Countrymen: excusing the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a iest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should hee need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victorie, he could pay them with the Enemies monie. Finally Hee brought the Warre to good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. Hee increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue most agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely verie notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed The Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vsfull qualities, that verie little was wanting in him, which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was verie skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not vnprofitable in any buisines cyther private or publike. Many Books he wrote: whereof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, and of husbandrie. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as hee liued in perfect health to verie old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sinceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other wortie men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, Hee was a verie good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he neuer were out of his Element. He loved businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly, that euen vnto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of foure score and six yeares, He pleaded in his own defence: and foure yeares after, he accused Sergius Calpa vnto the People. So beganne the Nobilitie of Cato his family, which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Vicar: one, that being of like vertue and feruencie, had all his good purposes dalst, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanis Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not verie dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrey seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Pretors therefore, of which two euery yeare were sent ouer Commanders into Spain (that was diuided into two euery year were sent ouer Commanders into spaine (that was deuided into two Governments) did rarely faile of such worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirtene thousand Spaniards in a battaile; another tooke fittie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrie to sue for peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I haue already pointed: and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in spaine required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, vntill the Numantian Warre brake out, which was verie long after.

- In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised al felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves and their obedient Citie: Masaniisa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He beganne with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the lesser Syria: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Iudges had bene vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out vnto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrie: Masaniisa himselfe, now verie lately, pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise bene questionable) that the Countrie was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniisa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome.
- There had lately bene sent vnto them from Hannibal one, that should persuade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined, vpon some suspicion of his errand; yet neyther arresting him nor his shippe, had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to kecke them downe. As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwaies, hee said, bene theirs; that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometimes vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne: the Citizens of Carthage had no verie warrantable title, vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africa; that had gotten leaue there to build vpon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cut into smal thongs. Whatsoeuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniisa requested of the Senate, That they would not adudge vnto such vsurers, the Countrie sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans hauing heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly, they sent ouer three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuersie: yet secretly giuing them instructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masaniisa with a strong Armie should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such arts were the Carthaginians held; not onely from stirring in fauour of King

Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leisure to expresse the vtmost of their hatred.

¶ VI.

The Ætoliens labour to prouoke ANTIOCHVS, PHILIP, and NABIS, to warre vpon the Romans, by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. NABIS besiegeth Gythium, and wasteth some part of Achaë. The exact skill of PHILOPOEMEN, in advantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanquisheth NABIS. ANTIOCHVS being denied peace by the Romans, ioynes with the Ætoliens. The Ætoliens surprize DEMETRIAS; and by killing NABIS their confederate seize vpon Sparta. But they are drinen out by the Citizens: who at PHILOPOEMEN his persuasion, annex themselves to the Achaëns.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieued much the Ætoliens to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselves the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes; were not onely disapointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had bene taken from the Macedonian. This might haue well sufficed them, if their desires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation, more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly displeas'd, wherein they thought that they had vn sufferable wrong. Wherefore they desired, in a Parliament which they shortly held; by what means they best might right themselves; and giue the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betwene their enmitie and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to ioyne all together in a new Confederacie: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre surmount those of the Romans, Achaëns, Rhodians; and King Eumenes; with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprize, which the Ætoliens tooke in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great darers. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with perswasions as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to trie first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedemonian, who neyther (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay siege to Gythium, that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaëns, to whose care chiefly Titus at this departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neyther would they haue staied long from reprehending his violence by open war; had not some of them thought it wisdom to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly bee amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iuster cause of complaint, by waisting their owne Territories. Philopomen was then Prætor of the Achaëns, who had long bene absent in Crete, making making war there for his mindes sake and recreation. Vnto him the Achaens referred themselves, giuing him leaue to order the war at his pleasure; ether laying vntill the Romans came; or doing other wise, as he should thinke best. He made all halt to relieue Gythium, by Seas tearing leit the Towne, and the Achaen Garrison within it, should be lost, if hee vsed any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Seaman, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrirème Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeares agoe bene counted a gallant vsicell, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleete so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedemonian. Oncly it fell out well, that he committed 10 him selfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was becoming their Admirall; all were presently discouraged, and saued themselves with what speed they could. But Philopamen was not here with danted. If hee had failed in Sea-seruice, which was none of his Occupation; Hee said that hee would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gythium, to stop the Achaens if they should inuade his Countrie. But vpon these which 20 were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came unexpected; fired their Campe; and put all, saue a verie few of them, to the sword. Then marched he with all his Armie towards Lacedamon: within ten mile whereof hee was, when the Tyrant met him; that had alreadie taken Gythium. It was not expected that Nabis would haue bene ready for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gythium, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that he must ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some 30 five miles: hauing their Horse and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take: appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when hee walked or trauelled abroad with his freinds, to marke the situation of the Countrie about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same way. Hee would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of souldiours, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; hee were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what peece of ground it were meete for 40 him to feize vpon? and in what manner he might best doe it? in what sort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what fort he should encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation Hee was growne so perfect, that hee neuer met with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Reare, Hee encamped neare vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, hee bestowed on a Rokee; encompassing them round with his souldiours. The ground was rough, the waies bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achaens lay the nester. This watering therefore was like to minister 50 the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; wherinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, asa fugitive, and tell him, that the Achaens had a purpose to betwene him and Lacedamon; wherby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and wishall encourage the people, to take armes for the recouerie of their freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue bene forced. Some Companies he made to stay behind, and flew themselues vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopemen was not so to be beguiled. He easily won the Campe; and gaue chase to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The Enemies being thus disperfed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in covert all that day; Philopemen conceiued a right, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselues, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilest it was day; He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselues, and occupied the two most ordinarie passages vnto Laedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopemen's Campe great store of lights; thought that all had bene at rest; and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie daies together after this, did Philopemen wait the Countrie round about, whilest Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus & Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Asians. Vene faire countenance they also made vnto Philipp; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that hee should receiue other fauours at their hands; and regaine possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for war against Antiochus in Greece, whilest their Embassadours that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage between Ptolemie and his daughter: together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings son, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadours; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficial vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Linie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspicion wherein hee held the Romans: that honoured his verue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the most vertuous? So Hannibal gaunto Alexander of Macedon the first place; to Pyrrhus the second: and the third hee challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou haue said then Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claymed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: is the often and freindly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbeare a while to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recovered his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when hee was a litle boy, That hee neuer should be freind vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine promises:

mises: but to know thus much, That as long as hee thought vpon war with Rome, so long would Annibal doe him all good seruice: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behoue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Ætolians, and their freinds, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans: than were the Romans, in mustering vp their freinds in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victorie against Philip, that finally they prevailed with him: especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him, without hope of peace, vnesse he would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian. But in vaine. Hee vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improoue their owne forces to the vtmost: as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselves, without helpe from any; saue only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to beate their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a litle; by exhorting them, not to conlude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay nere at hand. For want of a readie answer hereto they were contented to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the busines worthe of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small peece of seruice, to with-draw from his freindslipe, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore he came to their Panætolian, or Great Assemlie of the Nation; where hee forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. Hee willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand, whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrie, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mæteric: the Ætolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becomming * the Stückler. As for those greiuanes which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent courses, He willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to set the world in a vpror, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what hee said or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they desired, either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such *T*ermes had they bene feasted once already: and were by the Senate rejected vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to set the Countrie at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending betwene the Romans and Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of brauerie, whereby to vant themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe; but that this Decree, & their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their camp in Italie vpon the riuer of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better as the Aetolians are like to vnderstand herafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the war they referred vnto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the authoritie of a generall Assemblies. The Apudeti (so were the Priue Council) of Aetolia called) went as holily to worke, as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden: entering, some of them as freinds to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had bene driuen to flie thence, but was, by intercession of those that loved him, againe recalled. His Aetolian companions that were not many, seized vpon a Gate: wheratt they lay in a Troop which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Towne prepared to defend itselfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer: saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans: who more insolently domiered ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By such Rethorick they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Towne-men replied, That they neither found any abridgment of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received iniurie. So this busines was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good freind, was Lord of the Towne: styling himselfe King; but, more truly, by all men called Tyrant. He had wel-neare loit all, by means of the ouerthrow which Philopomen had lately giuen him: since, he durst not stirre abroad; and daily expected the mischeife, that on all sides threatned him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after other, to the Aetolians: requesting them, That as He had not bene slow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward; so They would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath bene often said, That the rauinous Aetolians were onely true to themselves, & regarded neither faith nor freindship otherwile than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his Tyrannie, were in a manner confumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to assure Lacedamon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Damocritus the Praetor brought into the Council of the Apudeti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be; nor to thinke that they were sent to make war with the Achasians, or to doe ought else, save onely what Alexamenus should command them: which were it neuer so desperate; and in seeming against all reason; yet must they vnderstand, that vntill they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue wordes: telling him, that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mightie Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Aetolians, He said, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were verie desirous at the present, to make as goodlie a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither a fore with with no greater companie. Hercupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bene long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Aetolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great worke that he had in hand: He then went aside to his thirtie Horsemen, and bad them remember the taske enjoyned them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnlesse they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neare them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirtie Aetolians neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead bodie: where in stead of seeking reuenge they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Aetolians halted into the Citie, and seized on the Palace: where hee fell 10 to ransacking the Treasures; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had bene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horse, and made him their chiefe. So they fell vpon the Aetolians that were idely stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Companie, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedamon, Philopoemen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamenus should haue done after hee had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and libertie, to incorporate themselves with the Achaens. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Aetolians, and the small but effectuall, trauaile of Philopoemen; the 30 Achaens made a notable purchase; and Lacedamon, that had hitherto bin gouerned eyther by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; whereof 40 the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer

 all Greece.

B. VII.

ANTIOCHVS, perswaded by THOAS the Ætolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundrie passages betweene him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians and others. Hee winnes Chalcis and therby the whole Ile of Embroea. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the Ciuil answer of TITVS to their discourse, before the Achaens. That it concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betweene the Romans and ANTIOCHVS; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many pettie Estates that fell to the King. Of AMINANDER, and an idle vanitie, by which King PHILIP was lost. HANNIBAL giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and reuels away the rest of Winter. Vpon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsake ANTIOCHVS. Hee with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Streights of Thermopyle. Hee is beaten, and flies into Asia: leauing all in Greece vnto the Victors.

ANTIOCHVS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampasus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behind him and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speed conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a verie small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was alreadie vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were readie to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilseth therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africa, there to moleste the Romans, and so giue him the better leasure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: THOAS the Ætolian came ouer to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreimen had alreadie taken Demetrius a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This he did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: THOAS was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the verie reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vnfit man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commaunder if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal preuailed; Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes neare vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being ialous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon hee laid aside the determination; which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently after this He made readie for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuolous

Ious pomp of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Izum; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Aegean Sea, Hee came to Demetrius.
Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whome the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wanne Demetrius; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. Hee therefore with his Countreimen, in great frequentie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this; and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to bee so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie somewhat like to that 10 of Alexander; they saw three hundred ships, of which no more than fortie were seruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of tenne thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and sixe Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore wel onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Ætolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein hee desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie.
 20 This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that hee had not to make all things readie; but hastned vnto their aid, euen whilst the season was vsuit for navigation. Yet it should not bee long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neyther would hee spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which hee had vnderaken; euen to drine the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrie free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be verie great: so was it his meaning, that all prouisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not bee any way bur-30 denesome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aid, vnprouided of manie necessaries; that they would helpe him with Come and other victuals, whereof hee stood in need.
 So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeild vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a businesse of dangerous importancie, vpon the promised assurance of 40 a State that is meerey popular. For if the vehemencie of Thous, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell: the Ætolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceived them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedie had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thous, and complained of the wrong; but he must haue bin contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thous would therefore haue pronounced to bee verie wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilst it was in dispute 50 where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to bee first vnderaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture need to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot; leaving the rest behind him at Demetrius. With these hee hastned away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Ætolians,

which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to meet with him. There the Ætolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsfull, they said would neuer be obtained; vntill by removing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euerie seuerall Estate had where to find redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King wel able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuerthelesse desired them only, so to joyne with him in League, as that if eyther the Romans or Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whole good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But since he, and the Ætolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Ætolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But verie soone after, hee brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yeeld: before all the succours could arriue, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Enbwa being thus gotten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochus. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer late to haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Boeotia, lying ouer against the Iland; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priuiledge of an inuioiable Sanctuarie. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to bee seene, whilest others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Memippus, one of Antiochus his Captaines, that had wearied himselfe in manie vaine Treaties of peace; tooke aduantage of their carelesse sense, and vsed them with all extremitie of warre. Verie few of them escaped: sifue were taken, and the rest slaine. Herat Quintus was grieued; yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiser fort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referred themselves vntill hee should come among them: knowing that eyther, if hee came not, Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their iust feare, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joyned with him in true meaning; save the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Acheans. Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Acheans to his partie. Neuerthelesse hee assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the eniie, which Titus was said to beare vnto *Philopamen*s vertue, had bred a secret dislike betwene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Ætolians sent Embassadors to the Councell at Arginum; that spared not braue words, if the Acheans would haue so benee taken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming: reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimians and Cadusians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the

- the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be cersiled. Now concerning monie, and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwaies thereof great plentie. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late war made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vtmost partes of the East; requested no more of the Achaens, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilet He tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Aetolian Embassadour: and further added, That in the battel at Cynosephala, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good fouldiours: but that both He and his Armie had bene there destroyed, had they not bene protected by vertue of the Aetolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue bene desired. He told the Achaens, That neither the Kings Embassadour, nor the Aetolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vnto themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus linked the King and the Aetolians together. For euen such bragges as here they made, before the Achaens who knew them to be liars, had the Aetolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclayming the victorie ouer Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they bene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimaens, and a many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslauens, and good for little else. These diuerse names of fрасal people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, wherewith a freind of his at Chaleus (no such vanter as were these Embassadours) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, wherethee wondred, was none other, as his Host then merily told him; than so many peeces of one tame Swine, dressed after severall fashions with varietie of sawces. Seeing therefore aside this vanitie of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgment of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Armie he was faine, in a manner, to beg victuallies of the Aetolians; and take vp monie at vsurie, to despay his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence backe to Chaleis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Aetolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilet wiser men tooke heed by their example. To a favourable Auditorie much persuasion is needlesse. The Achaens did not loue so well the Aetolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abiects. Wherefore they stood not to harken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Euboea, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaymed war against him, and against the Aetolians.
- How the hatred betwene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appears in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent spirits of the Aetolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue bene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue fought, not how Smyrna and Lampsaes might recover their libertie (which had neuer bene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrie, as two Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from overflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greekish; than the generall applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachus, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a verie great cause of feare, that should move them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, & requested that things might continue as they were, promising joyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell bene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrie, had bene far from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achaens were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gaue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Beotians willingly received him, as soone as he entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had bene somewhat hardly vied. Aminander the Athamian, besides his old freindship with the Aetolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and wanted himselfe to be defended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sifter to the poore Court of Athamania: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was iudged by Antiochus and the Aetolians, a man fit for their times. They made him beleuee, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them herunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sifter, effected as much as they desired. But the first peece of seruice done by this imagine King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading; with which he marched vnto Cynscéphale, there to gather vnto the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedonians troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intending meercly vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that hee was ready with all his power to aid them wherein fouer they should be pleased to vse him.

The Aetolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Beotians, and Athamians, hauing now all ioyned with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting; who had long bene cast aside, as a vessell of no vse; but was now requiered to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vtter, ter, was euen the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before beene asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetiens, Boiotians, and other their good freinds, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as readie to fall to the contrarie side, alleading the same feare for their excuse? wherefore he thought it most behouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (belides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mightie Prince, and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easly perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a verie strong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, These Aetolians here present; and namely this TROAS, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motives which be then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that PHILIP was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that King to some wild beast, that was chained or lockt vp within some grate and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate:

20 that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angrie stomack, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it prouoe otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him, that he may not seeke to please his good master the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne SELEVCVS is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Arme: if PHILIP will not bearken to your Embassage; let SELEVCVS be in readines, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning PHILIP; and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the managging of this great enterprife, wherein you are now imbarqued against the Romans; I told you my opinion at the beginning. Whereto had you then giuen care; the Romans by this time should haue heard other newes, than that Chalcis in Euboea was become ours. Italie and Gaule should haue beene on fire with warre: and little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that HANNIBAL was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs enen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Arme hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victualles: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouths.) Whereof let the one halfe be employed against Italie; whilest you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may but take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen readie to follow vs into Italie: yea and be readie to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my

40 *advice: who though perhaps I am not verie skillfull in all sorts of warre: yet how to war with the Romans, I haue beene instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent service for the execution: but what counsaile saener you shall please to follow; I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; saue onely that one was sent into Asia, to make all things readie there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thesalie; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force; many other places, doubing their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was cheife of the Countrie, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the wals with his whole Arme. T his their faith*

50 *and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprietor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus: whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa grew such, as wrought more than the succour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines tops afarre off; and thought that* a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had bene coming vpon him. There fore excusing himselfe by the time of the year; Hee brake vp his seige, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne : whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betwene them, both in years and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captaines: in such wise that when he took the feild, he might evidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him verie shortly, and helpe him to reclaim them from this loosenesse of nuptial Ruels; by scitting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of farre lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had bene long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for verie feare and superstition, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuelt then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogatiue of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Province; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make war against the Boians: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fiftene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Aegypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedony had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Aetolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good carnell. But he was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his monie was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Phisips Embassadors answer was made, that this his freindly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him; for the assistance that He should giue to Acilius the Consul. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And herein Masanissa far ouer-went the poore Citie of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul fife hundred Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vnder-tooke to fet out a Fleet at their own charges; and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behind; and ought to be discharged by many yeerely penfions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. For the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betwene the Roman and the Asiaticke souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as hee had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to

But King Philip and Bibius, having recovered many places; and the Roman Consul being arruied, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good seruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking stocke: and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians vsed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them staid behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who hauing withdrawn himself to Chaleis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his freinds and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toile during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, He found all the promises of the Aetolians merely verbal: and himselfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea a verie Prophet, that had foreseen all this long before. Neuertheless He sent word to the Aetolians, that they should now make readie all their forces: as considering their owne need to be no lesse than his. But the Aetolians had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who hauing promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of the m, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyned with him. Hereat the King was angrie: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thoas and his fellows had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He seized vpon the Streights of Thermopyla: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopyla there hath beene spoken enough * before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came on wards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece: vnlesse they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betwene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a World of men comming to inuade the Countrie. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he listid himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilest he lay: He sent earnest messages one after other to the Aetolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at least wise now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path should come downe vpon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thousand, that undertooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared for the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them beene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to trie whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Aetolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what base-conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifullly reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before his battaile. All that night Cato had a fore iourne (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, saue onely that hee failed in his inteny and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepe Rocks and crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselves while He, being a verie able man of bodie, tooke in hand the discouerie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to him selfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neyther had this entrance of the Thermopylae bene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any traailers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best yett dit it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day light: by which he discouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Aetolians verie neare vnto him, that were keeping watch. Hee therefore sent forsa a lustie Crew of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice; and willed them by any means to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderstood, that these Aetolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set vpon the Aetolians; ouer-20 threw them; slue a great part of them; and chased the rest: that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was alreadie begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate peece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred downe a shouere of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Aetolians had bene com-

 30 ming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and enignes were discouered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnes of the way, did hinder the Roman Arme from making pursuit. Yet this daies losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence, with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Aetolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neyther did the Consul giue 40 them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recovered health came to joyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victorie was alreadie gotten, He did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successie; and offered to take part with them in the Aetolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclaeus and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who saine would haue taken Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindred by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen readie to be taken, when the Consul, hauing wonne Heraclaeus, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these Townes was a re-
 50 ward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip must bee contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Aetolus, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victorie, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul, was readie to ease him of his charge.

The losse of Heracles did so affright the Ætoliens, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them vterly, but eather to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with-held him from comming in person, at leastwise to help them with monie and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but appertained vnto his owne safetie: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætoliens being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes; might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true.

10 Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a summe of monie, that might serue to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Theos, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly stated, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heracles was taken from them: then did the Ætoliens lay aside all hope, of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suit vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said Hee had other buinesse in hand: onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as

20 much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their own cause, to acknowledge how well they had deserued of the Romans. Where to Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memorie of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by their mallice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremitie. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. His phrase of committing vnto the faith, signified,

30 in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgment of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then sayd Hee, I command you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any buinesse private or publike; then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dionarchus the Ætolian, Meneistratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athasmanian, and such of his Countreimen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest hee was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who had yielded themselves vnto his faith, not vnto slaverye. What? (said the Consul)

40 Doe yee stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought, and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euerie one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apocretior ordinarie Council of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause He entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This surceance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had bene commaunded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that hee might not returne home with his

Armie, like one that could not bee trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was delired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamania, Perrebalia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians, bearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, T hat although they were very ill provided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicaner about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with monie and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His monie Nicaner conueighed into Lamia, by verie vnusall dexterity. But hee himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was verie much perplexed about this his Iourne, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the aduerture: and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians, by whom hee was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but cyther to bee deliuered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemes, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his seruants to entreat Nicaner friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; T hat the Ætolians did now reape the fruits of their own madnesse, forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but would needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more auailable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. T hus much the King willed Nicaner to signifie vnto his Countreymen; and priuately to hold in mind the courttesie which hee then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuooy to gard him to Hypata; He louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicaner was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the warre of Perseus hee made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where hee ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: he forthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither he therefore directly marched, to trie what they could or durst. The seige of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconieued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Scyllus stood vpon point of honours, wherein he thought that he should haue beene a looser, by rising from before it without Victorie. So He itaid there weneare all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Acheans, made farre better vse of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victorie, subdued the Athamanians and others. T he Acheans called to accept the Eleans and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. T he Eleans gaue good words; whereby they faued themselves from trouble awhile. T he Messenians being more stout, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achean Pretor wasted their Countrie, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whome they sent word, word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Achaens it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achaen Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Achaens, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Majestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Achaens; yet could not like it wel, that eyther they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against anie of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once been Philips, and was afterwards giuen by him to Aminander who sent a Governour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philips: then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Iland to the Achaens, whom he found readie Chappmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achaens referred themselves vnto his discretion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell: and that holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having settled these thus in Peloponnesus, Hee went ouer to Naupaclus: where Glabrio the Consul had laine two monethes, that might haue bene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which Hee had vpon the Ætolians, or out of dislike of King Philips thriving so fast: Hee perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupaclus was in great danger: else would not the Ætolians haue made such earnest suit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had bene sure to carrie it, in any short space: it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without it; since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome: no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That eyther they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neyther Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much monie: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnderlood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeild vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But herof they could get no certaine answere: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilest the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to set things in order among the tractable Achaens. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedæmonians home into their Country; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Common-wealth. This the Achaens liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they desired the restitution of the banished Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Achaens: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted; and law that they should haue their desire, without such compulsiue mediation.

The

The Roman Admirall C. Linus, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twentie saile of Rhodiens came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of saile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betook himselfe to a speedie retreat.

And such end had the first yeares warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Ætoliens, were glad to excuse themselves by feare; thinking themselves happie when by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his yonger sonne, whom some few yeares they had kept as an hollage. Also King Ptolemie of Ægypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee desired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, whereinsoever it pleased them to vleit, should not be wanting. This Ptolemie was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but hee was the friend of Fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now beginne to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephesus, as if he had bene in another World: but was told by Hannibal, that it was not so farre out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italie into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soone be there, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

Such a question had not of long time bene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an vnblamable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Lieutenant. - relyed vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Capitaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had bene victorious against the same Great Worthie. But indeed a worser man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor farce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation, where his wisdom was much approued, but his libertic and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthe of remembrance, as a signe of the freedom that he vsed in his censures, euen whilst he liued in such a Court. Antiochus multered his Armie in presence of this famous Capitaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him with, that hee had bene serued by such braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauerie on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what hee thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most couetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backs of Cowardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King; it is ealie to guess. The little vs that hee made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to loofe the vs of his seruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof.
- 20 The Scipio's made all haile away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the warre, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirte Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Emilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same year for that Voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphissa a Citie of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vngarded the last year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and sel vpon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went hee to Amphissa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot and five hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphissa was presently forfaken by the inhabitants: but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadours had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Ætolians: entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and willed them to perswadethe Ætolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made fill the same answer, with which they had beene chased from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpeful commoditie which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a yeares Truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeares leisure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time lost, which withheld the Warre from passing ouer into Asia.
- The busines of Ætolia being thus laid aside: and the old Consul Glabrio sent home into Italie: the Scipio's marched into Thessalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace vnto the Hellspont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyaltie of King Philip: who might either doe them some mischeife by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would he be vnfaithfull, though he were not so - courageous;

courageous; yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victuall, it by no greater inconuenience, they should be disgraciously forced to returne. He had promised them the utmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as hee should take him on the sudden. The King was merrie at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly bad welcom; and shewed him the next day, not onely what prouision of victuall he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the bad waies by which they were to passe. With these good newes Grachus returned backe in haft vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readines, that might helpe to aduance their iourne. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, euen to the Hellefont: where they staid a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: truc to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countrymen that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe som what vpon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellows should arrive to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke; and sent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was belieued: and the Rhodian Admirall grew so carelesse, expecting stil when he should receiue a watchword from Polyxenidas, that he himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauens. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readie to enter the Hauens. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauens; so to gard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some companies, in another part of the Iland: which falling vpon the backe of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and sunke or boorded all his Nauie, five excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles, at the Beake-head: and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemy: who hauing not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies; for feare lest they should burne, together with the miselues, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such aduantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, He was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great brauerie, presented battaile to Polyxenidas before the Hauens of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as eather they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perlawed by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by storms at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elea and and Pergamus: and did with the rest of his brother of King Eumenes defend the Cities, Iland, and feare; and stand Foot, and vnder Philomenus was. This Diophanes Towne, the detem 10 should hold him in foot, seeing that he than by spoiling the Enemies Countrey would goe forth that the march was and sitting for the, him little better of meaning was: but his boldnes; and 20 ly. So they rest phases perceiving, he might: and he on the Station that readie sailed, but drawe them all out measure, with great citizens of Pergamus beheld this spectacle. Yet was 30 an in doing what mile further from forth Diophanes did. When they had the der as he came, with so moved one while them binde the pe with his Horse char pursued them at the an, and the balesnes 40 honous. Such being the Romans, That to affect his marriage, a time of great security they were tripling in haue done had He Antiochus was full with a great desire Pergamus: into which of his Horse and light mirall was come, to peace: about which Pergamus. But when the Consul Titus reand Pergamus: and leauing his sonne Selencus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Armie spoile the whole Countrie thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore hee had reason to stand in feare; being too much inferiour in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Acheans: old souldiors all, and trayned vnder Philopemen; whose scholler, in the Art of war, Diophanes their Commiander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemie; began to diddaine, that such men as they should hold him besieged. For Selencus his Armie which was encamped at the hill-foot, seeing that none durst fallie forth vpon them, grew lo carelesse: as otherwise, than by spoiling all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told him that lte would goe forth to vilit them. Attalus had no liking to this aduenture; for he said, that the match was nothing equall. But the Achean would needs haue his will: and issuing forth, encamped not far from the Enemie. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers; they wondered at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a iect of his boldnes; and laughed to see with what a handfull of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiuing, Hec commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they wight: and he himselfe, with the hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Verie few of the enemies had their Horses readie saddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as Hec draue them all out of their Campe; and chased them as far as hee might safely aduenture, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had couered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle) were verie ioyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Acheans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to helpe the Acheans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Selencus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than hee had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested awhile in his old Station. When they had staid many houres, looking who should begin: Selencus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moued not whilest the Enemie was in sight: but as soone as the ground between them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all hast, & soone ouertaking them with his Horse charged them in Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their verie Trenches. This boldnes of the Acheans, and the basenes of his owne men, caused Selencus to quit the seige, litle to his honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiatiques; Philopemen had cause to tell the Romans, That he enuid their victorie. For when Antiochus lay seatling at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiors betooke themselves to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great securitie: a good man of war might haue cut all their throtes, euen as they were tripling in their vltualing houses; which Philopemen said that hee would haue done, had He bin General of the Acheans, & not, as he then was, a priuate man.

Antiochus was full of busines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had bene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leauing the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before hath bene shewed, and went to Elea: whither hee heard that Emylus the Roman Admirall was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There hee made an Overture of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Emylus, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treatie brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned;

oned; which caused Seleucus to give over the seige of Pergamus. Afterwards, foure or five Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King; and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirtie Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and hauing the victorie taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not farre aduenture vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces vnto the war; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanitie of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus wanted the last year, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twentie: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timberd and thin planckt, hauing all aduantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselues by the lame deuice; with which, five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Naue hoysed saile: and hauing a faire wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forie of their Gallies they left behind them: wherof thirtie were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows lost onely two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Materie of the Sea.

The report of this misaduenture, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had beene remainyng, to defend those places that he held in Europe: Hee presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue bene kept, euen till the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the siege had bene continued obstinately) to termes of great extremitee. Hee also gaue ouer the seige of Calophon: and laying aside all thought faue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellepont; but had yielded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readines, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that He landed quietly at his owne good ease; euen as if the Countrey had bene his already. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemy, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaing peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampscus, and Lysimachia, had ben the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now alreadye giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to stitue with the Romans about Lampscus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with war? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or other wise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not be vnertaine; and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, wherat they had bene in this war. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune; Hee expected their their answer. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be verie little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his only fault: and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which he held in Æolis and Ionia; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keepe himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore saw, that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in priuate: and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is verie certaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor other wife to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a priuate man. As for the publike busines: Hee onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachus, and suffered the war to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition wherby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had beene already subdued: little reason there was, that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could loose, as hee thought, no more, than by seeking to auoid it he must giue away. He had with him threethore and ten thousand Foot, and twelue thousand Horse; besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was hee nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neare him apace, as one hastning to fight. But howeuer he was affected; Hee made to litte thew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sicke at Eles, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ranfome: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickness, and withall not desirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus sought his bountie to be constant. Other wise it might be suspected, That herein he dealt craftily. For since he could haue none other ranfome of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards haue beene little worth; than to slay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue beene much auailable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, He said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduising him not to fight, vntill wee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus resolued to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the Riuer of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sippus: where encamping, He fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul; and late downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slue some; and were anon, with some losse driuen backe ouer the Riuer. Two daies were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the aduenture: wherein they found no disturbance nor were at all opposed, vntil they came within two miles and an halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were taking vp their lodgings, they were charged by three thousand, Horse and Foote: whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure daies together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul ful tooke aduife what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon whatfoeuer disadvantage, or else resolute to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrie of their friends, and therefore subiect vnto many difficulties: vnlesse they would staine their honour by returninge farre backe, to winter in a more conuenient place; and so deferre the war vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldiour was throughly persuaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the general Crie, that this great Armie should be assailed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were fo many beafts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loath to dishonour his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy; resolued to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans took the field againe, and ordered their Battailles: He also did the like; and aduanced so farre, that they might vnderland his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vsually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were diuided into Maniples. The Hyllati had the leading: after them followed the Principes, at such distance as was vsual; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achaens; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vnto all of all (saue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trauians were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troupes of horse were placed there; though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: inasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would haue serued to discourage his men; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more courageous beafts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuersly pointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kinds, in such wise as each might be of most vse. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the middle, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants goodly beafts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fiftene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agona, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. Althwich Troupes of Horse, diuided in their severall kinds, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue been stretched out in Front. Adjoyning to these were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment: called the Argyrasides or Siluerforalls, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had serued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foot: two thousand and five hundred Archers of Aethiopia; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Circians, and Elymaans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Arriarabes, with two thousand and feuen hundred of diuers Nations.

Nations and a Regiment led the Army Traine, so Horse were the Chariots on five Arabians with men. Beyond this were Cilicians, Pamphilians, with them were the Seleucians in the left: and Phalangians.

The first onser was the oner, being like to the Foot, Eumenes with his Army made frustrate the noyles, and some were vpon their owne men. Wherefore the left wing: who others being without it may hardly seeme to be charged. One of his owne battaine; and the other with Horse; gave M. Amyntus, that had power to helpe his fence the fight. So already victorious: he turned his Horse at the Campe was detatched fiftie thousand Foot, the Romans, there were Horse: of Eumenes had Antiochus had to see that Seruas was gone there, to one whom hee so dismayed with the nothing. All the Towr themelus by Embassadors theway, Nerthus was the Campe: hauing Romans to impole upon there: who obtained required no more than abandon his Dominion: they required fiftene five hundred, with the peace; and the other ones. Likewise they de Come, that was done which they recovered, that the Romans, will turned into that hand would be their purpose.

Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troop; being Syrians, Pergians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sat Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrians, Elymans, and many others, hauing also with them sixteene Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captaines commaunded ouer the Phalangiers.

- 10 The first onset was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot, Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with showings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: where they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with such varietie of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse; gaue vpon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Emilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renewe the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious; whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach, he not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further variance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine aboue three hundred Foot, and foure and twentie Horse: of Eumenes his followers sixe and twentie.

- Antiochus* fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townesmen and Souldiors were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded vp themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neyther were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans; to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother: who obtained leaue to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That hee should quite abandon his Dominions on this side of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fiftene thousand Talents: sixe hundred in hand; two thousand and sixe hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeares next ensuing by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some more 50 of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, verie earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thomas the Etolian, with some others who had stirred vp the King to this warre, deliuered into their hands. But any wife man might so easily haue perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to lend immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Confils chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Vulso. The Aetolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it; because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make Warre vpon the Aetolians, the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes, that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so thoroughly setled by one Victorie, but that many things might fall out worthe of the Romans care; Cn. Metellus, to whome Asia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodiens and some others: yea by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his owne deserts: and comparing himselfe with Masaniassa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had bene to the Nomidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniassa was onely such in title, and since both he and his father had alwayes bene their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what he would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtisie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craued that they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countrey by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their ownhands. Neyther thought hee it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing libertie to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The Rhodiens did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian libertie; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece itselfe had bene subiect vnto Phillip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alledged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Phillip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victorie of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that every one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumphe: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deserued; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians, and the Galgreekes, vanquished by the Roman Consuls FVLVIUS and MANLIUS. MANLIUS hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by SIBYLL. ARE FVLVIUS and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided betwene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mns worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Roman Majestie, it was now to be brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not v unexpected vpon the Ætolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadours were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so deiected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuise, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countreys lost, where they spied aduantage.

Poore King Aminander liued in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Cailles. But the Atbamanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing beene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuerfed with them after an homelie manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of commaund, vsed by the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vndertooke the worke. Yet assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countrey, to his vs. The fame of this good successe at first, with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action: made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few daies; giuing thereby some leisuere vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all saue two thousand behind him, & so came to Athensam, a little Atbamanians Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying ouer Argibeas, that was chiefe of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King, had the boldnesse to descend vpon Argibeas; for that they might perceiue the Atbamanians, all along the hill sides, readie to come downe vpon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: specially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argibeas, and presently withdrawne by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet, at their pleasure.

30

The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layed them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plain flight, with great losse of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians, hauing found the businesse of Athamania to easie, made attempt, in their owne behalf, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently reuolted, and became Ætolian againe. The Ethiopiens lay next; that had bene cuer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke armes at first: but soone layed them away, seeing their neighbours readie to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Confull his halting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that he had recouered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouters. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had bene the chief seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, vnlesse they would adventure to fight vpon equall ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Ilyrians at sea, and readie to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countreies of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Confull to graunt them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the assaillants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Confull had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so he driuen to leaue vnto his successors the honour of finishing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bad them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediator, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vsufferable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made verie grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countreies, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which those good Mediators of Athens and Rhodes did earnestly sollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the libertie of the people of Rome, and to oblerue diuers articles, which made them lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they hauing bene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrey. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as nor long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Scheams, by stiffly pressing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to forbear the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set downe an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require require to haue the Romans Iudges of the controuersies, when they should arise. And hereof good vse will be shortly made: when want of emploiment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordlie Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Galgreekes and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whole victorie, his acts were the consummation. Hee visited those Countries on the higher side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at warres, without regard of the great alteration hapned in Asia. From euery of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Prouinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. He was euen loaden with bootie, when, hauing fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Galgreekes. These had long dominated ouer the Countrey: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their forepassed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such trial, when they serued vnder King Antiochus, as made them to know themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their satisfaction, that they dwelt vpon the River Halys, in an Inland Countrey, where those enemies were not likt to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had bene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: there was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and with all that they could carrie or drue, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vndertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally,

30 when he had staied there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Galgreekes had bene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if the stones would haue serued well enough to that purpose: the Romans, who came farre other wise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Galgreekes, neither exercised in that manner of sight, nor hauing prepared their stones before hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the 40 Barbarians, wanting defensiuie armes, could not hold out against the arrows and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a peece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rocks. Few of the men escaped alive: all their wiues, children, and goods, became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation ouercome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backs.

These warres being ended: Fuluius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul his Prouince for another yeare. Fuluius, in his second yeare, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom hee had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for leare of the Roman armes. Hee drew from them all what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as hee thought expedient. Hee also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus, whereof

he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom hee sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Helleſpont, laden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallogrecques had in so many yeares extorted, from the wealthie Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattail, or things of needfull vse, which the Roman souldier had bene wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household-stuffe, and flaves of price, excellent Cookes, and Multicians for banquets, and, in a word, with the feedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrey of Thrace lay betwene Helleſpont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iournic homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such bootie as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with an huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not so well containe themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it other wise than verie pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angrie; seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Aetolians; promising morcouer to restore vnto him all the Grecke Cities, that had bene taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betwene him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victorie, to giue away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Cherſoneſus and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodiens had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipios, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neare acquaintance with Pulcius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spain and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wanne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and intrusted how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these vsurpt Kings of Pergemus, whom hee accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found hee great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that hee had ioined with Antiochus and the Aetolians, by whom he might haue bene freed from his insolent masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall verie shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrey. They knew all advantages: and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midde of the Armie; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting, and the sauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the

To Mantius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Mantius; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assit him, did very bitterly taxe, as an unworthie Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chiefs of the Senate. One clause is worthe of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindred the peace with Antiochus; they said, That with much adoe he was kept

10 from leading his Armie over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamitie threatened by Sibyls verses, unto those that should passe the fatal bounds. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatened the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe over Taurus; I doe not conceue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before hand wonne, in a fort, the Countreys on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gauē to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeede the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out neare about 20 one time, with the restitution of Ptoleme King of Egypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference, vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tulie noteth, found at random in the large field of Time, there to rike root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptoleme to his Kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should haue any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers, haue bene well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibylline prædictions I haue sometimes thought reuerendie: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But obseruation of the shameful

30 Idolatrie, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my eruditie, and made mee suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of maister Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was forehewed, but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited peeces, and at first entertained (whosoever deuised them) by the vnderferre zeale of such, as

40 delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strenghtned with foreine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historic, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely of an Altar to him crected, with an inscription Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetanius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then liued and flourished, would haue obtained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some had Criticisme, taken amisse in place of SEMONI SANGO: a title four hundred yeares older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebel, had many ages before bene consecrated SEMONI SANGO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chapell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, SIMONI SANCTO; and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sanguis, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more historiciall, than was conceiued by the Author. But it cannot be saie, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last payment of those monies, which the Common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen as long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipios were called, one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the People, men, only by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasurie, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrie. When therefore his day of answeere came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middelt of the Assemlie, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the People, That vpon the same day of the yeare he had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre by a signall victorie. In memorie whereof, hee thought it not fit season to bragge at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitall, and there giue thanks to Iupiter and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weightie businesse of the Common wealth. And hereto he inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the seruenteenth yeare of his life, vntill hee now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had exceeded the capacitie of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne slaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, vntill for verie shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeares he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeare, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vn certaine. The report of his dying in the same yeare, with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his priuate behauiour at Liternum, render it probable, that he outliued the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawne him backe to his answeere, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howfoer it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Africanus. They pronounced a Decree vnto the People, touching monie receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasurie; That the

In fauour of this Decree an Orat[i]on was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue: temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugal also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmercifull and vnconscionable, in seeking to encrease his owne wealth, by such meanes as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with enuie, troubled both himselfe, and the whole Citie, whilest he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie; especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopyle, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carrie it, he tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perurie, That he had not brought into the common Treasurie some vessels of gold and siluer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipios grew partly (besides his generall spight at the Nobilitie) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurie he then was. For when Cato did vtter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandrie (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some premporie manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurie. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vttruce reports against his General; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipios, whilest it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuerie inquirie and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soone condemned in a summe of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie should haue bene layed vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his citize, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing bene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had bene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had bene against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and clients made such a collection for him, as would haue sethim in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. He tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessarie vse, being redeemed for him by his neerer friends.

And thus began the ciuile warre of the Tangue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not bene, or not bene much regardable, vntill now, since the Pannicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire, which first caught hold vpon that great Worthie, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great securitie her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of words, and cunning practise. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubbes and stoues, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Ladie of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Græcchi, Gracchus, saw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather aproued by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue woon a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authoritie they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuile warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consull had finally cause to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in need of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voices in the House, did compell Cesar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: where with preuailing against his aduersaries, he took such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedom, and became subiects vnto the arbitrarie government of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their inuolent rule, wherein they took vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth; to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatness, nor beleued of her selfe as if she had, whilest a King sat crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this confirmation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequelle will discouer.

soever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Mones; and To reserve (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed foures; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeals, or last resort, as euerie petty iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senatours themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Commonweales, declined, He or they were beateen, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vtterly dissolved. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrarie; neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especial regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Matters.

And to such degree of seruitude the seuerall Estates of Greece did bow verie gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grievous, or as being skillfull in the art of flatterie, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriving; or, as being more fearefull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuertion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auailable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they verie louing vnto Masaniissa, and to his Houe, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Affrike: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the ministerie of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vilefall and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimitie was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that hee had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his Countrey, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellepont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Enus and Marenea, with all Peeces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof manie of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselves.

These Townes of Enus and Marenea had bene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North west, extended his dominion verie farr. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transylvania: in which Prouince it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold haue bene found, in the age of our grand fathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he listed not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of warre, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolomie Cerasanus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily walk away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gauls being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recovered their libertie; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to finde their aduantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefes commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull vrsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answer, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as hee thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue laid, touching Enus and Maronea; That they were Places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled, in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre; and since they, by their victorie had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Enus and Maronea should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Oberssonsus, that were already by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demanour of their Embassadors towards him; who sitting as Iudges betwene him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in curie controuersie. Neuertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equirie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either hee was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might berinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in placding against him for their libertie, he tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little joy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majestie, to an account. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factiōns, being some incinable

And hereof hee wilked the Embassadours to inquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who furnished were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But hee found the Romans more severe, and more thoroughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if she would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a lttle trouble
 10 him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not bene at Marones, nor neare to it, hee requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; heeooke order to haue him poisoned by the way. By this wee see, That the doctrine, which Machiavel taught vnto Cesar Borghia, To employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe, was not of his owne invention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodlie policie, the latter hauing bene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancknt; as the reigne of Henric the eighth here in England, can beare good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same iust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which hee feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore hee employed his younger sonne Demetrius as Embassadour vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints; and wishall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had bene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be verie acceptable vnto the 30 Senate; as hauing bene well approved by them, when hee was hostage in Rome; and therefore seemed the more likelic, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likelic to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had bene Iudges betwene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuerfies, which they found betwene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedaemonians against the Achaens. It was objected vnto the 40 Aens, That they had committed a grieuous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedaemon: That vnto this crueltie they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lyortias, then Pretor of the Achaens, made answer; That these banished Lacedaemonians, who now rooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame vpon others: the Achaens hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, 50 as they were coming to make answer for the mefelues. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedaemon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kindes of fortifications; as the

Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vfurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walles, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quiteabolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achaens; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycurtus plainly told App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadors, That hee and his Countermen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus contrained, to answer and giue account of their actions; as vassals and slaues vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Achaens as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capus, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worthy longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Achaens haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without perurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeed fearing, the Romans but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold answer of Lycurtus, Appius found little to replie. Yet taking state vpon him, hee pronounced more like a Master than a Iudge, That if the Achaens would not be ruled by faire means, and came thanks whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achaens; which growed to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare prevailed above Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans: to doe as they listed. Herevpon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, verie soone after, did make void all Judgements of death or banishment, that had bene laid by the Achaens vpon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as like wise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territorie of Lacedæmon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achaen Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made, as it had bene, an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discouered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achaens, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slauiery had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and perswasions of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearful seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes verie farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was hee not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrie would be his, whensoever he should take armes, as shor-

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spitefull enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condescend: or rather (as Lucie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betwene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiours were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuised some secret fauies vnder ground to saue himselfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedie: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, he tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwayes preferred for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerser fortune; which being readie to swallow downe, he vttered these wordes: I will now (said he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres 20 *possesst them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victorie of FLAMINIUS ouer me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer be numbred among the rest of his heroiicall deedes: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the World, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their forefathers; as, when PERSEVS invaded them in Italie, and was readie to giue them battaile at their owne doores, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson: whereas these of a later race haue employed FLAMINIUS, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, to practise with PERSEVS, contrarie to the honour of a King, contrarie to his Faith giuen, and contrarie to the Lawes of Hospitality, to laughter or deliuer vp his owne Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelity, dranke off the poyson, and died.*

30 In this yeare also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had he bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authoritie might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did 40 lastly dissolve it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Country and Commonweale.

Hence it comes to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and jealousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, that there is no Profession more vnprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and jealousie of men; the spoiles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries layed on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Montes the Marshall of France confesse, That were not the merites of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. How soeuer, this is true, that the victories, which are obtayned by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues haue rayed them about the leuell of their inferiours, and haue surmounted their enuie: yet haue haue they beene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Luins, L. Emilius, and this our Scipio, whom we haue lately buried. Among the Greekes we read of not many, that escaped the rewards. Yea long before these times, it was a Legate that Danis bequeathed vnto his victorious Capitaine Josh. With this fare Alexander casted Armenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Aetius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnies, in the greatst battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was frucken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, besides runne-awaies, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, T hat in killing of Aetius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Aetius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durst attempt, Aetius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Aetius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolued, than obscured. The same vnworthie destinie, or a farr worse, had Bellisarius, whose vndertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and he died a blinde begger. Narles also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustine. That Rule of Cato 20 against Scipio, hath beene well observed in euerie age since then, to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence haue the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkish one, That euerie warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of warre, than suffer his owne glorie to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bairest the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes, bring to ruine the most of their Viziers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsaluo, who drave the French out of Naples; and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines 39 of all Nations, haue beene paid with this copper coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrarie it may bee said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue beene giuen, or offered, vnto verie few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, T hat the Tyrants which haue oppressed the libertie of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traiterously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vied the advantage of some commotion, or many of them, by base and cowardlie practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vnderferuently were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farrre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a fouldour, and by helpe of the fouldiours, hee got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but hee was a coward; and with a barbarous crueltie, seldome found in any other than cowards, hee slue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. T his his bloudie aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heracius: who took from him the Imperial Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Le 59 ontinus laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius: to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre, Iustine, hauing recouered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same

But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, hee enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endless, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Zoro rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue bene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousand, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by GODS iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriving, by the practise of armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserued. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulnesse in this kind, hath been found belonging to all Countreys and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: and there was found a poore and wise man therein, and he deliuered the Citie by his wisdome: but none remembered this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks, least thereby they should acknowledge themselves to haue bene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them thinke to fauour of some impotencie in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes censured and abused: which proues that weakenesse to be in them indeede, whereof they so gladly shunne the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks: yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoile of the enemy, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the well-deseruers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most clean from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hercof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipios being so lately recited.
- 30 In my late Souerainnes time, although for the warres, which for her owne satisfaction shee was constrained to vndertake, her Majestie had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martiall men both by Sea and land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeares had, yet, according to the destinie of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Majestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witness, who in all her daies neuer receiued dishonour, by the cowardise or infidelitie of any Commander, by her selfe cholen and employed.
- 40 For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Mathey, Randell, Drenrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunsfable, Bourchier, Barkley, Bingham, and others: so those of a later and more dangerous imploiment, whereof Zorice and Vere were the most famous, and who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had as euer any did: those I say) with many other braue Collonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many traualles and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. willoughbie of Ershy, two very worthy and exceeding valliant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.
- 50 That her Majestie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner belecue other men than her selfe, a discafe vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue bene subiect, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where where the prosperous Actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so vnprofitous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, & among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which martial men sildome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a Profession farre more noble than their own, seeing therein they should only mind their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deservng, and of farre greater vse than themselves.

But his Majestie hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, he hath honored more Martiall men 10 than all the Kings of England haue done for this hundred yeares.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the year 1588, as at Calix, the Hands, and in our owne Seas; hauing first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Majestie hath changed the Baronies of Montoy and Barley into Earldomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Ruffel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their governments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

PHILIP repenteth him of his sonnes death; whome he findeth to haue bene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on PERSEVS, he dieth.

QVINTVS MARTIUS the Roman Embassador, who trauielled vp and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to haue discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoeuer they enioyned him; yet so, as it might appeare, that such his obedience would last no longer, than mere necessitie should enforce him therunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was deuising. Now it was founde, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiounesse to the Romans, 40 and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with sacrifice of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what meanes soeuer. He was in an ill case: as hauing been already vanquished by them; hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could deuisse against the necessitie which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romans, hee compelled to forsake their dwellings and removed them all into Emathia. PHILIP making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with manie of his owne Subjects. His negotiation with the Bastarnæ. His crudelty. These were like to doe him notable seruice against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefite that could be hoped by their arriuall, mult be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwayes troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found aduantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarna, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expedition on, through Ilyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scythians, and peraduenture some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarna from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey vnto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuile Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: for as the Bastarna came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the trayning of his men to warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and food worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meet for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within wordes: he hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also he did vnrillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparent. This euill therefore would soone haue bene determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traitorous malice; and accordingly sought reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deseruedly. This encreased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generally; when the King in a barbarous and base furie, mistrusting all alike whom hee had iniuried, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill he should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whome tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical than perhaps he could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, he felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention betwene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreme jealousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparrell, or the vnsightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jelled at in ordinarie discourse and table-talk, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praying them, euen in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conuerlation with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much least his brother should step betwene him and the succession, conuerted wholly, vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirtie yeares olde; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five yeares, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought old and craftie ynough, to entertaine more dangerous practises, than his free speeces discovered. The jealous head of the King hauing entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practise of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muller, and ceremonious Iulstration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus. They cleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailles, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the verie first original, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King betwene his two sonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vsing poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earnestly seeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was sorrie for this, as it had bene some bad preface: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vse. They were of the craftier sort: who perceiving which way the Kings fauor bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, address'd their seruices to the more malicious and craftie head. And now they said, that this victorie of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solempne pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spyes in the others lodging, to obserue what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indifferently, that he was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leaue none of his traine behind, but forced them also to beare him companie. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his doores, as if he stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himselfe excluded, and faced vnie anglerly with his brother. But Perseus, bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment, no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the same that hath bene here recited, saue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which

which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had vnderaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to vndertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect vnto his father, and was sorrie to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somwhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For prooffe herof he cited a letter, sent of late from T. Quintius to the King himselfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wilely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonians Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsell was giuen by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should wayt vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become seruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as hee remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that conuerted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocents brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him; Hee said that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practise, He were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a ialous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the excess or error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres aduicence of the matter, but vpon better obseruation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seeme to haue dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward, he gaue himselfe ouer iustly to Perseus: vnto little conference with his yonger sonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans; He liked neither to haue him present, nor neare vnto him. About all, he had especial care, to learne out what had passed betwene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philoetes and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interceded in the quarrells betwene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose scale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practises vnjustifiable against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect; for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuce. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pitied the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and fo wrought out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flie secretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in safetie, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such daime as he had in reuerion vnto the 50 Crowne of Macedon. Whatsoeuer his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the fallhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death; without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as prooffe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despatch against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This his accursed Minister of his Kings vnadvised fence, first gaue poyson to Demetrius; which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedie: who vnawisly accomplished their worke by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Alexandria.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not bene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander fell eyther with themselves, or euen vpon their heeles; by intestine discord and icalousities, grounded on desire of soueraine rule, or feare of loosing it. By the like vnnatural hatred, had almost bene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and of Selenus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously diltempred. Contrariwise, it was worthe of extraordinarie note, how that vniuersall family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it selfe to marvellous greatness, in verie short space, from the condition of meere slaueerie; whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neyther was Philip ignorant of these examples; but it is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But hee was himselfe of an vnmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to be a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon manie of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirstie appetite hee delightfully had committed vpon manie innocents, both strangers, & subiects of his owne kind; now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found hee nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not bene contriuer of the whole proesse. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceiued in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remoue of those dangers, which hee had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to be feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vsuall trouble of mind, and carelesnesse of making prouision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betweene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner desolate: some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer bene slow to apprehend. He was much vexed; and so much the more, for that he knew, neyther well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable man, a Cousen of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hateful to Perseus: and thus becoming subiect vnto the same icalous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsaillour, when hee found that the anger conceiued against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue case to the King, vntill the truth were knowne Whether Demetrius were guiltie or no of the reason objected; as also that Philotes and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgerie in the busines; made diligent inquire

Some were of opinion, that by this vnawisly blood, that by the vnawisly another, were more vertues, and withall against this discouerie, Apelles forasmuch as he could gainie, or else was put should need to be the fathers presence. inquire after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one Xybus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what hee knew. Xybus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that hee had bin employed by the Embassadors in that wicked pece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreame, when hee vnderstood, that by the vnnaturall practise of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous, and innocent. Hee raged exceedingly, against himselfe, and withall against the Authors of the mischiefte. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie. Philodes was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not denie it when Xybus confronted him, yelded himselfe forsake, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to fle the Countrie: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the kingdome, towards Thrace, whilest his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, & conferre it vpon Antigonus. But his weake bodie, and excessiue greife of minde, so disabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yeild to nature: He had reigned about two & fortie yeares: alwayes full of troubles; as vexed by others, and vexing himselfe, with continuall wars; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappie, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, he might thanke his owne peruerse condition: since his vncke King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well seled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsaile. Wherefore he was iustly punished: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginarie happinesse of a Tyrant, which hee affected, and the life of a King, wherof hee little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilest yet it was only drawing neare, was foresignified vnto Perseus, by Calligenes the Phisitian; who also concealed it awhile from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse improudently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

Further quarrels to PERSEVS. He seeks friendship of the Acheans, and is withstood by CALICRATES. The Romans discover their intent of warring vpon him.

Immediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bastarna into Thrace: where order had bin taken, long before, both for their free passage, and for the indemnitic of the Countrie. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as none other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; & not heard withall, that hee tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all daunt and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto the strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Basilarnes would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers, Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip: grew carefull of thiuing in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Basilarnes had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countreies. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, receiued by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether becaufe of extreame bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirtie thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirtie thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not find. It seemes that by the careless vng of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that decalation, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countreie.

As for Persus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his mind to the feeling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion: he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; hee saue personally to heare their causes in iudgment (though herein hee was so ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceiued this his vertue of iustice to be no better than feined) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Abooue all he had care to auoid all necessitie of warre with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which hee obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbors: but was rather herein so excellently bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder, how in few yeares, to his vtter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeed the maistring passion, which ouer-ruled him, and changed him into so manie shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For prooue of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in wars against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Isfria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Ithyrians and others. Ouer the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victorie) a heauie hand: and suffered Masanissa to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masanissa therefore had great aduantage ouer them: and was not ignorant how to vse it. Hee could get possession by force, of what seauer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could bee at Rome; and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countreie of Emporia: and so did hee vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where hee had anie; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masanissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala; and within a while, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonissa, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose judgment the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome.

They had scarcely digested this iniurie, when Masaniſſa came vpon them again, and tooke from them about ſeuentie towneſ and Cathels, without any colour of right. Hercof by their Embaſſadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They ſhewed how grievouſly they were oppreſſed by reaſon of two articles in their League: That they ſhould not make warre, out of their owne lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were ſo, that they might lawfully withſtand the violence of Masaniſſa, inuading their Countrey, howeouer he was pleaſed to call it hiſ: yet ſince hee was confederate with the Romans, they durſt not preſume to beare deſenſive armes againſt him, but ſuffered them-
 10 ſelues to be eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that eyther they might haue fairer iuſtice; or be ſuffered to defend their owne by ſtrong hand; or at leaſt, if right muſt wholly giue place to fauour, That the Romans yet would be pleaſed to determine, how farre forth Masaniſſa ſhould be allowed, to proceed in theſe outrages. If none of theſe petitions could be obtained, then deſired they, that the Romans would let them vnderſtand, wherein they had offended ſince the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchſafe to inflict on them ſuch puniſhment, as they themſelues in honour ſhould thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to ſuffer at once what ſhould be appointed by ſuch Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwiſe draw 20 breath than at the mercie of this Nomidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embaſſadors threw themſelues proſtrate on the ground weeping in hope to moue compaſſion. Here may we behold, the fruites of their enuie to that valiant houſe of the Burchinſes; of their irrefolution, in proſecuting a war ſo importaint, as Hannibal made for them in Italies; and of their halfe penne-worthing, in matter of expenſe when they had aduentured their whole eſtate, in the purchaſe of a great Empire. Now are they ſeruants, euen to the ſeruants of thoſe men, whoſe fathers they haue often chaſed, ſlaine, taken, and ſold as bondſlaues in the ſtreets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africa and Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which 30 Hanno ſo often and ſo earneſtly deſired. Only they want peace with Masaniſſa; once their mercinarie, and now their maſter, or rather their tormentor; out of whoſe cruell haids, they beſeech their maſters to take the office of correcting them. In ſuch caſe are they, and adore the Romans, whom they ſee flouriſhing in ſuch proſperitie as might haue bin their own. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who loſt the bartell at Cannæ; then Hannibal that wannic it was vſed by the Carthaginians; they had freely beſtowed, euerie man of them, all hiſ private riches, vpon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without craving recompenſe: as alſo they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to ſet out an armie into Spaine, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne wals. Theſe were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the *Carthagi-
 40 nians*, hauing fought againſt their betters, muſt patiently endure the miſeries belonging to the vanquiſhed. Their pitifull behauiour bred peraduenture ſome commiſeration, yet their teares may ſeeme to haue bene miſtruſted, as proceeding no leſſe from enuie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themſelues able to fight with Masaniſſa: which eſtimation of their forces was able to make them, after a litle while, enter into compariſons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no ſuch leaue as they ſought, of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwiſe, when without leaue obtained they preſumed ſo far, the deſtruction of Carthage was thought an eaſie puniſhment of that offence. At the preſent, they receiued a gentle anſwere; though they had otherwiſe litle amends.
 50 Gaiuſſa the ſonne of Masaniſſa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craued audience. Hee was therefore called before the Senate; where hee was demanded the reaſon of hiſ comming; and had related vnto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians againſt hiſ Father. He anſwered, That hiſ Father not being thoroughly aware of anie Embaſſadors thither ſent from Carthage, had therefore not giuen him instructions, how to deale in that busines. Only it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell diuerse nights, in the Temple of Esculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not bee ouermuch trusted, especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answer was gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masaniſſa his sake, they had done, and would doe, what soeuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the covenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to enjoy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnreasonably to rebellion) or Masaniſſa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masaniſſa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vsage in the future; by Masaniſſa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should bee vanquished; hee made none other account, than that all Africke round about him and Carthage therewithall should bee his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not beene vnmindfull of Perſeus. They visited him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behaviour. These hee entertained kindly at first, vntill (which tell our ere long) hee perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania; eyther would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Besarnes were thence gone; though hee protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done to sundrie of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which they said (that he did vnto other some. Where hee did harme to anie; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vnlesse eyther they had bin extremely prouoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoeuer it was that bred this courage in them: Perſeus did soone ally it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke verie angrily, this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had inuaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselves haue done the part of Masaniſſa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betwene them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take arms without their license first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equal tearmes: whom vsually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoeuer they presumed to fight themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achaens had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers; and whose hope of extraordinary dinarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messians by warre; T. Quintus rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie; yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats; when they tooke vpon them to carrie any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheless, vpon submissiō, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to thrive especially in vsurping the praefise of farmes, which belonged only to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesſon, they were such vntoward schollars, that they needed, and not long after felt, verie sharp correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Achaens; refused not only to giue them such aide as they requested; and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a carelesse insolencie, reiected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italye, with victuals or armes. Here with not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argines, Lacedaemonians or Corinthians, would reuolt from the Achaens; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopomen: at what time it was beleued, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall in to much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Praetor of the Achaens had vtterly subdued the Messians; farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Towne rebelled from the Achaens, but manie entred into their corporation; then did the Romans, with an ill fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to bee carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their conditions; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates; not permitting anie of them to make warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meere strangers; without interpoling the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Roman arts how fouler manie (for gainfull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neyther subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring anie into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to praefise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mightie. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mithridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratuators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdomes, that with ouer nice diligence strove to preserve their libertie and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to be deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Nacchonian, as the most vnpliant, and wherein manie of the Greekes beganne to haue affiance, was necessarily to bee made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to breake.

Neyther

Neyther Perseus, nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus by reason of his neare neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, Whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage.
 Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their libertie, felt themselves grieved with the present subiection, whetto alreadie they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to chooe among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrey, and would for no ambition, or other seivile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestick conspiracies would soon be at an end; when honest and iudicious of the Common weale, became the faire way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safetie of Greece, the Romans were not throughly aduertised: eyther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies, or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom euerie Citie in Greece) had to manie) as were men vtgarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which manie know, from those that are feared or flattered by manie. The Achaens being to send Embassadours to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point whereto they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse, chose one Callistates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their wil desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weake publike. For this Callistates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more autoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and allcaiding what was meetest in iustification of his people: hee vttered a quite contrarie tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Achaens, and all the rest of Greece, with a fatter more heauie hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the setting of their autoritie, among his froward Countreymen; if they ment not wholly to foregoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of con-federacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any in-iunction from Rome notwithstanding. Hence grew it that the Achaens both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if He, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wils: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columes or Monuments erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to giue eare, vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to bee more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vnder tooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer to bad, were increase apace, and they became the prevalent faction. It was therefore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiety. More wisely, though with seditions & rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea & ordinarily, conferred great honors, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these & the like reasons, wherwith he exhorted the to handle roughly those that were oblitinate, & by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsaile, in euery point; yea to depreesse al those that held with the right, & to set vp their own

10 followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt the contrary more perceptorily with the Acheans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrot at the present vnto al cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedaemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callistates; they aduised all men, to be such, and so affected, as he was, in their severall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callistates returned home a ioyfull man; hauing brought his Countrie into the way of ruine, but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheless hee forbore to vant himselfe, of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Only he for reported his Embassage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherwith he threatened 20 those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts hee obtained to be made Pretor of the Acheans; in which Magistracy, as in al his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serue to manifest his readie obsequiounes vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans; by threatening termes wan manie flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberal gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeste than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonians; and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wher-
 30 in they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, that a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shal afford them iust occasion to make war vpon him. Perseus hauing finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a iournie to Apolla his temple at Dalphi. He tooke his armie along with him; yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his iournie, but the good affectio towards him generally increas'd thereby. With those that were in his way, hee dealt himselfe, to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters, praying them, That the 40 memorie of all wrongs whatsoeuer, done by his father, might bee buried with his father; since his own mening was to hold friendship sincerely with al his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could haue beene pleased better, if he had behaued himselfe after a contrarie fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a iournie, without their licence, this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Acheans; which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbad any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arats, giuen them 50 cause to abhor him; yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, bin to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any general consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preferuation of concord among them, to vse all circumspection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Countrie towards wards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of war, and when all danger of innoation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leauing meanes of reconciliation. And heretofore the Achaens reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon; yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profitable vs. But Perseus tooke hold vpon this occasion: as fitly scruiing to pacifie those, whose enmitie faigne he would haue changed into loue. He therfore apprehended all these fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achaens, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Pretor, before the Councell, but Callierates took the matter very angrily; and bad them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he tooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achaens before hand acquainted with the war, that was comming vpon Perseus, from Rome. He told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same war; how Demetrius had bin made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done manie things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly Here heard all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans; the inuasion of the Bastarns, vpon the Dardaniens; the Kings iourne against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphis; and finally his peaceable behaviour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his partie. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the event of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Callierates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neyther one of the Kings cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renewed his league with the Romans; that hee was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that He had louingly entertained their Embassadours. This being so: why might not the Achaens, as well as the Etolians, Thessalians, Epilots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanity required? Neuertheless Callierates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-fluently gain say him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the while, That since the King had only sent a letter without any Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus, here with not contented, would needs vrge them further, and send Embassadours: then were they fittely without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and denie to give audience; which was prooue sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For hearkning to this aduice of Callierates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparent; that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonians; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

§. V.

How EVMENES King of Pergamus was buſied, with PHARNACES, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom hee accuſeth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the cauſes thereof. The vnuſual ſourneſſe of the Macedonian Embaſſadors; PERSEVS his attempt vpon EVMENES. The brotherly loue betwene EVMENES and ATTALVS. PERSEVS his deuice to perſon ſome of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre againſt him, and ſend him defiance. Other things, concerning the iuſtice of this warre.

EV MENES King of Pergamus had bene troubled, about theſe times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Antiochides his neighbours. Hee had taken the right courſe; in making firſt his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, & promiſe, That they, by their authoritie, would end the buſines, to his content. But in concludion, by the helpe of the Kings Pruſias and Antiochides, hee ended the warre him ſelfe; and brought his Enemies to ſeeke and accept peace, on ſuch conditions as pleaſed him to giue them. After this being at good leiſure; hee beganne to conſider, how the affaires of Macedon ſtood vnder Perſeus. His hatred to Perſeus was verie great: and therefore hee was glad vnderſtand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the ſame his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now beſides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonian, it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kind, had heaped immoderate ſtore on his father and him) began to wax euerie where ſtale: whileſt Perſeus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their beſt liking and wiſhes. For deſpight of this indignitie, Hee ſtirred vp the Lycians againſt the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping theſe rebels was ſo violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But ſmall pleaſure found hee, in theſe poore and indirect courſes of reuenge. The Lycians could not be ſaued by his patronage, from ſeuere and cruell chaſtiſement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as like wiſe, his acts of boſtilitie, little different from robberies, made him hateful to thoſe which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achaens, as too vnmeaſured, miſbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deſeruings. All this (which hee needed not to haue regarded, had hee not benee too vainly ambitious) beſell him, eſpecially for his being ouer-ferniceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it felt the libertie of Greece was not like to ſtand. Now for the redreſſe hereof; hee thought it vaine to ſtrive any longer with bountie, againſt ſuch an aduerſarie, as by hopefull promiſes aloue, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the general fauour. And therefore hee reſolued euen to ouerturne the foundations of this Popularity, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idoll, The Macedoniſſe Kingdome, which all ſo vainly worſhipped. Neyther would it proue a difficult matter, To perſwade thoſe that were already deſirous: rather hee was like to bee highly thanked, for ſetting forward their wiſhes; and perhaps to be recompensed with ſome peece of the Kingdome, as he had bin rewarded, for the like ſeruice, when Antiochus was vanquiſhed.

To this end, He made a ſecond voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to ſay which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with ſuch attention, as if they had contained ſome ſtrange noueltie, and ſo pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius; the expedition of the Balkanians into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians; and to Delphis, the great climation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermedling in buisinesse of his neigbours; his riches; and his great productions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He descended vnto particulars, hauing feared him into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirtie thousand foot, and fise thousand Horse of his owne monie in a readinesse to entertaine tenne thousand mercenaries for tenne yeares; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him foldiours as manie as he should require; and that hee prepared victuals for tenne yeares, because he would not bee driuen, eyther to liue vpon spoile, or to take from his owne subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Selenus the sonne and fieceffor of Antiochus the great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Selenus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neyther spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loath to vtter it plainly) That euen the enuie to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might eyther bee denied, or iustified (as that hee had procured the death of some 25 which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Amyopolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify vnto the most: saying that he thought it his durie to forewarne them; since it would bee to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making war vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great follie, to beleue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, least he should set vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelste forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so, that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadors, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them, their iniustice, and oppression, would haue bene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their own right and securitie? Toward this iustification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto, their more than vsual curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, prouided of answeres to the words, which they knew before hand that hee would speake; and with matter of reimeration. The vanitie, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to haue disclosed all: when the warrenesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooued their wisdom to neglect no possible remedie. Wherefore carelesse audience was giuen to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had cuer bene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodian had with great pompe, conuicghed by Sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifullly required, so the Romans despiightfully accepted.

cepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were selling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange news which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as mere vassals, but as dependants and associates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of rhings in Asia, after the victorie against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Mansissa, The Ætolians, 10 and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to find themselves agreed if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subjects might easily bee made their fellowes, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Lycians, for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might fauour of hostility; but that, if his trauaile in this kind proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrarie to expectation. These big words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Scarpilus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from 30 instruction giuen by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps vtterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouering his too much weaknesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not verie bad, but subiect (in appearance) to Fortune, which might haue bene his, had he knowne how to vse it.

40 Now that this brauerie (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appears by his daring to adventure soone after, on a practise that more iustly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer shew of reason to make war vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to do the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud wal on the side of a verie narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised

might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not send men, to wast the Kingdome of Pergamus, or to besiege the townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by Poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. Hee seemes, at this time, to haue bene so confident; in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies the more calme. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being wearie they departed with our audience. Then called he them back; and bad them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long bene collecting against him, and where with Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that He had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Smothrace, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Raminus and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, welbeloued, and well friended. Persus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedie, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, he promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That hee would no longer stand to the league, made betwene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeede onely for feare: but wished them to defend to more equal conditions; whereupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

In the forme of the league betwene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Liuie inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entering shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had bene restrained by plaines covenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Persus very iust reason to find himselfe grieued. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilst they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Ilyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league, as vnliust; hee mistred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to giue him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message; he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdome in three dayes. But either hee should haue bene lesse vehement; or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vndertake the warre; hee should courageously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whilst the Enemy was vnprepared; nor haue lost opportunitic, as now and often hee did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

PERSEVS braues the Romans; fights with them; knowes not how to vse his victorie; futes for peace; and is demed it by the vanquished. PERSEVS hauing the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the countrey lying without Tempe. The Bœotians rebell againſt the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Greek Commanders vnfortunate in the warre againſt PERSEVS. They vex the Romans their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes prouision; hauing heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans bene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well they might haue bin readie for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in prouisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre; whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together, seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greeks, and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to feare, that all of the Greeks or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissension betwene their seuerall estates; how focuser the generalitic of them were inclined the same way. Neuertheless Embassadors were sent to deal with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in watres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors vsed as gentle words, for fashions sake; as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtisie: and vnderstood, that not only such as made refusal, but euen they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly; were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans; * the Achæans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should bee ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their dutie. It is strange that men could bee so earnest to set vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue scene the ruine. The vsual sort was euerie where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea the wisest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee * iudged the victorie of Perseus, like to prouee hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greeks might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, hee was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears, that

- that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Achaens, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vnderaken a war, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet not sooner were some few companies brought ouer sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him; than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that every small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans
- 10 power, by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon thole which had assited him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few towncs; and solliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more firmenes in cunning then was vsuall among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Pencus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Wherto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That his might conveniently bee done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readines, and might haue done much, ere the Roman armie could haue bin in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he suffred a most convenient season, of winning vpon the enemie, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it
- 30 had bin with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betwene him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. Hee sent Embassadors also to the Rhodiens, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, not withstanding the goodnes of his cause, hee should be denied peace. These were poore helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honor, was no better than mere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearefulness might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly their own: had it not bin his office, who took vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the warre, as might incourage al others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more auerfe from him, and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodiens, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to doe against the good liking of the Romans. The Boeotians also, who had centred of late into a strict society with the Macedonians, renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was
- 50 Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their severall towncs to make couenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebell) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Boeotians from

from Thebes their their head; was more than Agesslaus could effect, or Eparinondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being desirous of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Eparinondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedemonians.

Marius brought this to effect, whilst the King late still, as being bound by the truce: and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reposed it as disloyall) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne; the Senate being resolu'd before hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirtie daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: where as they who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walles, in the Temple of Bellona (the vsual place of giuing audience to open Enemies; or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had only the short warning of eleven dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue alone to hide the craft of Marius, as if hee had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely mean, both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soone, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their king at Pella. Which though it were enough to haue rouzed Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans; and to redeeme their good will with some part of his kingdome, that so he might enjoy the rest, than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsaile prevailed: which also was the wisest; and so would haue proued, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendezous at Citium, a towne in Macedon. All being in readines, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerua, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then, with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with liuely speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancellors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodness of his cause, the greatness of his prouisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their severall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered, That his owne prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that countrie, in their iourney towards him: Some townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he basked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wanne by force. Of these last was Asyle: a towne thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a falke; which the Leues the Confessed another strength of his brother, came tharfe. Thither also states could afford, of was very little. Of this with a thousand foot, the Cappadocian, by reason had sent to Rome nothing in this warre but when it was too late. Proius was coming the Romans. A vnder Toros had by gyptian: yet each of performe. Centius had the countenance to the Romans, the Roman Adrian. This king had foure aazine to what purpose him flew to believe, good friend Centius had the beginning; he for this war; by offering.

He refused to be encamped, attending not any slender helpe, refused, to abide while were sufficiently increased entrance into Thessaly, was better attaining bene freed by the as, when there was little rich, fruitfull, and about but somewhat more to by fall of all delights, the fant and goodly places, huge mountains, off-and-dies, by which it was on And this way were the langrie iourney, thoro with Philis, they had small aduantage; by beir

the Townsmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practised heere: to the greater terror of the oblitinate. So Velaie and Connus (to wns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the king marched on wards to Sycorium, to a wne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemie.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother, came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send; which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Masaniassa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Misagenes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his yong sonne, there to be brought vp: yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe began within a while, but when it was too late, to be other wise aduised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet leaving the Romans. Antiochus, and Ptoleme (though Ptoleme was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to inuade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Ilyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian: yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie trick, where with M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fittie shippes, riding in the haue of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind sort; making shew to beleue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his kingdom and himselfe, in the end of this war; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painfull iourney, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing bene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poëtie) with their Spures or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vnlesse they would make an hungrie iourney, thorow the country of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though far greater greater he might haue had, if by mispending of time he had not lost it. For in dosending the ragged pailages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worke; yea to winne upon them (for a while) every yeare more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done far greater things, had he seized vpon the fireights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no relief to bee found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if they would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Aetolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Borotians, how politically focuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Macedonians quarrell: what would they haue done, if he at first had done his best? The Aebodians, Ilyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peaces, he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his wellwillers, yea and bought downe with money (as hee might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; and to render the libertie, by them giuen, entire; which otherwile was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue beene expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue wonne the victorie: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that war, whereof he should haue sought the honor; hee left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inuitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, it is hard to shew particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, and lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Lerissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protra the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by waiting the land of the Pharians their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduenture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victorie his owne. At this comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Capitaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor E-

ment, found it reasonable to hazzard battaile. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldness: much encreased; and much more, his reputation: to the griefe of those, who being so farre come to make a conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The towne of Syeurium, where Perseus then lay, was twelue miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both wearie and thirlic when they came to fight. For remedie of these inconueniencies, he found out a lodging, seuen miles neerer to the Enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His comming at such an vnusuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though hee brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vsnit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: he him selfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victorie in a manner entree, (though the Thessalians made a good retreat) with little losse of his owne. But he discovered his weaknesse ere night, by hearkning, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vsent for: he neuer the lesse tooke it for sound aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victories; by which means it was said, That either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it bin greater; and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue been the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did he, than proclaim vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victorie would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot he had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twentie horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remoue to a surer place beyond the Riuer Pentus. The Consul, though alhamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud tearmes, to draw vpon him selfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the Riuer in the dead of the night, and incamped more strongly on the further side. The Asioliens were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Five of them, that were men of especiall marke, had been obserued, to be the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honored with reward: for as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, so that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then must they adventure no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their own libertie. Thus fared it with the Consul and his armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, hee not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victorie, or giuen better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue routed them, whilest they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue beene done: since there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome, out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoiles of them without resistance, as yeelding themselves ouercome. With such braue words did the King set out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoiles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor sound. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betwene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neurtherlesse hee was easily perswaded to vfe the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore hee sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yeeld vnto the same conditions, wherein his father had bene bound to the Romans; if the war might so take end. It were needlesse, heere againe to shew the folly of this course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power, than to grant a truce, whilest Embassadors might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approoue the conditions, and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to bee so resolute in aduertise. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that hauing receiued an answer so peremptorie, he still persilled, making vaine offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace, which hee so much desired, could not be purchas'd with money, the king withdrew himselfe backe to Sycyrium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagenes the sonne of Misamis, with the aid before mentioned. This distance betwene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their harvest: about which businesse they ranged ouer all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the forragers, he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawn it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilest he stroue to force a garr, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battaile, hee was ouercome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was: whereby what losse he felt will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, saue only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connus; hoping to haue taken it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned backe vpon the Perrethians and others; from whom hee wanne some towne, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundrie townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme, not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians; vnlesse, perhaps, after his victorie, Perseus did greater actes than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defectiue. One may thinke it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his

But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other petti- to wnces, which by that same distraction of the Bacotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to have beene fought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that hee would have brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreame oppression hee could have driven them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in generall; That in the warre which he made, he ¹⁰ cruelly and couerously demeaned himselfe.

After the same fashon dealt they, that commanded in the yeare following; Hoftilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Pretor of the Fleet. Hoftilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war vpon his kingdom, after that the Consul had sought passage in vaine ouer certain mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, ²⁰ free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Ilyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an armie of foure thousand, and who, by leaues made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to have taken Ypsam, a border towne of Ilyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; falsed forth vpon him, ouertogw him, and chased him so farre, that hardly hee escaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Ypsam shortly after became Roman: which howsoeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian king, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirotic, revolted from the Romans, on

³⁰ the other. Perseus likewise made a painfull journey into Etolia: where hee was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee took in Aperantis; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe thoroughly beaten by Cleues, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian war vnder Hoftilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes; by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and maine to aduance their busines, than of those which

⁴⁰ were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who shortly after was Generall of the Achaean horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honorably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue beene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abtained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to leir it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all

⁵⁰ were well. In like manner dealt they among the Etolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councill that approved the motion: as also among the Aeacarnians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not onely such as were inclinable to the Macedonian,

FTER two yeares of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had been thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hirberted the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. He had

- 20 enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might prove, and therupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselves, that many towne, euen of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Roman side; and the armie much lessened, not only by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one
- 30 upon the other) in licencing the souldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Consul, who succeeded vnto Hostilius, was to amend all this; which neuertheless was more than he knew how to doe; though he brought with him a strong supplee of men. He began hody to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept. And he began the right way: not seeking to force the streights that were surely garded, but taking paines to cline the mountaines, which were thought able to forbid all passage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way he meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his iourney: with hope, either not to bee discovered by
- 40 the Enemy, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as convenient ground, as they should haue that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedit foot, to discover the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in ouercoming the difficultie of no more than fiftene miles: after which they had sight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arrival; but met him, and fought with him, two or three dayes together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to retreat. Wherefore Martius tooke the only course remaining; and indeed the best. Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilst hee,

with the rest, fetch a compasse about, and fought out wayes that neuer had been troden. Herein he found extreame difficultie: which notwithstanding he overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such journeyes, through places vnfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea where Nature might seeme to haue intended, that none should be. So steep he found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which he took: that of seven miles, which they travelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rocks, that stood one ouer another, so vpright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddie prospect, and casting their gouernours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous journey; there was nothing more desired by the souldiours, than that they might be suffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliff; the other sustained by two long postes, fastened in the ground below. Vpon these two postes, or poles, which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastened two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were couered with planks and turles; that they might seeme continent with the ground, so to make the beasts aduenturous, to goe vpon them. If there were a Plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretie way, vpon one of these; the postes vpholding the frame were cut a funder; thereby causing him to sincke downe vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward still, to the very bottome. Thus went they downe sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appeares, how thoroughly prouided the Romans y^lsd to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what insupportable paines they took in this descent, about the conueyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly, or perhaps neuer, should haue overtaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeyes were like vnto the first: saue that custome, and the nearnesse to their wayes end without meeting enemie, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three dayes together; he lying so nigh, that he might wel neare haue heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, sate hearkening after the euent. Foure only passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Comnus; which the Romans were vnable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whoeuer would seeke any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe; into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the river Helicon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke vp the one halfe, the rest being such as might easily haue bene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middelt of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the

the parties of the mountaine were banks of Perseus a good number had been: more or less: some say: if Perseus were not only in the valley, but also in the same way that he came, he would not have returned, and climbed vpon the mountain, from which, with extreame labour, he had taken the way to the top of the mountain, from the side of the valley, lying open on that part, whence, after that they were come out of the valley, the King of Perseus, did come. The King of Perseus had sooner heard that the King of Perseus was like one out of his wits, than he had heard of his outbrayle. Hercowich in hate; and through amazement, he sent a letter to the King of Perseus, as if the Romans were who were appointed to do that which he had done, though soone after, he was recovered by Dium from the sea, as if the King of Perseus had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeyes were like vnto the first: saue that custome, and the nearnesse to their wayes end without meeting enemie, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome iourney: if Perseus could haue scene his owne aduantages. For the Roman armie was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauell; but mult needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the streight of Diuum. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it seems a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy, from aboute their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore bee thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdom had often bin invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were there arriued, there was no meane to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. But the cowardize of Perseus, did commend the counsaile by them followed, as wise. For he no sooner heard that the Enemy was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe, than he

20 faced like one out of his wits, saying, That he was vanquished, & had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Diuum, what he could carry away in haile; and straightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be callt into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Diuers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance

30 might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull prouidence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus growing alhamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this haile direction; caused them both to be slaine. All those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the sea by their diving, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are priue to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleue him to 40 be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitie. He thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Arsilepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed, he rated them openly saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemy the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproch if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martinus had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the 50 Roman armie, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He tooke Diuum without resistance; & thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing trauelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towne that yielded, he was compelled, by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the war; but having left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians; for by those waies only might come be brought into the army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was desirously expected; he forooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than the longer falling had bin worth. It is probable, that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himself on such an enterprife, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, he should be faine to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behoued him to have prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recolleed himselfe; vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed; and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done; he encamped strongly by the river Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue bin enough, not only to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace; but to haue given him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towne of Etracela, standing on the river of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force; or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads; somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could; and was not given vp for feare. After this Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the sea-townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were allayed; but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted and some companies, that sundrie times aduentured forth of the towne, were still put to the worke. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming nere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ranne along by Enia, and Antigonia (landing nere to each of them, and both doing and receiuing hurt) vntill he came to Pallene, in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioined with him, bringing twentie ships of warre: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne; which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the towne wals filled vp with that earth, and covered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by sapping the walls. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meete; signifying an alarme to the other side of the towne, that he by shadow his attempt. The breach was soon made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for ioy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceived what was done; & sallying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch & the wals; of whom they slew about six hundred & suffred few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, & the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entering the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned, he made way towards Demetrias: where into Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not only sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemie pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibea; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddainely ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dilodge in all halt, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises, euer since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelesly) most vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodiens, by Aegspolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that Polyb. Legat. 6.

20 this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodiens in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeit. And so were the Rhodiens moued to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassador, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perseus, & of Gentius the Thyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good

30 fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome, to view the estate of Martius his army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall, wanting men, and, for those few that he had, wanting both mony and cloths: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontire of Thyria, so vnable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Thyrian side, which made al to halt, or at least,

Polyb. Legat. 7.

40 that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had been driuen from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craftie master, with a resolute working diligence. This indeed neither proued his sufficiency, nor commended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheless, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such deligh as weake and bulie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his country. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hostilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessalie; and

50 and other good Patriotes among the Achaens, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperitie they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Achaens should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the armie was leui'd; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busied in seeking passage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the armie, and awaited the Consuls leisure, till they came to litraea; where finding the time conuenient, hee presented the Decree, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein sooner it should be commanded. Martius took this very kindly; but said, that hee neede now no maner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that App. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achaens, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide: and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achaens be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; musing, and vnable to resolue, whether it were for loue to the Achaens, that the Consul was so earnest in this busines; or rather for enuie, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuat, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleging that he had no need. In this case therefore, he had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from needesitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was 32 sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Achaens were sau'd, of more than an hundred and twentie talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare, lest the fire, which hee himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his owne lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerwey other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certaintie. One reports, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius: but comming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leaue behind him certaine horse of the Gallogreekes, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Roman good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally receiued; that Eumenes gaue a willing care to Perseus his desire of accord, for mere desire of gaine. And it might well bee, that Eumenes drew him on, in the course; where into indignation first led him. How-soeuer it befall; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founden, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue, betwene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell like to all Kings, though though they dealt with more gainl another; That Antiochus, with the help of Antiochus, had taken out of his next at hand; yet hee was not in like sort the aim of his warre with the Romans; by denouncing their will to compell the Roman; to them as common enemies way: and therefore was more neerely watch; and stand in doubt of the rest. Perseus was afraid. Who would haue esteem'd hundred Talents would remaine a Neutram (show much I haue not) and for assurance of his selfe well to receive the before hand, as was required. Eumenes only. For proct hee would lay downe the be deliuered vnto Eumenes. The like of Somethat was money no nearer to him, be- bour deler'd some what, that neede he would haue 30 no more, than looke time Trytor.

After the same manner cramped this Libyan before he could not surse. Hereo Treasures would serue at wher the Roman had gotten gaine; so hee agreed to p for a recompence. So the lused first performance. T his armie might haue comf sely upon the bargaine in few and Antiochus: who deli- twene Perseus and the Roman thing that Martius the Con- doner, arrogantly promi'd, wing the Kings to show the answe're, as dissimulat; and vaine glorie of the Achaens haue bene, if their submissi- Such vie of Genius his friend of Siber. though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Atlas; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue out, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans, to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to bee true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answer; hee began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part; That if he might haue fiftene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this Warre, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condiscend vnto peace: 20 and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus's owne; and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there; than if it remained in Pella. Besides; his labour deserued somewhat, how soeuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needes he would haue part of his wages in press. Thus the two Kings did 30 no more, than loose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Genetius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said; That without money he could not stirre. Hereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last call, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Genetius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his 40 armie might haue comfort, by such access of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Genetius: who desired the Rhodian, to take vpon them; as arbitrators, betwene Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodian's thinking that Marius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, That they, by their authoritie, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate; hearing proude words, to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gave an answer, as disdainefull, angry, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glorie of the Rhodian was throughly chastised; and more thoroughly should 50 haue beene, if their submission had not beene as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vse of Genetius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantanchus, the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Genetius, exhorted him him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon tenne Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the young King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed vp with the scale of the Ilyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this monee came into Ilyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadors, and cauit them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Ilyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyred thereto, or not.

Then came about the same time, through Ilyria, to the side of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a petty King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Basarnæ. These had before hand made their bargaine, and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entrie into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whome he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to gize the souldiors their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (saie Clondicus) tell thy maister, That the Gauls will not sūre one foot further, vntill they haue gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an ineffectiue against the inciuillitie and avarice of the Basarnæ: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fieue thousand horse of them hee said would be as manie as he should need to vse; and not so manie, that he should need to feare them. It had bene well done, if anie of his counsailors would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, since without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Partavia, into Thessalie: where wasting the Countrey, and filling themselves with spoile, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable seruice, whether they wonne anie victorie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might haue bene alledged, if anie man had dared to gize aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had bene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those manie thousands that had bene drawne so farr to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those fise thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceiued, that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifting excuses; the Basarnæ returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than he could haue well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserue his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painefull Office he was verie soone discharged by L. Amylius Paulus the new Consul: who in fiftene dayes after his setting forth from Italia, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with anie danger, yet the indignitie so moued them, that either they decreed that Province to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betwene him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthie a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. He refused to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that concerned his Province; vntill by Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonians, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowne to be such, as hath bene already told; the Senate appointed a strong supplic, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Naue, and likewise to the Armie that lay betwene Ilyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Antianus sent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouerne their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by heare say, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the Battaille of Canna, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Æmylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey; with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more than could haue bene hoped or imagined. He came to Brunndusium: whence, when the winde came faire, he set sayle at breake of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Coreyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fift day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in fise dayes more. So are there but fise of the fiftene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Diium; hauing spared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was fordeable in drie weather. So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon: One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Diium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne myles betwene Diium and Tempe; all the way lying betwene the Sea shoare and the foot of Olympus, without anie Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Æmylius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where hee found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not about the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Marius from taking vp his lodging anie nearer to the enimie, than the Towne of Heraclæa, on the Riuer of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such means to lie close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward, being defended as hath beene shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquire was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perræbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Marius either had not beene informed hereof, or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his souldiours to make the aduventure; they fearing least it would prove such a piece of worke, as had bene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater indultrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, euen at his first coming, manie disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the souldiours, among other good lessons, to be obedient and readie in execution; without troubling themselves, as had bene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about fife thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Æmilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; and the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the fleet; where victuals were provided for their journey: it being noyced, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay; rather to diuert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon anie hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay welneare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Æmilius employed none saue his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had aduantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had rayfed on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Æmilius persisted as he had begun; and continued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to reach the Macedonian, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Æmilius was knowne to be, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauadoes, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men; that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed than anie of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodge: or rather, without order, in all tumultuous haile, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedie retreat made to Pylæna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine forces; Scipio and Fabius had verie good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came

Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had bene effected by Marius in the yeare fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunity.

Perseus was in extreame doubt what course to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: hauing beerie taught by the last yeares example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But faire worke counsaile prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into anie one T'owne, least that should be first of all besieged, and hetherin (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not ouer-carefully relicued. This was euen the same that Amylus, or anie inuador, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neare vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There he abode the coming of the enemies; who stayed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which with greater feare than discretion, had halsted away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting least otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to loose occasion by delay. But Amylus told him, That hee speake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor anie thing there, save onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonians, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; wherinto, at good leisure, hee fell backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy; who advanced no further, but kept vpon ground seruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeare bene Praetor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brasse and Balons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause, anie alteration in ciuile affaires, and matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthie of obseruation it is, how superstition captiuates the wisdom of the wisest, where the helpe of true Religion is wanting. Amylus, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor above the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with anie deuout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice her deliuerie, as soone as she shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not admit him in this foolish deuotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councill for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules, which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with anie Sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entralls of the bealls. At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Aemilius; but with condition, That hee should not giue the onser. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman: Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new Goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically vpon Mars the father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaille; Aemilius was throughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it; for that otherwise hee would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leysure serued to retire whither he list, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that hee might wait vpon aduantage, without making anie great haste. Neyther was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalang, and Aemilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelihood of fighting that day. Put about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which wherero neither of the Generalls had ouer earnest desire. A horse brake loose at watering; which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the riuer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne side. These fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His countreimen seeing this, hastied to reuenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the riuer. Hereupon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaille, accordly as the manner of his Countrey, and the armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flat leuell, saue that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whercof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with liuely words: which the present condition could bountifullly afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, with drew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaille, since hee had betroughed himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the sacrifice of a coward: whose vnseasonable deuotion could be no better than hypocrisie. For hee that will pray for a good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaille, hee found it no better than lost: and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight. The

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse on wards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amylius was therat much astonish'd; That the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them slaine, and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that tell our aduersie to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue bin his owne. That which turned the fortune 10 of the battaile, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battaillons pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worse) that some files hauing open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direftion giuen by Amylius, when hee saw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vnequall, and 20 the ranks in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauailable against manie small squadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of Cynosephale: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vneruiceable against the other, by reason, that being not euerie where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though here were little such inconuenience of ground, as had beene at * Cynosephale.

Perseus, when he saw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing 30 the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercie of the Enemy: who slew about twentie thousand of them; though hauing little cause to be furious, as hauing lost, in that battaile, only some fourescore, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, ourtook the king & his company in a wood; where they fel to railing at the horse-men, calling them cowards, traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company disperfed themselves: euery one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within 40 a while to lessen. For hee fell to deuising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe; thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella, he found his Pages and household seruants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnreasonable admonitions, hee slayed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him; This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shortly doe 50 some greater mischief; hee stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him onely Eugander (who had beene employed to kill Emmenes at Delphe) and two o-ther. There followed him likewise about six hundred Cretians; more for loue of his money, than of him. To thate he gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fitie talents, though shortly he cozened them of some part thereof; making them as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townsmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speeche being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves. Vpon the first fame of the overthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth vnder colour of a gainfull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King; they plainly bade Euander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessels that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samosbrace: where hee hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amylus, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was nearest at hand, was the last that yielded. About fixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindring all deliberation and consent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantachus, who had bene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Thyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselves and the Towne of Berea, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armie. Amylus sent abroad into the Countrey, such as hee thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Thyrian. But within a little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samosbrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that he wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in tearmes ill becoming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King PERSEVS to the Consul PAVLYS; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craved and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheless in this conference, hee was maruailous earnest, that hee might bee allowed to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preferred his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his due to liue at ease, and bee called King. Yea it seems that hee had indeede, enen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samosbrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the war he was deborted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for such a paltrie Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Enne-

* Liv. lib. 43.

- nes demanded, in the holie Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessitie, and without moe adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and merite of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arriues at Samo- thrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who allayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole, where- in, for feare of imprisonment, he had imprifoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samo- thraciens; How they durst pollute the Temple, by receiuing into it one that had violated the like holie priuiledge of
- 10 Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This he went to the quicke. The Samo- thraciens, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselfe in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holie place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majesty, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auail, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willett Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand,
 - 20 who are like to be preiudents and cuerseers of this judgement: so as it were better to die valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seems to like well: and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyson wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandment. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, saue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holie
 - 30 Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gaine say them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which preferes him from captiuitie; hee purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Cotys his good frind, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samo- thrace with one shippe; who easly was persuaded to waite the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that hee had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by
 - 40 a rope, and ouer a mudd wall. At his comming to the Sea side, hee found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recouer the Temple. Hee ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, least he should be taken; hee hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquire; till Octavius made proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoeuer, abiding with their maister in Samo- thrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them
 - 50 belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hercupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whome the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samostrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victorie compleat. Hee had not trusted in those gods of Samostrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; hee might well have brought this Warre to a happier end. Now, by diuining his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrarie hopes of sauing his Kingdoms by armes, and himselfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that haue benee wretched by their owne default. Hee was presently sent away to Amylius; before whom hee fell to the ground so basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victorie ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the lesse to bee esteemed. Amylius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answer might haue benee returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul reamed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, and respectfully entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Q. Ailius.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeares continuance; and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon, the glorie whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

GENTIUS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

About the same time, and with like celeritic, Anicius the Roman Pretor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius, had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fiftene thousand; with which hee was at Lissus, readie to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereof hee had receiued onely tenne Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was verie defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpossible to be wonne, in anie not a verie long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victorie; and therefore presented his Armie before the walls, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselves within the Towne, would needes issue forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon forth with began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, hee desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadors, to haue recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison; where they were still alieue. Having obtained three dayes respite, hee passed vp a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra.

* Called now Scutari.

Scodra, as it were to see whether the report were true. Finding that no likelihood was to returne into peace: before whom beneuolence, was not looked vpon, hee desired his wife, children, brother, and himselfe, to be killed in thirre dayes: the Perseus, one of the Emperors Annius how all had passed

Scodra, as it were to consult the more priuately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Cerauntius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent messengers craving access vnto the Prator: before whom hauing lamented his follie past (which, excepting the dishonestic, was not so great as his follie present) he fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, and friends, were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill 10 Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had bene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

How the Romans behaued themselves in Greece and Macedonia after their victorie ouer PERSEVS.

20 Now began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had bene vnmanerly toward them before, whilst the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. Ths they performed with bad grace; saying, That they were sent from Rhodes, to make an ouerture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and manie others: but that now they were verie glad, and in behalle of the Rhodians did con- 30 gratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had bene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue to Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (couetous of the charge) to haue Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had bene anie whit auerse from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were eyther taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that flew themselves for rare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would haue done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedie to ranfacke, than anie iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of anie marke remained aliue, saue those that had bene of the Roman Faction. All 50 which notwithstanding, manie yeares passed, ere, by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the societie of the Romans: a fauour which, till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equall friends.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Amylus himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure; yet not forgetting to make them vnderstand what power he had over them. More than fiftie hundred of the chief citizens in Demetrias were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with helpe of the Roman souldiours. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul; the redresse was such, as required not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the libertie of their Countrey, he feasted like a King, with excessive cheare; yet so, that hee had all things verie cheape in his Campe: as an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome; some, to giue order for setting the estate of Macedon towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsual in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was set at libertie by Amylus and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefor from the Senate. But this libertie was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed vnto the Kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were sent captiue into Italie, with their wives and children, as manie as were aboute fiftene 20 years old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Amylus. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue anie inconuenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subjects to Rome; the things done to them could deserue no better name than a meere tyrannie, yea and shamelesse perjurie, were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from euerie quarter, as had anie way discovered an vsuericable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Persus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for vsing them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for having bene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achaens these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Commonwealt was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue 40 untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby anie one of the Achaens could be suspiciously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonians. It was also so, that neither Callistates, nor anie of his adherents, had bene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Achaens with the rest. And hereto Callistates was verie 50 vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellowes should be made to pay for their mischieuous deices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Achaens: where one of them, in open assemblie of the Nation, spake as Callistates had before instructed him. Hee said, That some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Persus.

After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, we will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime: If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise haue bene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answere him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited about a thousand; willing them to appeare, and answere before the Senate. This might euen be termed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Country, to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison: as men already condemned by the Acheans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since 20 honestie had bene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senat, that these men were neither condemned by the Acheans, nor yet held to be offendours. But in stead of better answere it was pronounced: That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrey, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Acheans, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuteenteen yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of iayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death

30 as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the souldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible crueltie; as also it was performed by Æmylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for tenne of the principall men out of euerie Citie. These he commaunded to deliuer vp all the gold and siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euerie of their

40 Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed they should fall to sacke, euerie one the Towne wherein hee was sent. Thus in one day were threecore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman souldiours; and besides other acts of hostilitie in a time of peace, a hundred and fittie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserued punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guiltie of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had bene already sent into Italie, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not only at the present

50 in good obedience, but had, euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleeue it, had anie one Writer deliuered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse meruitious, that GOD was pleased to make Æmylius childlesse, euen in the glorie of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victorie, with the Greekes and Maccedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad; it will appeare by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus: whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadors came.

§. XI.

The Warre of ANTI OCHVS vpon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadors.

ANTI OCHVS the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reign and life. He died the six and thirtieth yeare after he had worn a Crown, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolemie Epiphanes; while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iuliane) of Iupiter. He left behinde him three sonnes, Selenus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had giuen in marriage to Ptolemie Epiphanes, King of Egypt. Selenus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes; reigned in Syria twelue yeares, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was slouthful by nature, so the great losse which his father Antiochus had received; took from him the means of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeares before his birth, Daniel gaue this judgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regis. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus the father of this man) shall start up a wilde person, unworthy the honor of a King. Under this Selenus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect. What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all peace, because of the godlinesse of ONIAS the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honor the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God; and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Maccabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successour of this Selenus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaeus (who died in the hundred threecore and seuenteenth yeare of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the Storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeare of the Gracian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Judas: remembering in the fourth Chapter the praise of Jafon, the brother of Onias, who after the death of Selenus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Ianfenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greekes, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembereth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Zumenius and Antipater his Embassadors, whom hee employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the High Priest, whereto Iosephus adds, addes, that the name of the Lacedemonian Ambassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws.

Now to this Selencus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth year of the Greekes in Syria. Hee was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also hee vsurped from his brothers sonne:

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very yong, had bene about seven yeares King of Egypt.

Ptolemie Epiphanes, the father of this King Philometor, had raigned in Egypt foure and twentie yeares; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdome between them, whilste he was a childe. But they found such other busines, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Provinces of Coelesyria, Phoenice, and Iudaea, which he had wonne by his victorie ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuertheless, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby he liued in the greater securitie. Hee left behind him two sons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the lower of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subiects, and was like to be chased out of his kingdome: his yonger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong partie, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vncl. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the yong Prince, fought by all meanes possible to possesse himselfe of that kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mneisibens Ambassador into Egypt, and vnder colour to assist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Governours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safetie and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he alongt the coast of Syria, to Toppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) hee was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Selencus, the brother and predecesour of Epiphanes, that impious traytor Simon of the Tribe of Bentamin, ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouvernor of Coelesyria and Phoenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being stroken by the Angell of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Ouias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practises. Presently vpon the death of Selencus, this Iason, the brother of Ouias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threecore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enioyed it.

This naughtie dealing of Iason, and his being ouer-reached by another, in the same kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achaens, when as that mischieuous Callierates, who had bene too hard for all worthe and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus.

 One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more sore;
 One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does fly.

And euen thus fell it out with Iafon: who within three yeares after, was betrayed, and ourbidden by Meneleus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talguts more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iafon thereupon being forced to flie from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Aegypt; with which, and with a mightie armie of land-forces, hee went about to raigne ouer Aegypt; that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Aegypt with a mightie companie, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navie, and moued warre against PTOLEMAEVS King of Egypt, but PTOLEMAEVS was afraid of him and fled, and many were wounded to death. He wanne many strong Cities, and took away the spoies of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL. He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victorie ouer the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For hee gaue a notable overthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betwene Pellusium and the hill Casius, after which he entered and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Aegypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that ANTIOCHVS had smitten Egypt, he turned againe and went up towards Israel and Ierusalem with a mightie people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuarie, and took away the golden Altar, and the Candellstick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Show-bread, and the pouring Vessels and the Bowles, and the golden Basons, and the Vails, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. Hee took also the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Alacedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian buisnesse. At what time he first laid claime to Coele Syria; justifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Province had not benee configned ouer to the Egyptian, orgiuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. False it was to approve his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaens, Illydians, Albaniens, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by severall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was; that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee saw, that it was an hard peece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine warre, than by the terrour of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weake estate, the younger, almost ruined by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weake fouer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to bee so strong, that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leasure his other buisnesse at Ierusalem or else where. So after the sacke of Ierusalem he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Tharsians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowrie, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis For Governour

Gouverneur of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iafon out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, comitting the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Sotiratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iafon) had certaine knowledge, being moued 10 with zeale, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, hee reproued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuarie at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoining as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweet Springs, banqueting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lull, and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuledge, from the holines of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is far lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall; than to iudge this fearfull shift which 20 Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore old man: for MENELAUS taking ANDRONICVS apart, prayed him to slay

ONIAS. So when he came to ONIAS, he counselled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswading him to come out of the Sanctuarie; so he slew him incontinently, without any regard of righteousness. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, hee tooke away ANDRONICVS his garment of purple, and vent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City, and in the same place where hee had committed the wickednesse against ONIAS, hee was slain as a murderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should haue

But presently after this, at the suite of one Ptolemie, a traitor to Ptolemie Philometer, he condemned innocent ment to death; who justly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of justice: since he reuenged the death of Onias, yet slew those that were in the same cause with Onias, who had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should haue beene heard as innocents. By reason of such his vnsteadinesse, this king was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, madde, in 40 After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Aegypt, and then were there seen throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, sorte daies long, horsemen running in the aire with Kobes of gold, and as bands of Spearmen, and as troopes of Horsemen set in aray, encountering and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of Gods, all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starre in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the Citie, after which there followed a slaughterlike into this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tells vs that Armies were seene fighting in the aire from the morning till the euening.

Of these and the like prodigious signes, Visera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me the most memorable, because the most notorious. Sutton, Galba.

When Luia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Henne, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Luia caused this Henne to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Henne came a faire increase of white Poultry, and from the little branch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vse to carrie in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue; and after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeare of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at oncē. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be unworthie of regard; it appears by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their vnclē; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by persuation than by armes. Physcon had not as yet forgotten the terrour of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worke to live in scarcitie of victuals (which was alreadie great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelyhood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and about all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he stood of his vnclē. For though Antiochus were gone out of Egypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly engaged: for notwithstanding that hee had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answer to all Embassadors; yet hee now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently furnished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Armie into Celestria, readie to enter Egypt the Spring following. When hee was on his way as fast as Thinis cornra, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, that he would rather be pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, that hee would neither call backe his Fleet, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territorie thereto belonging: and that hee should also abandon and leave vnto him the Isle of Cyprus, with all the right that hee had vnto either of them for cure. For answer vnto these demaunds, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places ces which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Antiochus and all about it receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by ealie journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood; the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to entermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iuster cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuerthelesse, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to bee expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor monecy wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Peloponnetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundrie people abroad, ill followed or seconded, by other as bad in requittall: but with continuance of futable beneficehee, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde: especially to the Rhodian and Acheans, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeare since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Acheans they desired in particular, that Lycortas as the brave warriour might be sent to them as Generall of all the Auxiliarie, and his sonne Polybius Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Acheans readily condescended: and would immediately haue made performance; if Calliocrates had not interposed his mischieuous arte. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunte his obsequiounnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voice; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, beaiding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans what helpe soeuer should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction oblatinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that

40 Martius the late Consul had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all need of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could, without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Calliocrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate, and to labour, as the Senate had

50 done, by sending Embassadors, to set Egypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse else where, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends durst not gaine-say the Roman Councill; which had force of an iuniction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus ouercome: and then might the Embassador sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Arme could haue done.

Audience had bene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Physicon and Cleopatra; which hauing staid more then a whole yeare in the Citie, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadors deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no lesse than his brother and sister.

Polyb. Legat. 71.

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had bin before three or foure yeares last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedonian warre; either he, or Euleus and Lenus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not only he determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Celestria; but would haue interposed himselfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassador was by a friend perswaded, to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subiects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by attonement with his brother and subiects, hee might haue seemed to stand in no need of such protection; he hath remaining none other helpe wherby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed it selfe euen in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorly cladde; the haire of their heads and beards ouer-growne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entered into the Senate; and there fell groueling and prostrate vpon the floare. Their garments were not so meane and mournefull, nor their looks and countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Country stood; they made a pitifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authoritie, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadors, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederat; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Armie out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time or vsed any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonor to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors, to determine and end the warre betwene those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vnesse they surceased and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obliuate or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadors, tooke their leaue, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Ægypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neare was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Role of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a litle while considered of the businesse, hee tolde Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commaundement, after hee had stayed and pawed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to doe whatsoever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Ægypt, without anie good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling euery particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Ierusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene histoi-20 rified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed a while, and settled the Kingdome of Ægypt, leauing it vnto the elder brother, and appointing the younger to raigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had bene, in the power of the Ægyptian, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Ægyptian shippes.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards EMMENES, PRYSIAS, MASANISSA, and COTYS. The end of PERSEVS and his children. The instablie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of PAVLVS, ARICIVS, and OCTAVIVS. With the Conclusion of the Worke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the readie obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had bene well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Atheans and Æoli-ans, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good wordes, and no more than good wordes, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

30 Emmenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallio greeke, which molested him. Verie welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee cyther approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaimed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratus a Physician; y whome Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene sent; recounted his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre,* wherewithall hee forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Annus and Maronea might be bestowed vpon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceined opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him vnderstand how gracious hee was, they not onely granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheless, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Annus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Galgroekes, which were about to inuade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthe of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the follie of his second voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neyther could they, in so doing, haue avoided the note of singular inconstancie: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entering into the Senate, hee laye downe, and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and fauours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cappe, after the manner of slaves newly manumitted, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeede naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flatterie kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischief than anie wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome, there to receiue education. Further petition hee made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would haue bene vnjust hee receiued a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was vndertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Aegypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But about all other Kings, Maianissus held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue judgement on

Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deuile vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masaniſſa himſelfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. His excuſe was not taken; ſince hee had voluntarily obliged himſelfe to Perſeus, by giuing hoſtages, without neceſſitie: Yet was his ſonne giuen backe to him ranſome-free; with admittance, to carrie himſelfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betweene Macedon and ſome barbarous Nations; in which reſpect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for thoſe vnhappie Kings, Perſeus and Genius, they were ledde through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emylius and Anticus. Perſeus had often made ſuite to Emylius, that hee might not be put to ſuch diſgrace: but hee ſtill received one ſkornefull anſwere, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himſelfe. And ſurely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, hee would rather haue fought his death in Macedon, than haue bene beholding to the courteſie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The iſſue of the Roman clemencie, whereof Emylius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had bene ledde in chaynes through the ſtreets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to priſon, wherein they remayned without hope of releaſe. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe ſacrifice, hee ſhould command the captiues to be had away to priſon, and there put to death: ſo as the honour of the Vanquiſher, and miſerie of thoſe that were overcome, might be both together at the vtmoſt. This laſt ſentence of death was remitted vnto Perſeus: yet ſo, that hee had little joy of his life; but eyther famiſhed himſelfe, or (for it is diuerſly reported) was kept watching perforce by thoſe that had him in cuſtodie; and ſo died for want of ſleepe. Of his ſonnes, two died; it is vncertaine how. The youngelt called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though deſtined ſometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a Ioyner, or Turner, or, at his beſt preferment, a Scribe vnder the Roman Officers. In ſuch pouertie ended the Royall Houſe of Macedon: and it ended on the ſuddaine; though ſome eightſcore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whoſe ambition this whole Earth ſeemed too narrow.

If Perſeus had knowne it before, that his owne ſonne ſhould one day be compelled to earne his liuing by handie-woke, in a painefull Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonneſſe of Soueraignetic, haue commaunded thoſe poore men to be ſlaine, which had recouered his treaſures out of the ſea, by their ſkill in the feat of diuing. He would rather haue bene verie gentle, and would haue conſidered, that the greateſt oppreſſors, and the moſt vnderſtoden wretches, are all ſubject vnto One high Power, gouerning all alike with abſolute command.

But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as yet would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

Euen they that haue no murderous will,
Would haue it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted such power to verie few: among whom also, verie few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the dangerto his owne person) some one of his owne sonnnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not manie excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearnesse in blood, be driuen to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot, that gouernes one, the most vnworthie of his whole house, yet reigning ouer all? The vntimely death of manie Princes, which could not humble the meane vs to such flatterie; and the common practise of the Turkish Emperours, to murder all their brethren, without expeding till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Hereto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had been obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that vnhappy King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subiect; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happy that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceale and teach, That * God is the forefist and sharpest Schoolemaister, that can be devised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controule: to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintus Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person; that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyle; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thenceforth, vntill the ciuile Warres, which followed vpon the death of Iulius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue beene hindered by the souldiors; who grudget at their Generall, for not hauing dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiors herein, and brought them to reason by seuer exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelessse, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sonnnes, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died five dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes after it. This losse hee bore wisely: and told the People, That hee hoped to see the Commonwealt flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie; in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Octavius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Pretor, who had conquered Ilyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their severall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to say vnto Rome, Suave superbiom, Take upon thee the Maieitie, that thy deserts have purchased.

10 BY this which we have already set downe, is scene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted vp, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the formes of ambition that beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subiect of those ancient Histories, which have bene preferred, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men have complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, the greatest Lords of the world have bene fired vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation, and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cinesa to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often bene dangerous to the living, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill gaine of buying this lasting discourse, vnderstood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished, to haue stolne out of the world without noyse; than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression and crueltie; by giuing in spoile the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath bene no State fearefull in the East, but that of the Turke; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granada, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they possess in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as haue bene spent by the English, French, and Netherlandis in a defenseless war, and in diuersions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the most, they may not only be persuaded to liue in peace, but all their swelling and overflowing streames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all

¶ To the Reader.

He use of Chronological Tables is needfull to all Historiies, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall:
 since they cannot, like Annales, yearly set downe all Occurrences not coherent. This here following, may serue as an Index to the present Part of this Worke; pointing vnto the severall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are farre distoynd in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that any can be. For howsoever the years of the first Patriarchs may seeme to haue bene well-neare computat, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, wee finde many fractions, and the last yeare, or yeares, of one King reckoned also as the forme of another. The same is most likely to haue fallen out in many other; though not so precisely recordad. Hereto may be added the diuers and imperfect formes of the yeare, which were in use among sundrie Nations: causing the * Summer Months, in proceesse of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extremate confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse, out of so many, and so vntogether disagreeing computations, as haue already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleaged, in excuse of such error as a more intricate and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serue to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from any notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, euen in that regard; not onely for some errors of the Presse, in the numbering of yeares, but for some haitie mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to haue hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence.
 The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles ouer the Columnes, haue reference to that which follows vnder them; as will readily be conceiued. Where two Titles, or more, are ouer the head, as ^{in Rome} I there doe the numbers vnderneath answer proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were finished in the 210.
 yeare from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be vnderstood, That IEROSOPHAT began his reigne in the 3774. of the IULIAN Era, in the 3092. of the World, and in the 99. yeare of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeede so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To auoid prolixitie, I haue forborne to insert those yeares, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Raigne; some change of Government; some Battaille fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeares wherein SYLVIVS CAPETVS reigned ouer the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of IEROSOPHAT, wherein CAPETVS began, vnto the 17. wherein SYLVIVS A-VENTINVS succeeded, and wherein IEROSOPHAT first reigned with IEROSOPHAT his father. For I thought it vaine to haue filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers, numbering forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of AVEN-TINVS, and 17. of IEROSOPHAT. In setting downe the King, there is noted ouer the head of euery one, what place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth, in ranke, of those that reigned in his Countrey, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeare of his reignes; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space giues leaue) is the whole number of yeares in which he reigned; in the spaces following vnderneath are those yeares of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeare of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there is it to be vnderstood, that the same yeare belonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but vnto some one, or more, of his

his fore-goes: as the first year of IERORAM King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother AHAZAH, and the 22. of his father AHAB. So, where two or three names are found in one place; as in the 3077. year of the World, LIMKI, TIBNI, and OMRI: it is meant, that euerie one of them reigned in some part of the same years; which is reckoned the second of ELA, and the first of OMRI. Particularly, vnder the years of the Egyptian Kings are set downe the years of those DYNASTIES, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, otherwhiles, the dayes of the month upon which NABONASSARS year began: which, how it varied from other years, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or account of yeres, from IPHITVS, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from NABONASSAR, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath bene said, where due place was, in the Booke it selfe: so as it remaineth onely to note, that vnder the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year of that Olympiad: as that CYRVS began his raigne in Perlia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first year thereof.

Now, for that the years of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONASSAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columns; opposing part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all evertwaie with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more troublesome than usefull; since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will onely be needfull to observe, that howsoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. yeares elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of NABONASSAR, yet the raigne of some King may have begun at such a time of the year as did not suite with this difference. But herof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explaine all. Queene ELIZABETH began her raigne the 17. of November, in the year of our LORD 1558: Shee was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it up; threw downe Images; and reformed manie things in Religion; all in her first year: yet not all in that year 1558, but the greater part in the year following; whether we begin with the first of Iannarie, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table; but so, as the difference is neuer of a whole year.

The IVLIAN Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the yeares of the World, was devised by that honorable and excellently learned IOSEPH SCALIGER: being accommodated to the IVLIAN yeares, now in use among vs. It consisteth of 7980 yeares; which result from the multiplication of 19. 28. and 15; that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeares of an Indiction. Being divided by one of these, it leaveth the number of the present yeares, or if no fraction remaine, it sheweth the last year of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battaile of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sunne 18, and consequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the IVLIAN Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period, after the present account, always exceeds the yeares of the World by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a year, than anie other Æra (as from the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertaine position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in workes of this kinde: it is sufficient if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.
