40 After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephtha's victorie, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grievous slauey that euer Israel suff'erd quarrell'd with Iephtha, that they were not called to the Warrre, as before time they had contested with Gideon, Iephtha hereupon in sort to defend himselfe against their furie, in the encounter slew of them two and fortie thousand, which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistines had had an ealie conquest of them all not long after: sephtha after he had iudged Israel six yeares died: to whom succceeded ibzan, who ruled seven yeares: after him Elon was their Iudge, ten yeares: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Ab. 11. 20.

Id facit numero certo yvaintertio, 3010.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall bee necessarie vpon the occasion of sephtha's account of the times Iud. 11. 28. (where he saies that Israel had then possesst the East side of Jordan 300. yeares) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene sephtha and Amnon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul Act. 13. the third that which is in the first of Kings. sephtha here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeares: Saint Paul giueth the Judges, as it seemes, from the end of Iosua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeares. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were continued 480. yeares. To the first Beroaldus findeth sephtha's 300. yeares to be but 266. yeares, to wit, 18. of Iosua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Adad and Samgar, 40. of Dehora, 40. of Gilead, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But sephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or propoeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic ut dictum agi prope trecentisiman, 20 ex quo nullus sit cum ea de re moueri Israelis, 30 he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or w^ol-nigh the three hundredth yere, since Israel possessed those Countries, pro making question of their right. Codoman on the contrarie finds more yeares than sephtha named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israel's captiuitie, at several times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) sephtha forbare to repeat the whole summe or any great part, leaſt the Ammonites should haue illly objected, that 71. of those yeares, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassalls to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name 300. yeares it was enough for prescription, hee omitted the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeares, besides the 71. yeares of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. yeares more, and so maketh vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeares hee findeth out thus: 20. yeares hee giues to the Seniors betweene Iosua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth but 18. yeares to Iosua's government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas S. Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melanchton 32. The truth is that this addition of 28. yeares is faire more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeares of affliction (to wit, 34. yeares of the 71.) if we adde them to the 266. yeares of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we haue the iust number of 300. yeares. Neither is it strange that sephtha should leaue out more than halfe of these yeares of affliction: seeing as it is already said the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeares, and say that during these yeares, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion making those 300. yeares remembered by sephtha, to be 306. which odde yeares, saith he, sephtha omitteſ. But because the yeares of every Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306. but doe only compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petraea; which fortie yeares of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betweene sephtha and Amnon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Amnon in these wordes. Because Israel took my Land, when they came vp from Egypt from Arnon vnto Iaboc, &c. now therefore restore these Landes quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plain that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out out of Ægypt: but from the time that the Land was possess'd. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam; Because Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephtas answers also confirmeth in these words. When Israel dwelt in Hebron, and in her Townes, and in Aroer and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeares: why did yee not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeares: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possess it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for wee doe not vfe to reckon on the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iuinius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and saies that this time of 300. yeares hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephtas narration: when he makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges in our translation in these words. But when Israel came vnto Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeares (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeares: and not only the time in which Israel possess'd Gilead, according to the Text and Iephtas owne wordes: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeares, from the deliuerance out of Ægypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Ægypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of S. Pauls and Iephtas account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue beene signified. For first, touching Iephtas 300. yeares of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossest Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession, which they had, pass'd to Israel; and so Iephtas might say that they had possess'd those Countreys 300. yeares, reckoning 266. yeares of their owne possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul Act. 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeares. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter, (as I finde his opinion cited by Franctus Xrensenius, and Beza, for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeare of Heb., but 357. yeares: and this hee doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Ægypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. yeares.

Now for as much as S. Paul (as it seemes) finds 450. yeares from the death of Iosua, to the last of Heb., and leaues but 30. yeares for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for Dauid who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wate the Crowne three whole yeares ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this peece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave vnto them Iudges about 450. yeares, vnto the time of Samuel. the Prophet: the words then afterward, being clearly referred to the death or after the death of Iosua, as shall be hereafter proued. But where S. Luke recharling the wordes of S. Paul write 350. yeares (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceiued by the affinity of those two Greeke wordes, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracoisios for Triscoisios 400. yeares, for 300. yeares, and 450. for 350. This hee seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great Annotations adhereth. A contrarie iudgement to this hath Colomen: where Luther and Beza beginne at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Iosua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeares: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons yeares) 319. and of yeares of feruitude and affliction vnder strangers 111. The reason why he doth not reckon make 397. years) and so to these yeares adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the 3. of Salomon, we shall have the iust summe of 480. yeares. Neither is it hard (saith he) that the annus egressus 1. Reg. 6. 1. should be vnderstood egressus non incipientis sed finis, the yeare of their coming out of Aegypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeare after they came out of Aegypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeare after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeares after they had set foot out of Aegypt, are said to haue beene done in their going out of Aegypt, as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Aegypt, Jordan was druen back, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Aegypt. And thus farre it seemes we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the word ab exitu, to be as much as quon exiissent, or ab exitu finis: for if Iunius Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quon exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that here in he doth well, why may not we also, to auoide contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

The next point to be cleared is how their iourning should bee said not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeare after the victorie of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length scated themselves, as it is declared Jud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephtha, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings c. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel liued all those 40. yeares of rest, of which Jud. 3. 11 so that by the 25. yeare after his victorie, either he might haue beene dead, or at least as Gideon did, he might haue refused all foueraigntie, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeare after Othoniels victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be receiued as good: especially considering that the speeches of S. Paul, haue not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set downe. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authoritie, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman that the conquest of Lays, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeare of Othoniel? Or what other probabilitic hath he than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after 40. five and twentie yeares, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes.

Now concerning the rehearfall of the law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeede be properly said to haue beene, when Israel came out of Aegypt: like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the holy Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I thinke he can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or saith by conuerting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Aegypt. Indeed most vproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenged long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say that King Edward at his arrival out of Palatima, did winne Scotland, or didd at Carlisle. How may we then beleeue that enterprize performed so many yeares after the diuision of the Land (which followed the conquest at the iournies end) should be said to haue beene at the time of the departure out of Aegypt: Or who will not thinke it most strange that the most notable account account of time, serving as the only guide for certaine ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning, from that illustrious delivrance out of Egypt, rehearfed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, wherein of the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeare and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the year vpon that occasion changed; but should haue reference to the surprizing of Towne by 600. men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idolls to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident wherupon Codeman buildeth hath either no time giuen to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposeth, and is indeede rather by him placcd in such a yeare, because it best stood with his interpretation fo to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges, and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul: did raise vp our Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to haue bene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the Historie being so well knowne and beleeued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeares consumed in the wilderness, wherof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeares. In like manner he proceeded saying that from the diuision of the Land vnto the daies of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeares. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and cleuen yeares of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeares of the Judges: for this had bene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is a worke not so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeares is so expressly and purposely set downe.

Now that the wordes of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeares to the raigne of Saul, whereas it is manifest that those yeares were diuided betwene Saul and Samuel, yea that farr the greater part of them were spent vnder the government of the Prophet, how soeuer they are here included in the raigne of the King. As for those that wish so much cunning for sake the generall opinion when it fauoureth not such expoliation as they bring out of a good minde to helpe where the neede is not ouer-great, I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The wordes of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Bernardus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those daies, that the 111. yeares of seruitude were to be reckoned a part from the 339. yeares ascribed to the Judges; which accept the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith quasi quadringenis & quingaginta annis; as it were foure hundred and fiftie yeares. But Codeman being not thus contented, would needes haue it to be so indeede; and therefore disioynes the members to make the account euen. In so doing he dalheth himselfe against a notable Text, wherupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeares from the departure out of Egypt, vnto the building of Salomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen

faith to his owne interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to find some new expolition for that which is of it selfe most plaine; than to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuertie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he looketh himselfe in those waies wherein before him, neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrig him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, That Othomed could not gouerne about 25. yeares, because then was the taking of Laisb, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the Danites must needs haue taken Laisb at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the yeares of seruitude; And that the yeares of seruitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himselfe should haue spent his time vaine-ly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an expolition. Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a paradoxe, I leave it to the decision of any iudicious Reader.

And now to proceede in our storie. To the time of Lepta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the propitions which her husband Athenaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recouerie. Others referre this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Athen: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not beginne till the third of Ailon or Eilon, yet the Greekes had fixe yeares to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this Warre, longa preparatio bellis celerem afferit victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedie victorie: for the Greekes consumed ten yeares in the attempt; and Troy as it seemes was entred, sackt and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three yeares after Troy taken, which was in the fixt year of Habdon, Aeneas arriued in Italia. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule died, after he had bene the Father of 40. Iohnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeares of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Jud. 13. v. 1.)ooke beginning from the ninth year of Sair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I seee no great reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Lepta, for not calling them to Warre ouer Harad, if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed; and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being ouerthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemie. And therefore these 40. yeares must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson and afterward: or else they must be referred to the Inter-regnum betwene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Israel by Sampson, such as it

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy. 506

p. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue obserued Historical truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other Stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habbad, Iudge of Israel, whom in the last place I haue mentioned) I rather choofe here to intreate of in one intire narration, beginning with the lineall descent of their Princes, than to breake the Storie into peeces by rehearsing a-part in diuers yeares the diuerlitie of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teneer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reinecius thinks) tooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it from him, then it rests vpon the authoritie of Virgil, who saith thus.

Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought In lowest vales. Hence CYBELS rites were brought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idean groue.

Thus

Thus it seemes by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teneer first gave name to that Countrey, wherein he raigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speakes thus.

*Est locus Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque vbera gleba.

OEnotrians held it, now the later progenie

This seate belongs to vs, hence DARDANVS, Hence came the Author of our stock, Iasus.

Some old Auruncos, I remember well (Though time haue made the fame obscure) would tell Of DARDANVS, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuscanie (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did saile to Samothracia,
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Remescius thinks that these names, Troes, Teneer, and Thracas, are deriued from Tiras or Tiras as the sonne of Iaphet: and that the Dardanians, Asians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were Germane Nations, descended from Askenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrey, Lake, and Riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Askenaz gaue name to those places and people it is not vnlkely: neither is it vnlkely that the Asians, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe. that the name of Teneer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teneer, whereas Ualicarnasius makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authoritie is the more to be regarded, because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did following it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teneer were of Crete or no. Remescius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus and others, that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Seamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrey, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Bata was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Remescius further thinks thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that theſe were Parents to Chryſe, firſt wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds other wife, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the ſonne of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Ectruria, to whom theſe bare Iafius. Annius out of his Berofus finds the name of Camboblyſcon, to whom he giues the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iafius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betwene theſe Bretheren, which grew to ſuch heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obſcuritie of the hiftorie giues leauc to Annius of ſaying what he liſt. I that loue not to vſe ſuch libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Jupiter, it muſt haue bene of ſome elder Jupiter than the Father of thoſe that liued about the Warre of Troy. So is it likewiſe probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which alſo is the opinion of Boccaccio. For (as hath often bene ſaid) there were many Jupiters, and many of almoſt euery name of the Gods; but it was the cuſtome to aſcribe to ſome one the acts of the reſt, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my ſelfe with making any narrow ſearch into theſe fabulous antiquities, but ſet downe the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teneer ſuch Parents as Diodorus giues, becauſe others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Troian Kingdome, with the length of euery Kings raigne, I haue chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Historie, whercon depends the moit ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie

whilst it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. yeares more ancient than the beginning of the 94th. Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did passe betwene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first yeare of the 94th. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeares, that is, 408. yeares went betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authoritie of booke. Hereunto doth Eusebius reckoning excludiuidly agree: and Eratosthenes (as hee is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the same total summe, wanting but one yeare, as reckoning likewise excludiuidly.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, doe neither cohere any way nor depend vpon any collateral Historie, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the yeare before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: we must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end out of Eusebius, who leades vs from Dardanus on-wards through the raignes of foure Kings, by the space of two hundred and siue and twentie yeares, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed vnder Laomedon, wee are fainte doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon trust from Ammius his Authors; beleeuing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings raignes and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Ammius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we neede not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no Historie or account of time depends vpon the raigne of the former Kings, but only vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may suffice that wee are carefull to place that memorabile accident in the due yeare.

True it is that some obiections appearing waightie, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those yeares, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeare; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorabile, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprize that was vnder-taken by generall consent of all Greece was the last Warr of Troy, which hath bene famous euen to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great battailes fought with variable successe: the long insurance of the siege; the destruction of that great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countries, as well by the remainder of the Troians, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, haue bene deliuered vnto posteritie, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose verses haue giuen immortalitye to the action, which might else perhaps haue bene buried in obliuion, among other worthy deedes done both before and since that time. For its true which Horace saith;

Vixere sortes ante AGAMEMNONA
Multi, sed omnes illicrimabiles
Vrgentur, ignotique longâ Noctē: carent quâd'vate sacro.

Many by valour haue desired renowne
Ere AGAMEMNON: yet lye all opprest
Vnder long night, vnwept for and vnknowne:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilest these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them of Poets, in whose works are both profit & delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted ouermuch; but such as can either interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much dilagerement of Authours, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the sonne of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes: but how he was herunto emboldened it is doubtful.

Of the Rape of HELEN: and strength of both sides for the warre.

 Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre, saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Aegypt, the Greekes to bee reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medeas, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to doe the like, not fearing such reuenge as inflicted. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phœnicians? or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, plead any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phœnicians? Tionycides a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vsed at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greekes themselves were not then called all by one name Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to think, that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations as barbarous, for the iniurie receiued by one: or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivry of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue bene true.

For

for Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruell man, seeing his owne sonne Teneer durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Alex (which Teneer could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so that Helen was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard, either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Helen: but was meereley incited by Venus, that is by his lust, to do that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greekes, as Herodotus discourseth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and hauing stollen them, either to sell them away in some farre Country, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theseus and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) rauish Helan. And these practises, as it appears in Thucydides were so common, that none durst inhabite neere vnto the sea, for feare of pyracie, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helan, considering the beautie of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, hee gaue free choyce of a husband to his daughter, who chose Meneaus brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Islands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he imbarqued for Troy in his owne ships, which were more than any other of the Greeke Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or ledde by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Meneaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprize; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build shippes with decks, onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small shippes, meete for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian armie consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie, doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which tenne whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliades; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misissia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenas being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia

10 Herefore the Greeks vnwilling to come to tryall of armes, if things might be compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Visles Embassa-dours to Troy, who demaunded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made here-unto it is vnertain. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests makes it very probable that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy.
The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helena, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuarie. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because hee was a stranger.
20 When therefore the Greeks demaunding Helen had answered, that she was in Egypt:
they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeed the had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Eurypides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Ladie, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odyssey, Homer speakes of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easly beleecued, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene 30 driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediatly vpon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such windes as hee could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauen in the Greeke Seas; whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Nauigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Egyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene vtter madnelle for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for 40 Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hebeus, considering that she had bene rauisht by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Casior and Polux (he and Polux being said by some to haue bene twinned) who sailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Aias in their companie before the time that Helene was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aias, that was a principall commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so, that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very 50 well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bene a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Holste with many troublesome answers and diuinations. For he would haue Agamemnon's daughter sacrificed to appeare Diana,

Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the Goddesse was contented with a heinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is that the malice of the deuill which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible till some fatal impediments were remoued: and that till tenne yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise; vnder the commaund of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phonix; Ajax and Tener the sonnes of Telamon; Iademeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Vilster, Meneleus the sonne of Petereus, captaine of the Aethiops; Dionides the sonne of Tydemus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes; Aeglephus, and Ismerius, the sonnes of Mars, who had failed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the sonne of Pean, who had the arrowes of Hercules, with out which Calchas said that the Citie could not be taken; Ajax the sonne of Oileus; Penelus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tisanderus, Eurypilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podalirius, and Atachon, the sonnes of Aesculapius: Epeus who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IIII.

Of the Attes of the Gracians at the siege.

THERE and many other of lesse note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily persuade them to thinke that the war would bee more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: saue onely that by their numbers 30 of men, they wonne ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Ceroneffe: others to robbe vpon the sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne receiue little losse by them, hauing equal numbers to maintaine the field against such Greekes as continued the sieg, and a more safe retreat, if the enimie got the better.

Wherefore Ouid saith, that from the first yeare till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Herodotus commends as very credible the report of Herodotus; That the Greekes did not ly before Troy the first nine yeeres: but onely did beate vp and downe the seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by waisting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vnto which they returned not vntill the fatal time drew nere, when it should be subuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them, and therefore sitting vpon an high to wer (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helens: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue beene supposed that hee should bee ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betwene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whilest the rest made purueyance by land and sea: the other that the whole whole armie did spend the time in waiting the sea-coastes. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authours: for they make report of many townes and Islands wasted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had bene to bee performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe; and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ranfome: but

- 10 Heraclides interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raised pestilent fogges, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish peece of ground. And it might well bee that the campe was ouer-pestered with those, who had bene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their hippes within the fortifications.
- About the same time arose much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as General, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe an other, then Aiux, Phyffes, and so the rest of the Chieftaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father, Apollo's
- 20 Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say, that hee alone would loole his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had bene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aiux, or to Phyffes. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse, otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Companies. But the Greekes encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troups.

- The Troians were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countreys hauing sent them ayde: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders,
- 30 who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre beganne (as appeares by his words in Homer) or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters, partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs recieued of the Greekes, when they wasted the Countreys adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Heitor issued out of the towne, hee was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Heitor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helinus and the other sonnes of Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriuall, Memnon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came to-
- 40 wards the end of the warre. Betweene these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilius vpon the plaine, and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Heitor brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Aiux, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Heitor, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

- An other battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troups, relieuing the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Phyffes, and the rest of
- 50 the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recouered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Heitor. It was the manner of those warres, hauing slaine a man, to strippe him and handed for a woman a count of brought

and hale away his bodie, not restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foote, slightly armed, and commonly followed the fuccie of their captaines; who rode not vpon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some true following of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their lauelins, and then alighting fought on foote, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of the footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their armes defensiu were helmets, breast-plates, bootes of brasse or other mettall, & shields commonly of leather, plated ouer. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand; and stons, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The vse of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keepe them from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subiect, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest warre heauied: also that from them they might throw their lauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field; wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their Tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; euery man (speaking of the chief) carried his owne compleat, of which if any peece were lost or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from some Captaine whom hee had slaine, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such meanes gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to awaite the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deere friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giuing him very great gifts, and exculing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleued) hee chased three times about the walles of Troy. But great questio n may be made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiving Hector in such an extremitie, would haue forborne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes soeuer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead bodie, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragged him shamefully about the field, selling the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his crueltie and couetousnesse were not long vnreueged, for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes in the Ican gate, or as others in the Temple of Aollo, which he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe same rate that Hector was by him sold for. Nor long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who after some proofe giuen of her valour, was slaine by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles.

¶ V.

Of the taking of Troy, the woddn Horse, the Booke of DARES and DICTIS, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

10 Hinally after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree; but whether by the treason of Aeneas and Antenor, or by a woddn Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificall horse. It may well bee that with some woddn engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the walls vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a woddn horse, it had bene a desperate aduenture, and seruing to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceiued the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon) or they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlkely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their walles vpon the suddaine to doe it) by which means they who were shut into it, must haue perished for hunger, if they had not by vsing forth vnseasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was built so high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall, to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprizing of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

30 Iohn Baptistæ Gramscy in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this war, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wall with a woddn engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the flecte of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed the bookes of Dares and Dictys must proue, which whether we now haue the lamethar were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in auuncient times, would not as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the Common report: had it not been that either those bookes were euen in those times thought, friuolous; or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authors as now is found in them.

40 Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre which Dares and Dictys say to haue bene aboute 600000. on the Troian side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report merely fabulous; forasmuch as the whole flecte of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as hee could, to bee somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported ouer the Greece seas, not much aboute 100000. men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extol the deedes of their Auuncients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greekes, that serued in the war; and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending & extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romanes descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Perſian King made againſt all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mineſeus the ſonne of Peteus had ſhewed, in marſhalling the Graecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had bene a matter of much conſequence, they were ſo proud, that they refuſed to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almoſt all Sicily, the Admirall of their Seas, notwithstanding that hee promiſed to bring 200. good fighting ſhips, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie poſſeſſed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in theſe parts of the world, which haue ſtriven to bring their deſcent from ſome of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikehooDs in ſuch their Pedigree, notwithstanding. But thoſe Nations which indeed, or in moſt probabilitye came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romanes, brought into that Countrey by Aeneas: the Venetians firſt ſeated in Padaua, and the Countrey adioyning by Antenor: the Chamaens planted in Epirus by Helenus, the ſonne of King Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth that the poſteritie of Heſtor did reſemble ſuch of the Troians as were left, and raigned ouer them about Troy.

29

Concerning the Greekes, they taſted as much miſerie as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes that by reaſon of their long abode at the ſiege, they found many alterations when they returned: ſo that many were driuen by their borders from their ancient ſeats: many were expelled their Countreys by faction: ſome were ſlaine anone after their arriual: others were debarred from the Soueraigntie among their people, by ſuch as had ſtayed at home. The cauſe of all which may ſeeme to haue bene the diſperſion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into ſo many peeces vnder ſeueral Commaunders, not very well agreeing. For (beſides other quarrels ariſing vpon the diuiſion of the bootie, and the like occaſions) at the time when they ſhould haue ſet ſaile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being deſirous to depart immediatly, the other to ſtay and performe ſome ſacrifices to Minerua. Hereupon they fell to hot wordes, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the reſt of them ſailing to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arriued, they could not agree among themſelues, but ſome returned back to Agamemnon, others were diſperſed, each holding his owne courſe. But the whole Fleet was ſore vexed with tempeſts: for Pallas (as Esomer ſaith) would not bee perſwaded in haſte.

They who returned ſafe were Neflor and Pyrrhus, whom Oreſtes afterward ſlew: alſo Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheleſſe, as Virgill tels, were driuen ſoone after to ſeek new ſeats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italia. Agamemnon likewiſe returned home, but was forthwith ſlaine by his wife and by the adulterer Egyſthus, who for a while after vſurped his Kingdome. Melaeus wandering long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as many rather ſeeme) to fetch her. Viſſes, after ten yeeres, hauing loſt all his company, got home in poore eſtate, with much adoe recouering the maſterſhippe of his owne houſe. All the reſt either periſhed by the way, or were driuen into exile, and ſaine to ſeek new habitations.

Aiax the ſonne of Oileus was drowned; Tenter fled into Cyprus, Diomedes to King Danus, who was Lord of the Tapyges in Apulia; ſome of the Locrians were driuen into Aſſricke, others into Italia, all the Eaſt part whereof was called Magna Graecia, by reaſon of ſo many townes which the Greekes were driuen to erect vpon to erect vpon that coast. Finally it appears in Homoy that the Grecian Ladies, whose husbands had bene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Habdon Iudge of Israel, whom Saujon after a variance of Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of SAMSON, ELI, and SAMVEL.

HE birth and actes of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Iudges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie. First that the Angell of God forbad the wife of Mansob the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to eat any vndean meate, after she was conceiued with childe, because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the child in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or at least will not beleue this precept; the most part forbearing nor drincks, nor meats, how strong or vndean fouer, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drincks farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Mansob would haue offered him, commaunding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Deuils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receiue no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wines, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euerit; Whom no force could ouermaster, Voluptas in se euerit.

Fourthly we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Come in harvest time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of India, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etan, vying these wordes, Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs? &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gaue them another ouerthrow and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Ass.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast wherto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patentia sepe lesa vertitur in furam; Patience often wounded is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli and of the Arke taken, and of DAGONS fall, and the sendinge backe of the Arke.

1. Sam. 3. 2. 3.
 He Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whole finnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrarie opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to call the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first encounter 40000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Itamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successfully in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Itamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phineas the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abijah the sonne of Phineas the fourth, his sonne Bocai the fifth, Oza the sonne of Bocai the sixth, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lycanus out of diuers Hebrew authours haue concinced. In the race of Itamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimias and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth. God greatly abhorred Israel, so that hee forsooke the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romanes to ouerthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to ouerthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would haue obserued his Lawes, and serued him onely: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Maschabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious, as any that garded themselves by the signe instead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne, David witnesseth when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him; he forbad it, and caused it to be returned into the Citie, vjing these words. If I shall finde fauour in the eyes of the Lord, hee will bring mee againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleued that while their Palladium or the image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer bee ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last Battall battell against Saladine carrie into the field, as they were made beleue, the very Crosse whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Christosome vpon Saint Matthew (if that bee his worke) giueth a good iudgement, speaking of those that ware a part of Saint Iohns Gospel about their neckes, for an amulet or preferuatiue. Si tibi ea non profunt in auribus, auribus quomodo proderant in Collo? If these words doe not profit men in their eares (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reverence of the Father that gave the one for a memorie of his Covenant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glorie which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Asotus, and set it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboute to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and set it vp, and set it againe in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the bodie, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the hands (by which wee execute strength) were sundred from the armes. For God and the Deuill inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not indure the representation of the true God, it is not to be maruailed, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles wherein the Diuell derided and betrayed mortall men lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had neuer beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a virgins bodie, shining vpon the earth which had bene long obscured by Idolatry, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great God Pan, as hee saileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an assertion: yet findes he none out but frivolous. For not onely this olde Deuill did then die as hee supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole race became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victorie God strook them with the grieuous disease of the Hemorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered that the Arke should be remoued from Asotus to Gath or Geth another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to proue, as it seemeth whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grieuous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and hee smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath lent the Arke to Ekron or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out that themselves and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduise of their Priests, the Prince of the Philistims did not onely resolve to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Israel, remembreing the plagues which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his seruice by strong hand. Wherefore confiding the power of the God of Israel to bee almightie, and that their owne Idols were subiect therunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vying these words; So yet shall give glorie to the God of Israel: that hee may take his hand from you, and from your Gods and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the liuing God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seene his miracles by Daniel.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to bee chosen, such as had not bene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to bee framed: but they durst not drive or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make triall whether were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethshems and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolve that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knewe that the milch kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their calues, but that they would have followed them wherefoeuer, much lesse when they were left to themselves would they trauell contrary way. For in the darkeſt night in the world if calues be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and delartes by the foore, till they finde them. But the kine trauielled directly towards Bethshems: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, 10 of one Iofua of the same Citie, they stood still there, which when the Princes of the Philistims perceiued, they returned to Ekron: After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements and had bene taught accordingly: he strooke them more grieuouſly than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fiftie thousand and leuente. From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-iearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie yeere in the charge of Elezar his sonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Ierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob, Mispah, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time seuered from the Arke: 20 or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-iearim.

§. III.

Of SAMUEL and of his Government.

THese Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a child, became now Judge and Gouernour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of Chore or Korach. For Leui had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, 30 and Isaar: of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Isaar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Leuite, was called an Ephraimite, not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauid's father was called an Ephraimite, because borne at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seed should multiply, as the Starrs of Heauen, and the fands of the Sea, as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the leuente; There shall bee neither male nor female barren among you. 40

Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother according to her former vowe dedicated him to God, and his seruice, to which he deliuered him euen from the duggs. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five yeeres old for five sheekles, and betwene five yeeres and twentie for twentie sheekles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should be called to seruice about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twentie yeeres old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Actes the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was giuen, and yet did Moses account himselfe such a one, as in the 18. of Deuter. The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like vnto mee, &c. But hee is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as, Before time in Israel, when a man went to seeke an answer of God, thus hee spake, Come, and let vs goe to the Seer: 50 for

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mispha in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them: who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia.) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother. The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall be thunder upon them, &c. Iosephus affirms that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victorie. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy successe obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Iosephus called Lapidem fortium: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and advantage of the victorie, the Israelites recovered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts: the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites toward the North and East, and the Idumites on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and judgment in diuers places by turnes, as hath bene elsewhere said.

set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and judgment to the best Chapmen. Which when when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a natural man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they praised him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successē which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeeld fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choise of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vsed his best arguments to dehoit them: which when he perceived to be ouer-feeble, hee deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniencies and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intollerable, but such as hath bene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will vse their Ionnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotiers, and Foot-men; which is not only not grieuous, but by the vassalls of all Kings according to their birth and condition desired: it being very agreeable to Subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-seruants to dress meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened: He will take up your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and giue them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, governed by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination contriue this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraignes hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Iudges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: he commandeth that the Kings which were to raigne ouer Israel, should writte the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all daies of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the wordes of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that he may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrarie to the lawes of God: in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is iust and right shalt thou follow, that thou maieest liue. Now if it bee not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst cate out of an other mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to an other. Neither are the wordes of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sonnes: and againe, this shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power secured from pietie, (because it is accountable to God only) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achub, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrarie to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better valew, or the worth in money.

money which he refused: yet because he was falsely accused and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tells vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israell. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe. Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of *S. Augu*stine is very true. Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata equitas non est equitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Feined innocence; and feined equite are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disposition who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrarie side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true law of free Monarchies; which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Only thus much I will say, that if practise doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, euen the best Kings of Inda and Israell were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne bretheren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though Dauid confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israell should receive this change of government, it was not only fore-told by Moses in Deutonomie, but prophced of by Jacob in this Scripture. The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing. For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equal the Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceede of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the Patterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall: and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other governments, hath bene by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not neede to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israell had: what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they lined for many yeares: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Jordan: the Philistines the Sea-coasts: and the Iebusites Ierusalem it selfe, till Dauid's time: all which that King did not only conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the Neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassalls. But whether it were for that the Israellites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this means they fought to be cleared from the finnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the persuasions and threats which Samuel vied, insisting vpon this point that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: where vnto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent every man to his owne Citie and abiding.

 Of the election of SAUL.

50 After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Bezkub, hee forbare the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom hee commanded Samuel to anoint. So

Samuel went vnto Ramath Saphim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also having wandred diuers daies to seeke his Fathers Asses, at length by the aduise of his seruants trauailed towards Ramath, to finde out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beaſts. In which iourney it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who fought an Assie, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Tabor; and after to make choise of Dauid the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beaſts, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Israel. So Iohn and Iacob were taken from casting their nets, to become Filthers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignity that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerslasting in Gods endlesse Kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staid his arriuall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul, finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him: asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt, Samuel answered that himselfe was the man he sought, and praised Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following appointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two men should encounter him by Rahels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found; and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of loosing his beaſts, to doubt the losse of his sonne: that he should then meete three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a companie of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods spirit and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Abias, Elias, Elisaeus, Isay, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets saith S. CHRYSTOSTOME, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praeterita, praesentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of 1. Cor. 1. 14. who intiched with spirituall gifts expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

Paul. in 2. Cor.

At Mizpeh Samuel assembled the people that hee might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betwene him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reucale it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeh, the general opinion is, that hee was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinkes by the answer of Urim and Thumim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, writing that mysterie vpon his breast when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all Nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others haue remembered diuers sorts of lots, vsed vsed by the Romanes, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds of honours; and in things to be vnder-taken: the two first kindes were called diuisorie; the third diuinatorie; and into one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes howsoeuer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs. The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus conifers it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe to be the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlighten'd by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and praised for him; yet some there were that enuid his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoid sedition, tooke no notice.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee received knowledge that Nabab King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which Nation since the great ouer-throw giuen them by Iephtha, neuer durst attempt any thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Ammonite, and then Israel did possess them of: which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephtha's time; yet they neuer perswaded themselves of more aduantage than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly they were remembered that the Philistims had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had vsed great care and pollicie that they should haue no Smithes to make them swordes or speares: neither was it long before that of the Beethsheemesites and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it selfe inuited them to enlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides it may further be coniectured that the Ammonites were embolden'd against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weakenesse, since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to haue bene increased to any great numbers: And if they had reconcered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time beene disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be vtterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath bene spoken: Saul, both to valiew himselfe in his first years raigne, and because perchance he was defended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel hewing a yoke of Oxen into peeces, and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, professing thus. That who soeuer came not forth after SAUL and after SAMUEL, so should his Oxen be serued: threatening the people by by their goodes, and not by their liues at the first. Seuen daies had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seuen daies to giue Nahas the Ammonites an answer: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue seuered themselves from Israel, and to become Vassalls and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces, which repaired vnto him at Bezeec, neare Jordan, that he might readily passe the Ruer; which done he might in one day with a speedy march arrive at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

1. Sam. 11. 8.

The Armie by Saul led consisting of three hundred and thirtie thousand: he returned an answer to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noone. For as it seemeth Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee surprized the Armie of Nahas the Ammonites. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he diuided his force in three parts, putting them to the sword, vntill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troups, inforst them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happy successe the people were so farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue slaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base vassalls of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

1. Sam. 11.

After the Armie removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, appointed King: and here Samuel vied an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now reigned one year before hee was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his natuities: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Mismas; and in the Hill of Bethel.

1. Sam. 12.

§. IIII.

Of SAULS disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his final reuersion.

IONATHAN with his small Regiment, that attended him, taking a time of aduantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama where he was first appointed by Samuel, which they thinke to haue bene Cariatb-searim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariatb-searim: but Iunius vnderstands this Garrison to haue bene at Gebah in Beniamin neare Gibba where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. How soeuer by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some throug places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly intraged by this surprize they assembled 30000. armed Chariots, and 6000. Horse, where-with they invaded Ides, and incamped at Masmas or Mickmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaris to Hiersusalem, and in the midst of the Land betwene the Sea and Jordan. With this suddaine inuasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountaines, other fled ouer Jordan into into Gad and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of Iosua when hee led Israel ouer Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel scauen daies: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrarie to the Ecclesiasticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to haue beene any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment 1. Sam. 10. 8. Secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoeuer was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes vsitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant beene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe, at which time also Samuel teared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

20 After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul when he had taken view of his armie found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan only. For the Philistims had not left them any Smyth in all Israel, that made weapons; besides they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons & armour as they had, behind them in the garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should bee able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Tabes Gilead with 300. and thirtie thousand men, if there had not now bene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, saue onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howsoeuer, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites onely files to sharpen and amend such stiffe as serued for the plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kinde of armes it is manifest, or els they durst not haue attempted vpon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was any found amongst those 600. souldiers which staid with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had publicly reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fled from him before

With this small troupe he held himselfe, to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength and better assured vnto him, then Galgala was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoeuer in the time of Samuel much had bin done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from heauen: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no meruaile if they could not in a short peace vnder Samuel bee replanted againe. For this tyranny of the Philistims is to be vnderstood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their craftes they proceeded in the pollicie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so enen to the times of Saul kept them from hauing any store of armour. The same pollicie did Nabuchodonosor vsr after his Conquest in Indus: Dyonisius in Sicilie; and many other Princes elsewhere in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Jordan the Philistims *sim*s had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessitie ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Boniamites exceeded in casting stones in slings; and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the twelfth Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Dauid against Saul, while he lurked at Sikeg, That they were well armed with bowes, and could vse the right and the left hand with stones, & with a sling it was, that Dauid himselfe slew the gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though hee were discouraged before he came to the hill toppe, and in a kinde of derision called vp by his enemies: yet hee so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God hee slew twentie of the first Philistims that hee incourent. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and iequalitie, they slaughterd one another in stead of enemies: wherupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victorie ouer them. Heere was that prophetic in Deuotonomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill about and, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retreat for the pursuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take foode till the euening, yet his son Jonathan being infebbed with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a droppe of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemes to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrowe likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vnderooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely the Mosabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he pretailed. Hee then assembled all the forces hee could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, hee invaded Amalek, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea and the desert, belonging to the Amalekites, from Hauilah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which warre hee tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all other attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the bestes and spoile of the Countie, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know, that God would cast him from his roiall estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there bin no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all vnexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalek from vnder heaven. For the crueltie which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouerweared, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, & his Nation about 400. yeres after ward; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe having also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witnesseth: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had bin by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to slay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in peeces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see SAUL, until the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrents betwene the reiection of SAUL and his death.

NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel; among the sonnes of Issai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how he might auoide both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom he sought to auoide the inconvenience or dangers of this life, then doe those men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no other wise auoide the perills and dangers thereof, than as men flippish in the opinion of fate, or destiny, neglecting either to begge counsaile at Gods hand, by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disclaime here to instruct Samuel, to auoide the fate of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Issai, Samuel by God directed, made choise of Dauid, the yongest, having refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of comly person and great strength, yet vnto such outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. Hee also refusing the other fixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock, for of him the Lord said to SAMUEL, arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, ouercome in battaile by the Philistims.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still and forborne to giue impediment vnto his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel might be repaied with aduantage, if euer opportunity should serue their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Mob, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all Warlike proportions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equal, if not superiours to Israel. The success of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their owne wilhes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so neare to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battaile, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the valley that lay between their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had bene confounded by the aggrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroake from heauen were to be feared. Goliath of Gath a strong giant, fearing neither God nor man, vnderooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as ouercome in groffe, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publicke notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliath, vntill David (sent by his father on an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith hee ouerthrew that haughtie gyant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistines, who should haue yielded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne side propounded, fled without slay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistines were not so broken, that either any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from intelling the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grievous indignation of his master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well deserring. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon David, he then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse and irreligious. Because the high Priest Ahimelch led David in his uacillatie with hallowed bread, and armed him with the sword of his own conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murdered this Ahimelch, and 85. Priests of Ahol, but also he destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both child and suckling, both Ox and Ass, and sheepe. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preferred the best of his Cattell, contrary to the Commaundement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priesets of Israel. Yea he would haue slaine his owne sonne Ionathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vireasonable commination. The companions of crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; also in that when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he fought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsel of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparatie for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsel from God he had benee alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neere and faithfulllest seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistines: his bodie with the bodies of his sonnes (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the wals of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Tabes stolne their carcases thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeres, according to Cedruanus, Theophilus, & Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistines.

§. VI.

Of such as lived with SAMUEL and SAUL; of HELLEN and HERCULES, and of their issues: upon occasion of the DORES, with the HERACLIDAE, entering PELOPONNESVS about this time.

- IN the second year of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David borne: after Codomas later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, saith he, was thirtie yeares old when he beganne to raigne: whence it followeth, that he was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeares, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the eleuenth of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus beganne his raigne over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State 31. yeares. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, wherof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleuenth of Samuel, Dercilus late in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; hee ruled that Empire 40. yeares. In this age of Samuel the DORES obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, posselt a great part thereof 328. yeares before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aolians: at length it was called Hellen, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the sonne of Denecalon, Lord of the Countrie of Phthiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet euery severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.
- 10 Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification; or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.
- Iapetus* begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Denecalon: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Denecalon and his wife Pyrrha raigned in Thessalie, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhanius affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queen. In Denecalons time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken else where. Denecalon begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xanthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dores and Aolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Boeotia. The Dores hauing first inhabited sundrie parts of Thessalie, did afterward seate themselves about Parnassus: and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedaemon: Xanthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being punished by his brethren, for hauing diuerted from them to his owne vsf some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erichon, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie recovered the Kingdome of his grand-father in Thessalie.
- 20 Ion being General for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegialia: In which Countrie Solinus then raigning, thought it safer to giue his daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Exordium.

Ion married Helle, and built a Towne called by his wifes name in Ægialia, where he and his posteritie reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and ouer-comming the Achaens possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achaes had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achaes driuen to secke a new seate, came vnto the Ionens, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alleading in vaine, that Ion and Achaens had beene brethren. When this request could not bee obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenes, the sonne of Orestes, in that Warre.

Thus were the Ionens driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remoue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionens into Asia hath beene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeares after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeares after the descent of the Heraclida into Peloponnesus. These Heraclida were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeares. Of their Father Hercules many strange thinges are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps mult be allegorically vnderstood. But the most approued Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these twelue great labours.

1 First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: Secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, wherof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hart: The fourth was the taking of a wild Boe alive, which haunted mount Erymantus in Arcadia: The fift was the cleansing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which hee performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it: 2 The sixt was the chaling away of the Birds from the Lake Symphalis: The seuenth 3 was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which 4 Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of 5 the Queene of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeces from Gades; 6 the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythological in- 7 terpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and 8 no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules vnderstand 9 Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others 10 make Hercules the Sunne, and his traualles to be the twelue signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well affi- 11 ring, that the expolition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee 12 tooke Elis, Phylus, Oechalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that he slew many Thceues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His traualles through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But sure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his inuicuous to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Cite of Greece (Athens excepted) required the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persecuted by the King Eurytheneus. This Eurytheneus was sonne of Sitheneus, and grand-child of Perseus; he reigned in Mycena, the mightiest Cite then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks vpon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnesse hee had committed vpon his owne Children; but as others say, because hee was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Eurytheneus for improving the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great ieaousie by Eurytheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein hee was employed, so that hee grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wifes and Concubines about threescore children. These children Eurytheus would haue had into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Ceyx King of Thracie, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurytheus) to Aibens. The Aibensians not onely gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountred Eurytheus. Iolau the brothers sonne of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heracidae. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leaue of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurytheus; whom when he had slaine in battell, he died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas he had led Calomeis into Sicilie, and aboad there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his colins, and afterwarde returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurytheus was slaine, they tooke Atrous the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mightie, and fauoured of the people: Against him the Heracidae marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoid estion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echeneus King of the Tegense a people of Aradia, who assisted Atrous, with condition that if Hyllus were victor, hee should peaceably enioy what hee challenged as his right: otherwise the Heracidae should not enter Peloponnesus in 100. yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heracidae compelled to forbear their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie shewes, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achei, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurytheus foure generations.

Of HOMER and HESIOD, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Alaones, descended (as Funfius imagineth) of Berois his Anameon, who gaue name to that people. But this Funfius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue beene long after these times, rashly framing his Aera according to Archibolus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus, & makes seuen more of this name to haue flourished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diueritie of opinions, both of the time and of the natue Cite of Homer. According to this Archibolus, Funfius findes Homer about the time of Alasse King of Inde, and Aunus of Rome. Hee was called Meletemes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe χορηγος; for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. Clemens Alexandrinus recites many differ entopinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. yeeres before the Consulshippe of Marcus Vinatius: which Mercator casteth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Tray taken, about 260. yeeres: and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome, making him to haue flourished about the time of Iehosaphat King of Inde. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus aboue named mention authours that make him much auuncienter. The difference of which authours in this point is not vnworthie the readers consideration, that by this one instance hee may guesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of auncient time: seeing in such diversitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Cleonus Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, nere the time that the Heracles returned into Peloponnesus: and Erastosthenes after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Philocorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colomies in Ionis. Apollodorus affirms that hee liued while Agessilus gouerned Lacedamon; and that Lycurgus in his young yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, nere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprife against the Gracians: which Berardus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Eusebius seemes to make him to haue bene about the time of Iudas King of Iuda 124. yeeres before Rome built: though Elfrid in his Chronologie he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall preparation where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, hee reckoneth many other Greece writers more auncient than Homer, 20 as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Pheonius, Aristaut, Orpheus, Musaeus, Thamyris, Amphion, and others.

Not. Attic. §. 6. 11.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Anlus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Senophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiodus: and on the contrarie, that Luc. Actius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian make Hesiodus of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, wherein he confirmes himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Eiclion in Helscon.

Varro de imag. lib. 1.

Not. in Chron. Cassi. L. 1. c. 11. a 1 his number M. c. lxx. corrects, & reads 240. lxx. Euseb. in Chr. apud Clem. Alex. Strom. 5.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siluij reigned in Alba, about 140. yeer^s after the fall of Troy. Euthimenes findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Aecusius the sonne of Pellias, King of Thebessy. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the reader with these opinions, but only to shewe the vncertainie and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Mennis, as perhaps containing some great mystrie. In derision whereof Lucian faining himselfe to haue bene in hell, and to haue spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he beganne his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, 40 because it came in his head so to doe.

Ep. de Cassi. in Corin.

It seemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobis Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepher solvis was his successour who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

About the end of Sauls gouernment, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Syllisius then ruling in Italie. And besides the ouerthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung vp, somewhat neerely together, sixe Kingdomes into greatnesse not before erected. In Italie, that of the Latines in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedamon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Syria Soba, and Danaseus, the Alads made themselves Princes, of which there were tenne Kings, which beganne and ended with the King of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites hauing now altered their forme of Gouernment, began to flourish vnder Kings, of which which David, in a few yeeres, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subiected the Judaans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a most abiect, and grieuous slavery; to wit, the Edomians, Mosites, Ammonites, Midianites, Iturians, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Iebusites, Geshurites, Machabites, all which acknowledged David for their Sovereigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

Of DAVID.

§. I.

Of DAVIDS estate in the time of SAUL.

20  HE hazards which David ranne into while he was yet onely designed King, and lining as a private man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personal act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the sonne of Saul, that hee loued him as his owne soule: In so much as when Saul sought to perswade his sonne, that David would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause,

30 Jonathan could neuer be perswaded, neuer forske, nor cuer wearied in the care of David's life, and well doing. It was not long after this signall act of David's, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though hee were become as his household seruant, and his Esquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit, was aduised to procure some cunning Multrian to play before him vpon the harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde ease, which came to passe accordingly. He entertained David for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant soone waxed wearie of his good affections, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the middle of his raising her, at which time hee threw a spear at David that was then playing on his harpe to doe him ease.

40 Conseruine remembreth one Asclepius a Physitian, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musick; and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kinde of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howe euer it sometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that musike, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Multrian than to the King.

50 Saul hauing failed in such open attempts, gaue vnto David the Commandement of 1000. soldours, to confront the Philistims withall. For hee durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife; but hauing married her to Achiel, hee gaue to David his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskinnes of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect spee of the valour of that Nation, that the Philistims would take Dauids head, than he their fore-kinnes. This hope failing, when as row Dauids victories begat new fears and ieioulties in Saul, hee practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this hee fought to murder him in his owne houle, but Atchob his wife deliuered him. So Dauid fought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence vnto Iob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to be-fore him selfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims he couered himselfe in the Cave of Adullam: and after conuincing such of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him into Moab, he hid himselfe in the deserts of Ziph, Maon, and the hills of Engaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Sauls garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his master Saul was knowne to prosecute him.

Of Achis Dauid obtained Siklag* in Simon, pretending to inuade Iudaea: but he bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of *Israe*l, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis supposing that Dauid had drawne blood of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him: and therefore preparing to inuade *Israe*l, summoneth Dauid to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore hee withdrew himselfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wines with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellows mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and assurance to recouer all againe which hee did.

This armie of the Philistims commaunded by Achis, encountred Saul at *Gilbo*a, in which hee and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the same Nation, who auowed (though falsly) that himselfe at Sauls request had slaine him. Dauid, because hee had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong euidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that every man ought to bee beleued of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is holdin the lawe; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbata alia instruit rigorem cognoscens. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vnlesse some other prooue informe the conscience of the Iudge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessor, et in cap. de parisi. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Chasse reconcile these two places in this sort. Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in iudgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseuere in his confession, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth off all competition and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of *Israe*l also fell, could not but stirre vp sorrow and moue compassion in the heart of Dauid.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Israelites, euen beyond the riuer of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemy, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seeke to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betwene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of *Israe*l, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caused fed them to attempt nothing at the present, leaft by fo doing they fhould enforce their difagreeing enemies to a neceffarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one party fhould confume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquifhed, would become a prey to the violence of fuch as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

§. II.

Of the beginning of DAVIDS reigne, and the warre made by ABNER for ISBOSETH.

FTER the death of Saul, Abner, who commaunded for Saul in the war, fought to advance Iſboſeth (or Iſboſus according to Iſeſephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdom of Iſrael: for Nephthoſeth the firſt ſonne of Ionathas lived. Againſt this Abner, and Iſboſeth, David made a delenſive warre, till Abner paſt Iordan, and entered the border of Iudā; as which time hee ſent Iſaah with ſuch forces as hee had, to reſiſt Abner; Iſboſeth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountered each other nere Gibeon, where it ſeemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betwene the Lacedæmonians and the Argives, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being choſen of each Nation, of which number three perſons were onely left, vniaine. I he like triall by a farre leſſe number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii for the Romanes and Latines. The ſame challenge Goliath the Philiftim made, whom David ſlew: a cuſtome very auncient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his owne perſon to the French King, and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There weretwelve choſen of each part, in this warre of David with the houſe of Saul, to wit, ſo many of Benjamin, and as many of Iuda: whoſe force and valour was ſo equall, as there ſuruiued not any one to challenge the victorie. But the quarrell ſtaid not here: for the armie of Iuda preſt Abner in groſſe, and brake him. Three hundred and fixtie men of Abners companions were ſlaine, and but twentie of Iuda; whercof Aſabel the brother of Iſaah was one: who when hee would needes purſue Abner, and by Abners perſwaſions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounding him to death, with the ſtroake of his ſpeare. For though Aſabel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Iſeſephus reporteth, contented not onely with men, but with horſes; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue maſtered Abner (who as Aſabel perſwaded himſelfe, had by being overthrown and flying away loſt his couraige) yet here it fell out true; That the race is not to the ſwiſt.

That this ciuill warre laſted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the ſecond of Samuel the ſecond Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter reſteth ſtill in diſpute, and ſome of the Rabbinnes conceiue that Iſboſeth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Iſboſeth after this, and till ſuch time as there grew iealouſie betwene him and Iſboſeth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Iſboſeth inſtantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the ſame doth not certainly appeare.

ABNER, reconciled to David, was alone by IOAB murdered; for IOAB could not endure a companion in Davids favour, and in the commandement of his forces, by which hee was growne so powerfull, as David forbore to call him to account; for thus much he confesseth of himselfe. I am this day weake, and these men the sonnes of ZERVAH bee too hard for mee. In this sort David complained after ABNERS death; and to make it cleare that hee hated this fact of IOAB, hee followed him with this publicke imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of IOAB, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subiect to ulcers, to the leprosie, to lameness, to the sword, and to povertie, &c. For could any thing haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by IOAB might greatly haue endangered Davids estate, ABNER being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. T his mischaunce therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which ABNER held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to giue them great respect; as hath bene already shewed more at large. T his office IOAB held in the armie of Iuda, & thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to David in kinred, and had bene partaker of all his aduersitie; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemye should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so ialous of his dignitie and place, that hee afterward slew AMASA his owne kinsman, and the Kings, vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him ioyned with himselfe as captaine of the hoste of Iuda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and bene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoever IOAB did hate or despise ABNER, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which hee might seeme to haue perished, by affirming that hee died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man falleth before wicked men, so (said hee) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyeth vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subiect to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever ISBOSETH meant to haue dealt with ABNER, yet when he heard of his death, hee despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were possit with great feare: in so much as two of ISBOSETHS owne Captaines, RECHAB and BAANAH, murdered ISBOSETH, and presenting his head to David, receiued the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to haue slaine SAUL. ISBOSETH being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annointed by generall consent.

D A V I D.

1 Sam. 5.

HEN DAVID was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprife was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walles with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which David soone after entred: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing maistered the fort of

Zion

Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) hee became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Iosias, and after them almost 400. yeeres.

There are who expound this place otherwise. Except they take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebusites; others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with Isaac and Iacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angels, and that therefore till those (that is till that Couenant) be broken Dauid ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with Iosephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in some of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against al the Children of Israel, Iosua, the Indges, and Saul: did not doubt but to defend it also against Dauid.

When he had now possit himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and receiued congratulatory Embassadors & presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained diuers other concubines & married moe wiues, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem, and by his former wiues he had six in Ebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistims hearing that Dauid was now anointed king as wel of Iuda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before hee was fully warme in his feat. And being encountred by Dauid at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of Giant, they were at both times ouertrowne. After which hee called the place Baalperazim.

Then Dauid assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house of Aminadab in Gibea, to the Citie of Dauid, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Fezab the sonne of Aminadab, whom the Lord slewe for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnitie brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musicke, dances, and all signes of ioyfulness, in which Dauid himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Mischol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in Coorne. That hee was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that hee forgot his regall dignitie both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and fireets: not that hee disliked Dauids behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of Dauids sin. But rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glorie of her husband to whom shee was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines shee conceiued that the sonne of Israh had built this his greatnesse, together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitfull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, Dauid consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest, homicides; hauing threatned, not in vaine, that hee would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beast. The warres which Dauid had made were iust, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceiue themselves, who thinke by bloodshed and terrour of their waies, to make themselves in greatnes like to the Almightie, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Sauour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accepta Temple of Dauids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon hee receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happie promise of the euerslasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1. Sooner after this David ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, accepti frantum Amgaris e manu Philisthorum, which place our Englisb Genes conuertes in these words. And DAVID took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense, for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Genes hath it in the marginal note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casaria, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thercinto their retreat In all their inuasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontie town of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hil whereon Geth or Gath stood the Hebreues call Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and thirteenth Chap. This expolition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Iunius in 8. c. of the second of Sam.

1 Sam. 13.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities & villages of that kind, but infort them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of Dauid were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

2 Sam. 21. vs. 17.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrows: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betwene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. shickles of brass, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Alisbhai succoured Dauid and slew the Philistim, whereupon the Councillors and Captaines of Dauid (least the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himself in any battaile. The second and third incounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, hee inuaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduertitie he sought succour and let his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

The Rabines saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of Dauid, which liued vnder his protection in Sauls time, but questionlesse Dauid wel knew how that Nation had bin alwaies enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deuter. God commaunded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperitie of the Moabites, which Dauid well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of all the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his armie by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadazer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which DAVID made vpon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: DAVID smote also HADADAZER &c. as hee went to reconer his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went) to reconer his border) be referred to Dauid or Hadadazer it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to Dauid, who finding Tohu oppressed by Hadadazer, ouerthrew threw the one and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if Dania had intended any such enterprise towards Euphrates, he was in farre better case to have proceeded after his victorie than before: seeing that (Adadecer being taken) he had now left no enimie on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Again, seeing Dauid was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to cary his provisions through those uncultivated places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we find that Dauid returned to Iherusalem, after hee had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King Dauid, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria Damsasena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadecer was ouerthrowne by the Israelites, fearing his owne estate, & the losse of his owne Contry which adioyned to Syria Zobab of Hadadecer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadecer, and too sonne for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 20000. This king of Damascus, Iosephus (out of Nicholau an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name & family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatness and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. Dauid hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as hee did in Ezion: hauing also sackt the adioyning cities of Betab, and Berath, belonging to Adadecer, of which Cities Ptolomy calleth Betab, Taubu, & Berath he nameth Barathena, Tobu or Thoi whose contry of Hamath ioined to Adadecer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) sent his son Ioram to congratulate this successe of Dauid: partly because hee had war with Adadecer, and partly because hee feared Dauid now victorious. He also presented Dauid with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse, all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoiles of other Nations Dauid dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (elypeis aureis) by armholes, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Koboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadecer, at such time as Shieab the Egyptian sackt the Temple of Iherusalem, it may be gathered thereby, that those of Adadecer were golden shields.

This done Dauid sent Embassadors to Hannum King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fithers Kingdome: for Dauid in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had bene relieved by Nabab, the father of Hannum. But this Ammonite being ill advised, and ouer-iculous of his estate, vsed Dauids messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their bearded, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand souldiers of the Amalakes, and their confederates: to wit, of the vaillales of Adadecer twentie thousand, and of Machab and Issob thirteene thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great armies together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Ioab and his brother Abisai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the wals, the other in their desarts adioyning, till Ioab was returned to Iherusalem.

Hadaezer hearing that Joab had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent for all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. Dauid hearing of this new preparation assembled all the ablest men of Israel and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the Northeast, than Hierusalem was towards the South west. Now Dauid (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest off journey that cuer he made, because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the mid-way. He also posselt himselfe of Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon after ward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one daies iourney from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had he two safe retraites the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between Dauid & the Syrians, they lost 40000 horsemen, and 7000 chariots, together with Shobach General of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000 souldiers footmen, and so Iunius conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000 horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battel, numbred at 7000, in the first of Chron. the 9. in which number, as I conceiue, all the souldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included: so that there died of the Syrians in this warre against Dauid, before he forc't them to tribute; 100000 footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Iuda often: but the kings of Israel they impowerlessed, euen to the last end of that State.

Dauid hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his armie to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, after ward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and posselt. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with pretious stones, Dauid set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though Dauid stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Vriah-his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie, and readie to be entred: yet Joab in honour of Dauid forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arriuall. To the people he vsed extreme rigor (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters) for some of them he tare with harrowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kilns, in which he baked tile and bricke.

As victorie begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicitie a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the Fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commandements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemy (against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) hee beganne to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not only satisfied to take Vriahs wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but hee imbrodered his adultery with Vriahs slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant

Iobab

Iosh to marshall him in the front or point of those Iffraelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of preuailling. And that which could no lesse displeas God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best seruants and souldiers should perisht together with Viab, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-haruest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God

10 to take the witness of Dauids owne mouth against him, as Dauid himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne error, in the person of another, to wit of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof although it pleased God to pardon Dauid, for his life; which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iudice together with his merite in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine V. with the 20 sword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this Dauid lost the child of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Thamar, by the aduise of his Colin german the sonne of *Shimeah Dauid*s brother, possesst her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despitifull manner. Two yeeres after which foule and incontinent act, Abisalem caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheep-shearings not perchance in reuenge of *Thamar*s rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affaire greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despised her; the other after

30 a long dissembled malice, first, made his own brother drunken; and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the sauegard of Talmai King of Gessur neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abisalem by the inuention of Iosh, (but chiefly because of the great affection of Dauid towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence. He began instantly to practise against Dauid his father, seeking by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of *Dauid*s sinne.

40 The company which Abisalem gathered at the first were but 200. men; which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiouly, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon on the suddain, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Cite of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surpris; but incamped in the fields, & desarts with some 600. of his guards, and few else. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God from whom he desired to bee aduertised of those things that chanced, to whom he directed Hui his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsels of Abisalems partie and confederacie, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolted Counsaillor, whose practises hee greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his maister Mephiboseth the sonne of Ionathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauid prosperitie had smothered, but his aduersitie illighted, holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most despitefully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no private reuenges, forbade Abisba to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Abisalom being now possesit of Hierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel vsf his fathers concubines in some such publicke place, as all Israel might affure themselues, that hee was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded they would then resolutely adhere to Abisalom and his cause, without feare of being giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betwene them. This saluage and impious (though craftie counsaile) Achitophel indeed vtred for his owne respect, as feareing that this rebellion might take end in his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretoide Dauid: *I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and giue them vnto thy neighbour, and hee shall lye with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne.* Hee also gaue aduise to Abisalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid, which had willingly bene embraced by Abisalom, had not Abisba *Dauid*s faithfull seruante giuen counter-aduise, and swayed it: perswading Abisalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father: then by such a troope, which *Dauid*s valour, and those of his attendants, might either indaunger or resist. This delay in Abisalom, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeed, after God, the losse of the one and deliuerie of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly feareing (by the occasion fore-deluiered) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the partie and the care of Abisalom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isboseth himselfe in the warre against Dauid after *Saul*s death feared himselfe. To which place there repayed vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nahash the Ammonite, whom Dauid loved, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannum, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after *Hannum*s ouerthrow. In thankfullnesse whereof hee relieued Dauid in this his extremitie. There came also to *Dauid*s assistance Machir of Lodabar, Gardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Borzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his companie.

In the meane time both the King and Abisalom prepared to fight; Abisalom made Amasa Commaunder of the armie of Israel, the same place which Isab held with Dauid; an office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, slayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Isab, Abisba, and Ittai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisalom. But Isab, besides that hee was very cruel by nature, remembered that Abisalom had lately disposed of his Government to Amasa, and therefore the victorie being obtained, and newes brought him that Abisalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, hee himselfe with his owne seruants dispatch him. It appeared also by the sequell that Isab affected Adonijah whom hee afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and feareing the disposition of Abisalom, he embraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, hee mourned and forrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and seene euery delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward ward after so great a victorie, covered themselves also in the Citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Isab presenting himselfe before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the armie. For first he told him that he had discourteased his faithfull servants, who had that day preferred his life; inferring that nothing could be more daungerous to a King, than not onely to notacknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrarye grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Absalom at an easie rate. Secondly, hee urged that it was generally beleueed, that he loued his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that hee had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull servants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Absalom liued, than in the victorie by their faithfullnesse and approved valour gotten.

Lastly hee vsed this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publikly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening: And that will be worse vnto thee than all the euill that sellon thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouerbold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Isab raised David, from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom hee assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa who commanded the armie of Absalom, to whom hee promised the office of Lieutenant-shippe; the same which Absalom had giuen him, and which Isab now enioyed, For David doubted that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face, but this remission was but extemal, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsly accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall hoste, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in David, the armie brake and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba, the sonne of Bichri a Beniamite of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontentment among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest; and it seemeth that many of the people of the out tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David employed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because hee conceived that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Isab had. He received commandement from David to assemble the armie within three dayes, which hee foreflowed: but being onward on his way, Abishai Isab's brother was sent after him, with David's guard and best souldiers, whom also Isab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no lesse iealous of Amasa than hee was of Aner, whom hee murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done he pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman thereinhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and stung it to Isab over the walls: which done, hee retraited his armie to Jerusalem, and commanded as before all the host of Israel.

The next act of David's, was the deliuerie of Sauis sonnes or kin smen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers crueltie. David had knowledge knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reaton of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore hee willingly yeelded to give them this satisfaction, both because hee had warrant from God himselfe, as also if we may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom hee and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endaugered; only he spared Mephibosheth the sonne of Jonathan, both for the loue hee bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of RISHAH whom shee bare vnto SAUL, and the five sonnes of MICHOEL the daughter of SAUL, whom shee bare to ADRIEL, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites. 10

Iunius calls this Mitchel the sister of her that was Dauids wife, shee whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Mitchel here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid, when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol sloued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel the better translation were out of the Hebræw word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliath, whose speare was weightie as a weauers beame, when as by the same Eclipsis it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath: Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forraigne enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number and qualitie, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were sixe Coronels, whose valour was extraordinary, that it might well be held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue bene giuen vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was laine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neerenesse in blood vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approoued seruices. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue bene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea or thirtie times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, & bin hardened with his aduertities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their seuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was General of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37) were the especial men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be gesse to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths wee finde nowhere mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeraiah, who had bene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and onely Ioab left in the beginning of Salomons, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremitie. 50

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout, when the posteritie of Saul was rooted out, so that hee hee enjoyed about seauen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remouell all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeas'd God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power in which hee employed Ioab with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twentie daies trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare armes, and they amounted to the number of thirtcene hundred thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin; whereof in Juda and the Cities thereof siue hundred thousand, and in Israel 2. Sam. 24. 1. Chron. 21. 1.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which hee pleased; to wit, seauen yeeres famine, three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chafed by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choyce to bowe himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished seauentie thousand. And hereby he hath taught al that liue that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof hee giueth vs this diuine reason. For his mercies are great. 2. Sam. 24.

§. VIII.

of the last acts of DAUID: ADONIAHS faction: the reuenge upon IOAB and SHIMEI.

LAsly, when hee grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of woman, hee was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a yong and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when he was in a manner bedrid, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Amnon and Abisalom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, beganne manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauid's sonnes, and a man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly tainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Lingo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hercof when Dauid had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her sonne should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, & seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoe the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benasab the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to annoint Salomon, and to set him on the mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cberethians and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those rydings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his attendants, and for the safety of his life he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof hee was desirous to discharge his thoughts, the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which hee sought by all meanes to aduance, and make the businesse publike. To bring these intentions to good effect hee summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the seuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power, who repaired vnto Ierusalem. 2. King. 1. Chron. 28. v. 1.

In

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he tooke occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Isaac in his blessing prophetically Bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choice of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselves vnto all that God had commaunded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced hee the paterne of the worke according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

1. Chron. 29. 9.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himselfe had given three thousand talents of golde, and seauen thousand of siluer, they added vnto it heauen thousand of gold, and ten thousand of siluer, besides brasse, iron and iewels, heartily reioycing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, and received fealtie of all the Princes and people of the land, and of all the Princes his brethren the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his father Dauid finding himselfe euē in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happie end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mightie words; Take heede to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keep his statutes and his commandements, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of MOSES &c. to the performance of which God fastened the succession, and prosperie of his issues. For this done (saith God himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit vpon the throne of Israel.

1. King. 2. 3.

1. King. 1. 30.

Secondly, hee aduised him concerning Isab, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that hee fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his matter yet liuing) and thereby vexed him in his keble age. But as God hath neuer left crueltie vnreunged, so was it his will that Isab should drinke of the same cuppe, whereof he had enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniuently stroken others with all, qui gladio percussit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Ahner and Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Ahner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoid him: against the other but a meere iaculose of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Isab assured himselfe that Ahner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benaiab the sonne of Iehoiadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against Isab, that he slew the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed blood of battell in peace; and to this apparent and iust cause, it is not improbable that that Dauid remembered the ill affection of Isab towards Salomon, which Isab made manifest by the vintimey setting vp of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Isab had committed against Dauid of which in these words he put his son Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what I O A B the sonne of SERUIAH did to mee, &c. Now whether this were ment by the killing of Abisalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Abisalom; or whether it were the publishing of *Dauid*s letter vnto him for the killing of Uriah: thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselves exceeding ding inoltently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their matters cannot misse them, or that they daerenot offend them. But this kinde of pride hath overthrowne many a worthy man otherwise deservng great honour and respect.

Hee also gave order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David and curst him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himselfe lived, yet being dust and in the graue he slew him, by the hand of Solo mer his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh of England had his patterne, when hee gave order to Henric the eight to execute Peol as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spaine when hee delitered Peol vnto him, that while hee lived hee would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Isab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profite or assurances he hoped for. For he found a young Alad of Linnas, and Rezin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that David slept with his fathers, and that Isab the Captaine of the host was dead. Now when David had reigned in all fortie yeeres, to wit in Hebr on seauen yeeres, and in Ierusalem three and thirtie he died.

For his person he was of final stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces he so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his own heart. The Psalms which hee wrote witness his pietie, and his excellent learning: of whome Therom to Pautinus. DAVID SIMONIDES nasser, PINDARVS & ALCAEVS, FLACCVS quogue CATVLLVS, & SERENVS, Christi sim lyra aper sonas, & in decachordo P saltero ab inferis suscitatus resurgentem. DAVID (saith he) Jour SIMONIDES, PINDARVS, ALCAEVS, HORACE, CATVLLVS and SERENVS, he playeth Christi on his harpe, and on a ten stringed Psalter he raiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, hee foretelleth Christ more lightomely and Iudely than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalms saith Glycas were diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalms were written by David it is diuersly disputed. For Athenasius, Cyprian, Iyranus, & others conceiue diuers iudgements, and differing titles of the seuerall Psalms, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named, and that only 73. Psalms were composed by David himselfe, namely those which are intituled ipsius David. For the 50. and 72. with the ten that followe are bestowed on Moshe the sonne of Barachia, eleuen other on the sonnes of Korah, and eleuen are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the 10. following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine authours of these Psalms which David wrote not. Sicut Senensis nameth as followeth, Salomon, Moses, whom Aben Ezra contrariet to Hierome, maketh one of Dauid fingers) Asaph, Eithar-Eziachi, Eman-Ezaiara, Idithurn, and the three sonnes of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes David the sole authour of all the Psalms, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner. Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms onely vnto David, which are ouerwritten ipsius David, and the rest intituled psa David to others, this opinion (saith hee) Voc Euangolica saluatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse DAVID in spiritu Christi sum dixerit esse suum Dominum quoniam Psalmus 109. sic inquit. Dixit Dominus Domino meo, se te a dextris meis &c. The voice of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the 109 Psalm begins thus. The Lord said vnto my Lord sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are vsed both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a patterne to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Storie and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. ver. 19. For the seuerall parts of the bookes

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Troians during the time of the siege, fought for succour from Dauid, and that he stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscall the time twixt Dauid and the Troian warre. Of the treasures of DAVID and SALOMON.

Vof. 14.

IS treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, & a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more than any King of the world posselt belids him selfe, and his son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirtie and three cartload & a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides three score and seateene millions of French Crownes, or of our money twentie three millions and a thousand pound: a matter but for the testimonie of the Scriptures exceeding all beliefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare, seeing that the Iudges had not any treasure, nor any soueraigne power to make leuies: but when they went to the warres, they were followed by such voluntaries as the severall tribes by turnes gaue them: seeing also that Saul who was of a meane parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part posselt by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how Dauid within the space of not very 30 many yeeres, might amasse vp such mightie treasures. For though parsimonie be it selfe a great reuentic, yet needes there must haue beene other great meanes. It seemes that hee made the vttermost profit of all that hee had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de preparatioue Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid among other preparations for the Temple, build a Nauie in Melanis (or as Villalpandus corrects it Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Island Vrph, which Ortelius thinks, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Island is in the red Sea; from whence saith this Eupolemus they brought golde into Jury. Pineda ltb. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 1. thinks that Dauid did this way also enrich himselfe, and citeth this testimonie of Eupolemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other waies to gather great riches. Much land doubtlesse hee gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistims, besides those fruitfull valies neere Jordan in Trachonitis and Basar, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike hee kept in his owne hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which hee tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeme themselves, hee husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 1. Chron. 1. 7. that Iehonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Ezeri was ouer the labourers, that tilled his ground; Simei ouer the vineyards; and Sabdi ouer the store of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the oliue trees, and Iosb ouer the store of the oyle, also that hee had herdmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high lands, and in the plaines, ouer his sheepe, camels, and asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandry and Cattell the auncient Kings euery where held, both before and and after Dauids time. For wee reade of Pharas that hee spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to be Rulers over his cattell. We reade of Pharis, that he loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greece Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Hearsd and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augens and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlikely, but that those captiues which were not imploied in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues:

10 To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tebu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem captationis; By the law of captation or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sicle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fourteene pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbred by Iosh. Now although this Law of captation be thought by some very learned not to haue bene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuertheless they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlikely to haue put it in practice. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that of this great masse of gold and siluer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in private, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that he left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that he gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of siluer; a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue been, hauing received continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution euer since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintayned the Priest and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the People which remayned at home, had the other halfe; where by all the Countrie receiued benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euery single share.

30 Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued, and one in siue hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoile of Midian, thirtie two thousand women being taken, the armie had sixteen thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two and thirtie for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twentie. By this meanes, the lesser that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaying at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domestick affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and siluer, and other mettalls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtayned against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as vultaric presents.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden downe by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shile. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must haue bene exceeding great; as contayning aboute one hundred part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtayned against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Iosh, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoiles obtayned in warre, to maintayne the house of the Lord; the like wherof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captaines in other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Dauid brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted; but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue bene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue bene the meere fruits of his owne industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he receiued yearly reuenues with his tributes fixe hundred sixtie fixe Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returnes from the East Indes, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voiage euery three yeares, and he beganne that trade in the two and twentieth yeare of his reaigne, and ruled fortie yeares. Besides this, all Indes and Israel were now mallered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobab, of Damascena, of Palmyra, of Ituraa; all of Idumaa, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguisht, though subiected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by Dauid, who after fortie yeares reaigne, and seuentie yeares of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in Dauids Tombe a meruailous quantite of treasures, in so much as Thyreanus (who first of the Ethiopianes, or race of the Alaccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeares after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem, and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleued, in regard of the great exactions with which he was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left vnto him; were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent imploiments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but only the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monumentes of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Alca) they remayned within these thirtie yeares, and are like to remaine still, are able to make any report credible, of the cost bestowed vpon them.

Dauid Tombe.

D. X.

Of the Philistims, whom DAVID absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with DAVID.

10 If the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of Davids time somewhat here may be spoken.

They descended of Casium, who, according to Isidor and Iosephus, was one of the sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Euseb was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities of petic principalities, namely, Asdod, Gaza, or Aesaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casium was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumaea, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembered in the Scriptures, till Dauids time; perhaps the government was turned into Aristocratie. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, whose fouer Achi be named King of Gath; the same to whom David fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Sauls time.

After him we read of another Achi who lived with Salomon, to whom Semci trauided to fetch backe his fugitive seruant, what time the seeking of his seruant was the losse of his life. Ieremie the Prophet speaketh the Kings of Palestin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warres of the Philistims are remembered in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not neede to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Siluij King of Alba called Latinus Silanus, who is said to haue ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Coerus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontides, without regall name governed Athens during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their government, was not drawne from any inconuenience found in the rule of Soueraigntie, but in honour of Coerus onely. For when the Grecians of Doris, a region betwene Phoia and the mountaine Oeta, sought counsaile from the Oracle, for their success in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered that then vndoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie against the Nation, and yet preferre the Athenian King liuing. Coerus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrewe himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountered, was himselfe forthwith cut in peeces.

Enphates the 21. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire about the 13. yeere of Dauid, and held it 38 yeeres.

Neere the same time begh Iston the second King of the Heraclida, the sonne of Eurythenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclida in Lacedaemon: in honour of which Agis, his succellours were called Agida, for many yeeres after. Hee restored the Laconians to their former libertie: hee outcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, whq had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetual slaucry, whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like sort from the Sclauis came the word Slau. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized vpon the countrie of Syria and made it their owne by Conquest, their victorie pleased them so highly, that therupon they called themselves by a new name, Slauos, which is in their language glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate hauing thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden down, and made seruants to their neighbours, the Italians which kept many of them in bondage began to cal all their bondmen Slaves, vsing the word as a name of reproche: in which sense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Aeis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Dauid, and saie that Acheilratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whome Eusebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon.

In the tenth yeere of Acheilratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus assisted by the Ionies, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adioyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie was slaine by the Carians whose countrie he vsurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magenetes, his armed Statue being set ouer him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next prouince to Ephesus on the Seacoast of Asia the lesse) he enlarged his Dominions vpon the Aeoles, which ioyneth to Ionis: and that his posteritie gouerned the Cities of Ephesus and Erythra by the name of Basilides in Strabo his owne time. Of the expedition of the Ionies how they came hither out of Peloponnesus, I haue * spoken already vpon occasion of the returne of the Heraclides into Peloponnesus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Aeoles, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Ionies succeeded that of the Heraclides 100. yeeres.

The Citie of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the temple of Diana therein built: which had in length 425. foote, and 220. in bredth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foote high: whereof 27. were most curiously grauen, and all the rest of choice marble polihnt, the worke being first set out by Cresiphon of Gnosos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that receiued the Christian faith, of which Timothie was Bishop, to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intitled. The other Citie possit by Androclus in Aeolis was also vniuersally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythraa: who liued seuen hundred and fourtie yeeres before Christ borne. Saint Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greeke coppie certaine verses of this Prophetesse: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these wordes. *Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator. About the time that Isab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres beganne to gouerne in Egypt, the same that was father in Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembered by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of Dauid, was the citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated vpon the riuier Meander, where Scipio gaue the great ouerthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best horses of the lesse Asia bred, whereof Lucan:

About the same time Cuma in Compania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Servius, with whom Strabo ioyneth the Cumans of Aeolis, saying that to the one of these people the gouernment was giuen, with condition that the other should giue name to the Citie. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholar of Isoocrates.

Eusebius and Cassiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Dauid, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Metimius the sonne of Badezor brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Israell; and betwene the death of Dauid, and the first of Achab, there were waied about 95. yeeres.

In this time also Acastus liued, the second of the Athenian Princes after Colchus, of which there were thirteene in descent before the State changed into a Magistrate of tenne yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Aiolians ledde by Gramus, the grandnepheue of Orestes, possess the Citie and Island of Lesbos about this time. In the 32. yeere of Dauid, Hiram beganne to reigne in Tyre, according to Iosephus, who saith that in his twelfth yeere Salomon beganne the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Iosephus, to misreckon times, which in this point hee doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any account. For it is manifest that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars to Dauid, soone after his taking of Ierusalem, which was in the very beginning of Dauids reigne ouer Israell, when as yet hee had reigned onely seauen yeeres in Iehron, ouer the house of Iuda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned about 30. yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should be giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

taining the Kingdome.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonyah to be slaine by Beniah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonyah his desiring by Bertheba, that the young maid Abisag (which lay in Dauids bolome in his latter daies, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. What soeuer he pretended it was enough that Adonyah was his elder brother, and fought the kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is saide that a word is enough to the wife, and he that sees but the claw, may know whether it bee a Lyon or no: so it may seeme that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had bene concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wilhed Abisalon to take his fathers concubines as a part of the royaltie. And Dauid alter that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntil their death. And this it seems was the depth of Isobeths quarrel against Abner, for hauing his fathers concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid; I haue giuen thee thy misters house, and thy misters wines. And in the words of Saul, vpbraiding Jonathan that hee had chosen Dauid to the shame of the nakedness of his mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdome to Salomon. There might be diuers farther occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition; or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the customes of the Jewes: yet the Kings of the Jewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne, namely of Jacobs disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Joseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appears by the words of Bersabe and Nathan to Dauid, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it nowhere appears in the stories of the Jewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilead: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that hee was King long before no man can doubt. In like manner elswhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said. Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that he put Adonijah to death, he ridde him selfe also of Isab, and three yeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Ahiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Ephraim King of Egypt to wife: for so Enfethim out of Enophemus calls him. Hee offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bad him aske what he would at his hands; *SALOMON chooseth wisdome, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, becaused, I haue done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life, in respect of our selues cannot but proceede of selfe-loue, which is the roote of all impieties: the desire of priuate riches is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand and to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from Dauid, or from* from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to give him both that which he desired not. And I have also given thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomon's wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soon he judged the controuersie betweene the two harlots.

Of SALOMONS buildings and glorie.

He then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is written of Dauid that he called SALOMON his sonne, and charged him to build a 20 house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tobias give the force of a diuine precept to these words. Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my name.

Hee beganne the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the 4. yeere of his reign, at which time also hee prepared his fleets at Elongaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supplic the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Adammag trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed thirtie thousand Carpenters, tenn thousand euery month by course: he also vsed eightie thousand Malons in the mountaine, and seauentie thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, he selected out of the Presettes, besides three thousand three hundred maisters of his worke, so as he paid and employed in all one hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Zidonians which were more skilful in hewing timber than the Isradites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his seruants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in rafts to Joppe or the

For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouerseers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassalls of Hiram, and of Vaphes King of Aegypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand measures of wheate, and twentie measures of pure oyle yeerely. Eusebius out of Eusebius in the ninth booke of his preparation the last Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomon's Letter to Saron (which was the same as Hiram or Hiram) King of Tyre in these words.

30 REX SALOMON SVRONI, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicia regi. Amicus paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno DAVID patris mei regnum accepisse, cumq; mihi pater præcepit tem plum Deo, qui terram creauit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atq; sabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King

KING SALOMON to King SYRON, of Tyre, Sidon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friends, sendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father DAVID, the Kingdom: and when my father commaunded mee to build a Temple to God which created heauen and earth, hee commaunded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would bee pleased to send mee artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King SYRON made this answer.

SYRON, Tyri, Sidonis, & Phœnicia rex, SALOMONI regi salutem. Letis literis gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis sabros ministros, ad condendam Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te milia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur vt necessarij non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SYRON of Tyre Sidon and Phœnicia King, to King SALOMON greeting: when I read your letters, I gave God thanks, who hath inflated you in your fathers Kingdom. And because you write, that carpenters and workemen may be sent to build Gods Temple; I have sent vnto you, a wreath of thonsand men, and a Maister builder a Tyrian, borne of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built that they come home to vs.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum archivibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somewhat in different termes, as the reader may finde in his antiquities. But were this intercourse betwene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Iosephus set it downe, but, so that in substance there is little difference betwene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to haue written to Vaphres King of Ægypt and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Ægypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemus in Eusebius, I doe not inde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Iosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the Ierues antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and vsed likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, in so much as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wal, & repaired Hazor which had bene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iosuahs time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: he built Bethoron, Gerar and the Millo or ruinion of Hierusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar which the Canaanites yet held & put them to the sword and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then buied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of those neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Ægyptians to visite those partes againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Shebact this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan and Beth in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamorou in the desert of Iudæa (or as Iosephus phus thinks Palmyra in the desert of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the utmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when hee wanne Damascus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best arte; that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadamor, by which name (saith hee) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places calls it Thermeth. In aftertimes, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperor it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold received from Hiram servants, Salomon offered Hiram twentie townes in or neere the upper Gatlee, but because they stood in an vnfruitfull and marish ground Hiram refused them, and thereof was the territorie called Chabull.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Gatlee of the Gentiles, Non quo; gentes inhabitarent: sed quis sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possess'd by Gentiles (saith Nauclerius) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. How soeuer it were, it is true that Salomon in his 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, hee made a iourney into Syria Zobah and established his tributes; the first and last warre (ifin that expedition hee were driven to fight) that hee made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrens, and to the Deserts of Idumaea, from whence hee visited Eziongeber and Eloth, the vtmost place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I haue described in the Storie of Moses.

§. III.

Of SALOMONS sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about SALOMONS riches, and of PINEDAES concept of two strange passages about Africk.

30 Ere Salomon prepared his flecte of shippes for India with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Marriners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom and was conquered by Dauid, did the Flecte passe on to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Illands of the Maluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesseth the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Illands of the East at Manilla, and receive a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these shippes amounted to foure hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written foure hundred and fiftie talents: wherof thirtie talents went in expence for the charge of the flect, and wages of men, and foure hundred and twentie talents, which makes five and twentie hundred and twentie thousand Crownes came cleere. And thus mult those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixtie and six talents of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yeerely, and which came to him besides these profits from Ophir.
 30 My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought) but a countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Jerusalem from the East Indies then in 3. yeeres; and that Thar si in Scripture is diuers times taken for the Ocean; hath bene already declared in the first booke.

Onely

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Betulia would faine haue Gades or Calis-malia, in old times called Tartessus, which is the South-west corner of that Prouince, to be the Tharhis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for loue of his owne cuntry, and because of some conceits of found between Tharhis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three yeere ere they, that tooke shippe in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath bene in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceiue of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the mettall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betwene Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that we haue no neede to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that so they might bee long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyriani which went with them, could not haue bene ignorant of) was along the Mediterran sea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconueniencies and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should haue escaped the troublesome land-carriage betwene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desert, and the euill Countiees; and within 30. mile of Ierusalem at Soppe, or some other haue in Salomons owne Countiee, haue laden and vnladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largeness greater than all Affrick and Asia being swallowed vp in the Atlantick Ocean bin Jered Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar for this hee alleadgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mudde and made vnpassable, that there could bee no coming to Gades by the Mediterran sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to haue stooode: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cathay by the way of compassing Affrica, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortieeth in the East Indies and inhabites some part thereof, as in Mamilla, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the small territorie which he there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Affrica, which els where he dreames of: supposing whereas Jonas sailing to Tharhis the Cite of Cilicia was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this whale in three dayes swimming about twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterran sea, and so through the freights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Affrica, cast vp Jonas vpon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might haue perhaps some fixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninurie. This conceit hee grounds onely vpon the ambiguitie of the word Suppe, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Jonas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elswhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any neede. For this long voyage of the whale finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preferuation of Jonas in the bellie of the whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessitie of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda. nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessitie, nor deliuered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore to leaue this man in his dreames, which (were hee not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might bee thought unworthie the mentioning. But to proceede with our Storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sabates comming from farre to Salomon, (as it seemes from Arabia felix, & not as some think from Ethiopia and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions, those are set downe at large in the text. But herein Iosephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queene of Saba Nicules, the succellour (saith hee out of Hieronimus) of thole thirtie and eight Egyptian Kings which succeded Minews the founder of Memphis; adding that after this Egyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elswhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia, so were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, about three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Iosias King of Iuda.

2 King. 23. 7. 2. Chron. 35. 26. 1. 46. 2. 2.

It is also written of Salomon that hee kept in garriions fourteene thousand chariots and twelue thousand horsemen, that he spent in Court every day thirtie measures of fine flower, threefore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deare, bugels and foule; foure thousand stals of horses he had for his chariots and other vses, and for the twelue thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stals or horses, and in euery teeme ten horses, as Iunius and the Geneva vnderstand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrabite, than Heman, Chaleah, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a fit, to wit, Ezab. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrabite by Nation. Iosephus writes them Athan, Aman, Chaleus and Donan the sonnes of Heman. Hee spake three thousand Proverbs, and his songes were one thousand and fiue, whereof either the most part perished in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or else because many actes of Salomons were written and kept among the publike Records of Ciuill euales and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessarie to be inserted into Gods booke.

of the fall of SALOMON, and how long he liued.

Now as hee had plentie of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women. For besides his seauen hundred wiues hee kept three hundred Concubines, (and forgetting that God had commaunded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolaters) hee tooke wiues out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Amman, Zidon and Heth; and when hee fell a doting, his wiues turned his heart after other Gods, as Aseroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad Idumea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Ieroboam his owne seruant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie hee had. Deus cum in peccatorum animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vitior, quae ipse non fecit. God in punishing sinners, vseth the finnes of others, which hee himselfe wrought not.

P. Mart. in reg.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in tymes of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fourtie yeeres hee reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and must therefore be found onely by coniecture. The most likeli way to gueesse at the truth in this case, is by considering the action, of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby wee may best make estimation of the yeeres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yeeres Dauid reigned in Iebzon: in his eight yeere hee tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to haue bene in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leysure, liuing in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites, and Edomites, which must needs haue held him fife yeeres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadeser; and that in euery of these warres, he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely that these cruicies occupied any longer time, because in those daies and places there were no wintering camps in vse, but at conuenient seasons of the yeere, Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing, as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies countrie, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery souldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid in which hee tooke Mephiboseth the son of Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begonne the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Iobab after the victorie, returned immediately to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that war hauing taken vp all the summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein hee brought all the tributaries of Hadadeser vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to haue bene the next yeeres worke, wherein hee did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumaa, being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue bene the 20. yeere of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which hee sent forth Iobab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Frabs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe hee felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie iudgement laid vpon him by God, for his foule and bloudie offence.

Now very manifest it is that in the yeere after the death of that childe, which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue bene nineteene yeeres old or thereabout, when hee beganne to reigne at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortye.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Abjalom slew his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue bene one yeeres worke. So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seeme to haue bene in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the tenne remaining yeeres of Dauid there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three yeeres of famine, for four yeeres of warre, and for numbering the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmities, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Xob nere vnto Gezer and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims vnderooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids old age, for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwards hindered dered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So Dauid had sixe or seuen yeares of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) thereby the stirring Spirit of Adonijah finding little succour in the broken partie of Isab the sonne of Zerubab.

At this time it might both truly be said by Dauid to Salomon. Thou art a wise man, 1 Kings. 3. 26. 9. and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong child; for nineteene yeares of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Neuertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeares old when he beganne to raigne. Of these Rabbi Salomon seemes the first Authour, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps vpon that which is said of Absholons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeares, which they vnderstand as yeares of Dauids raigne. But whereas Rehoboam the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeares old when hee beganne to raigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of nine or ten yeares old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who raigned fortie yeares) were but eleuen yeares old when his raigne began. To auoid this inconuenience, Iosephus allows 80. yeares of raigne to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion construed the wordes of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeares of Salomons life. But by such reckoning hee should haue bene 40. yeares old at his Fathers death; and consequently should haue bene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vnruth. Wherefore the 40. yeares remembered in Absholons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space betweene Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeares; which passed betweene the returne of Absholon to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of SALOMONS writings.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Prouerbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life and correctest manners: in the second the vanitie of humane nature, in the third he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled the wisdom of Salomon, which some giue vnto Salomon and some make the elder Philo the Authour thereof. Hee come and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith HIEROME) qui SALOMONIS inscribitur, Graecum redolet eloquentiam, sum. The stile of the booke of wisdom, which is ascribed to SALOMON, fauoureth of the Graecian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Authour of that Booke hath a direct fore-telling of the Passion of Christ in these wordes. Circumuenimus iustum quoniam inuisus est nobis, &c. Let vs circumuent the righteous for he is vnpleasing to vs, he is contrarie to our doings, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the sonne of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following wordes point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Prouerbs, and Cantica Cantecorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the porch of the Temple, which they say Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglecting helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Salomons bookes of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliacarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossest diuers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Vespassian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer been read of as this King; who hauing receiued wisdom from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his only seruice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: hee that was made King of Israel and Judaea, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the persuasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner. SALOMON reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house in his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for euer; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a fount! Thy minde covered the whole earth, and hast filled it with grace and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Ile, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus he concludeth. Thou didst bow thy loynes to Women, and wast overcome by thy body, thou didst flaine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

Of the Contemporaries of SALOMON.

NEARE the beginning of Salomons raigne, Agelau the third of the Heracidae in Corinth, Labotes in Lacedemon; and soone after Syluius Alba the fourth of the Syluij, swaied those Kingdomes: Laosthenes then gouerning Ashyria: Agastus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Cobrus, ruling the Athenians.

Ant. lib. 3.

In the sixe and twentieth of Salomons raigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Balistrus succeeded, and raigned seuentene yeares, after Mercators accept, who recons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeares. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolius findes Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there bee not some Kings omitted betwene the death of Hiram, and the raigne of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sefac or Shisak (as our English Geneua termes him) beganne to gouerne in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sofachis, Iosephus, Sufac, Cedrenus, Sufesinus; Eusebius in the columnne of the Egyptian Kings Smendes, and in that of the Hebrewes Sufac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reprooueth it as an error in Herodotus, that hee ascribeth the acts of Sufac to Sefobris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accomping Sefac another Sefobris, for the great things hee did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sefobris I haue spoken already in the florice of the Egyptian Princes: only in this hee was reprov'd that hee caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when hee was disposed to bee scene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sefobris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sefobris perceiuing, asked him what hee found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instabilitie of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheel was suddainly carried about, and became the highest, and the vponmost part was as suddainly turned downe-ward and vnder all: which when Sesoftris had iudicially weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like scrutude in the future. Of this Sesoftris, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Ægyptian Kings preceding.

Of SALOMONS Successors vntill the end of IEHOSAPHAT.

§. I.

Of REHOBOAM his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and IEROBOAMS Idolatrie.

REHOBOAM the Son of Salomon by Nahaman Ammonitisse, now fortie yeares olde, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was annoiued at Siehem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Rehobam as yet in Ægypt, since he fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehobam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father, Sic enim firmitus et fore Imperium; si amari mallet quam metui; So should his Empire (saith IOSEPHVS) be more assured if hee desired rather to bee beloued than feared.

whereof he tooke three daies to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe hee knew not how to resolve, so had hee not the iudgement to discern of counsells, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to iustifie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not only to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdēns which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting fallily of greatness exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heauier, and more vsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the successe, those yonger aduisors greatly mistooke the nature of kueritie, which without the temper of clemencie is no other than crueltie to selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be vsed for the helpe, and not for the harme of subiects.

For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cordes or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue bene twisted and forged by loue only? His witlesse parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and imbled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehobam did not a little aduance Ierobams designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achias of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people crying out what portion haue wee in Dauid? wee haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Israhel. Now though themselves, euen all the Tribes of Israhel, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bonds of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated resolu'd hearts doe, they serued themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Ahazur, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beate to death with stones. Whereupon the King allrighted, got him from Shechem with all speede, and recouered Ierusalem, where preparing to invade Israhel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Stemas in the person of God commanding to the contrarie, all was staid for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Shechem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Iordan, and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid, and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Aegyptians to follow their Idolatrie: he set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israhel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented thof: Gods, which deliuered them out of Aegypt: and refusing the seruice of the Leuites, hee made Priests fit for such Gods. It mu't needes be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israhel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iosua, for as it is written The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreli-gious pollicie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatrie that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israhel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophetic and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first beganne; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the authoritie of Abia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a funder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen by the commandement of God, who againe recouered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obdurate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in pollicie to proceede as he had begunne. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historiari compared with the pollicies of late Ages, obseruing well the practise of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodie (saith he) politicus vocantur, & propria commoda, presentisq; utilitates sibi tanquam vltimam finem constituunt, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, ampliana nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si infirma honestatisq; leges, subuertenda si religio ipsa persundanda, si deique omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil inmentatum, nihil per se inuisibile, relinquendum censent, curant vnu, omnia percurant, nihil ad ipsos, modum, quod e re sua esse sibi persuident, obstruunt, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigare potest Deus; So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their vniuersall end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit, are wont to allegge the case of state for sooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancing, preseruing, or encreasing of the state, they thinke they may do any thing. If they meane to oppress their neighbour, to ouerturne all lawes of iustice and honestie, if religion it selfe must goe to wrack, yea, if all rights of God and Man must be violatèd, they will trie all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of ragione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as that the first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatrie of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground

Amasa the Priest of Bethel, counsaileth the Prophet Amos, not to propheticke at Bethel; For (said he) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had massacred the Priests of Sad, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wife depart from that politike sinne of zeroboaam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henrie the fourth to change his religion, yet the Protestants whom hee forsooke obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom hee followed murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizor of wife proceeding delude euen those that know the soule face of impietie lurking vnder it, and behold the wretched endes that haue euer followed it; where-10 of Iehu and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves, very great examples.

§. II.

OF REHOBAM his impietie; for which he was punished by Sesac:
of his end and Contemporaries.

While Teroboaam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboaam on the other side hauing now little hope to recouer the Provinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endeavour: for he fortified and victualled fiftene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin:
20 not that he feared zeroboaam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Jeroboaam had not only filled himselfe, but withall invited them to invade Iudea; laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Salomon, which might now easily bee had, seeing ten of the twelue Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Iudaans. So as by those two waies (of late yeares often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and invitation of forraigne force, Jeroboaam hoped to settle himselfe in the seate of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatrie in a few yeares after rooted out with all his. Rehoboaam also hauing, as he thought, by fortifying diuers places assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, 30 and made high Places, and Images, and Grous on euerie high Hill, and vnder euerie greene Tree.

And therefore in the fifth yeare of his raigne, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumea, as Teroboaam, were familiar and his instruments, entred Iudea with twelue thousand Chariots, and three score thousand Horse, besides foote-men, which Iosephus numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations, Egyptians, 40 Lubaans, Succians, and Cushites. The Lubaans were Lybaans, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West side. The Cushites were of Petrea, and of the Desert Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Inda. The Succians, according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomee, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward about fixe hundred English mile from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I doe not thinke that the Succians or Succai were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomee calls Arabes Egyptij or Ichitrophagi, which possess that part of Egypt betwene the mountaines called Alabastrini, and the red Sea farre nearer Egypt; and readier to be leuied then those remoued Sauages of the Troglodytæ.

With this great and powerfull Armie, Sesac invaded Iudea, and (besides many other strong Cities) waime Ierusalem it selfe, of which, and of the Temple, and 50 Kings house, he tooke the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recouered from Adadecer, in the Syrian warre: these Rehoboaam supplied with Targets of brass, which were fit enough to guard a King of his qualitie; whom Siracides calleth The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the soueraignty of Iuda, and held the Iewes as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seemes, rendering vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the wordes of God, where promising the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, he doth not withstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Egypt, in these wordes. Neuertheless they (to wit, the Iudaens) shall be his seruants, that is, the seruants of Sesac.

After this ouerthrow and dishonour Rehoboam reigned twelue yeares, and his losses received by Sesac notwithstanding, hee continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Israel foure yeares.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeares, and reigned 17. his storie was written at large by She-meiab and Hidden the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan & the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernours for life after Codrus, were in Athen. Abdastartus or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fifth of the Heracleids in Sparta according to Eusebius (others make him the sixth) and Priminus the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Latines reigned Syluius Alba and Syluius Arys, the fourth and fifth of the Sylng.

About the 12. of Rehoboam Abdastartus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurfes sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdom twelue yeares.

Towards his latter times Periclaides, or Pyrihiades, beganne to gouerne Abyria, the 24. King thereof: and not long after Astartus the sonne of Balestartus recovered 20 the Kingdom of Tyre from the vsurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battaile betweene Ieroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

ABIAH the Sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which hee invaded Ieroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand; both Armies ioyned neare to the Mount

Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side fise hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or received of those Nations. Abiah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Ishbanab, and Ephraim, soone after which discomfure, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeares. Abiah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hefson, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the 2. of Chren, he reigned but three yeares and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the finnes of Salomon in his Sonne Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and a Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he serued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when hee forsooke him, it was torne a-sunder by his meanest Vassalls; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac. For the sonne Abiah was able to leue foure hundred thousand men, and with the same number hee ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fise hundred thousand, God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expreit, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God who liueth and gouerneth all things for euer, doeth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discouragement, raise, and throw downe Kinges, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed the causes are set downe, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages.

 They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, For San and his blonde house, &c. And Dauid towards his later end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah. Salomon had tenne tribes of twelue torne from his Sonne for his idolatric. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe & his posteritie for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his sonnes slaine by 10 Phisfims, and his very bowels torne out of his bodie by an excoiating lix, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Iezabel were slaine, the blood of the one, the bodie of the other eaten with dogs: for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sinnes in all after-times, and in these our daies by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, licknell, and calamities, howsoever the wise men of the world raise these chictes no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and cares, seeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

¶ IIII.

Of Asa and his contemporaries.

A Abijah succeeded Asa, who enioyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his owne mother who was an Idolatresse, but deposing her from her regencie, brake her Idol, stamp it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war 30 in the leasure of peace. For not long after hee was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Iudea, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer assembled of that Nation either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Judeans Zerah of Ethiopia with an host of tenne hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an armie of fise hundred and fourscore thousand, leuied out of those two tribes of Iuda and Beniamin which obeyed him, and with which he ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoile both of their Cities and Campe.

That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian I haue proued already, and were it but the 40 length betwene Ethiopia and Iudea, and the strong flourishing regions of Egypt interiacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is that these inuaders were Ethiopians. But in that the scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Iudeans in following their vi-ctorie, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth vpon the torrent of Befer, which Dauid pass ouer when he surprized the Amalckites or A-rabians, this prouoeth sufficiently that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier towne standing on the vttermost South-border of all Iudea, from all parts of Ethiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoiles which Asa tooke, as the 50 cattell, Camels, and theepe, whereof he sacrificed fise thousand, shew them to be Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnknowne Ethiopians. And if it be ob-

the twelve, should arme five hundred and foure score thousand. Besides it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these nations should exceed in number, for God spake it of Israel, that he would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Basba a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great victorie, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadecor, to ioyne with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, hee fortified Rama which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towards Samaria.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Basba died in the 26. yeere of Asa, therefore could not Basba begin this warre in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the diuision of Iuda and Israel: for so many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange that Asa being able to bring into the field an armie of five hundred and foure score thousand good souldiers, did not easily driue away Basba, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Iuda and as much dilheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with mony. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands in the late seruice against Zerah, had caused many mens priuate businesse to be vnspatched, whereby the people being now inentiuie to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to stirre against the Israelites, choosing rather to winke at apparent inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-time. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himselfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he tooke the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian again Basba, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake of confederacie with Basba. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inuasion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephthulim without resistance, he spoiled diuers principall cities thereof, and inforced Basba to quit Rama, and to leaue the same to Asa with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad who loued neither partie, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Iuda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, he not onely caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but hee began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore spoken with the grieuous paines of the gout in his feete, where with after he had bene two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue up the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There liued with Asa, Agellus the sixth of the Heraclidae, and Basia the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Basidae. Astartus and Astarimus were Kings in Tyre. Astarimus tooke reuenge on his brother Phelletes, for the murder of Ithobalus priest of the goddesse Ashtar, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Atys and Cappys ruled the Latines. Pyrrhiades and Ophrateus the Assyrians: Terisappus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Aegyptus who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheops his successor that reigned fiftie sixe yeeres, euen to the 16. of Iuss.

Of the great alteration falling out in the Ten Tribes during the raigne of A s s.

IN the raigne of Asa, the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegiance to the house of Dauid, if the wilddome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ieroboam had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heauie vengeance laied vpon it, by the mouth of Aias, the same Prophet which had foretold the diuision of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his raigne ouer the ten Tribes. One sonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom only God found so much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Familie) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimonie of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death; and (wherein hee was most happie) the fauourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good sonne, the vngodly father was soone taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile vnthankfulnessse to God, that he durst not suffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idolls that wrought his confusion. So loath hee was to forsake his worldly wisdome, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memorie excepted.

Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, reigned in the second and third yeares of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeares, though indeede his fathers last yeare of two and twentie did runne along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeare was the first of Bascha; so that perhaps this Nadab injoyed not his Kingdome one whole yeare. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seemes that he little feared the iudgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, hee armed all Israel against the Philistims, and belieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successse, and recalled to minde their grievous losse of five hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie familie to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, hee exasperated them) slaine he was by Bascha, whom the Armie did willingly accept for King in his stead. Bascha was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercie, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods will to haue it so, it is euident, by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatric which Ieroboam had begunne. Wherefore hee received the same sentence from God that had beene laied vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same sort. Hee beganne to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramab; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Countrie, destroying all the Land of Nephthulim. Foure and twentie yeares hee reigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his sonne; who enioyed it, as Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam had done, two yeares current, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam perished; but hee fate at home the whilst, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby hee gaue such aduantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaying with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Bascha had found, by doing as Bascha had done. Wherefore hee did set vp-

513 on Elai in his drunkennesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himselfe King of Israel: and began his raigne with massacring all the house of Basbas; extending his crueltie not only to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirsa. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri's expectation. For the Souldiers in steade of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirsa; which in 'short space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliuie into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace: consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seven dayes he is said to haue raigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an Idolater, Walking in the way of IEROBAM; and therefore is likly to haue had more time wherin to declare himselfe, than the raigne of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Basbas, partly in seeking to haue defended his owne life. After the death of Elai, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his partie strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not bene readie to his hand, some strength, not vnkily to resist and vanquish the Armie which maintain'd Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out; I doe not finde; only it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leauing no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A conjecture of the causes hindring the reunion of Israel with Juda, which might haue bene effected by these troubles.

Any man that shall consider the state of Israel, in those times, may justly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities alreadie suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and reuente themselves with the mightie Tribes of Juda and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose, the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yielding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man for saken: than to haue recourse vnto a remedie, so sure, so readie, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) vnlesse it could be proued, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that business, as he forbade Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued betwene Israel and Juda, so many yeares following: wherein Abia so farre prevailed, that he wanne a great battaile, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing vnder new vsptars, rather than to call their eyes vpon that Royall house of Dauid, from which the succession of sūe Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue bene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof: To thinke that Omri had prevented his Competitors, in making peace with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which as it might serue alone to proue, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which hee professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon the

the familie and friends of Basſha, (Asa his mortall enemy) giues manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more iustly than he haue expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardnesse in the ten Tribes (which was such that they may seeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amisse to examine the causes, moouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, who followd the waies in person, as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if wee looke vpon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Sadonan had galled their neckes. Their desire was to haue a King that should not oppresse them, not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately chooſe Ieroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that libertie vnto them, for which hee had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) heren altogether deceived. For his affectation of popularitie appears in his building of decayed townes, and in the institution of his new deuised idolatry; where he tolde the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile so farre as to Ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntarie, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reigne, and in the reigne of his sonne, when long time of possession had confirmed his title; which at the first: was onely good by couretie of the people or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatiues of a King that he still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is clearly apparant, that the whole armie of all Israel ioyned with Basſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams house.

Now the reigne of Basſha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and cost at Roma was cast away; the other side of his Kingdome harried by the Syrians; neither did hee winne that one towne of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that bulinesse to his sonne, who likewise appears an vnprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of Basſha grew from his good forme of Ciuill government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboams euer meant to doe. And surely he that shall take paines to looke into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda; in administration of iustice, will finde it most probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so aduerse from the line of Dauid; as to thinke all adueritie more tollerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of Iab and Shimei was indeed by them defrued; yet in that they suffered it without forme of iudgement, they suffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without iudgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings ialousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrarie iustice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away) he would haue slaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before he had yet committed any offence, as appears by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to haue endured wrong hauing not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethren, and vpon sundry of his greatest men; as also Iosif did fo put to death Zachariah, the sonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, euens in the court of the house of the Lord: and MANASSES did slay innocent blood exceeding much, till hee replenished Ierusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault, besides his sinne, wherewith hee made Juda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of Israel we finde no monument of such arbitrarie proceeding, vnlesse perhaps the words of Iehoram the sonne of Ahas (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, instance, when he said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of ELISHA the sonne of SHAPHAT shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether hee meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a false prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children, which he thought a sufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the libertie which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptorie execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen sicke for anger, neither was hee for that cause put to death, as vpon commaundement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, which might giue satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuise, though to God it could not.

2 Kings 19. 10.

The murder of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made, whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is that the people, being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the kings of Juda (such as are regitred) prooue them to haue vsed a more absolute manner of commaund, than the Kings of the tenne Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrarie. For of those which reigned ouer Juda, from the diuision of the kingdom, to the captiuitie of the ten tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a place of buriall amongst their auncctors. Yea, the death of Ahazias and his brethren, slaine by Iehou, with the destruction of all theroyall seed by Ahalias, did not for ought that wee can reade stirre vp in the people any such thirst of reuenge, as might by the sodainesse and vniormitie testifie the affection to be general, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vlesse we should thinke that the death of Ahalias, after seauen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memorie of her ill purchasing, than by the present fence of her tyrannicall abusing the gouernment, whereon he had seded. On the other side, such of the kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seauen of the twentie) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so faine from embruing their hands in the blood of their Soueraignes that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbear to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approue the good successe of treason, vnlesse teare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharias, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who traitercouly got and vsurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seauen remaine, whose ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeed it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehou, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same teare might be in them at the death of Pekas, whose historie (as others of that time) is curiously passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by furie of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them, neither was there any motiue vrging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (how soeuer all that the law calls treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which haue here most preuailed, the furie of the multitude hath quenched it selfe, with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, how soeuer wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraine, but rather for bearing the aduantages gotten vpon his royall person: which if any man impute vnto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truly, ascribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, being loosened by Pallus, did with his hundred hands giue assistance to Iupiter, when all thereof the Gods conspired against him, is very fully expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarches need not to feare any courbing of their abfolutemess by mightie subiectes, as long as by wisdom they keepe the hearts of the people, who will bee sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the Story might very well haue borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tels vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did maue all their practise, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without assistance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuises of the greatest and shrewdest politicians: e-uery Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening rebell how mightie Iouer, can against him.

2 Kings 10. 4.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldom found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of government there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subiects, nor of confidence in their good affection, to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vially disarmed. For other wise it would haue bene almost impossible, that Abthata the sister of Abah, a stranger to the royall blood of Iuda, should by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother haue destroyed all the seede of Dauid, and vsurped the Kingdome very neere seuen yeeres without finding anie resistance. Yeare when Iehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captaines & principal men of the land to set vp Iosif their lawfull King, wherunto the whole nation were generally well affected, he was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speeres and the shields that were King DAVIDS, and were in the house of the Lord. But wee need not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more vncertain tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the tenne tribes did neuer seeke to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Asa, admitted a sequenth of a new family, rather than they would subiect themselves, with those of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honorable, but more heauie yoke.

So, Asa hauing seene the death of seauen kings of Israell, did himselfe after one and fourtie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehosaphat his sonne to deale with Abah the son of Omeri, who was the eight king ouer the tenne tribes.

§. VII.

Of IEHOSAPHAT and his consen-poraries.

IEHOSAPHAT, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happie; hee destroyed all the groues, altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and sent searchers to all places and people wanting instruction; hee recouered the Tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one hee had siluer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thousand and foure hundred: The numbers of his men of warre were more than admirable: for it is written that Adush had the command of three hundred thousand, Iehobaniam of two hundred and fourecore thousand, and Amalia of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada

two

two hundred thousand, and vnder the commaundment of Iehozabad a hundred and foure score thousand: which numbered together, make eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand, all which are said to haue waited vpon the King, besides his garrisons.

2 Sam. 14.4.

That Juda and Beniamin, a territorie not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should muster eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Isak in Dauids time found five hundred thousand: Rehobeam found but an hundred and foure score thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and foure score thousand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they amounted to three hundred thousand: Vzziah three hundred and seuen thousand and five hundred. Surcly, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Iehosaphat that Maab and Ammon were entred his territorie to the west of Jordan, and that these numbers were manie, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that hee would haue feared euen the armie of Xerxes; if hee could haue brought into the field eleuen hundred and three score thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better iudgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the seauenteenth, distributed to seuerall leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand vnder Adnah, & the two hundred and foure score thousand vnder Iehosananam, were afterward commaunded and mustred by Amaziah, Eliada, and Iehozabad: for the grosse and total is not in that place set downe, as it was vnder the other Kings formerly named. Again as the aydes which Iehosaphat brought to Ahab did not leue that hee was a Prince of extraordinarie power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which hee that commaunded least among Iehosaphats leaders had vnder him.

This mightie Prince notwithstanding his greatnes, yet hee ioyned in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iosaphat visited at Semaria, and caused his sonne Ioram to marrie Atalia, this Achabs 30 daughter.

Ahab perswaded Iosaphat to assist him in the warre against the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Basilites to foretell the successe: who promised him victorie. But Iehosaphat beleued nothing at all in those diuiners, but resolu'd first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Achab made answer that hee had one called Mitchaiab, but hee hated that Prophet, because hee alwaies foretolde of euill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet sent for Mitchaiab was to the King, but by the way the messenger praied him to consent with the rest of the Prophets: and to promise victorie vnto them as they did. But Mitchaiab spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both Kings, which was that God saide who shall perswade Ahab, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his prophets, and bee in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that speake, but the spirit of your father speakes in you: so in a contrarie kinde did the deuill in the prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Marit vpon this place well obserueth, these euill spirits are the ministers of Gods vengeance, and are vsed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ. For as it plealeth God by his good Angels, to saue and deliuer from destruction of which the Scriptures haue many examples: so on the contrarie, it is by the euill that hee punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the wil of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are euery where visible. There are spi- 50 rits,

rits, faith hee, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure strokes. In the time of destruction they show tooth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Mehabius having by this his revelation greatly displeas'd the King, and the Prophets whose spirit hee discovered, was strooken by Zekab one of Sains prophets, and by Achub him selfe committed to prison: where hee appointed him to be refused and fed with bread of affliction till hee returned in peace. But Mehabius, not fanning to reply, answered, If thou returnest in peace the Lord hath not spoken by me. Nevertheless Achub went on in that warre, and was wounded to death.

10 Jehosphat returned to Jerusalem, where hee was reaped by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Arames or Damascenes, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans to invade Juda: who pass'd Jordan, and encampe at Engaddi, and when Jehosphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Ishaziel foretolde him of the victorie, which should bee obtained without any blood-shed of his part: and so when Jehosphat approached, this assembly of nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves: those of Ammon and Moab set upon the Idumeans, and brake them vtrvly, which done they also invaded each other; in which broile Jehosphat arriving tooke the spoile of 20 them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this victorie, Jehosphat forgetting that hee was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyne with Gehazias, the sonne of Achub, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salomon had: but as Eliozor the Prophet foretold him, his shippes perished and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was outthrowne. Yet hee taketh part with Jehoram the brother of Gehazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Israel the Edomites joyne their forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their armie.

30 The Moabites, subjects to David and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves for vassals to Ierobam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achub: but Jehosphat, notwithstanding the Idolatrie of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to be auenged of the Moabites for their desertion from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyned themselves with the Syrians against Jehosphat, and thirdly to punish their double rebellion who first forsooke Juda and now Israel.

Both Kings resolv'd to passe by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that nation, for wee finde that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Jehosphat. But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehosphat, it is not certaine; for in the 2. of Chron c. 11. vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Ierobam, the sonne of Jehosphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were slain: by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to joyne themselves with the armie of Juda. For that they were number'd among the enemies of Jehosphat it is plaine in the 2. of Chron, the 20. and as plain e. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehosphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the yeere, or whether the Idumeans having a purpose to rebell misse'd the armie of Juda and Israel with intent to infestible them for want of water, true it is, that they suffred the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Cressus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, vterly perished, had not Elphis taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not onely Jehosphat and his armie, but Iehoram King of Israel an Idolator was relieued: the great mercie and goodnesse of God, hauing euer bene prone to faue the euill for the good, wher as hee neuer destroyed the good for the euill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Mosh burnt his sonne, or the sonne of the King of Edom, for sacrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I haue already written in the life of Iehoram among the Kings of Israel. Iehosaphat reigned twentie five yeeres and died, he was buried in the valley of Iehosaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set ouer his graue is yet to be seene, saith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the sonne of Hanani.

There liued with Iehosaphat, Ophrasenes in Assyria, Capetus and Tiberinus Kings of the Athens in Italie; of the latter the riuer Tiber (formerly Albulæ) tooke name.

In Iehosaphats time also ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Agessilus in Corinth; and Archilans of the same race, of the Heraclide the seauenth in Lacedæmon. Badesorus ruled the Tyrrians; Sechab, Oebazias and Iehoram the Israelites.

IE H O R A M the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Juda began to reigne at thirtie two yeeres of age, and liued vntill hee was fourtie yeeres olde, being eight yeeres a King: but of these eight yeeres, which Iehoram is said to haue reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Abab, left this Iehoram King in his stead, as Abab did his sonne Ahazias. This appeares by the seuerall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehorams kings of Israel and Juda, and to Ahazias the eldest sonne of Abab. For Ahazias is said to haue begunne his reigne, in the seauenth yeere of Iehosaphat, Iehoram the brother of Ahazias succeeded him in the second yeere of Iehosaphat King of Juda, that is in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Juda was designed king by his father; it being (as we finde elswhere) the eighteenth yeere of Iehosaphat himselfe, who went with the Israelites against Mosh. Hereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Iehosaphat, who gouerned absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fifth yeere of Iehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the olde king tooke vnto him, as partner in the Government, this his eldest sonne, who was at that time thirtie two yeeres olde, his father being fiftie seauen. Now so far as Iehosaphat reigned twentie five yeeres, it is euident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Iehoram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Iſrael, who did not alwaies reigne preciſely ſo long as the bare letter of the text may ſeeme at firſt to affirme: but their yeeres were ſometimes compleat, ſometimes onely current, ſometimes confounded with the yeeres of their ſeſſors or foregoers, and muſt therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of thoſe others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing leſſe needfull than curious, to enquire into the reaſons mooving Jehoſaphat either to allume vnto him his ſonne as partner in the Kingdome, whileſt hee was able himſelfe to commaund both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer bene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once (in the ſeauteenth of his reigne) vouchſafed vnto him that honour, to reſume it vnto himſelfe, or at leaſt-wiſe to deſerre the confirmation of it, vntill ſower or ſiue yeeres were paſſed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of theſe paſſages, may bee a meane to hide ſome light, whereby wee may more clearly diſcouer the cauſes of much extraordinary buſineſſe enſuing, I hold it not amiſſe to make ſuch coniecture, as the circumſtances of the Storie briefly handled in the Scriptures may ſeeme to approue.

Wee are therefore to conſider, that this King Jehoſaphat was the firſt of Rehoboams iſſue that euer entred into any ſtreight league with the Kings of the tenne Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themſelues in vaine, making ſmall profite of the greateſt advantages that could bee wiſhed. Wherefore Jehoſaphat thought it the wiſeſt way, to make a league offenſiue and deſenſiue between Iſrael and Juda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long proſper, as not iſſuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wiſdom: yet as a peece of ſound pollicie, doubtleſſe it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to ariſe, with mutuall fortification of both thoſe kingdomes, againſt the vncircumciſed nations their ancient enemies. This apparant benefit, being ſo inſeſſimable a iewel that it might not eaſily bee loſt, but continue as hereditarie from father to ſonne, it was thought a very good courſe to haue it confirmed by ſome ſure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri and ſiſter of Ahab King of Iſrael, giuen in marriage to Jehoſaphat, who was ſonne and heire apparant to the King of Juda. This Ladie was of a maſculine ſpirit, and had learned ſo much of Queene Iezabel her brothers wiſe, that ſhee durſt vndertake, and could thoroughly performe a great deale more in Jeruſalem, than the other knew how to compaſſe in Samaria. Shee was indeede a fire-brand, ordained by God to conſume a great part of the nobleſt houſes in Juda, and perhaps of thoſe men or their children, whoſe worldly wiſdome, regardleſſe of Gods pleaſure, had brought her in.

The firſt fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Iſrael did aduantage equally, but the profite of the victory ſhould haue redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes verie ſeldome thrive by matching with Idololators, but rather ſerue the turnes of thoſe falſe friends, who being ill affected to God himſelfe, cannot be well affected to his ſeruants. Before their ſetting forth Ahab deligned, as King, his ſonne Ahazias, not ſo much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine euents of warre (for none of his predecessors had euer done the like vpon the like occaſions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Mitchaia (for he deſpised them) as imitating Jehoſaphat by his owne example, to take the ſame courſe, wherein he prevailed.

§. II.

Probable coniectures of the motives inducing the old King IEROSAPHAT to change his purpose often, in making his sonne IERORAM King.

Manie arguments doe verie strongly proue Iehoram to haue bene who-ly ouer-ruled by his wife, especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly auncelors, and following the abhominable superstitions of the house of Ahab.

That she was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to liue a priuate life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter shee was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not vpon base women and meere subiects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honorably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crowne, whereof already hee had, in a manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long hee dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smokes, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Iehosaphat about the same time, argue no small dissembler of the whole country, through the misgouernment of his vngodly sonne. For the good old King was faine to make his progresse round about the land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and appointing Iudges throughout all the strong Cities of Iuda Citiue by Citiue. This had bin a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Iustice bene peruerced, by the power of such as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges; and by his commission giuen to one of the priestes in spirituall causes, and to the steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouerscers.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the sonne of Ahab; but how long after it is vncertaine. For Iehoram the brother of Ahaziah beganne his reigne (as hath bene already noted) in the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Iehosaphats sonne, though afterward this Iehoram of Iuda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in priuate estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not set downe, yet wee may not thinke, that motives thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Israel held the same correspondencie with Iehosaphat that his father had done; and made vse of it. Hee drew the Iudeans into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well bee, that the young Prince of Iuda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition hee had bene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprise against Moab did not occupie so much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the daillie negotiations betwene the two Kings of Iuda and Israel, and the affinitie betwene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behaviour of the younger sonnes, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession, for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe dissimulation, of Iehoram himselfe, might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vsuall in mischieuous fell natures, to be as abiect and seruile in time of aduerlity, as insolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himselfe in such wife towards his brethren as caused their father to enable them, not only with store of silver, and of gold, and of precious things, (which kinde of liberalitie other Kings doublelesse had vsed vnto their younger sonnes) but with the custodie of strong Cities in Iuda, to assure them, if it might haue bene, by vnwonted means, against vnwonted perills.

§. III.

The doings of Iehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Lubna.

BVt all this prouidence auailed nothing; for an higher prouidence had otherwise determined of the sequel. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of the King their brother, then had he them without more adoe; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdome against them, so that the apparent likelihood of their final ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and slaine, and with them for companie many great men of the Land; such belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their liues, or had bene appointed Rulers of the Countrey, when Iehoram was depofed from his Government, in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoide the doing of many things, derogatorie to their yong Master, which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrarie?

After this, Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innovations in religion; wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto superstition and idolatrie, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that abone all other sinnes; but he vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registered, to haue set vp irreligion by force.

Whilest hee was thus buied at home, in doing what hee listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and hauing hitherto, since Danils time, bene governed by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselves a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chanots, with which hee obtained victorie in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, wherof hee forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that hee had gotten in beating and killing some of those, whom he should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now beganne the prophetic of Isaac to take effect, wherein he fore-told, that Esaui in procelle of time should breake the yoke of Isaac. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Iuda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many ciuill and forraine warres, the Iewes by friendrie Nations had bene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Sonne, and others of that race following them, became

liberti { The freedome of the Edomites, though purchasēd somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Juda, which in the time of Sesuai had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehoram, and set it selfe at libertie. Libna flood in the confines of Beniamin and of Dan, farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so vnlkely it was to haue maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue bene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incensēd Lord. The Israélite held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe we reade that it sought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Iehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not only bene the first and remote cause, but euē the next and immediate reason, mouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: For it wasa T owne of the Louites: who mułl needes be driuen into great extremities, when a religion contrary to Gods law, had not only some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsiue authoritie to force vnto it all that were vntwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which being deuout men they might feare to loofe by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten reuolted Tribes by any of the religious Kings, who rather invited the Israélites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment: vnder Idolaters they must haue bene without it whether they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasones were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than to suffer that which was vntwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Iehosaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Gouvernours, and giuing them especiall charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these wordes: The Louites shall be Officers before you; Be of good courage and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phraſes, it seemes, that hee encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his sonne; whom if the Louites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect, in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be euē with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heaue indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon detroyed, yea that it was not (for ought that wee can reade) so much as besieged or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to haue ouerwhelmed any one T owne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might in one month haue cast into it with shouells, by ordinarie approaches.

a. Chron. 21. 17.

a. Chron. 30.

But it seemes that of these great numbers which his father could haue leued, there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps hee thought it an easier losse, to let one T owne goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loquē; are faine themselves to stand in feare of those, by whom they might haue bene dreadfull vnto others.

of the miseries falling upon IERORAM, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince a prophetic in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatened both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne body. Hereby likewise it appears that hee was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and euill Kings, but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and farre from him. This Epistle is said to haue bene sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus propheticd in his stead before this time, euen in the daies of Iehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophetic in writing behinde him, or that (as some conclude) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeede any thing may rather be beleued than the Tradition held by some of the Iewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle, a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heauen to S. Giles.

But who soeuer was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophetic was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Iudea, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wiues, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensive warr till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbeton by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue bene then as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrey affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to robbe and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thick set in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered; that this was when they had leamed of the Romanes the art of Warr; and that the provisions which they found, together with the arts which they leamed, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skillfull in pursuing their conquest, and going onward in to Regions farre removed from them. At this day hauing lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to passengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding stark naked, and rather trauelling in the swiftness of their horses, than in any other meanes of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seeme to haue bene, that spoiled Iudea in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrey was alwaies barren and desert, wanting manuell arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the leall number of Iuda and Benzamin vnder Iehosaphat (wherin were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had bene enough to haue driuen away farre greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people bene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes idoulsie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his his Palace in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrey, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sacke the Citie, or spoile the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Jerusalem it selfe by surpris, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore having done what spoile they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to contrieigh away.

The slaughter committed by Iehu upon the two and fortie Brethren of Abasia, 10 or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his Brothers Sonnes, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (only Ioas excepted) vnder the tyrannic of Abasia, following within two yeares after this inuasion of the Philistines, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Iehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murder beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcase. 20
The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had bene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous entering of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authority, and to place about her Some such Counsellors, of the house of Ahas, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore these thought it vnreasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eies, with a stately funeral of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed bee laid vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe, and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoid. Such is the qualitie of wicked inuigilators, hauing made greedie vse of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his owne vices, but with their faulits also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worke, when once he is gone and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fell out in euill a busie time; when his friend and coine the Israélite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite; and therefore could haue had no better leisure to helpe Athalia in setting of things according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the same hindrance) to helpe her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistines. Year rather he needed and cra-ued the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairely intreated. 30

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembered in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish neuer the selfe his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselves in the seeming-wise deuicis of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wise dome dictate vnto them. For in such kinde of vnhappy subtilities, it is manifest that 50

Athalia
850 847 5

Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne, but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the raigne of AHAZIA, and his busynesse with the King of Israel.

10 CHAZIAS, or Ahasia, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his raigne ouer Iuda in the twelfth yeare of Iehoram, the sonne of Abah King of Israel, and raigned but that one yeare. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, wherof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Torniellus, alleging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome. Anno Domini 1588. which saith that he was twentie yeares old in the beginning of his Kingdome, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that give him two yeares more. Like enough he is to haue beene yong: for hee was gouerned by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Abah. Hee was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cosen the Israélite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wanne, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduerture his owne person, which escaped not vnwounded. The Towne being wonne was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to bee made by Hazeael King of Aram: which done, Iehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Iazee, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his woundes; and Ahasia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that hee was but newly come home (for hee raigned in all scanty one yeare, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part) when he made a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his woundes. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindred, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine peece of worke so to leaue his Kingdome, hauing no other busynesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolued at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which hee had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet, vpon the house of Abah. And hereunto at this time had hee disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue beene accidental; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtles was one; whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that wee diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How AHAZIA persued with the house of AHAB: and how that Familie was destroyed by IEHU.

30 THe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elias the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together, who calling out from among them Iehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and annointed him King ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the prophetic of Elias against the house of Abah, Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fallion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaine a desire to know his errand, which Iehu thought meete to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the prophetic of Eliasa was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose him selfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu who had vpon the suddaine this great honour throwne vpon him, was not flow to put him selfe in possession of it, but vsed the first heate of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foote the businesse which nearely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might bee carried to Izrael, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen hee marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recouered of his wounds, that hee could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazias comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to viiit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Scuentie Princes of the bloud Royall there were that liued in Samarita; Iehoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wonne Ramoth Gilead, which his father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein hee recieued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great betwene Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophetic of Eliasa might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembred, than as an vnlkely tale, by them that beheld the majesticall face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the midt of this securitie, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents; first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebells and enemies; or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already well achieved, and the Queene Mother dressing her selfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discouered a companie comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to bee readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Only the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to bee satisfied, sent out another, that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspition in Iehoram, whose the watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the companie drew so neare that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loath to discover any weakenesse, caused his Chariot to bee made readie, and issued forth with Ahazias King of Juda in his companie, whose presence added majestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had bene more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field field of Naboth. Iehoram beganne to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouer-tooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carcase into that field, which purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with blood of the vniuit possessor. Neither did Ahazias escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone bee aduertised of this calamitie, if shee did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgement pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when shee least expected it. But shee, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her selfe readie in all haist, and painted her face, hoping with shee itarely and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitor, or at the least to vtter some Apophibegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for cuer. Little did shee thinke vpon the hungrie dogs, that were ordained to deuour her, whose paunches the stibium, with which shee besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language where-with shee armed her tongue, could trouble the cares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neare shee opened her window, and looking out vpon him, beganne to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long ioyned the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in mere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeede a part of miserable folly, as are all things, howeouer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortunes; much lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vexee him; hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deedes and not by wordes. He only called to her seruants to know which of them would be of his side, and soone found them readie to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her downe head-long; which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude handes of her owne seruants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord; and shee perished miserably struggling in vaine with base groomes, who conumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insuluing enemie sate on horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornefully beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcase that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murder, and oppression, with flow, but sure painment, and full interelt.

Ahazias King of Juda fleeing a pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haist) and seeke his buriall in his owne kingdome; and this fauour hee obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Megidda, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where he was enterred with his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeare.

CHAP. XXI.

Of ATHALIA, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded vnto her.

p. I.

Of ATHALIA her vsurping the Kingdome, and what pretences shee might forge.

FTER the death of Ahaziah, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Ioua, who raigne shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her Sonne, vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the blood, and slew them, that so shee might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, and raigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before hand put into great place, and made Counsaillours vnto her sonne, such as were fittest for her purpose, and readie at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Iehoram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to stirre, whatsoeuer they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it be, is seldome or neuer so shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia when shee saw the Princes of the Royall blood, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children detroyed by the Philistims, beganne euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practise, into faire likelyhoods, those possibilities where-with her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great shew of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might shee giue him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilest as yet hee might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained only in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laied vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not only his Successour, but also the reuertioner, and so to provide, that the Crowne might neuer bee subiect to any rising, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retain it.

Such persuasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate solicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the ieaalous Tyrant thinke think that the only way to frustrate all deuis of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might shee doe it in her Sonnes. For Abazaz (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his owne high borne-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children wickedly begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgate her selfe so farre in her wicked pollicie, that shee lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring to her selfe some seeming Title, yet could shee afterwards finde some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another world. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order for her affaires before hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to prouide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husbands issue by other women was yong and vnable to reitit. We plainly find that the Bretheren or Nephewes of Abazaz, to the number of two and fortie, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any strength) makes it very suspitious that their entertainment in Iezabels house would only haue bene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. Hee that lookes into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could giue, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, behold this is new? it hath bene dreadie in the old time that was before vs. That a King might shed his brothers bloud, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might aliene the Crowne from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen proofe: but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practise, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begunne one rebellion, and was entring into another. Iehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: DAVID purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might aliene the remainder at his pleasure; or if Athalia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the words which Iehoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of IOASH. Behold the Kings sonne muir, raigne, as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of DAVID. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might bee, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it most certain that shee had the vnto no right at all, but only got it by treacherie, murder, and open violence; and so here held it sixe whole yeares, and a part of the seuenth, in good seeming securitie.

How IERU spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest

ATHALIA.

IN all this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturber her, which in reason hee was likelic to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Abah, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramites, wherein he was so farre ouercharged, that hardly hee could retaine his owne, much lesse attempt vpon others. Of the line of Abah there were euentic liuing in Samaria, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident hee was, which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had slaine, and being exceedingly afraide of him, they offered him their seruice, wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one daies warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their God, by which meanes he drew them altogether into one Temple, where he slew them; and in the same zeale to God vterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuised by Ieroboam, no King of Israel had euer greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be allured into the house of Dauid; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had receiued his kingdom by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdom should remaine in his familie, to the fourth generation. But all this would not serue; hee would needes helpe to peece out Gods prouidence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needlelesse Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole rest. He had questionlesse displeas'd many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more hee should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practized as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many soeuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom to retaine them, hee now forsooke, had not giuen him the Crowne; when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The crueltie of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the prophetic of Elizaeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire, and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their infants against the stones, and rent in peeces their women with child. So did not only the wickedness of Abah cause the ruine of his whole house; but the obtinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazael's victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor worried with one inuasion; but he smote them in all the coastes of Israel, and waited all the Countrey beyond the Riuer of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those daies the Lord began to loath Israel;) but rather it is likelic, that they bemoaned the noble House of Abah, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities ties which his Father had wonne: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, living vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in seruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrarie courses, ouerwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to auoide, and therein by God whom they first forooke, forsaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde widdome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of ATHALIAHS Government.

THese calamities falling vpon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leisure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnlesse it were so that shee held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King Aza, who had done the like. And some probability that shee did so may 20 be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we finde that this wicked ATHALIA and her children brake vp the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow vpon BAALIM. Such a sacrifice, though it proceeded from a desire to let out her owne Idolatric, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

2 Chron. 24. 7.

Vnder this impious government of Athalia, the deuotion of the Priests and Leuites was very notable, and serued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, how fouer the Queenes proceedings advanced the contrarie. For the pueritie of that sacred Tribe of Leui, must needs haue been exceeding great at this time; all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they liued, being now very few, and small; and the forelaid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robbrie. Yet they vp-held in all this miserie the fruce of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping duly their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those daies wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IIII.

Of the preferation of IOAS.

IEHOIADA then occupied the high Priest-hood, an honourable, wise and religious man. To his carefulness it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender fort vp-held in those vnhappy times. His wife was Iehoshebeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and sister to Ahaziah, a godlie Ladie and vertuous, whose pietie makes 50 it seeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education vnder such a Mother could haue permitted her to be such as shee was. By her care IOAS the yong Prince that reigned soone after, was conueighed out of the nourserie, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, dren, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly hee was brought vp. How it came to passe that this young child was not hunted out, when his bodie was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in pollicie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had auoided that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after inuouations, and so bee the lesse conformable to the present government. So Iosif was deliuered out of that slaughter, hee and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to bee call away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him suck, who foolishly doubting that hee her selfe should haue benee slaine, was fled away with him into some desolate places, where it was like enough that shee and hee should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coine such tales, and rather sweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will loose the thanks due to their ioyfull tidings.

¶ V.
Whose Sonne Iosif was.

¶ I.
Whether, Iosif may be thought likely to haue benee the Sonne of A H A Z I A.

2. King. 11. 2.
Chron. 22. v. 11.

Ow concerning this Iosif, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of A H A Z I A, seeme plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue that title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrarie opinions of them, that thinke him to haue benee, or not, the naturall Sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is said, that the house of A H A Z I A was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this Iosif was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeede him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Ahazia, doth very well agree. For shee perceiuing that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom shee had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyrannie exercised by her husband, at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now bee reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had benee heire to the Crowne; for shee that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie shee might haue done her pleasure, and benee the more both obaied by others, and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needfull, that shee should be so vnaturall, as to destroy the child of her owne sonne, of whose life shee might haue made greater vse, than shee could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessitie vrgeth nor any commoditie there by gotten requireth it, yea when all humane pollicie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

¶ II.

† II.

That IOAS did not descend from NATHAN.

10 BVt (as it is more easie to finde a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise beene) the pedigree of this Ioas is, by them which thinke him not the sonne of Abassia, set downe in such sort that it may verie iustly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon; to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdom without this condition, that if at any time it failed, the family of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of Dauid there are that would haue him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward hee reuoked it, as was meet for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of Dauid, by Bathsua the daughter of Amnon, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregorie Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Eber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Ioas, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salomon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue bene the children of Vriah the Hittite; and so are they accounted by sundrie
 20 of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew expolitours of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the only begotten of his mother, doe approue this exposition: for wee read of no more than two sons which Bathsua or Bathsheba did beare vnto Dauid; wherof the one, begotten in adulterie, died an infant, and Salomon only of her children by the king did liue. So that the rest must needs haue bin the children of Vriah, and are thought to haue bene Dauid's only by adoption. Wherefore, if Ioas had not bene the sonne of Abassia, then must that pedigree haue bene false, wherein S. Matthew deriueeth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Sauour issued from the loins of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had onely bene of his line by courtesie of the 30 Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue bene. As for the authoritie of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioas was not of the posteritie of Salomon it is enough to say that this was Friar Annus his Philo; for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annus can make authors to speake what he list.

† III.

That IOAS may probably be thought to haue bene the sonne of IERORAM.

40 IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, me thinke it were not amiss to laie open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, wherof the one telling the wickednesse of Iehoram the sonne of Iehoshaphat King of Iuda, for which hee and his children perished, re-
 50 hearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise he would give him a light, and to his children for euer: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same IERORAM, there was not a sonne left him save IERORAM the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that, after those massacres of Iehoram, vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistines and Arabians vpon the children of Iehoram, one of the seed of Dauid escaped, why may it not be thought that he was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preserved; for had all the race of Salomon bene rooted vp in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would haue bene extant, of an euent fo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke. but the preferuation of the house of David, mentioned in the bookes of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehoaſas in whom the roiall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not onely legall issue remaining of David, was kept aliuē. Wherefore it may be thought that this Ioaſo, who followed Ahalia in the Kingdome, was the yongest sonne of Iehoram, whose life Ahalia, as a stepdame, was not vnkely to pursue. For it were not easily vnderstood, why the preferuation of Dauids line, by Gods especiall mercie in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Ahazias himselfe there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining aliuē, which afterwarde were all slaine by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one onely did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Iehoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reneged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistines and Arabians, but being onely begun by them, was afterwarde prosecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement laid vpon Iehoram and all his children, onely Iehoaſas his yongest sonne was exempted; whom therefore if I should affirme to be the same with Ioaſas, which is called the sonne of Ahazias, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise haue bene. For it was the yongest sonne of Iehoram in whom the race was preferred; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazias, seeing that hee was twentie yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reigne, and consequently, was borne in the eightieth or twentieth yeere of his fathers age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more vnkely, either that Iehoram should haue begotten many children before he was eightene yeeres old, or that hauing (as hee had) many wiues and children, he should vpon the suddaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twentie yeeres following: each of which must haue bene true, if this were true that Ahazias was the same Iehoaſas, which was his yongest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Ahalia, in seeking the life of Ioaſas, are easily cleared, if Ioaſas and Iehoaſas were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seven yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if wee vnderstand of yeeres complext, hee might haue bene a yeere old at the death of Iehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickness. Neither is it more absurd to say that hee was the naturall sonne of Iehoram, though called the sonne of Ahazias, than it were to say, as great authors haue done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that hee was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer, which had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoaſas, that foundeth much more neere to Ioaſas, than to Ahazias, in an English eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilful in that language) through the diuersitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our western manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahazias himselfe be also called Azobas, and must haue had three names, if hee were the same with Iehoaſas; in which manner Ioaſas might also haue had severall names; yet because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weak foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leisure to consider of this point.

† IIII.

Vpon what reasons ATHALIA might seeke to destroy IOAS, if he were her owne grandchild

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said that Althalia was not onely blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worshippes of Baalim, but purified the accomplishment of some naturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the blood royall. For whether it were so that Althalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwaies chaste) had imitated the libertie of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraid by Iehu to her sonne, or whether she had children by some former husband, before shee was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Ozri, and sister to Abib) certaine it is that shee had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondrous at, that to settle the Crowne vpon her owne children, she did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for IOAS, if he were his grandmother, yet he might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, least when he came to yeeres, it might withdraw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for he made him spend all his time in idle iourneies, to no other apparent end, than that he might rule at home, and he liuing abroad, be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutresse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuises, then was Althalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doc as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely displeas'd to IOAS, we neede not seeke into the reasons mouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

His much concerning the person of IOAS, from whom, as from a new roote, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diueritie betwene it and others, the lesse, me thinks, I neede to suspect mine owne presumption; as deserring blame, for curiositie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of coniecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humane countaies and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can allooord; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times fallily. This we often finde in prophane writers, who ascribe the ill success of great vndertakings to the neglect of some impious rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Iemes in Egypt vnto Ieremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatrie. For, how foucer the written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishment laid vpon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their owne wils, that they would not by any means be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worshipping the Queene of Heauen; as they and their their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to do; For then (said they) had we plentye of vicinals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off the seruire of that Queene of Heauen. So blinde is the wisdome of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out there is no better nor other guide than his owne written wil, not peruerted by vaine additions.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that haue bene written by the most sufficient of merely humane authors: it letteth downe expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened, not in imputing the death of Ahab to his overforwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his familie, to the securitie of Ieroboam in Israel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the coming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this storie, by many great examples, giues most notable proofe. True it is that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these booke nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman Sir Philip Sidnie, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions, which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are saine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed: for to take out of Liuie every one circumstance of Claudius his iourney against Asarubal in Italie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practise of that kinde, is neither Historical nor Poeticall) to search in to the particular humours of Princes, and of those which haue gouerned their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motives, or impediments of euery businesse, and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquitie in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, how focuser it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable: and Princes, how focuser their intents be seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which prie both in to them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtil miste, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begate, are conuerted to another vs. The indutric of an Historian, hauing so many things to wearie it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbearth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weakie minde is more effectuall, than many that seeme farre greater. So comes it many times to passe that great fires, which consume whole houles or Townes, begin with a few straws, that are waited or not scene; when the flame is discouered, hauing fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire; howsoeuer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queene Atossa, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had receiued any iniurie, and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alleading the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following; this I may boldlie affirme, (hauing I think, in euery estate some sufficient witnesses) that matter matter of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue 15 indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to visite him in his Popedome, as hauing long before in his meaner estate, bene his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old libertie of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he verie much wondred how it was possible for his holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning politician, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, 20 all the subtiltie (said he) of the most craftie braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the arte of the conclaue, and your vnaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Frier, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and sene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued; the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if we lift vp our thoughts to that supreme gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was 30 said of Iupiter.

*Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & urbes, regnaque tristia
Diuisaque, mortalesque turmas, Imperio regis vnius aequo.*

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-swolne streames,
The ciuill Cities, and th' infernall realmes,
Who th' host of heauen and the mortall band,
40 Alone doth gouerne by his iust commaund.

Then shall we finde the quite contrarie. In him there is no vncertaintie nor changes he foreseeeth all things, and all things disposed to his owne honour; He neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that law, which hee hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the profession of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poisons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes 45 deeply wounding the bodie, all which, if any few escape, they haue onely this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happinesse, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicitie, yeelding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easilie counteruaile all afflictions whatsoeuer: though indeed those brambles that sometimes teare the skinne of such as walkein this blessed way, doe commonly laie hold vpon them at such time as they sit downe to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their iourneys end, in presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euermore.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all Historie, to teach by example of times past, such wisdome as may guide our desires and actions, wee should not meruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicitie, both here, and hereafter, pro-pounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The feare of the Lord is the beginning of Wisdome. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captiuitie: wee may well beleuee that the counsaile of God therein, and the execution of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole, or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrences, bene the lesse true, though they might haue bene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had bene lawfull for any man to gather out of profane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not haue done iniurie to the sacred writings, as long as hee had forborne to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleuee that any man of iudgement will taxe mee as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faile, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he deprauce the text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which authoritie alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the libertie, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vsed when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbecoming an Historian.

¶ VII.

The conspiracie against ATHALIA.

WHEN Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any forraigne enemy, nor domestical aduersarie to disturbe her possession, suddainly the period of her glorie, and reward of her wickednesse meeting together, rooké her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had bene very vsfiting that his education should be simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his fastetic it was requisite,) when his capacitie required to haue bene inducted with the stomach and qualities meere for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and with all the great increase of impietic, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spreade it selfe ouer all the Countrie, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore hee associated vnto himselfe siue of the Captaines, in whose fidelitic he had best assurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, hee made a Couenant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely, that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Dauid was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likelie to succeede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared. For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, and other associates of Iehoiada able by close working, to draw together so many trustie and seruiciable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noyse, made vp such a number, as would be able able to deal with the Queenes ordinarie Guard, and that was enough, for if the tyrannesse did not prevail against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the Followers of the Captaines, and other adherents were bestowed in the vtter Armour: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King David had left an Armourie to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come wherein this high designe was to be put in execution; Iehoiada delivered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard vnto the Kings person; produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vntil all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings the Queene was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly loole the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilist yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddenesse, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischief.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ranne forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windows of the Court; were the people running and praising the King. Atbalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise, of folkes in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much vnusall passion in their lookes, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthe of her care was happened; though what it might be shee did not apprehend. Howsoeuer it were, shee meant to vie her owne wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that shee thought it some especiall solemnitie vsed in the Diuine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue some presumption.

Many things argue that shee little thought vpon her owne Tragedie; although Iosephus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, Shee came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neare to her Palace) and that when shee looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, shee rent her clothes, and cried Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that shee was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place, which when shee found occupied by another, then shee begun to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cried out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby shee saw that shee must perish. But that shee came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her companie being beaten back, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had shee truly knowne how things went, shee would surely haue gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which shee gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly if it were granted, that shee, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene meere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if shee perceiving that neither her authority, nor their owne weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would neuertheless take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of seuen years old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom shee saw to bee armed in his defence, may wee not thinke that shee was mad in the most extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had shee vsed the most likely meanes to disappoint it: yet wee neede not lo cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more easie successe, through her indifferetion, than other wife could haue beene expected; so that at his appointment shee was without more adoe carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no bloud saue her owne was shed in that quarrell; her small traine, that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

The death of ATHALIA, with a comparison of her and IZABELL. 527

Moft like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Iehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, only through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant; yet thee her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued such a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murtheresse. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them foruiuing her husband about eight yeares, did spend the time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vsing tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughtie minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the sudden by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming vpon the Treason, receiued sentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her subiection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indignitic, and shame of body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that shee was buried, as hauing not perfected and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument; for shee was a Church-robber. The seruice of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who sūe them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Heazel the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to haue bene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel perished in few daies after her; whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vn certaine; shee had sonnes liuing after shee was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthe of consideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had bene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely haue followed hers as nearely, and bene regarded, as well as the death of Matthan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not haue saued these vngracious Impes, whom the clause following would haue cut off, which commands, that euery man shall die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had bene professors & aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is that they should not haue escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could haue gotten them into his hands As there was awfull cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earnestly. For these had bene citemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to haue carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes and followes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazeael in his warres against Iehu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Iehoiada might with the more confidence, adventure to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

§. I.

Of IOAS his doings whilest Iehoiada the Priest liued.

30

BY the death of Achasia, the whole Countrey of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietnesse; wherein Ioas as a chuld of seuen years old or there-about, began his Raigne, which continued almost fortie yeares. During his minoritie, hee liued vnder the protection of that Honourable man Iehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as hee had before carefully preferred the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his aunceltors. When hee came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Iehoiada two wiues, and begat sonnes and daughters, repairing the family of Dauid which was almost worne out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull peece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that Holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vphold the Temple, whome the Temple had vpheld. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not only the Leuites were more slacke then he, but euen Iehoiada was faine to be quickned by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the tax imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberalitie of the people; who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of Gold and Siluer, and with all other Vteniles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had bene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

§. II.

The death of Iehoiada, and Apostasie of Iosias.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirte yeares, died before his Countrie could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preferred the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselves, and all their issue. Yet his honourable Funerall seemes to have beene given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of DAVI D. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to have beene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if hee had thereby beene discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Juda beganne to flatter their King, he soone forgate, not onely the benefites, received by this worthe man his old Councellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himselfe, the author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Abasia had so infected the Countrie, in fifteene or sixtene yeares; that thirte yeares, or there about, of the Raigne of Iosias, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleare it from that mischief. The King himselfe, when once hee was entred into these courses, ranne on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King in deede, that hee regarded no longer the sower admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was onely counterfeited, when in like an actor vpon the stage, he had striven to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. III.

The causes and time of the Syrians invading Juda in the dayes of Iosias.

BVt God, from whom he was broken loose, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more, and for ground of the waite (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Juda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was thoroughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extreme miserie, to the furie of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before hee had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay betweene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunity had not promised such easie and good successe, as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Abasia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries vsually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as Iosias did, a neuter in the waite betweene him and Israel, but to ioine all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jeim his posteritie, who, like a bloudie Traitor, had vtterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Abub, to which he was a subiect. It thus were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howloeuer it were, we find it plainly, that Iosias was afraid of him, and therfore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the Golde that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, for in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for the possibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with 10 rich bootie of vnhappie treasure, which, belonging to the liuing God, remained a small while in the possession of this mightie, yet corruptible man, but lent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtiue seuenth of Iosias, which was the fiftieth of Iehoaiaz, he made this purchase; but in the same or the very next yeare he died, leaving all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprife of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Arames vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly prouee, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloodshed or fight, 20 in the later, Iosias tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the world, hee lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was present in the other, he was not named; but contrariwise, the King of Arans then reigning (who may seeme to haue then beene the Sonne of Hazael) is said to haue bene at Damascus. The first Arme came to conquer, and was so great that it terrified the King of Iuda; The second was a small companie of men, which did animate Iosias (in vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Arme.

Now concerning the time of this former inuasion, I cannot perceiue that God forsooke him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeede some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Priest, because that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had bene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had bene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Booke of Kings, or if the Apollitic of Iosias, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeede to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was he more vnjust in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Iosias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharash, or his iudgments vpon the house of Abub. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent seruice of God therewithall, which are ioyned together, were vsed in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Iehoiada, soone 40 after whose death, if not immediatly vpon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the six, or thirtiue seuenth yeare of this Iosias his Raigne, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foule Idolater.

And indeede we commonly obserue, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay vpon his seruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwayes tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of 50 the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with euill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen, and more strict account; permitting vually their faultes to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appeares that he dealt with Iosias. For this vnhappie man did not onely continue an obstatinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if he had strouen to excede the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such a vilainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

§. III.

How ZACHARIA was murdered by IOAS.

SVndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia, the sonne of Iehoiada the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable, and sonne to a man so exceeding beloued in his life time, and reuerenced, that if IOAS had reputed him (as Abah did Eliab) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should haue placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured loue of IOAS, yea though he had bene otherwise a man of very small make, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should bee heard with reuerence, how simple soeuer he appears that brings it. But this king IOAS, hauing already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandman in that parable of our Sauiour deale with the heire of the Vineyard; who said, this is the heire, come let vs kill him, that the Inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soeuer that mans deseruing were, that did so, yea though Gods commaundement required it. So they conspired against this Holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open law, as was practised vpon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treacherie, I doe neither reade nor can conjecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement; though the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactours, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commaundement, by which he suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of inere power (as hath bene already noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Iuda.

§. V.

How IOAS was shamefully beaten by the Arames, and of his death.

THIS odious murder, committed by an vnthankfull snake vpon the man in whose bosome he had bene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his owne time, and his memorie detested in all ages; so had it the well-deserued curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly, and heavily vpon the head of that vngratefull monster. It was the last year of his raigne; the end of his time coming then vpon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to liue how he listed, without controulement. When that yeare was expired, the Arames came into the Countrey, rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action tion; for they come with a small companie of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Joab naturallly was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement, prooffe sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when hee might have leauied (as his sonne after him did mulier) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needes be valiant and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of rousers, he tooke a verie great Armie, so that wise-men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Countrey, and expose his person to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; he going forth so strongly appointed, against so weake enemies. Thus might wise-men thinke, and laugh at him in secret, considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh, not onely at this vaine glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he draw along with him.

When the Aramites and King Joab met, whether it were by some folly of the 20 leaders, or by some amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatsoeuer meanes it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Armie of Juda received a notable over-throw, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a rebell to the King of Kings. As for Joab himselfe (as Ambrosius and others expound the storie) hee was forly beaten and hurt by them, being, (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ranfome.

And surely all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they excrested vpon Joab ignominious iudgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, 30 that they had him in their hands, and handled him illiuaorely. Now at that time, Joab is the Son of Iehoaahas raigned ouer Israel, and Benhada the Son of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Demastue; the one a valiant vndertaking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Countrey; the other inferior euery way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betwene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as after followed, might haue giuen to the King of Juda good cause to bee bold, and plucke vp his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not bene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with 40 some shew of warre at his doores, it were ealie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The v unexpected good successe hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weaknesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his ordinance; both the kingdome of Juda, alter more than fortie yeares time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing fo bene troden downe by Hazael, that onely fiftie horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand footmen were left, preuailed against his Some, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are euerie where 50 found, and therefore I will not insist vpon this, though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our Heavenly fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore fathers vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they liked, and saw that they were nor able, being ing lo few, to take any possession of the Countrey, they departed out of Iuda laden with spoyle, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so wel. The King of Iuda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sonnes of an Ammonitisse, and of a Moabitisse, whom some (because onely their Mothers names being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue bene bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, least (as Tyrants vse) hee should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatfoeuer else it were that animated them to murder their King, the Scripture tells vs plainly, that, for the blood of the children of IEHOIADA, this befell him. And the same appears to haue bene used as the pretence of their conspiracie, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amacia, the sonne and successer of Ioa, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthe of buriall in the Sepulchers of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zecharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytours, with wel-deserued death.

Of the Princes lining in the time of IOAS: Of the time when Carthage was built, and of DIDO.

Here liued with Ioas, Alexades and Diogenetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Syluius, and after him Syluius Aladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italia. Ocraxapes, commonly called Anaxandax, the thirtie seuenth King succeeding vnto Ophratanes, began his raigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeare of Ioas, which lasted fortie two yeares. In the sixteenth of Ioas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeares.

In this time of Ioas, was likewise the Raigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido, the building of which Citie is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be seuentie yeares yonger than Rome, others aboue foure hundred yeares elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annales of Tyre, counting one hundred fortie and three yeares and eight Moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeare of Hiram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seuenth of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not vewell to make cleare the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write, some number of the yeares, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion, we may well enough beleue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose Bookes hee giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betwene two workes no longer following one the other, than the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeares current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeare of Ioas, was a hundred fortie and three yeares before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eightie and nine: a time lo long after the death of Aeneas, that we might truly conclude all to bee fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Aulianus noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigramme.

§. VII.

The beginning of AMAZIA his reign. Of IOAS King of Israel, and ELISHA the Prophet.

AMAZIA, the Sonne of Iosias, being twentie five yeares old when his father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demane himselfe, as his new beginning raigne might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to observe; which howsoever it had bene secretly despised since the tme of Iehoram, by 10 many great persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conforme himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, euen whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King vpon Zecharias, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods justice against idolatours, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers and to discourage Amazias from following the way, which led 20 to such an euill end. He therefore, hauing learned of his fathers the art of dissimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traytors that had slaine King Ioas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead bodie to be interred, as that of Iehoram formerly had bene, in the Citie of David, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda. Neuertheless after this, when (belike) the noyse of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspiratours (howsoever their deed done was applauded as the handie worke of GOD) had neither any mightie parakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the 30 heate of mens affections, being not well allaied it was ealie to distinguish betwene their treasons and Gods judgment, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life the better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attempts; Amazias carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelue or thirtee yeares.

As Amazias gathered strength in Juda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Israell 40 the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his predecessours had bene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the tenne Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoshuz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu sufficed not to withdraw him from this politike idolatrie; so were the miseries rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoshuz from the same impious course; yet the mercie of God beholding the trouble of Israel, condescended vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in 50 temporall matters the ten tribes recovered apace but the fauour of God, which had bene infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor beleue that they fought, that they had it not, I finde in the wordes of the Prophet, laying plainly to Amazias, the Lord is not with Israel neither with all the house of Ephraim.

2. Chron. 25.

Whe-

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperitie of the Israelites vnder the Raigne of Ioas, or whether Ichoas wearied and broken with long aduersitie, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heaue cares attending those vnhappy Syrian warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopeful sonne, we find that in the thirtieth yeare of Ioas, King of Juda, Ioas the sonne of Iehoiada began to raigne over Israel in Samaris, which was in the fiftieth of his fathers raigne, and some two or three yeares before his death. 2. King 13. 10.

It appears that this yong Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did fo well hulband that poore stocke which he received from his Father, of tenne Charriots, fittie horsemen, and ten thousand foot, that he might seeme likely to prouea thriuer. Among other circumstances, the wordes which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse. For Ioas visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Charriots of Israel, and the horsemen of the same, by which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more steede, than all the horses and Charriots could doe. 2. King 13. 14.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elisha, about the first yeare of Ioram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeare of this Ioas, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the Spirit of Elisha was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that he did not onely raise a dead child vnto life, as Elisha had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcase, which touched them in the graue. In sinche bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recouering all that the Aramites had vsurped, and weakening the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaris.

§. VIII.

of AMAZIA his warre against EDOM; His Apostasie, and ouerthrow by IOAS.

His happie successe which Ioas had found in his warre against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazias a delire of vndertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand seruicable men for the wars; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of warre he had very iust against the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the tyme of his grandfather Iehorams, had about fiftie yeares bene vnreclaimed, partly by means of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousnesse of his father Ioas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Juda had in many yeares bene without all exercise of warre (excepting that vnhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wisedom to increase his forces, with Souldiers waged out of Israel, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of siluer, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iosephus diminisheth the number, saying that they were but twentic thousand. 2. Chron. 21. 8. Inf. ant. Ind. lib. 9. c. 10.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazias had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse, before he had imployed it, being threatened by a Prophet with ill successe, if hee strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy he gaue them victorie against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismissal, as an high disgrace which departed to reuenge, they fell vpon

a peece of Juda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carried away. But Amazias with his owne forces, knowing that God would be assitant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Countrey, out of whom obtaining victorie, he slew tenne thousand, and tooke other tenne thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke, holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subjection of the crowne of Juda, which might be the cause of that seueritie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Amazias tooke, as appears by his carrying away the jdols thence; but it is like they were the places moit indefencible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another yeare the better haue pursued the conquest of the whole Countrey. How soeuer it were, he got both honor by the iourne, & gaines enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so beforsed this vnworchie King Amazias, that hee set them up to bee his Gods, and worshipped them, and burned in iustice vnto them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a churlish and threatening answer; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worit. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these jdols were made, or the curious workmanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had raiused the Kings fancies; me thinks, hee should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as household ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections carried him from God, vnto the seruice of jdols, which afterwards moued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. Hee had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliary forces as he had gathered out of Israels, which done, it is said that hee was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esaie, hauing broken the yoke of Jacob from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his seruant. If therefore Amazias did hope to reconquer all the Countrey of Edom, hee failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might haue well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, where with men being transported can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or foresight. Therefore it is commonly seene, that they, who entering into battaile are careful to pray for aide from Heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is wonn, do vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how hee got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gaue checke to such a battallion; a third, how hee seized on the enemies Canon; euery one striving to magnifie himselfe, whilest all forget God, as one that had not bene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than hee did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so hee whose meere wisdome and labour hath brought thinges to a prosperous issue, is doubly doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victorie, and for those virtues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeede so farre from weaknesse is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimitie; no vertue being so truly herosall, as that by which the spirit of a man aduanceth it selfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Esaunder in Vergil, vnto Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition,

 Finge Deo.*

With this philosophic Amazias (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head; he had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to Dauid: of which honour hee saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him loofe a hundred talens, and done him no pleasure, he hauing preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was dilempered with such vaine thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impietie following) Iosephus doth testify; saying, That hee despised 20 G O D, and that being puff vp with his good successe, of which neuertheless hee would not acknowledge Yp to be the Authour, hee commaunded Iuda King of I Israel to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their so-ueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King Dauid and King Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Iuda was rather grounded vpon the iniurie done to him by the Itraelites, whom he dismissed in the iourne against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirtene or 30 fourteen years. Neuertheless it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question, that to the Kings of Itrael might, at the least, learne to keepe their subiects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne crownes. Had Amazias desired onely recompence for the iniurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haue had some reasonable answer from Iuda, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Iuda returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and 40 Amazias in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, stuff perhaps with such proud comparison of nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which Iosephus hath written) betweene a King of Ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Alex, that when going to the warre of Troy, his fa-40 ther did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods assistance, he made answer, that by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though he did manie valiant actes, hee had small thanks, and finally killing himselfe in a madneesse, whereinto hee fell vpon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Alex did vtter such words, I doe not find: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such wordes, he was rewarded with success: according. The verrie first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a 50 wise Prince indeede at Ierusalem, among his Parasites, but a foole when hee had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Egyptians, a weakle people, trusting more in the sitte of their Countrie than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Iuda, who from so poore beginnings had raised himselfe to such strength, that he was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre.
 But as Amazias discovered much want of iudgement, in vndertaking such a marche, so in prosecuting the buisness, when it was set on foote, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Ioas on the contrary side, hauing bene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemy than the King of Juda, vsed that celeritie, which peraduenture had often stood him in good liued against the Amazites. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and waited his Countrey, but presented himselfe with an Arme in Juda, readie to bid battaile to Amazias, and saue him the labour of a long iourne. This could not but greatly discourage those of Juda; who (besides the impression of feare which an inuasion beates into people, not inured to the like) hauing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoile of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie a rate, as in the iourne of Edom, were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had somacke enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another Dani, to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foolhardinesse might easily be foreseen in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the warre. But meetre humane wisdom, how focuer it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischief that fell ypon Amazias. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despised, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blowe giuen, they fled all away, leauing their King to shift for himselfe, which hee did so ill, that his enemy had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Arme which fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazias himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ioas carried him directly to Jerusalem, where he had him procure that the gates might be opened, to let him in and his Arme; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable catiue, with these dreadfull wordes, that he durst doe none other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeelde themselves to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwarde being in weaker state, held out two yeares, against Nebuchadnezar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vsed all his force of command and intreatie to betray it. So the gates of Jerusalem were opened to Ioas, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) hee could not rest contented, but, the more to despight Amazias and his people, hee caused foure hundred cubites of the wall to be throwne downe, and entered the Citie in his Charriot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, hee sackt the Temple, and the Kings Pallace, and so, taking hostages of Amazias, hee dismissed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Joas from uniting Ivba to the croune of Israell, when he had wonne Ierusalem, and held

AMAZIA prisoner. The end of IOAS his raigne.

10 WE may iustly maruaile how it came to passe, that Joas, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his owne entire, could bee so contented to depart quietly, with a little spoile, when hee might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdom. The raigne of Abthai had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that croune, his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand-childe of Kings, together with the famous actes that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Iuda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of government, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succellion of wicked Princes had smooothered the thanks, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commoditie that would haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the tweiue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I need not insin on it. That any misage from God forbade the 20 Israelites (as afterwarde in the victorie which Pekah the sonne of Romelius got vpon Ahaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, we doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised; as Joas had bene, in recouering his owne, and winning from his enemy, should for-saake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilitie, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the Kingdome of Iuda.

But concerning that point, which of all others, had bene most materiall, I meane the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainely sene, that entring Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Joas was vnable to conceit 30 his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had bene enough to haue let him not only into the Citie, but into the royall throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially hauing fore meanes of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had bene before. The faire marke with this opportunitie presented, he did not aime at, because his ambition was otherwised, and more meanelly busied, in leuelling at the glorie of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards haue bene corrected well enough, if entring as an enemy, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walles, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the in-40 habitants. But when his pride had done, his courtesies began, and fought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readie to the spoiler, yet should be most forborne. The sacrifice wherewith Seul, Hazael, and the Philistines, men ignorant of the true God & his religion, had quenched their greedie thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Joas, who though an idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whose chil-50 dren had hereditarie charge of the tresurie) to a striu account, as if they had bene Officers of his owne Exchequer, they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoided; by stealing a few apples, hee lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceiue his Soldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so ealie to hold by force a mightie Towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vndulced feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first error; they will thinke vpon every aduantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tiletions, and rather chuse by desperate resolution, to correct the cuils growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefs to payson the bodie, which in such halfe-conquells, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more liuely example herof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weaknes of Pier de Medicis, gouerning therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard times, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the eight, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entered the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betwene them and the Towne men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of readie monie, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entered the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, had him found his trumpets, and they would ring their bells: which peremptorie wordes made the French bethinke themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for soe the usand pounds, and not halfe of that monie to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore what soeuer he had of their dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few months after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the stretes, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, vsually drawes euery Citizen to save his owne, leauing victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolued, women can quench, as fast as the enemy hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commaunder is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diuersitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Ioas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart, from thence, with his bootie safe, if the Armie of Juda, which had become more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should reinforce it selfe, and giue him a checke vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being vpon returne, and better laden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, serving to cool the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Juda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet; who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oner smite the ground with his arrowes which Israel had against Aram, at ye some, and with great probability, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seventh yeares of Ioas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had himselfe the former good successe, ill might the King of Israel haue liked himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could he haue either lent the Judean one hundred thousand men, or meeete him in battaile, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the the wordes of Elisba, that after three victories, Ioaſ ſhould finde ſome change of fortune, and ſuffer loſſe; we muſt needs conclude, T hat the Aramite prevailed upon him this yeare, it being the laſt of his Raigne. T hat this was fo, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Ioaſ his abſence, gave ſuch a blow to Iſrael, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himſelfe into new miſfortunes, which increased the calamitie, we may evidently perceiue in that which is ſpoken of Ieroboam his ſonne. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſaw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Iſrael, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Iſrael from vnder the heauen, he preferred them by the hand of Ieroboam, the ſonne of Ioaſ. This is enough to proue, that the victorious raigne of Ioaſ was concluded with a ſad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple haſting his miſerie and death, as they had done with Seſac, Athalia, and Iſhazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craſſus, and other ſacrilegious Potentates.

This either through indignation conceived againſt him, by the people of Ieruſalem, and courage which they tooke to ſet vpon him within the Walls: or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battaile in open field, and recouer by a new charge the honour which was loſt at the former encounter; or through the miſeries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his abſence, if not by all of theſe; Ioaſ was driuen to lay aſide all thought of winning the Kingdome of Iuda; and taking hostages for his quiet paſſage, made all haſte homewards, where hee found a ſad well-come, and being vtterly forſaken of his wonted proſperitie, forooke alſo his life in few moneths after, leaving his Kingdome to Ieroboam the ſecond, his fortunate and valiant Sonne.

The end of Amazja his Raigne and Life.

30 Any man is able to gheſſehow Amazja looked, when the enimie had left him. Hee that had vaunted ſo much of his owne great prowſſe and ſkill in armes, threatning to worke wonders, and let vp anew the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncaſed of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing ſo terrible a beaſt as he had beſte painted. Much argument of ſcoffing at him hee had miſtred vnto ſuch, as held him in diſlike; which at this time, doubtleſſe, were very many: for the ſhame that falls vpon an inſolent man, ſeldome failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazja (belides that the multitude are alwayes pronct to lay the blame vpon their Governours, euen of thoſe calamities which happened by their owne default) there
 40 was no child in all Ieruſalem, but knew him to be the roote of all this miſchiefe. He had not only challenged a good man of Warre, being himſelfe a Daſtard; but when hee was beaten and taken by him, had baſely pleaded for the common Enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes hee might ſee what ſpoile there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-ſay. The father of this Amazja, was a beaſtly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at ſo deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ieruſalem. Had he offered; ſhould they haue made his promiſe good? Surely the hate which they had made in condeſcending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Iſraelite (which was eaſie enough) any little while, they ſhould ſoone
 50 haue bene rid of him, ſeeing that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater ſpeece than he came forth. Then alſo, when hauing truſſed vp his baggags, he was readie to be gone, a little courage would haue ſerued to perſwade him to leaue his loade behinde; had not their good King deliuered vp Hoſtages, to ſecure his returne, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

2. Chron. 25. 17.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this vnhappy King: it had beene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonor. But we finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that hee continued an Idolator to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest proofe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his iudgement. And certainly, they which tell a man in his aduertitie of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than euer they had beene. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof them selues might alwaies be Masters, wanted not plausible matter to revine him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had beene ouer-come in battaile. Dauid himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leauing it, before the Enemie was in sight, vnto Abisalom his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Iouas might so easily haue beene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesai in? Maas was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes; if so, hee should rather liue to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had hee giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was hee indeede that commanded to set open the gates to Iouas; but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters commandements, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not Master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquire him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had hee beene as hastie to flie, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom hee trusted. Vnworthe creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans wordes, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld; hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he had them stand to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion where by many thousand liues were saued; the Enemie hauing wisely preferred the surpris of a Lyon that was Captaine, before the chafe and slaughter of an Armie of Itags, that followed him.

These or the like wordes comforting Amazias, were able to perswade him, that it was euen to indeede. And such excules might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that he meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fiftene yeares following (so long hee out-liued his honor) we finde not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his gouernement, yet wee may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them; increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking that lesse regard is had of his person, than he beleueeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuerer man. For the affected lowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauitie of one that is wise; and the feare wherein they liue, which are subiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazzle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they doe visually mispend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine and decei-deceivable course; procuring, instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an vnable spirit, being ouerparted with high authoritie, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence.

Amazias thought by extreme rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did hee else than triue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to beleue, that he did not loue them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, prouided well enough for his owne securitie: but who should take vengeance, (or vpon whom?) of such a murder, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not giuen commandement or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his anointed. Yet as Amazias, careless of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong furie, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driuen to forsake the Citie, and fle to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceiued against him, and so general, that neither his absence could alliaie the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrey abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionlesse, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspiratours (who troubled not themselves about raising an armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him; he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmost Citie of his Dominion Westward; standing somewhat without the border of Inda, so that hee might haue made an easie escape (if hee durst aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistines, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seeme that he was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the general insurrection, the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his bodie to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie that was in the Kingdome of IYDA, after the death of AMAZIA.

It hath already beene shewed, that the reignes of the Kings of Inda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by complicit yeares; otherwhiles, by yeares current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeares of his fathers Raigne; or the foremost of his Sonnes. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowne of Iuda laye void eleuen whole yeares: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Iosaphus, and therefore hard to be beleueed, were it not proued by necessarie consequence.

Twice we find it written, that AMAZIA, King of Inda, lived after the death of IOAS King of Israel fifteen yeares; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amazias, was about the end of fiftene yeares complete, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fiftenth yeare of AMAZIA was made King ouer Israel) had reigned in Samarita. But the succession of Uzzia, who is also called Azaria, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Inda, was eleuen yeares later than the sixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expressed, that Azarias began to reigne in the seuen and twentieth yeare of Ieroboam; the sixteenth yeare of his life, being ioyned with the first of two and fiftie that hee reigned. So the Interregnum of eleuen yeares cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed of interpreting the text otherwise than the letter foundes.

Yet

Yet some coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voided time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seuen and twentieth year of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnderstand the seuen and twentieth year of his life, or else (because the like wordes are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Asaria was eleauen yeares vnder age, that is five yeares old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth year might concurre with the seuen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twentie seuen for seuenteene yeares, and so, by making the seuenteenth year of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be salued. These are the coniectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euery doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be fatisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Asaria began his raigne being five yeares old; but then must we adde those eleauen yeares which passed in his minority, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeare, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so careful to auoide an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessitie hath enforced all good writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeares, in the Kingdome of Israel? The space of time betwene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zachariahs Raigne, and such another gap found betwene the death of Pekä, and the beginning of Hiofae, haue made it easily to be admitted in Samaria, which the consideration of things as they stood in Iuda, when Amazias was slaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yea although the necessitie of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, hauing loo farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremitie. Wee need not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which alreadie had throwne themselves into such a horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the crowne from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of regalitie, is neuertheless exposed to many iniuries, proceeding from headstrong and forgetfull subiects.

As for their coniecture, who make Asaria to haue bene King but one and fortie yeares, after he came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the text. The best opinion were that, which gives vnto Ieroboam eleauen yeares of raigne with his father, before hee beganne to raigne single in the fiftenth of Amazias did it not swallow vp almost the whole raigne of Iona, and extending the yeares of those which raigned in Israel (by making such of them complet, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Raignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with AMAZIA, and more particularly of SARDANAPALVS.

He Princes living with Amazias, and in the eleauen yeares that followed his death, were Ionas and Ieroboam in Israel; Cephrenes and Amycerinus in Egypt; Syluius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Abas; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diogenus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedaemon Thelestar, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achians, Ceranthe, Amycla, and some other townes.

But more notable than all these, was Assyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazis succeeding his father Ocraxapes or Anaxadaraxes, reigned twentie yeares, and was slaine the last of the cleau-void yeares which forewent the Raigne of Asaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and fortie yeares. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard hee was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behauiour.

In these voluptuous courtes hee liued an vnhappy life, knowing himselfe to bee so vile, that he durst not let any man haue a sight of him; yet seene he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beaustly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and striving to counterfeit an harlot, that hee thought it great shame to liue vnder the command of so vnworthie a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subiection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belesus or Belesus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with this prophcie, did promise vnto Belesus himselfe the government of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the buisines, one of them stirred vp the Medes, and allure the Perrians into the quarrell, the other perswaded the Babyloniens and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed fortie thousand men aginst Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as hee could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answer to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battailes hee carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such feareful termes, that had not Belesus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was comming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it vpon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of libertie, that those forces joynd themselves with his. The sodaine departure of the enimie seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to fealt his Armie, triumphing before victorie. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe; which through ouer-great securitie, was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leauing his wiues brother Salamenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Ninues which; till new aides that he sent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it hauing bene prophcieed, that Ninive should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enimie to the towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Ninive, enough hath bene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well vntualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battailes ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamenus) was faine to lie two whole yeares before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet hee saw no appearance. It seemes that hee wanted Engines and skill to force those walles, which were a hundred foot high, and thicke enough for three Chariots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which hee could not doe in two yeares, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not only drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the olde Oracle, or seeing no meanes of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Pallace, with his wiues, Eunuches and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, where with hee and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Strabopolis a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that hee built that Citie and Tharsus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and and drinke, and make merrie, encouraging other, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, testifie that his nature was more prone to sensualitic, than to any vertue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that sodainly hee slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleue that they were sometimes (yct not, as Orosius 10 hath it, incessantly) buied, in offensive or else defensive armes; yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthe of memorie. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophrastus Antrochennus hath said of them is verie true; Silence and obliuion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of VZZIA.

§ I.

The prosperitie of VZZIA, and of IEROBOAM the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes after the death of IEROBOAM. Of ZACHARIA, SALVEM, MENAHEM and PEKARIA.

VZZIA, who is also called Azaria the sonne of Iotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteene years old, in the seuen and twentieth year of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioa King of Israel. Hee serued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Towne that stood neare to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. Hee ouercame the Philistims, of whose Townes hee dismantled some, and built others in sundrie partes of their Territories. Also hee got the maiestic ouer some partes of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruites of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iosephus rehearseth his acts) hee beganne with the Philistims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seuen thousand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand fixe hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and spearcs, and helmets, and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to vse the seruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Chariots.

a. Chron. 26. 14.

a. Chron. 31. 9.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchievements dismantling a town pulling down for walls, bulwarks & fortification of and having it nothing but of all that had raign'd in Juda, since the time of Dauid; so were his riches and magnificent wakes, equall, if not superior to any of theirs that had been Kings betweene him and Salomon. For besides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of yare with triple interest, hee had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. Hee turned his lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dreillers of Vines, in grounds consuiant to such husbandric. In other places hee had cattel feeding, whereof he might well keepe great store, hauing wonne so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waite ground sruing for pasturage. For defence of his cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Towers in the wildernesse. He also digged many cisternes or ponds. Iosephus calls them water-courses; but in such drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers hee so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, releue themselves therewith; questionlesse hee took the only course, by which hee might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the wilderness;

 it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vse of trauailers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eilat by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Townes among the Philistims; hee repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Ioss had broken downe, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fiftie Cubites high.

The State of Israel did neuer so flourish, as at this time, since the diuision of the twelue Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Rezaia preuailed in the South, so (if not more) Ieroboam the sonne of Ioss, King of the tenne Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories, against the Syrians, hee wanne the Royall Citie of Damascus, and hee wanne Hamat, with all the Countrie there-about from the entring of Hamat, vnto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is (as the most expound it) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in the time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bene in the raigne of Dauid.

But it was not for the pietie of Ieroboam, that hee thrived so well; for hee was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites, vnder the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promised the Kingdome of Israel vnto the fourth generation, was now not faire from the end; and now againe it was invited vnto repentance, by new benefits, as it had bene at the beginning. But the sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, was held so pretious, that neither the Kingdome it selfe, giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike idolatrie; nor the miserie falling vpon him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie, of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioss, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto Iehu, that his sonnes, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that wee, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly gesse at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Ieroboam the sonne of Ioss, after a victorious raigne of one and forty yeares, had ended his life, it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith haue bene admitted, to raigne in his stead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne passed by election, must needs haue appeared base; and the vertue of the last King, hauing bene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the alreadie confirmed right of a familie so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twentie yeares

yeares did passe before Zacharia the Sonne of Ieroboam was, by vniforme content, receiued as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue bene wanting, vpon which, the wisdome of man was readie to cast an eye. Probable it is that the Captaines of the Armie (who afterwards flew one another, to fall, that in foureteen yeares there reigned fise Kings) did now by headstrong violence, rent the Kingdome a funder, holding each what he could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia, vntill, after many yeares, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the sonne of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twentie yeares, we find by the difference of time, betweene the fifteenth yeare of Vezia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and forth (his feuen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vezia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vezia in the last sixe moneths whereof, Zacharia reigned in Samarra. There are some indeed that by supposing Ieroboam to haue reigned with his father eleauen yeares, do cutt off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abridge this Anarchie, that was before the raigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaue it twelue yeares long: which is time sufficient to proue that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes, was no lesse dilttempered, than as is alreadie noted. But I choofe rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroade in the world, than this doubtfull coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeares, by adding three quarters of his fathers raigne vnto his owne, which was it selfe indeed so long, that hee may well seeme to haue begun it very young: for I doe not thinke, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer raigne, and with a longer life, than he did his seruant Dauid.

This much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was void, before the raigne of Zacharia, little may suffice to be said of his Raigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to iustifie the iudgement of God, whereby hee was slaine. He was the last of Iebu's house, being (includiue) the first of that line; which may haue bene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophetic hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant giuen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had bene giuen to Iebu, for the slaughter of Ieroram, and for the eradication of Ababs house.

Zacharia hauing bene sixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who 2 Kings. 23. 13. raigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samarra. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; saue onely that he was a Traitor, and the sonne of one Iabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that hee was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Iebu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tiphfab or Thapsa, and the coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menabem, his enemy and supplanter, then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum receiued the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menabem who reigned in his place.

Menabem the sonne of Gadi, raigned after Sallum tenne yeares. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane, For he not onely destroyed Tiphfab, and all that were therein, or therabouts, but he ript vp all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this crueltie bene vsed in reuenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would haue bene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his fathers crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, office, there was used such long deliberation, that we may plainly discouer Ambition, Disdain, and other priuate passions, to haue bene the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menabem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his raigne; Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appeales, with a thousand talents of silver, leaued vpon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this monie the Israélite purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (beike) hauing either invited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) fought to vse his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Iosephus reports of this Menabem, that his raigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his tyrannic ended with his life: and Pekahis, his Sonne, occupied his roome.

Of this Pekahis the storie is short: for hee raigned only two yeares; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Peka, the Sonne of Kemais, whose treason was rewarded with the crowne of Israel, as, in time coming, another mans treason against himselfe shall be. There needs no more, to be said of Menabem, and his Sonne, saue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as wee finde in Iosephus) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palastina; it will thordly follow in order of the storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belofus (called also Beleses, and by some, Phal Belachus) who joyned with Arbases the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-liued the happinesse wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Vzzia his reigne and life.

AS the zeale of Lehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preferre the lineage of Dauid, in the person of Iosab; so it appears, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the crowne of Iuda, when the hatred borne to his Father Azarias, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he sought God in the daies of Zecharia (which vnderstood the visions of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

But, when he was at first, his heart was lifted vp to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God: and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense, vpon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremitie bene so helpfull to the Kings of Iuda, that mere gratitude, and ciuill polieie, should haue held back Vzzia from inroaching thereupon; yea, though the law of God had bene silent in this case, and not forbidden it. Howloeuor the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgate not to afflitt them. Azarias the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honor it would proue, that he took vpon him the office of the Sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azarias foure score other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed, only in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) hee reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in Iosephus, that the King had apparrailed himselfe in Priestly habit, and that hee threatened Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeede, enlargeth the storie, by inserting a great earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs till it rested against another Hill, stopping vp the high waies, and spoiling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this earth-quake, hee saith, that the rooffe of the Temple did cleare, and that a Sunne beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue bene true; and some there are who thinke that this earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos, wherein they doe much misse- reckon the times. For the earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Israel, who died seuen and thirtie yeares before Vzzias; so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzias, which supplied his Fathers place in gouernement of the Land, should, by this account, haue bene then inborne: for he was but five and twentie yeares old, when hee beganne to raigean King. Therefore, thus farre only we haue assurance; that while VZZIA was wroth with the Priests, the leprosie rose vp in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to liue in a house by himselfe, vntill he died; the rule ouer the Kings houle, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherin his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a-part from the rest, because he was a Leaper.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which liued in the time of VZZIA; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzias were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Ioel, Amos, Obadiah, and Jonas. It is not indeede set downe, when Ioel, or Obadiah, did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to S. Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two bee judged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzias. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painefullly bene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holie Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to haue prophesied in the daies of Iosis, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimates no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophesies, that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose daies Ninive was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

In the raigne of Vzzias likewise it was, that Esaï, the first of the foure great Prophets, beganne to see his visions. This difference of greater and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esaï was great indeede, not only in regard of his much writing; or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who thinke him to haue bene the sonne of Amost the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued; but for the excellencie, both of his stile, and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Sauour, with the calling of the Gentils, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth yeare of his raigne, by our computa-

tion (whereof in due place we will giue reason) was current, when Vezzia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Juda.

After the death of Boochoris, Aschis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt, vnto him succeeded Amphis; and these two occupied that crowne fixe years. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fiftie years, whereof the ten first ranne along with the last of Vezzia his raigne and life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be inter-medied with the businesse of Juda.

In Absens, the two last years of Atriphron his twentie, the seuen and twentieth of Thespeius, the twentieth of Aganestor, and three the first of Aschylus his three and twentie, made euen with the two and fiftie of Vezzia: as likewise did in Albas the last seuen of Siluius Auentinus his seuen and thirte, together with the three and twentie of Siluius Procas, and two and twentie the first of Siluius Anulius. In Media Arbaces beganne his new Kingdome, in the first of Vezzia, wherein, after eight and twentie years, his Sonne Sosarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirte years. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vfe more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertainetic in the storie of the Assyrian Kings, who haue already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to fore-20 go it.

§. IIII.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundrie Families, that raigned a part in Ninive and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authoritic sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was shewen vpon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose especiall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces excreised in so tyrannicall manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generalitic of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he vfed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne Grace; allowing him to hold, not only the Citie and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embelzing whereof of his life had beene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) only the Soueraignetic to himselfe, which to vfe immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, hee destroyed the Citie of Ninive; permitting the Citizens neuertheless to take and carrie away euerie one his owne goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Babylonians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of libertie; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slackning too much the reines of his owne Soueraignetic, hee did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enioyed, could recompense. For both the Territorie of that Countrie was pared narrower by Salmansasar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde, in the Scriptures, to haue held some Townes of the

Medes; and the cuill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the silt of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Affyrians grew to be such, as might in foure score yeares, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Mediterranea, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nimue, and subuersion of the Affyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honour, who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Affyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at libertie; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nimue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their historie is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set downe a-part the severall authorities and arguments of sundrie men, adding somewhat of weight or of cleareness one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without feare to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine owne, but merely led by those reasons, which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weak.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as currant, is this; That Belosus was the same King who, firm of the Affyrians, entred Palesina with an Armie, being called Pal, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Beluchuu. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that hee got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Affyria: finally, that he reigned eight and fortie yeares, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglatphalsar his Sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Alerdash prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainesaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, how soeuer Annius his Authors deserue to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, iustifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no Historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeede the foundation, whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belosus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Babyloniens, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captaines were with gouernements: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to haue Affyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least apparence is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Affyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne walls and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nimue by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie, because thereby the people of that Nation might bee kept downe, from aspiring to recouer the Soueraigntie, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seate of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romens, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Bodie politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter cleemed ouer dangerous dangerous to Rome it selfe, that was Mistress of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four yeares had created their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Pal? or what must this Pal haue bene (of whose descents, or entermedling, or indeede of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall part of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belosus; whose neare Neighbourhood gaue him opportunitie (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should haue attempted to seize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belosus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and siluer that had bene in the Palace of Ninus. And questionlesse to restore such a Citie as Ninus, was an enterprife fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belosus had; which Pal, if he were not Belosus, is likely to haue wanted.

Besides all this, had Pal bene a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not haue bene an ealie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie a faire off in Israel: the only action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pal or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers haue called Belosus, Beleses, and Belesis, (in like manner as Iosephus acknowledgeth, that hee, whom the Scriptures called neuter otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the Sonne of Alyages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple vtterly remoned. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palestina: so that Belosus, hauing fenced his affaires in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leasure encroach vpon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may finde every one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who inuaded Israel, was none other than Belosus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, merely for the loue of Belosus. The friendship of the Arabians was a thing of maie importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belosus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adjoining to their barraine quarters, might yearely doe them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to haue quiet passage through their borders, but their vtmost assistance; yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue giuen him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broiles among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pal got a thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie Neighbour of Ieroboams, recouered their owne, setting vp a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuided by Euphrates hold together in fogood termes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinitie; the memorie whereof was auailable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites about the Riuier came ouer willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites beyond Damasco. So Belosus had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King reigning so faire off as Ninus, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, least it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath bene said of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes.

Tull. rousa

Joseph. l. 12. c. 11.

For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twentie yeares, then is it likely that Belus was either vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the advantage when it was faire, and first discouered. This might haue compelled those, who alone were not strong enough, to seeke after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belus did passe the Riuer of Euphrates, as soone as hee found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seeme that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we haue made it: for three and twentie yeares leisure would haue afforded better opportunitie, which ought not to haue bene looll.

For as we were to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they preuailed and grew mightie, betwene the times of Arbaces and Deceus the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where hee supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concurre, that the authoritie of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull only of it selfe. Now, though some haue conjectured that all Affria was giuen to Belus (as an ouerplus, besides the Prouince of Babylon, which was his by plaine bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deseruings, yet the opinion more commonly received is, that hee did only encroach vpon that Prouince by little and little, whilest Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelue yeares betwene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Mehabem his raigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Affria, and letting of that Countrie, was worke enough to hold Belus occupied, besides the restauration of Ninus, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his raigne, if perhaps he liued to see it finished in his owne daies. So that this argument may rather serue to proue that Phul and Belus were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made until Belus could finde leisure; and the time of advantage which Belus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Prouince of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Affria, and performed somewhat vpon a Countrie so farre distant as Palastina, was likely to haue bene, at least, named in some historie, or if not himselfe, yet his Countrie to haue bene spoken of for those victories: but wee neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoeuer of the Affrians, done in those times; whereas of Belus, and the power of the Chaldeans, wee finde good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Affrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vnfortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and viter desolation of Ninus, must needs haue so weakened the state of Affria, that it could not in thirte yeares space be able to invade Palastina, which the auncient Kings, raigning in Ninus, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belus to subdue it; who having once extended his dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Sythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and trie his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto ciuile dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering enuie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, friends and cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did inuite him. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pal in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belus; euen as by the names of Nebuchad- nesses, Darius the Mede, Arsilochus, and Ahasuerus, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countries, have called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Ahasuerus: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict anything that hath bene written of old, nor neede to trouble our selues and others with framing new coniectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance, will of the selves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Babylus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempalus, and Nabopolassar famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is not the same ground of this contention. If therefore Belus or Belusis were that Phul which invaded Israel, if he and his posteritie reigned both in Nineve and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Aur, from whom Salmanassar, Sennacherib, and Ashurbanon descended; then is it manifest, that we must seeke Nabonassar, the Babylonian King among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Salmanassar, who is knowne to have reigned in those yeares, which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath assigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Mero-lach, who supplanted Aur-hadon, I must, it is, that he and his successors were of another houle. This is the scope and end of all this disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrarie part, will not be satisfied with such coniectures. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into peeces, hope to ouerthrow all the premisses, vpon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar, that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belusis were severall Kings. This consequence is so plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To prove that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrarie. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proved by his name, which is merely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassar, name, is proper to the Assyrians. It is likewise proved by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolemy drawes that Epochs, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempalus, called in his owne language Mero-lach-ken-ped, but more briefly in Isay his prophetic, Meredach, by the former part of his name; or Mero-lach-Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Mero-lach, the sonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other then Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar, which in Greece or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, wherinto Salmanassar carried captiue some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the province of Babylon Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Mero-lach beganne his raigne ouer Babylon in the fixt yeare of Hezekiah, at which time Salmanassar tooke Samaritis; therefore, if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Mero-lach, yea and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Winter Ioseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofs from matter of more necessarie inference.

To touching all that was laid before of Phul Belusis, for the prouing that Phul and Belusis

Belus were not sundrie Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he coniecture that they were, who by their diligence might haue wonne the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Annus his Authors giuen such offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howsoeuer I beleue nothing that Annus his Berosus, Aetasthenes, and others of that stampe affirme, in respect of their bare authoritie; yet am I not so squamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of the good fellows alleged in it: I haue (somewhat peradventure too often) already spokn my minde of Annus his Authors: not thelesse, I may say here againe, that where other Historics are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elswhere we finde, and serueth to explaine or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painefull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellowes) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belus, and Salmassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or vnwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annus, though disliking him in general) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that hee should bee laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betweene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be refuted or auoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldaean name, and Salmassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleuing, that one man in two languages might be called by two diuersall names? That Astronomie flourished among the Chaldeaes, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldaean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, Prophetas uesitio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis uiderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their sleepe haue dreamt of Nabonassar, that hee was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negatiue. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldeaes, doth not proue him to haue beene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue bene also King of Assyria. The Emperor Charles the first, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, then were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spaine at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmassar or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholers: but it seemes, that he and his posteritie, by giuing themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vnanswerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleged on the contrarie side) one of them which is drawn from the vnlike sound and writing of those names, Salmassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmassar might be Lord of some places in the Princedome of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe; this indeede might bee so, and it might be otherwise.

Hitherto

Hitherto there is nothing false conjecture against conjecture. But in that which is alleged out of the Prophet Esaï, concerning Merodach the Sonne of Baladan, and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Merodachpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to raigne in the sixt year of Heczekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, then can be answered in haile. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections, untill I meete with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Heczekia, wherein Merodach liued and was King. Yet that I may not leaue too greata scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I here fustise him; that how strong fouer this argument may seeme, Sealiger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the Sonne of Nabonassar, he had beene deceiued.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their storie, who taking Pal to be a distinct person from Belosus or Belesius, haue in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pal to faile in Ahabadon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse mine owne want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Diuers, in indeede, there are, whom I haue seene, that since Ioseph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof: 20 but Seslus Catusus himselfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not bene carefull to giue vs notice, how long Belesus, Baladan, Pal, or Tiglat Palassar, did raigne, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Baladan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these diuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I finde it contriued by Augustinus Tornielius; who only of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that raigned in Affyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tornielius is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the 30 last yeare; he appeares to me a man of curious industrie, sound iudgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this business he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Tornielius; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and with that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as hee hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would hee haue instructed and emboldened mee, to write more fully and lesse timorously in other things, 40 which now I haue not leisure to reuise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared least it had ouer hastily passed out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kingdoms that inuaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were slaine by Abrabam, I finde mine aduenturing, as I haue done, to say, that they may probably be thought to haue beene some petty Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider how he hath ordered these last Affyrian and Babylonian Kings.

After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mightie, sought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belosus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Affyria, sided with Belosus, and they two preuailed so farre, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a diuision thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betwene Ottavian, Antonine, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Tornielius offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainetic) that Arbaces made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of

of his Empire in Media, appointing Belosus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Affyria. But in short space, that is, in foure yeares, it came to passe, by the iust iudgement of God, that Phul and Belosus rebelled against Arbaees, like as Arbaees had done against Sardanapalus, and in stead of being his Viceroyes, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Tornelius himselfe leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guess. Having thus deuided, how Phul and Belosus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, hee orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Foure yeares after Arbaees, Phul begins to raigne, and continues eight and foure yeares. Theglathalassar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuersly, according as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuertifie them) succeeding vnto Phul, raigned three and twentie. Salmansassar followed him, and raigned tenne. After him Senacherib raigned seuen; and when he was slaine, Asarhadon his some tenne yeares; in whome that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Affyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had bene more likely) Belosus usurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threecore and eight yeares; at the least threecore and eight yeares did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whome (with Sealiger) he thinks to be Badass, are assigned fixe and twentie yeares: then, two and fiftie to Merodach, or Mardacompadus: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twentie to Nabonassar, the father of Nabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Affyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who giue all to Belosus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more neerely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornelius would haue conceiued two different wayes, by which Phul might haue gotten Affyria (for how Belosus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adheres to the later of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the Iuddaean King of Affyria; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to haue happened, vnlesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had bene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he deuided the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betweene them, was vterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Diuision it selfe, and the ciuile Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of. Questionlesse, the intercurring of some Treasures by Belosus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoided; but that either we must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue bene exceeding his merits, or else his merits, and name withall, to haue bene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belosus against Arbaees, it was almost impossible for the Affyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeares, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belosus, it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaees did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer-great fauourer of libertie) cuen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but spea-

of the Assyrian King

speaking of their order and time in general. If it bee so vnlawfull to thinke, that some of Annus his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may bee true, especially such, as contradict not acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it said, that Phul did raigne in Assyria eight and fortie yeares? For this hath no other ground than Annus. It is true, that painfull and judicious Writers haue found this number of yeares, to agree fitly with the course of things in Historie; yet all of them tooke it from Annus. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annus his forgerie (as questionlesse he is of the guiltie of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, he be not beleeued for his owne sake; though for our owne sakes we make vse of his boldnesse, taking his wordes for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) wee are vnwilling our selues to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Herin we shall haue this commoditie, that wee may without b'ulshing alter a litle, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annus, against whom we shall bee sure to finde friends that will take our part.

The raignes of Thoglatphalar and Salmansar did reach, by Annus his measure, to the length of nine and twentie yeares the one, and seuentene the other; Tornielus hath cut off two from the former, and seuen from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; vsing the libertie wherof I spake last: for that any Author, saue our good Mesalsenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did raigne, it is more then I haue yet found. To Senskerib and Ashadion, Tornielus giues the same length of raigne, which is found in Mesalsenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much vnto themselves, as may well be allowed vnto a man so judicious as is Tornielus: yet could I wish, that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annus in this business, wherin he himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must haue done, almost nothing.

The like libertie we finde that he hath vsed in measuring the raignes of the Chaldeans; filling vp all the space betwene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threescore and eight yeares of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that hee thought Belofus might haue begonne his raigne somewhat later then Phul: for threescore and eight yeares would seeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shorning his raigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time whercin he was a priuate man, enough for a long liuer. Indee, eight and fortie yeares had beene somewhat of the most, considering that hee seemes by the storie to haue bene little lesse, at such time as hee joynd with Abaces; and therefore the addition of twentie yeares did well deserue that note (which Tornielus aduicely giues) that it his raigne extended not so farre, then the raigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonassar.

I neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Tornielus, in conjecturing, nor the modestie of Seuliger and Sethus Calasius, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend only vpon likelihood. For things, wherof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, must be described in Histories, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, wherof as yet there is made no true discovery. that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of loadstone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeede the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such libertie to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediesse obliuion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serue only to misleade such discoverers as rashly beleue them; drawing vpon the publishers, either some angrie curses, or well deserued scorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretie jeast of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthe Spanish Gentleman, who had beene emploied by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Iland in those streights, which me thought, might haue done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wives Iland; saying, That whilst the fellow drew that Mappe, his wife sitting by, desired him to put in one Countrie for her; that shee, in imagination, might haue an Iland of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Histories, we neede not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselues to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if wee haue it not alreadie) the perfect truth of these vncertainties? would it be more shame to haue beleueed in the meane while, Annius or Tornellius, than to haue beleueed nothing. Here I will not say, that the credit, which we giue to Annius, may chance otherwhile to be giuen to one of those Authors whose names hee pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authoritie, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornellius, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it hauing moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanely learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deale as Paenius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them delirious to put all the Senators of the Citie to death. He loekt the Senators vp within the State-houfe, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtaining thus much, that none of them should periish, vntill the Commonaltie had both pronounced him worthe of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was halitic; for as fast as euery name was read, all the Towne cryed, Let him die: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting another, some notorious vice of the Person, or basenesse of his condition, or insufficiency of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be keepe for lack of better.

§. V.

of the Olympiads, and the time when they beganne.

After this diuision of the Assyrian Empire, followes the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the raigne of the same King Pezzia, and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Ischom: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Autors, weigh-

10 tie enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the sacred Historie, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not bee too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accompts, we joyae them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of astiuitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strenght of Hercules his bodie. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwise Pisa, neare Va-
20 to Elis; where also Iupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Gracians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympicus. These games were exercised from euery fourth year compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neare the Riuier Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, till Iphitus by aduise from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lycurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Gracians, till the raigne of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Celsenus: other thinke that they were dissolued vnder Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Parrus accepted the Gracian times, and their stories, to be 30 certain: but reckoned all before either doubtful, or fabulous; and yet Plinie giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the raigne of Cyrus, who beganne in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Cassior, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seuen wife Gracians flourished. For Solon had speech with Craesus, and Craesus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely to set them in the true year of the World, and the raigne of such and such Kings; but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian, and Didymus, beginne the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of 40 Oliator or Acariab.

Eusebius who is contrarie to himselfe in this reckoning, accompts with those that finde the first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundredth and sixth year after Troy, yet he telleth vs that it was in the fiftieth year of Pezzia, which is (as I find it) two yeares later.

Erastophenes placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seuen yeares after Troy, reckoning the yeares that passed betwene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassius, Diodorus Siculus, Solimus, and many others adhere.

The distance betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Erastophenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his Posteritie into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, three score yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his gouernment in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first year of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date lare more vncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games, to haue bene in the foure hundredth and eight year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, muſt teach vs how to finde when they beganne.

To this good vie, we haue the enſuing yeares, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided, by the ſame Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundredth foureſcore and ſeuenteen yeares; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponneſian Warre, eight and fortie yeares; forwards to the victorie of Lysander, ſeuē and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, ſiue and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole ſumme ariſeth to foure hundred ſiſtie and three yeares; which number he otherwiſe alſo collecteth, and it is allowed by the moſt.

Now for placing the inſtitution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth yeare of Veziah, we haue arguments, grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his raigne, and the death of Alexander; as alſo vpon the Aſtronomical calculation of ſundry Eclipſes of the Sunne, as of that which happened when Xerxes ſet out of Sardis with his Armie to inuade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his raigne as King, before hee was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the firſt yeare of the ſiue and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he raigned thirtie yeares; they who giue him but twentie nine yeares of raigne (following Herodotus, rather than Tulle, Iuſtine, Eusebius, and others) beginne a yeare later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander ſet by all good Writers, in the firſt yeare of the hundredth and fourtenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, ſerues well to leade vs back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like obſeruations doe. For if we reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, we ſhall finde all to agree with the yeares of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus beganne his raigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to ſignifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the firſt yeare of the ſiue and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, we finde two hundred and thirtie yeares compleat. From the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchie, which laſted but ſeuē yeares, we finde compleat two hundred and ſeuē yeares, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore ſeeing that the firſt yeare of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the laſt of the ſixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundredth and fortieth yeare from the inſtitution of thoſe games by Iphitus) followed the laſt of the ſeuētie yeares, of the captiuitie of Juda, and deſolation of the Land of Iſrael; manifeſt it is, that we muſt reckon back thoſe ſeuētie yeares, and one hundred threeſcore and ten yeares more, the laſt which paſſed vnder the Kings of Juda, to finde the firſt of theſe Olympiads; which by this account is the one and fiftieth of Veziah, as we haue already noted.

The Eclipſes whereof we made mention, ſerue well to the ſame purpoſe. For examples ſake, that which was ſcene when Xerxes muſtered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundredth threeſcore and ſeuēth yeare of Nabonaſſar, being the laſt of the threeſcore and fourtenth Olympiad's, leades vs back vnto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threeſcore and ten yeares, vnto the deſtruction of Ierusalem; and ſo vpwards through the raignes of the laſt Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth yeare of Veziah.

This much may ſuffice, concerning the time wherein theſe Olympiads beganne.

of the Olympian Games
Gotham

To tell the great solemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practis'd; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Palme in those feats, whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises, that serued only for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers, which proclaimed the victors, contended which of them should get the honour, of having plaied the best part.

The Elæans were Presidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oliue, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Dingoras had scene his three Sonnes crowned for their seuerall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Movere Diagoras, non enim in caelum ascensusus es, that is, Die Diagoras, For thou shalt not come up to heauen: as if there could bee no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Quas Elæa domum reducit Palma uictoriles.

*Horat. Carm. lib.

Such as like heauenly wights doe come
With an Elæan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but euen graue Historians thought it a matter worthe of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the vanitie of the Greekes; that they esteemed it almost as great an honor, to haue wonne the victorie at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conquest of a Prouince.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Elcatombaan, which doth answer to our Iune; and what means they vsed to make the Moneth beginne with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I haue shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Iuda, and leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meeete in more serious employments, when the Persians quarrells draw the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Tonia and Helleffant.

§. VI.

of IOTHAM and his Contemporaries.

IOTHAM the Sonne of Yzzabab, when he was five and twentie yeares old, and in the second of Pekab King of Israel, was annointed King in Ierusalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple of three score cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: besides diuers Cities in the Hills of Iuda, and in the Forrests, Towers, and Palaces: he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundred talents, and of Wheate and Barly two thousand measures: hee reigned sixe and twentie yeares; of whom Iosaphus giues this testimonie. Eusimodis vero Principis

Princede his fuit, et nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo iuste praefuerit, urbem ipsam tanta sibi cura esse passus sit, & tantopere auerit, ut vniuersum regnum hostibus quidem minime conueniendum, domesticis autem eius incolis atque ciuibus felix, sanctum & fortunatum sua virtute efficeret; This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: he worshipped God so religiously, he gouerned his men so righteously, he was so prouident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplifie it, that by his vertue and proweffe he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperouse and happy.

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his raigne was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Autonomen about this time succeeded Phelosteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Basida, to the time of Cypselus, who droue them out.

Tiglatphalassar, or Tiglatpelsar, the sonne of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Affryans that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Maister Pekahiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglat reigned five and twentie yeares, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzheimus findes, that with his sonne Salmansar he reigned yet two yeares longer: which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single raigne, but reckon them to Tiglat Phulassar himselfe, who therewith reigned seuen and twentie yeares.

Schylus, the sonne of Agamemnon, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled five and twentie yeares. Alcemenes gouerned Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therein surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witness the contrarie. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned threecore yeares, and out-liued the Atheniack Warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicanor, his royall companion.

At this time liued Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Affryan Empire, and of the Citie of Ninive: which succeeded (sayth Iosephus) a hundred and fiftene yeares after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

HAZ, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seuenteenth yeare of Pekah, the sonne of Remalia: the same being also the last yeare of his fathers raigne, who began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned sixteene, but not complete yeares. This Achaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, set vp nor farre from Ierusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehennem, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vsed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pitifull cryes of the children might might not be heard: which vnnatural, cruell, and deuilish Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Mattheu hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible linne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Indea, diuers Authors witness; as Virgil in the second of his Æneids, — Sanguine placitis, &c. and Silius, — Poscere caede Deos. Saturne is said to haue brought this custome into Italie, besides the casting of many soules into the Riuer of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded that the waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in so much that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to be offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred vp and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be slaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appease him: who besides these forenamed Nations had instructed the Rhocians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messena, of Galatia, with the Massagets, and others, in these his seruices: Further, as if hee were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, 20 (as Arcula writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearful feruitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickednesse of this King Achaz, God stirred vp Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Sonne of Remalab, King of Israel against him, who inuaded Indea, and besieged Jerusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, possest himselfe of Elab by the Red Sea, and cast the Iewes out of it, and Pekah slaughtered in one day twelue hundred thousand Iudeans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Maasiah the Sonne of Achaz was also slaine by Zicbri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his house: and Eleanath the second person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites led away to Samaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliuered back againe.

2. King. 18. 6.

As Israel and Aram vexed Iuda on the North; so the Edomites and the Philistines, who were more attended the ruine of Indea, entred vpon them from the South: and tooke Bethsemes, Aialon, Gaderah, Socho, Timmah, and Gemoz, slew many people, and carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe enuironed on all sides, and that his Idolls and dead Gods gaue him no comfort, hee sent to the Affyrian Tiglatpileser, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the siluer and gold both of the Temple, and Kings 3. King. 16. 40 House.

Tiglatpileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Iuda. His Father hauing lately made himselfe from a Prouinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Affyria, had a little before led him the way into Indea, invited by Menabem King of Israel. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly hearkened to Achaz and embraced the aduantage. As for Belochus himselfe, he was content to assigne some other time for going through with this enterprize: because (as I haue said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglat, hauing now, with the treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Armie, first inuaded the Territory of Damascus, wanne the Citie, and killed Rezin, the last of the race of the Adadi, who beganne with Dauid and ended with this Achaz. At Damascus Achaz met Tiglat, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar sent it to Vizib the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglat possest all Basen, and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Israel, and made them his Vassalls. And notwithstanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he posselt himselfe of the greater part of Juda, and as it seemeth enforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings the eighteenth it is written of Ezechias, that he revolted from Ashur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Senacherib. After Achaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth year of his raigne hee 472 died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda.

With Achaz liued Medusus, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned fortie yeares, 10
Ensb. in c. 10. saith Eusebius: Dionorius and Ctesias finde Anticarnus in stead of this Medusus, to have bene Sofarnus his Successour, to whom they giue fiftie yeares.

Tiglatu Pileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the raigne of Achaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Sonne may seeme to haue reigned with him some part of the time. 10
For we finde that Achaz did send vnto the Kings of Assyria to helpe him. The Geneus note saies, that these Kings of Assur were Tiglatu Pileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that hee or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglatu, and Salmanassar his Sonne, who reigned with his Father, 20 as hath bene said before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it bee hard to define.

677 At this time beganne the Ephori in Lacedaemon, a hundred and thirtie yeares after Plut. in vita Sol. Lycurgus, according to Plutarch: Eusebius makes their beginning farre later, namely in the fiftenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Eclaus was the first, Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeare, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their aduise and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consulls. In the time of Achaz died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athenes euer since the fiftith yeare of Pezias. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medon 30 title, or Gouernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Aeschylus, and was the last of these Gouernours: he ruled only two yeares. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Gouernours for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgomaster or Gouernour of their Citie for ten yeares.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke beginnes in the first yeare of the eight Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicarnassus in the first of the seuenth Olympiad: at which time indeede, Carops the first of these, beganne his ten yeares rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeare by the Syluij, of the race of Aeneas, tooke end the same Achaz time: the foundation of Rome 40 being laied by Romulus and Remus in the eight yeare of the same King. Codoman buildt it the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke he should, others somewhat later, and in the raigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Entropius, Orsius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeare of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassus, Solinus, Antiochenus, Clemens, Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeare of the seuenth: who seeme not only to mee, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best account.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahas.

§. I.

of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italia.

20

Now here to speake of the more ancient times of Italia, and what Nations possit it before the arrivall of Aeneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs: the rather because much fabulous matter hath bene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italia before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by diuers names: as first Hesperia, then Asufonia, the one name arising of the Seate, the other of the Asufones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnassus thinks to haue bene the first, that brought a Colonie of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italia of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speaks thus.

Est locus Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glebae:
Oenotrij coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie.
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Posteritie,
Tis from a Captaine name called Italia.

Who this Captaine or King may haue bene, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil speaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long vpon the whole Countrey, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrey, Reueneus hath made a very painfull search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Halicarnassus, Italicar. l. 1. who speaks of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italia, before the name of Italia was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Isittine, who saith, that Brundysium Isitt. l. 12. was a Colonie of the Aetolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temsi or Tempsa, a Citie of the Brugi in Italia: Lastly, vpon the authoritie of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabite only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued overall. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Aetolians, who (as he shewes) had one original; from them hee brings the name of Italia. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitola, saue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greek word

words is common, and the letter (o) is changed into (a): which change is found in the name of Æthalia, an Island neere Italie, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolie Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassicus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach. Hercunto appertaines that of Iulus the Apollata, who called the Greekes cousins of the Latines. Also the common originall of the Greekes and Latines from Ianus; and the Fable of Ianus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Shippe on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Ianus, father of the Greekes and Latines: who sailing over the Ionian Sea, that lyes betwene Ætolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reynecius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applies that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilst he abode in Italie with Eleetra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the sonne of Ianan, and nephew of Iapheth, the eldest sonne of Noah: which antiquitie farre exceeds the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Country, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Eleetra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie; but calleth Eleetra and her sister Mais (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus beene one person.

As for the authoritie of Berosus in this case, we neede the lesse to regard it, for that Reynecius himselfe, whose conjectures are more to be valued than the dreames wherewith Ammius hath filled Berosus, holdes it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appears by the Verses of Virgil last rehearced, wherein hee would not have said, — Nunc summa minores Italiam dixisse ducū de nomine gentem, had that name bene heard of ere Dardanus left the Country. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeares before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Hierodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italia began: and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not, that I haue read of any such Greeke as was named Italus, yet the name of Ætolus, written in Greeke Ætolus, was very famous both among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being sonne of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to deriue the name Italus from Ætolus, then Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgil's authoritie stand well with the collections of Reynecius; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latinus.

IN Italia the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it vnder their subiection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicitie of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italia, and in few ages whatsoever Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Asia, and North of Africa.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassensis, Varro, and Reynecetus (following them) thinke to haue bene Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are frained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are knowne in vaunting manner to haue alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; because indeede, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus inforced to forsake their seats so oft as other Greekes were, who dwelt without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians so vnfire a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Countrie was lesse fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of access, and they them selues (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore hauing occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselves Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might bee that the Arcadians who dwell somewhat farr from Sea, and are alwaies neede as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should haue bene Authors of new discoueries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulness of children, in which those ages abounded, inforced the superfluous companie to seeke another seate, and that some expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Euxander, into the same parts of Italia, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelagii, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lack of good records: Neither was their glorie such in Italia, as could long sustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Anfonnes, Aurunci, Rattii, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some ciuillitie, and he therefore canonized as a God.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Stereos or Stercalius, others terme him Stercorinus, and say, that hee taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because hee did latere, that is lie hidden there, when hee fled from Jupiter, is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanity to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many Gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mightie, that it should bee hard to finde one Countrie or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poetieall fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguitie of speech or some allusion, they did mainely and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage ouer a Riuer in Hell, because death is a passage to another life, and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painefull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Pain: so also because men are stonie hearted, and because the Greeke axii people, and axii stones, are neare in found, therefore they fained in the time of Dedalion stonies conuerted into men, as at other times men into stonies) in like manner it may be be, that the originall of Saturnus hiding himselfe was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisdēt of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Aeēs; whence also Esay of the true God saies, in Deus abscondite. For it can not be in vaine that the word Saturnus should also haue this very signification, if it be deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the originall of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Reynecius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who defended of Cethim, the Sonne of Ianus, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembered by Homer as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reynecius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico; in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a Citie which the Aeolians held in Asia, called Elaea, or Elaiā, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamisi, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamisi, which name last rehearsed hath a very neare sound to Cethim, Citium, or Cithim; the Greek Letter (D) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing only in the strength or weakenesse of vterance, which is found betwene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Cithim, or Kithim, the Sonne of Ianus, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Aeolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Aeolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elaeus, the Haven Elaeus, the people Elaitae, the Citie Elaeus, Elaiā, and Elaestia, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elaitini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetai and Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing vnlike, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriuing the Sabines from him) giue the name of Sabinus: in the like manner might be whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elaestia) be named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reynecius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteans, being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Auge, the Daughter of Aelus King of Arcadia, was slaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans, who (feareing what euill might befall themselves by the Greekes, if the affaires of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, where the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reynecius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memorie of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Ladie, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus: That this name of Elatus may have been taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sonnes of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countrie: and betwene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost enterchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippobonus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Again, the name Latinus, hauing a deriuatiue sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reynecius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproof, considering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which haue written the originalls of Latium.

§. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill ÆNEAS his coming.

THe Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrivall of ÆNEAS, were, Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturnus there is nothing remembered, save what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be applicable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturnus 10 of the Greekes, called by them Kronos, or some other, siled Saturnus by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have bene the same: but the names of * Stereus, and Sterculius (for it may bee this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the soile which they laied on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme 15 some other man.

Of Picus it is said that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pic, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to have growne from the skill which he had in sooth-sayings, or divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Picus, reigned after his Father. Hee 20 gaue to Evander the Arcadian (who having slaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the wast grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the sister of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians agree; shee was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie, which praife in her mult needs have bene much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being merely ineffectuall.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any child, neither doe we read of any other Wife which he had, save only that Virgii giues unto him Latinus as his Sonne, by a Nymph, called Maria.

30 But who this Maria was it is not found, save only that her abode was about the River Liris neare Manturna.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Phisyr by Cree, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetes, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reynecius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the Sonne of Hercules, whereas Reynecius makes him his Nephew, by a sonne of the same name. This Latinus hauing obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter 40 and Heire Lavinia, to Turnus the sonne of Venilius, who was sister to Amata Latinus his Wife.

But when ÆNEAS arrived in those parts with fiftene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might bee embarked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessells then vsed, about one thousand and two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troians, and moved with the great reputation of ÆNEAS, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incensed herewith, sought to auenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne death.

50 Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were shee an Italian, shee could not haue borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of ÆNEAS; vntill we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather giue the conduct of the Cetes into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who serued in the last yeare of the Troian Warre. But Reynecius holds her an Asiaticque, and thinks withall that Latinus was borne

* Sterculius often calls the idols of the heathens das Sterculia and hence it may be thought the. Euan great we read for Sterculius, or Sterculius, which is interpreted Sterculius Sterculius: and it may be that after the Saturnus became the name of an idol, vntill hee had beene in a like sense this name Sterculius should thicke vnto him. Arabic 7.

borne before Telephus came into Italia. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Helicarnassus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro, who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be deriued from the Greek name Pallis. Amata, which signifieth beloued, or deere, was the name by which the High Priest called euerie Virgin, whom hee tooke to serue as a Ninne of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easily to be thought a surname, howsoeuer Virgil discoures of her and Ventus her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrey, was established in that race: where in it continued vntill it was ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans. 19

§. IIII.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

ANEAS himselfe being of the royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Cressa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius, whose surname was Iulus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) beene surnamed Ilus. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fledde into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a sonne, called thereupon Syluius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lavinia was so cuill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vsing her as a Queene, did foster her young sonne, his halfe-brother Syluius. Yet afterwards, whether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lavinium, which Aeneas had built, and called after his new wiues name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his raigne was, according to some, eight and twentie yeares: Virgil giues him thirtie; others five and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his decease, there arose contention betwene Syluius, the sonne of Aeneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lavinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leauing the Kingdome to Syluius Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterward called Syluij.

The raigne of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans raigne, I finde thus set downe.

The

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing wortheie of remembrance,

- Latinius* founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberius some thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Allua: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tivris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Julius, and grandfather of Julius Proculus; who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder sonne of Proculus, was deposed of the Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his sonne Agephus was slaine, and Isis his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sonnes, either by her vnclie Amulius as some thinke, or by Mars, as the Poets saie; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children their vnclie commaunded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antio, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preferred, who afterward reuenged the crueltie of their vnclie, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long he reigned I finde not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift encrease of Rome, vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concerns the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to liue in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrats; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Cassius Clauilius, who in the dayes of Tullius Hostilius, King of the Romanes, making Warre vpon Rome, died in the Campe; and Metius Sufferius, the successor of Clauilius, who surrendered the Estate of Alba vnto the Romanes, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Toratis, the Champions of the Romanes, preuailed against the Curatis, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullius Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Vientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romanes to such an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deale with Tullius, who notwithstanding this falsehood obtained the victorie, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in peeces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Julij: of whome C. Iulius Caesar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assemblie of the Romanes, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and iudgement, obtained the Souerainetie of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Aeneas, and honor of the Troian and Alban Race, was so reuiued, that selde, if euer, any one Familie hath attained to a proportionable height of glorie.

p. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of ROMVLVS birth and death.

OF Rome, which deuoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the laist that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betwene Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in peeces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, hauing bene the worke of many Ages; wherof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius, Piclor, Portius, Cato, Calphurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seeke to deriue the Romans from Ianus: but Sierodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equall credit, giue the Grecians for their ancestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth booke; CAECILIUS rerum Romanorum scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romanos à Graecis esse conditam quod Romani Graeco ritu, antiquo instituto HERCVLI rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque EVANDRI venerantur Romani; CAECILIUS (saith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Grecians, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by ancient Ordinance, doe sacrifice to HERCVLES; the Romanes also worship the mother of EVANDER.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembers many founders of that Citie: as Romanus the sonne of Pylles and Circus; Romus the sonne of Emathion, whome Dionedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Trojans out of that Country, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, saying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraclides giues the denomination to a captiue Ladie, brought thither by the Grecians: others say, That it was anciently called Febria, after the name of Febra, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Enie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whome and his 30 consorts Iuuenal to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verbes:

Maorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum, Aut pastor suis, aut illud quod dicere nolo.*

Yet though thou fetch thy pedigree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ile forbear.
meaning either a Shepheard, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That hee had Rhea for his mother, and Mars was supposed to be his father; that he was nursed by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Fausfala, a Shepheards wife. The same vnnatural nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like y enough that Amulius came couered with armor to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to me that he might haue two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other to satishie his appetite, because shee 50 was faire and goodly. For these being made a Nunne of the Goddess Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also fiade in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Mercurus, King of the Franes, was begotten by a monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them beleene it that list; Il le croira qui vaudra: 40

also of Alexander, and of Septim African, there are poeticall inventions: but to answer these imaginations in general, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Icolatrie, and when there were as many Gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues, then did many women greatly borne, cover such lumps as they made, by preteling to be forced by more then humane power: so did Cenone confesse to Pais, that shee had bene ransomed by Apollo. And Ancises boasted that hee had knowne Venus. But Alex was made with child by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the God of battell, according to the sense of the time. Cenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meroë might fancie a Sea Captaine to bee gotten with yong by such a one: as the Daughter of Isachus fancied, according to Livius. Aeneas was a ballard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beaurtie Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurit by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtelians in those daies were called Wolfes, que uinc (saith Halicarnassensis) hanc uirum uocabulo amica appellatur; Which are now by an honeste name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his Father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Aeneas vanished away by the Ruer Nimæus: but thereof Luce also speaketh modestly, for hee heareseth the other opinion, that the storme was the iurie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree that there was an unnatural darkenell, both at his birth and at his death, and that he might bee slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperour Augustus was slaine with lightning, so was Syrabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Cornis the Emperour (who succeeded Prebus) whilest hee lodged with his Armie vpon the Ruer Tigris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that beganne him; for he was begotten by a man of Warre, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinus Superbus: who was but the seventh King after him: who when he had murdered his father in law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (saith he) Romulus himselfe dyed and was not buried. But let Halicarnassensis end this dispute: whose words are these. They (saith he) who desire necessity to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens, and that his crueltie in punishments of offenders, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported that both when his mother was ransomed, whether by some man, or by a God, the whole body of the same was calysed, and all the earth covered with darkness like vnto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth containe (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles which had soone bene forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built vpon that foundation, had not given it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of trauell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the use of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition hee knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect reuenge of the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned seven and thirtie yeares: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death single, till he was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time the Soueraignetie fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him vknowne, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For hauing long bene sole Gouvernesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was cruell by forraigne enemies, and the Latines dispoiled of Imperiall power, these fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driuen from luxurie to defensible armes, and therein having bene vnfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Croisers staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the storie of the times of King Abaz, during whose raigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laied.

Of EZEKIA, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of EZECHIAS, and of the agreeing of P T O L O M I E S, N A B O N A S S A R, N A B O P O L A S S A R, and M A R D O C E N A D A V S, with the Historie of the Bible.

S the first year of Abaz his raigne was confounded with the last of his Father Iotham, so was the later end of his sixteene yeares taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his Sonne. This appears by the raigne of Hosea, ouer Israel, which beganne in the twelfth of Abaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Abaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekias; so it followes, that Ezekias beganne to raigne in his Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Abaz, was almost spent when Ezekias beganne, and so the fifteenth year of Abaz may haue bene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekias.

By supposing that Hosea beganne his Kingdome, when the twelfth year of Abaz was almost compleat, some would finde the meanes how to disioyne the first of Ezekias from the fifteenth of Abaz, placing him yett one year later, of which year, Abaz may perhaps haue liued not many daies. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth yeares of Ezekias, may not be removed out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the first year.

^{2. Kingz 8. 13.} In the foureteenth of EZEKIA, SENACHERIB inuading Juda, and the Countries adjoining, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroke from heauen, fled home, and was slaine. The year following it was that God added fifteene yeares to the life of Ezekias, when he had alreadie reigned fouretee of his nine and twentie; and the same year was that miracle scene of the Sunnes going back; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered vnto the twentie fifth of April, in the Italian year, being then Thursday. I haue not scene any workes of Scultet; but surely to finde a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessarie that he produce some record of obseruation made at such a time. Howfoener it be, the fifteenth year of Ezekias is agreed vpon; and therefore wee may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is vsual in the like cases, that Abaz slept with his Fathers, and EZEKIA his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekias reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Iehosaphat.

Sabbat, and succession of Icheram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to raigne whilst his Father lived, we have already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning testified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so that his vnfortunate and vngriuous Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sonnes proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first year and first moneth of his raigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be understood as the beginning of his sole gouernement; we plainly finde it to haue bene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Achaz had shut vp, cleansed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idolls, restored the Priests to their offices, and elcates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bene for many years neglected, and brake downe the brasen Serpent which had bene for many years neglected, and brake downe the brasen Serpent which signifieth a lump of brass. He did also celebrate the Pasche-ouer with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Israellites of the ten Tribes. Many there were, euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierusalem, to this feast: but the general multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekias to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekias his raigne, Salmanssar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochaz, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with Soe King of Egypt, against him: inuaded Israel, besieged Samaris, and in the third year (after the Inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affyr and Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Abnitue, in whose Seats and Places the Affyrans sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israellites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Spernans, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Treatise of the holy Land.

The later Affyr Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom we finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of Historie. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul & Salmanssar, with other Affyr and Chaldean Kings, diuersitie of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanssar, King of Affyr, who raigned in the time of Achaz, and Ezekias, Kings of Iuda, and of Hosea King of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolome makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he liued; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanssar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that hee was the same, whom Ptolome calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholernus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of sundrie good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares that betweene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seuen hundred fortie and sixe yeares: at which distance of time the raigne of Salmanssar was. One great proofe hercof is this, which the same Bucholernus allegeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prunick Tables. Mar decompadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolome, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Ezekias, King of Iuda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, betweene Merodach and Salmanssar, we shall finde it the same which is betweene Mar decompadus and Nabonassar.

nassar. Like wise Fanclim doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaris, to the denatation of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirte and three years: the selfe same distance of time is found in Ptolomie, betwene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolomie seemes to differ from this accompt, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortie years, than the destruction of Jerusalem, we care to vnderstand that he tooke Samaris in the eighth year of his raigne; so that the seuen foregoing years added to these one hundred thirte and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomie. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twentie and seuen yeares. Now if we add to these one hundred twentie seuen, the thirteene ensuing of Nebuchadnezzars yeares, before the Citie and Temple were destroyed, we haue the summe of one hundred and fortie yeares. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Ptolomie placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twentie and two yeares, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in accompt of times I hold more sure than the authoritie of any Historie; and therefore I thinke it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall obseruations doe so thoroughly concurre.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proued Baladan the Father of Merodach, to haue bene this Nabonassar, I will not spare to loose a word or two in giuing the Reader satisfiacion herein. It is true, that the next obseruations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomie recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the raigne of Mardocephadus; the second yeare of whose raigne, is, according to Ptolomie concurrent in part with the twentie seuen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second yeare of Mardocephadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twentie seuen yeares, seuentene daies, and eleuen houres: the accompt from Nabonassar, beginning at high noone the first day of the Egyptian month Thot, than answering to the twentie sixt of February; and this Eclipse being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betwene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocephadus, is noted by Ptolomie, according to the Egyptian yeares. But how doest this proue, that Mardocephadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successor, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleue Mardocephadus to haue bene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countrey-man Lidgate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornicus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar: I haue taken the paines to search, as farre as my leifure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet can not I finde in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduers to Scaliger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this business) any sentence more nearely prouing the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehersed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the as neare succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue bene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. T his considered, we may safely goe on with our accompt from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmansassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be druen from our booke, when they finde something in it, agreeing with Annals, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon, and Affrica, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are assigned to Belshazzar, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good Historie naming any others, that reigned there in those ages, and all Astronomical observations, fitly concurring, with the yeares that are attributed to these, or numbered from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and delinrance of Iudaea from SENNACHERIB.

10

Hen Salmansar was dead, and his sonne Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeare of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on at such time as Tiglath, the Grandfather of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmansar, invited by Ahas, invaded Rezen King of Damscur, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Israell had vnderaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, having (as it seemes) a purpose to invade Egypt, sent one part of his Armie to lie before Ierusalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of silver, and thirtie talents of gold: wherewith he presented Sennacherib, now let downe before Lachis in Iudaea, yet vnder the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of Iudaea to deliuer hostages, the Affirian environed Ierusalem with a grosse Armie, and hauing his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Ezechias directed his three greatest Counsellors, to parlie with Rabsaces, ouer the Wall; and to receiue his demands: who vsed three principall arguments to perswade the people to yeeld themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretarie, sent by Ezechias, desired Rabsaces to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Ierib, yet hee with a more loud voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, hee made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, bee enforced to eate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Iudaeans hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken slaide, on which whoeuer leaneeth pierceth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the Gods who should helpe them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brazen Serpent, which had beene preferred euer since Ayses time:

and withall hee had them remember the Gods of other Nations: whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, hee perswaded them by no meanes to relye on him; for he would deceiue them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while when he had vnderstood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, he himselfe left the Affirian forces in charge to others, and fought Sennacherib at Lachis in Iudaea, either to informe him of their resolution in Ierusalem, or to confere with him concerning the Armie of Terhac the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly aduised, and partly threatened to submit himselfe: vnto the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias sending those Counsellors to the Prophet Ezay, which had lately bene sent to Rabsaces, receiued from him comfort, and assurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not preuaile; against whom the King also besought aide from almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confelting this part thereof to be true. That the King of Assyria had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their Gods, for they were no Gods, but the work of mans hands, euen wood and stone, &c.

The reason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possess himselfe in haile of Ierusalem, was that he might therinto haue retrained his Armie, which was departed, as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for feare of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and S. Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might iustly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petra adjoyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Setnon King of Egypt, to be Vulcan Priest, and reporteth that the reason of Sennacheribs returne from Pelusium in Egypt, which heall besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their weapons of that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Terhaca, remembered by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more vrgent.

Ios. Cant. 1. to 6. 17

Met. Euseb. 1. 4.

S. Hierome vpon the seuen and thirtie of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his wordes do, reports Sennacherib retreat in these words. Pugnasse autem Sennacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Aegyptios, & obsidisse Pelusium, tamq. extructis aggeribus, vrbis capienda, venisse TARACHAM Regem Aethiopiæ in auxilium, & vna nocte iuxta Ierusalem centum octoginta quinq. milia exercitus Assyriæ pestilentia corruisse narrat HERODOTVS: & plenissime Berosus Chaldaicus scriptor Historie, quorum fides de proprijs libris petenda est; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians sought against the Egyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Citie, TARACHAS King of the Aethiopsians came to helpe them, and that in one night neare Ierusalem one hundred eightie thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence, of these things (saith Hierome) * HERODOTVS reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Chaldean storie, whose credit is to be taken from their owne bookes.

* To wit in part, for Hierodotus mentioneth nothing, neither of Terhaca, nor of Ierusalem, nor of the Armie there. 2 Kings 19. 6.

Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner. Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noise, a whirle-winde and a tempest, and a flame of denouncing fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authoritie (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, SENNACHERIBVS autem ab Aegyptiaco bello reuertens, offendit ibi exercitum, quem sub RABASACIS Imperio reliquerat peste diuinitus immissa deletum, primâ nocte postea quam Vrhem oppugnare ceperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis, centum octoginta quinq. milibus Militum, qua clade territus, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam qua NINVS dicitur. Vbi paulo post per insidias Seniorum, & filijs suis, ADRA MELECHI, & SELENNARI, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur ARASACI, quem praecipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ab patricidam à popularibus pulsus & in Armeniam fugientibus, ASARACOLDAS minor filius in Regnum successit; SENNACHERIB (saith Berosus) returning from the Egyptian Warre, found here his Armie, which he had left vnder the command of RABASACS, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begonne to assault the Towne: one hundred fower score and five thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftaines and Coronells. With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, ADRA MELECH and SELENNAR or SHAREZER, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to ARASACS, or NESLECH: whom he especially worshipped. These his sonnes being for their parricide chased away by the people: and flying into Armenia, ASARACOLDAS his younger Sonne succeeded

What this Nesroch was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certaine, that Venus Praxia was worshipped by the Affryans; and so was Iupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrtillus witness. Many fancies there are, what caufe his sonne he had to murder him; but the most likly is, that he had formerly disinherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, That it was fiftie five dayes after Senacheribs returne, ere he was murdered by his sonnes; during which time he flew great numbers of the Israelites in Nimue, till the most iust God turned the Sword against his owne breast.

§. III.

Of EZEKIAS his sickness and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

20 fter this marvellous deliuerie, Ezekias sickened, and was told by Isaiah, that he must die: but after he had besought God with teares for his deliuerie, Isaiah as he was going from him returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recouerie after three dayes, and a prolongation of his life for fiftene yeares. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrarie way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Hierome), was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Botch of Soare.

30 This wonder when the Wise men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure hee had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who tolde him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatsoever thy fathers haue layed up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel, nothing shall be left, sayth the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezekias should haue got any treasure worth the wing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeare before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with aduantage, and made Ezekias richer vpon the suddaine then euer he had bene: which vnexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezekias had reit, and spending without noyfe that addition which God had made vnto his life, he died, hauing reigned nine and twentie yeares. One onely offense hee made, which was against the Philistines with good successe. Among his other acts (shortly remembered in Ezechiasium) hee deified to bring water to Ierusalem.

50 In two respects they say that hee offended God: the one, that hee rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemies; the other, that hee so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to liue them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recouerie of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, vsurped that State him selfe, in the last yeare of that King, and held it by strong hand against his sonne Assarhaddon; who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength, by

by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Meroдах espied, and remembering, that their anccellor Phul Belochus had set his owne matter Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunetic which this Kings weakenesse did offer, as it had bene for Belochus to make vse of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himselfe beloued of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The assertion of this historie is made by the same arguments that were vsed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearse. So of this new Race, which cut asunder the Line of Ninus, there were onely five Kings.

But forasmuch as the last yeare of Salmansassar was also the first of Senacherib his sonne, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue bene an hundred and one yeares; of which, the last five and twentie were spent with Ezekia, vnder Salmansassar, Senacherib, and Affarhaddon.

Other contemporaries of EZEKIA: of CANDAVLES, GYGES, and the Kings descended from HERCVLES.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medius, and after him Cardiceus, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that varietie of names, by which these Kings were called in severall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeed they were; or whether the sonnes reigning with the fathers, haue caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctesias and Annius his Metastibenes, haue bene faultie, as neither of these two Authors is ouer-highly commended of true iudicall: so it is, that the names, number, and length of raigne, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that followed Arbaces: Therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medius and Cardiceus, as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I dare vndertake. I will onely here set downe the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, according to as sundrie Authors haue deliuered it.

Menestor hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seemes to be an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded vpon Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Eusebius, who liued in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medius and Cardiceus, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceus were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde vnto these, Cyaxares the sonne of Astyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Hierodotus, in setting downe the length of a Kings reigne, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeares of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure first that were chosen Governours of Athen for ten yeares; that is, of Charops, Arimenes, Elidius, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, save that Rome was built in his first yeare; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third I finde only the names. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of justice, or rather of crueltie, that hee shewed vpon his owne Daughter. For hee finding that shee had offended in vnchastitie, cauled her to be lockt vp with an Horse, giuing to neither of them any foode: for the Horse, constrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that Citie Romulus, did reigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

This

Expressed in the margin

This Region was first called Meonia. Lydus the sonne of Atyr reigning in it, gaue the name of Lydia, if we beleue such authoritic as we finde. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argem, who came of Alcaeus the sonne of Hercules by Jordana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclidae continued reigning fiftie five yeares (in which two and twentie Generations passed) the sonne continually succeeding the father. Candaules the sonne of Atyr was the last of this race, who doated so much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that hee could not bee content to enjoy her, but would needes enforce one Gyges, the sonne of Dasyllus, to behold her naked bodie; and placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queene perceiued Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, tooke it in such high disdain, that shee forced him the next day to requite the Kings follie with treason. So Gyges, being brought againe into the same chamber by the Queene, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirtie eight yeares, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one yeare before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his sonne Arytus reigned nine and fortie yeares; then Salyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fiftie seuen; and finally Crasus, the sonne of Halyattes, fourteene yeares: who lost the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crasus his Progenitor dispossest are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned severall Countries very long, as in Asia, the Mysians; in Greece, the Lacedaemonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argines; and from the Argines, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusanes: besides many great and famous, though private,

Families.

But of the Heraclidae that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my selfe to take notice in the times of their severall reignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the follie of this last King Candaules.

CHAP.

of the Kings of Egypt

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliuerance of ISRAEL from thence, and the raigne of EZEKIA in Iuda, when Egypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

§. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged only to Viceroyes. An example prouing this out of WILLIAM of Tyre his Historie of the holy Warre.

THE emulation and quarrells arising in these times, betweene the mightie Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorabile things in Egypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Maritime. Of Cham, the sonne of Noah, who first planted that Countrey, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, vntill the Israellites were thence deliuered, more hath bene said already than 30 I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to saile in such conjectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, mult here againe helpe me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Saldanes in later ages. Therefore, I will not only forbear to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Egyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances, prouing them to haue bene Kings in deede, being not recorded.

40 But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imagiuarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, wee ought not to beleue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was removed only fortie two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire: there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, haue reigned longer than fortie yeares. It follows that we should square the number of the Egyptian

50 Kings, in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names wee finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy Warre, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade him selfe, that it is not hard to find names enough, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroies. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elhadeth the Caliph ruled in Aegypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtle man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chaling away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan minitred matter of quarrell to Amarricke King of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an invasion, which Amarricke made vpon Aegypt. Hereupon hee grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if hee could get any forces wherewith to enter Aegypt. Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Armie of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: for in few dayes after, he was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recouer his Dignitie: which to establish he slew all the Kingdome and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Caire.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadeth gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilest hee might haue the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) doe nearly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turkes, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Aegypt, will not now be intreated there to leaue him, and quietly goe their way home. They seize vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they tortiue, and there attend the arriuall of more Companie from Damasco, for the conquest of all Aegypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and finds himselfe not strong enough to expell them, much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Amarricke of Ierusalem, whom with large promises, hee gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadeth particularly, in his owne Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes, that had bene in Aegypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Aegypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet, that false Prophet, the Soueraigntie ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weaknesse of the Aegyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Aegypt, with the Westerne parts, vnder the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Easterne Prouinces are vpin Armes; and Syracon, with a mightie power, descendeth into Aegypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Amarricke, that with all his forces hee hasteth into Aegypt: well knowing how nearly it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keepe the Saracens from joyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behooued him: for by their admirable valour, he finally draue the enemies out of the Countrey. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue bene King in title only, who medled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessitities required; makes large offers to King Amarricke, vpon condition, that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Penition) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receiue out of Aegypt, for this behouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much foucer he tooke vpon him) was subject to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Cesarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadeth, to ratifie the covenants. Now shall wee see the greatness of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Caire; where arriuing at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopiens, which, with all diligence, did reuerence vnto the Soldan, as he passed along. Through these straightes the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the grauitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with embossed works, curious paiements, fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, vnknowne in these parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then were vndiscovered. The further they went the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueighed them into other Courts within these; as farre excelling the former, as the former did surpass ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of meruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally, they were brought into the Caliph's owne lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entering the Presence, the Soldan, hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he ware about his neck, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtaine, behind which the Caliph sat. Presently the traueiser, wrought with gold and pearles, was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discouered, sitting with great Majestic on a throne of gold, hauing very few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almaricke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly performe all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargaine; which the Egyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach our his hand. When the Earle of Cesarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect. Sir, Truth seekes no holes to hide it selfe; Princes, that will hold covenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargaines with your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yeeld so farre. But, when it would none other wise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Seruants) hee vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaohs, and his Viceroy; we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himselfe with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vsing all Royal power, making warre and peace, entertaining, and expelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributarie to a forraigne Prince. What greater authoritie was giuen to Ioseph, when Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings Throne will I be about thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approoue the conjecture of mine Author, where hee thinks, that the Egyptians, ever since

In Septis time, haue felt the burthen of that seruitude, which he brought vpon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his judgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Aegyptian Kings, in taking their care, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that euen the Ptolemies (excepting Ptolomaeus Lagi, and his sonne Phaladelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were giuen, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrey afforded, were indeede sufficient, to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Aegyptians held their Princes, gaue them securitie, whereby they might the better truit their Officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroies governing Aegypt, is let downe by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who liued in the same ages was, in few years after, Chancellor of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Cesarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that wee bee not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleuee that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Aegyptians, haue honored with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as wee finde by circumstance, likely to haue raigned in that Countrey; after 20 whom it follows that we should make enquire.

§. II.

Of ACHERRES; whether he were VCHOREVS that was the eighth from OSIMANDYAS. Of OSIMANDYAS and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope 30 to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree. In this case Annius would doe good seruice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to bee beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly bee suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented, with the pleasur that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farre out of sight; as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Aegypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not bene silent, and that Reinec- 40 eius hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Aegypt, vnto the raigne of Thooris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greekes call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Aegyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and giue to euery one the same length of raigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenches, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seemes to Reinecius to bee the same whom Diodorus calls Vchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osimandyas, from whom Vchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaeus (as Reinecius conjectures) was the great Osimandyas; or else that this Acherres was Vchoreus: for the distance betweene them was more than eight generations. Mercator judgeth Osimandyas to haue bene the husband of Acherres, Orus the second his Daughter; thinking that Manetho (cited (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wifes, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wifes right. As for Vchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Vchoreus, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Armie, with the siege of a Towne, the captiuitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians laid to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King; which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue beene erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Egypt, and to their Viceroies; which yet they were not so ambitious, as euery one to haue his owne particular monument, situing therein to exceede all others. This appears by the many Statuaes, thete in placed, by the Waetes, the iudgement Seate, the receiuing of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the accompt of Reuenues, and plentie of all Cattaille and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the 20 severall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription, I am O SYMANDYAS King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceede some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those wordes, Or where I lie, it should seeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose bodie was prefixed among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royall Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plentie of Cattaille, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dreame, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his encrease of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassars are called, that is, Great about the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, betweene the times of Ioseph and Acherres, (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne conjecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to infetrey any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchoreus. For it might well bee, that Memphis was built by some chiefe King as was Gehoor, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Elcain, who hauing to his Masters 40 vlc, conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not faire from old Memphis, the great Citie of Caro (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Calira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though hee himselfe were a Dalmatian Slaue.

ϕ. III.

of CHERES, ARMEUS, RAMESESSES, and AMENOPHIS. Of MYRIS, and the Lake that beares his name.

When Acherres had reigned eight yeares, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fifteene yeares: then reigned Armeus five yeares, and after him *Ramesse*s, threescore and eight. Of Armeus and *Ramesse*s is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Aegyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Aegypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had sixtie Daughters, whom vpon seeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his Brothers sixtie Sonnes, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the first night; that only Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did saue her husband Lyncus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie sisters, when they died, were enioyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessell with water.

The raigne of Danaus in Argos was indeede in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and *Ramesse*s, Aegyptus; is more then Reineccus beleues: hee rather takes Armeus to haue bene Myris, or Meris, who cauled the great Lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can easily beleue, that he which fled out of Aegypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanaar, of whom wee spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short a raigne, as five yeates, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his Wiues being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose raignes we haue no assurance, I may truly say, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharash; seeing that greater deedes, or more absolute, then were those of Ioseph, who bought all the people of Aegypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gehar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanaar, who made the Countrie Tributarie, were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set downe the length of their raignes, whom we finde to haue followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compass, and sixtie fiddomes deepe. It serued to recue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow; being too great, was harmefull to the Countrey, and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this Lake, for the letting in or out of watets, were spent sixtie talents, but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet ointments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middle of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchets of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramid, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) sixtie paces high; hauing on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet is it very great. The yeates of Armeus arc by Manethon diuided, by inserting one Armeus (whom Eusebius omits) that should haue reigned one yeare and odd months of the time; but I hold not this difference worthe of examination.

After *Ramesse*s, his sonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeares. Some giue him only nineteene yeares; and Mercator thinks him to haue bene the King

King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue already spoken in the first Booke.

§. IIII.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynastie of the Lartbes.

- 10 SETHOSIS, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, sixtie five years. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesoftris. But the state of the World was not such in these times, that so great an expedition, as the old Sesoftris made, could haue beene either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now beene performed, as any man will perceiue if hee looke vpon my Chronological Table, and consider who liued with this Zethus. With this King beganne the Dynastie of the Lartbes; which Reineccius conjectures to haue had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Ecturia, were called Lartes, (the Ecturians being issued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Aegypt) and to haue signified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which these Kings were Generalls, 20 I take to haue beene against the Aethiopians: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Countrey of Palestina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they traualled ouer the desert sands, on the other hand; to seeke matter of conquest, in the poore Countries of Africa. But these Generalls (if the Lartbes were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the first; in such sort as the Roman Emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most vsutable conditions of Helioabahalus, made his Successors forbear the name.

- Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appeares by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the gouernment themselves; and that therefore I am deceiued in ascribing so much vnto the Vicerioes. 30 But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Lartbes, depends only vpon conjecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Vicerioes, might be great enough, though some few Kings tooke the conduct of Armes into their owne hands. For so we finde in Iohn Lee, that the Soldan of Aegypt (after such time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraigntie to himselfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, stiled Eddagnadare, who had authoritie to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good spend of the Soldans Treasure. So might the Office of the Vicerioes continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it stills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrey, as those of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many thinke, that the seuenteenth Dynastie was called of the Sheep-herds, because Ioseph gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Lartbes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Lartbes or Generalls, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vapines, and Sesae, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs 50 now returne to the businesse which we left.

Ramses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, three score and sixe years. He is mistaken for that second Sesoftris, of whom I haue spoken in the first Booke. I finde nothing worth rehearfall of this Ramses, or of Amenophis, and Annemeses, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortie, the later sixe and twentie years.

yeares. Wherefore it may well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thooris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seuen yeares; yet is hee thought to have bene that Proteus, of whom Hierodotus hath mention, saying, That he tooke Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I neede say no more in refutation of this, then that the time of Thooris his raigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helena to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greeke Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder-Officers: for such only are like to haue had their residence about Pharos, and the Sea coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helena, it is said, That he could foretell things to come, and that hee could change himselfe into all shapcs: whereby is signified his craftie head, for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea God, and keeper of Neptunes Seale-fishes, for belike he was some vnder-Officer to the Admirall, hauing charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Hierodotus, who calls him Ramsinusus, and tells a long tale, fit to please children, of his couctousnesse, and how his treasure-houise was robbed by a cunning Thiefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleuee what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor thinke that either hee, or his Father, did raigne at all.

¶ V.

Of Egyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to CEDREVS. Of VAPHRIS and SESAC.

Any other names of Egyptian Kings, are found scattered here and there; as Tenepher Jobis, of whom Suidas deliuiers only the bare name and titles; Senemares, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobium, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Philition that liued vnder him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great iustice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iceland; and that he consulted with the Deuil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had bene, or after him should be so mightie as himselfe. The answer or confession of the Deuil was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plestitis worke, Of the trueneesse of Christian Religion. The Greeke Verbes are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First GOD, and next THE WORD, and then THE SPRITE,
Which three be ONE, and joyne in ONE all three:
Whose force is endless. Get thee hence fraile wight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hercof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, and that clause, of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seemes

in both sayd

Suidas made about two hundred yeares agoe, which is almost two hundred yeares before Cedrenus.
I find in Suidas more of the same inuocation, and also the clause, of his giuing name to the Iland.
I find in Suidas more of the same inuocation, and also the clause, of his giuing name to the Iland.

to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of raigne. Indeede the very name of that Booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breede suspicion of some impollure: but the Friery fluffe that hee alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparrant, that he was a man both deuout, and of good iudgement, in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Aegyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the censure to others.

The first King of Aegypt that he sets downe is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him hee findes many of a new race, deriuing their pedegree thus: Nimrod, the sonne of Chus, was also called Orion; and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturnus, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three sonnés; Picus, surnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chaling his father out of Affyria into Italie, raigned in his head thirtie yeares, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Iuno, his siter and wife, and to Be'us his sonne: after which Belus, who raigned onely two yeares, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visite his olde father Saturne; Saturne forthwith resigned the Kingdome to him. Picus Iupiter raigned in Italie threescore and two yeares, had threescore and tenne Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete. The principall of Iupiters sonnnes were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee raigned in Italie, after his father, five and thirtie yeares: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Aegypt, with abundance of Treasurie; where, after the death of Mizraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeares. After Mercurie, Vulcan raigned in Aegypt foure yeares and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, raigned twentie yeares and a halfe. There followed in order Sosis, Ofris, Orus, and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their feuerall raignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesoftris King twentie yeares. His successor was Pharao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of 30 Pharao, to a very long posteritie. These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are said to haue raigned in Aegypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, then of negligence, in omitting such as might haue bene added.

Paphos, the father in law to Salomon, and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Paphos is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrianus and Ensebius for it. These giue vs not the length of his raigne; but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, tooke Gaza from the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his sonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wives and Concubines, besides this Aegyptian Princeesse. In the life of Rehoboam all hath bene written that I finde of Sesac, excepting the length of his raigne, which must haue bene fixe and twentie yeares, if he were that Smendis with whom Ensebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that wee knew the length of Sesac his raigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, vpon which the rest haue dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeare of Iehoaikim, King of Iuda, in which Pharao Neco was slaine, I reckon vpwards the yeares of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesac: by which account, the first yeare of Sesac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons raigne, and the twentic sixt of Sesac with the sixt of Rehoboam: wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, then Iou the Israélite and Craffus the Romme did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill vp the time between Sesac and Neco, I have rather taken thofe Kings that I finde in the Greece Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of these that are deliuered by Eusebius, we finde no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, saue onely of Bochoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Platare, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to haue bene a King. Hercunto I may adde, that the succellion is often interrupted in Eusebius by Aethiopsians, which got the Kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esey, that the Councillors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, in somuch, that they said of Pharaoh, I am the Sonne of the Wise, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which overthrowes the reckoning of Eusebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the raignes of Iosias and Xecoo meet by his computation, yet this indeede marres all; the raigne of Iosias being misplaced. This error grows from his omitting, to compare the raignes of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Ioram, King of Israel, is made to raigne three yeares after Ahazias of Juda; Samaris is taken by Sabmanassar before Hzekias was King: and in a word, all or most of the Kings, haue their beginnings placed in some other yeare of their collateralls than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI.

OF CHEMMIS, CHEOPS, CEPHRENES, and other Kings created by HERODOTUS and DIODORUS SICVLVS, which raigned betweene the times of REHO-BOAM and EZEKIA.

Following therefore the Greece Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. Hee raigned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accomped one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome upward, narrower and narrower to the toppe. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seuen akers euery way, and was about six akers high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any iniurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the raigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore liued, are indeede a thousand yeares; which giues the better likelihood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers tell us, that they haue scene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and ending rather to the opinion, that his sonne Chabreus succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might bee Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to haue bene brethren; but the length of their raignes may argue the later to haue bene sonne to the former: for Cheops raigned fiftie yeares, Cephrenes fiftie sixe. These were, as Chemmis had bene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who alreadie had ouer-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes, for those that raised them;

X but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have cut out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Herdman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entitling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the calling out of their bodies: otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might bee, that they, who had not power to auoide the like flauerie, laid vpon them by the yonger brother, or sonne, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting monie, did prostitute her, and that shee, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one 10 stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the middle of the other three. Belike shee was an insolent Ladie, and made them follow their drudgerie, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Mycerinus, the sonne of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father sixe yeares. He would haue built as his foregoers did, but preuented by death, finished not what hee had begunne. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatened him with a short life of sixe yeares only, because of this his deuotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should haue bene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeares, which thy Predecessors 20 knew, and performed for their parts, but thou hast releasedit, there are still thou liue but sixe yeares. It is very strange, that the Gods should bee offended with a King, for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrie impious, when the people were desirous to serue them; or that they hauing so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter delictiue, and make the ordinance of the Gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian Gods. The true God was, doubtlesse, more offended with the restitution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Cheonnis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeare of his Father Sesac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanitie of his Egyptian superstition? Sure it is that his raigne, and the raignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of 30 Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both daies and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into daies, and so doubled the time appointed: a seruice more pleasing to the Deuill, than the restitution of Idolatrie durit then seeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Reinecius fiftie yeares assigned to this King; which I verily beleue to haue bene some error of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other such oversights: for I know no Author that giues him so many yeares, and Reinecius himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next vnto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loued iustice; and may be taken for that Banchyrus, whom Suidas commends in that kinde; Ensebius reckons foure and fortie yeares of his raigne.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Aethiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Apychus; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Apychus made a 40 Pyramis of brick, more costly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Apychus, Herodotus placeth one Amyctis, a blinde man, before the Aethiopian. The raignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betwene Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but sixe yeares; and so long doth Fanfrus, so long doth Reinecius hold, that these two Kings, betwene them both, did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable; bable, that the raignes of two Kings should have beene so soone spent; he may doe it by taking some yeares from Setbon or Psammeticus; and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would beene a manifest inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his raigne, mult have beene in the first of REHOBAM; as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Iehoiakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeares only to these two Kings, than to loofe the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speake of Senacherib warre: at which time Setbon was King of Aegypt. I will not therefore adde yeares vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yeares, wee shall thrust the beginning of Setbon out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Aegyptian Kings. Otherwile it were a matter of no great enuie, to leaue both Ajehib and Amyss out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet fixe yeares further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall be required of Psammeticus his raigne) to the yeares of Rehobam.

Of Sabacus the Aethiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Amyss, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fixe yeares. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their seruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vse than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonaras calls this King Sua, the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israell, made a League with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Aegyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preferre the Israellite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroching power of the Ashyrian, grew terrible to Aegypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, hauing eaten so farre into Syria, in the raigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his raigne beganne in the fourth of Menehem) that Phul himselfe did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that Senacherib his Embassador compared the Aegyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such indeede had Hosea found it, and such Ezekia might haue found it; had hee not beene supported by the stronger staffe of Him, that rules all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeares by the words of Rahabe, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Aegyptian forces, for Charrets and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoeuer it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Aegypt it selfe, which So left vnto Setbon his Successor, hauing now fulfilled the fixe yeares of his raigne. Herodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Aegyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Countrey, and willingly retired into Aethiopia, because it was often signified vnto him in his dreames, by the God which was worshipped at Thebes, that his raigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse he slew all the Priests in Aegypt; which rather than to doe, he resigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Aegyptian Gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their Seruants, and invited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Aegyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as Gods, when their chiefe Gods had the propertie of Dogs, which loue their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should haue sained this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuise, of the fearefull old man, who seeing his Realme in danger of an inuasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himselfe into Aethiopia, where he had beene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Aethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Senacherib, when hee meant meant to invade Egypt, within two or three yeares after? But I will not trouble my selfe with such enquire. This I hold, that Seu, or Sabacus, was not indeede an Aethiopian (for in his time liued the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs house) but only so furnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdome from Assis, who was his opposite. The quiet and milde forme of his Governement; his holding the Kingdome so long without an Armie; and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally he betooke to a priuate life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leaue him, and speake of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his hauing bene King.

§. VII.

Of SETHON who raigned with EZEKIA, and sided with him against SENACHERIB.

20 THe first yeare of Sethons raigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fift of Senacherib. It was a troublefome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Assyria and Egypt, being then engaged in a Warre, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serue. The Assyrian had the better men of warre; the Egyptian, better prouision of necessaries: the Assyrian, more Subjects; the Egyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Assur, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so neare and mightie a Neighbour, before the seruice of a terrible, yet farre removed King. But herein was great difference, betwene Ezekia and his Subjects, For the good King, fixing his special confidence in God, held that course of policie, which hee thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrey: the multitude of Judaes, looking into the faire hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not neede to feare any more of those injuries, which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetfull of God, taking counsaile but not of him.

The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giuing the people of Juda to vnderstand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their horses flesh, and not Spirit; that God himselfe should defend Israel vpon repentance, and that 40 As serpents should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (saide the Prophet) they are vanitie, and they shall helpe in vanitie, their strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to pass. For in the treatie of Confederacie that was held at Zaan, all manner of contentment and assurance was giuen to the Iewes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horfes and Charrts, that they did not looke (as Esay saith) vnto the holy one of Israel, nor seeke vnto the Lord. But he yet is wisest.

After a while came Senacherib with his Armie, and wakened them out of these dreames; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neare as hee was, did seeme faire off, being vnreadie, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that hee purposed, rather to make Palestina than Egypt the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Iewes, weakening one another, should yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet hee fought with moerie; for he sent Horfes and Camells laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay 30. 6. Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures mismanaged, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca;) all the strong Cities of Inda were taken by Senacherib, except Libna; Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in sore distress, till the sword of God; and not of Man, defeated the Affirian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninive, where he was slaine.

Esay 31. 9.

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it; That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and the Countrey: that Sethon being Vulcans Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his God, who by dreame promised to send him helpers: that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelusium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Campe of Senacherib by night, did so know the bowes, quiuers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription. Let him, that beholds me, serue God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priells, wherein how farre they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their owne King, it may easily be perceived. It seemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Iewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof euery child could haue told, how much falsehood had beene mingled with the truth.

We finde this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Senacherib King of the Syrians, and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians or peradventure some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Egypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he tooke his God now in so good a moode. For within three or foure years before this, all the Priests in Egypt should haue beene slaine, if a mercifull King had not spared their liues, as it were halfe against the Gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might stirre vp the Egyptians to pietie, seeing that their deuotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Senacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by means which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeede a very good motiue to pietie. But the embleame, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable, the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon, finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his Gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most deuotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like neede: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Iewes (euen such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue beene ashamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Charretts of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horse-men, because they were very strong; had it bene told them, that Sethon, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charretts, was beseeching Vulcan, to send him and them good luck, or else (for these also were Egyptian Gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. How fouer it was, doubtlesse lesse the prophetic of Ezay tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor shall, nor doe them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the illue of humane wisdom, when relying secure vpon prouision that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in neede of God.

Some there are who take Setbon to haue beene set downe by Eusebius, vnder the name of Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twentie yeares which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the raigne of Setbon. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countie, or at least an enemy to Senacherib, in the warre last spoken of: the Ethiopian (as they are englished) ouer which hee reigned, being in deede Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarachus or Tuhaka, is placed in the roome of Setbon, and therefore giue to Setbon the twentie yeares of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) beganne his raigne ouer Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Senacherib and of Ezekias, in the first yeare of Manasses King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeares, haue no reference to Setbon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Setbon reigned; Fanilius peremptorily, citing no Author, nor alleaging reason for it, sets him downe thirte three yeares; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the raignes of these Egyptian Kings. The yeares which passed from the fift of Rehoboam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I so diuide among the Egyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom hee is found, the rest is to be conferred vpon him whose length of raigne is vncertaine; that is vpon this Setbon. By this account I finde the thirte three yeares, that are set downe by Fanilius, to agree very nearely, if not precisely, with the time of Setbons raigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeare lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arriue at the time of Panmitticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this Historie will shortly bring me; the Egyptian affaires growing now to be entlerled with the matters of Iuda, to which is meeete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of MANASSE and his Contemporaries.

p. I.

The wickednesse of MANASSE. His imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

MANASSE, the Sonne of Ezechias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperitie which followed him, set vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Deuill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, hee himselfe eieced the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the host of Heauen, as Gods, and worshipp'd them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Deuill Moloch, or Atelchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennan: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Deuills.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witch-craft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintayned those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Jerusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Isay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Jewes affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neare unto the Fontaine of Silo to be sawne in sunder, with a wooden saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a crueltie more barbarous and monstrous then hath bene heard of. The Scriptures in these are silent herof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captiuitie of the Host of the Kings of Assyria, which tooke MANASSE, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twentie yeare as a captiue, and dispoiled of all honour and hope, yet to his heartie repentance and continuall praier, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Asterodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easiest perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie & estate. After which and when he was againe established, remembering the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuillish Idolatrie, and cast downe the Idolls of his owne erection, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long raigne of fiftie five yeares. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cask of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fedde with bread of branne and water, which men may beleue as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

of troubles in Ægypt following the death of SETHON. The raigne of PSAMMETICVS.

That the wickedness of King Manasse was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Perlon, any Christian must needs beleue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who falsified Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous of enlarging his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Ægypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Iuda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill dissention, and after two yeares, ill amended by a diuision of the government betwene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betwene these, eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Ægypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betwene the raignes of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelue Gouernours, immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissention seemes to haue bene the vncertaine of title to that Kingdome (for that the Crowne of Ægypt passed by succession of blood, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not settled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraignetic.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fiftene yeares, in good seeming agreement, which to preferre, they made strait couenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drinke offering, in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilst this vnicie lasted, they ioyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neare vnto the Lake of Marius; a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirms) no wordes could giue it commendation, and swearable to the stateliness of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that vnperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to say, that he prefers it faire before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue bene the worke of Marius, or Menides, a King which liued siue generations before Protem, that is, before the Warr of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus tooke the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Creet. Who this Marius, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reinecius takes him to haue bene Amenemes, which raigned immediately before Thuris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus and Minos were both dead long before Amenemes was King. Belike Reinecius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Chazemon, and others; that are found in Iosephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, and Achisanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethon Amenophis, to be Diodor's Amasis, that Sethon should be Achisanes, and that Amenemes should be Marius. If in this case I might intrude 50 a conjecture; the times which we now handle, are those, about which Reinecius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Anysis; Achisanes was Sabacus; and Marius was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Achisanes the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Ethiopian deposed Anysis; Achisanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing offenders;

offendors; so likewise was Sabacus & Atarus the next King after Atisjones built this Labyrinth; and the next (sauiug Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as hauing not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same worke, according to Hierodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleeued the Priests, might bee a part of the Egyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Hierodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of the se tweine Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemne feast in Pulcrans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cups. Hercupon Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and there with supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but, being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marsh Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeuue to haue bene none other: In the rest Hierodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hyred Souldiers out of Caria and Ionis, by whose aide he vanquished his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeares of his raigne, according to Hierodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mezerator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeares to his single raigne, and ten to his ruling, joyntlie with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for hee cannot in reason be supposed to haue bene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelue Governours, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreme old age, if hee ruled partly with others, partly alone, thre score and nine yeares. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius; but will not aduenture to cut five yeares from the Asiobarates: though peraduenture Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelue, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeares companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeares of these Aegyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill vp the time, betweene the fit of Rehoams, and the fourth of Iehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from Sethons raigne; that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Eusebius may haue followed better authoritie than I know, or than himselfe allegeth, in giuing to Sethon a time so nearly agreeing with the truth) wee must confound the last yeare of one raigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronological tables, raigned precisely so many yeares as are ascribed vnto them, without any frictions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplid the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeare of those fiftene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt, who entertained any stratamitie with the Greekes; that he retayned in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionis, and Arabia, to whom hee gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held theright wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forooke their naturall

Countrie

Coutrie of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reok'd by kinde Messages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-rooke them on the way; but when hee told them of their Countrie, their Wiues, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrie, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to bee brought vp in such sort as they might not heare any word spoken; by which means, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Becus, Becus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low Dutch; in which the word Beecker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. Hethat will turne ouer any part of Goropius his works, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs, vied none other tongue than the Low Dutch, before the confusion of Languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that there they beganne to bable, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not insult vpon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about which he spent nine and twentie yeares. Neuer haue we heard (saith Herodotus) that any Citie endured to long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had bene wonne by Tartan, a Captaine of Sensacherib, and was now, as it seemeth releued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

30 What reference these Egyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargements of MANASSES. In what part of his raigne MANASSES was taken prisoner.

WHere it certainly knowne, in what yeare of his raigne Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before hee obtayned libertie; I thinke we should finde these Egyptian troubles to haue bene no small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God fo disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended only their owne buisnesse, fulfilled only his high pleasur. For either the ciuill warres in Egypt that followed vpon the death of Setbon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were into twelue peeces; or the warre betwene Psammiticus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessitie of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure worke with the King of Inda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrie, but only wast it. So that the Leues, hauing learned wit, by the ill successfe of their folly, in redeeming Amazons, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargaine vpon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weightie arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Inda could afford, had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby hee should compell his mightiest enemies to cometo some good agreement;

ment; when by quitting his present advantage over the Jewes, hee might make his way the fairer into Aegypt.

Now concerning the yeare of Manasses his raigne, wherein hee was taken prisoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are silent, and Iosephus giues no information. Yet I finde cited by Tornellius three opinions, the one of Bellarmino, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeare of his raigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirms, that it was in his twentic seuenth yeare; the third, of Rabbi Kimbi vpon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was fortie yeares an Idolater, and liued fifteene yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is vpheld by Tornellius, who rejects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons allcaged by Tornellius in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cas d'mall, as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gaue his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmino: the one, that Amnon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the works of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his finnes, it is not like that hee shou'd haue continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the finnes of Manasses, might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeares old; though it were granted that hee continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimbi) vntill hee was but fifteene yeares from death. Touching the second; how loeuer it be a fearefull thing, to call off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, that the finnes, which are not forsaken before the age of two and fiftie yeares, shall be punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Tornellius, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, that Manasses continued longer in this wickedness, than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimbi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did is remembered at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life, the storie of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the acts of MANASSES, and all that hee did, and his sinne that hee sinned, we they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda. The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehoukim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this vpon Iuda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the finnes of MANASSE, according to all that hee did, and for the innocent blood that hee shed (for hee filled Ierusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most false, that the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier than fifteene yeares before his death; or most probable, that when he was twentic seuen yeares old, he repented, and becoming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeares after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth can not be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeares of continuall dissension in Aegypt, fourteene or fifteene yeares following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignetic; the warre of Panmitticu against his Associates; and foure and twentie yeares, of the nine and twentie, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his raigne (after the first fifteene yeares) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonians, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visting his Countrie. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fifteenth of Manasse, was the last yeare of Setbon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his raigne, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seuen and twentieth of Manasse was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twentie third of Psammiticus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the sonne of Merodach in Babylon: but which of these was the yeare of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, least I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer violently to mine owne computation.

This was the first great mactrie that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmansar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that hee hoped to slay Sennacherib enterprile against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirtie of gold, besides the plate which covered the dores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasse being pressed with greater needesse, could refuse no tollerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose vpon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of feruitude) that hee might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not only by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Juda after his returne (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose partie hee had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom hee had thenceforth no more controuerie) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Nabulassar, which had bene against all reason and policie, if it had not bene his dury by couenant. Of this I will speake more in conuenient place.

§. IIII.

Of the first and second Messenian Warres, which were in the raignes of EZEKIA, and MANASSES Kings of Juda.

30

NOW concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasse, the most remarkable were the Messenian Warres; which happening in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betwene the Troian and Persian Warres, deserue not to be passed ouer with silence.

The first Messenian Warre beganne and ended in the daies of Ezekia; the second in the raigne of Manasse: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I haue thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops, and the Achaens, out of their seats, diuided their lands betwene themselves, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedamon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and sought one anothers ruine with bloudie Warres; wherof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian Warre, are scarce worth remembrance; they were so sleight. Ambition was the true cause of it; wherewith the Lacedamonians were so transported, that any thing serued them as a colour, to accomplish their greedie desires. Yet other matter was alleged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had slaine many Lacedamonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to haue him yielded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was growne frantick, through injuries receiued from Euaphnes a Lacedamonian. This Euaphnes had bargained to giue pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receiue part of the increase: but but not contented with the gaine appointed, heefold the Cattails, and slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilest the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedemonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive, hee carried the Sonne of Polyshares home with him; but having him at home, hee vilanously flew him. Wherefore, the Lacedemonians having refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to doe him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of those things, which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the judgement of the Amplicityones, who were as the generall Counsaile of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedemonians, who had a great desire to occupy the faire Countie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough, to haue some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old injuries, and so without sending any defence, secretly tooke an oath, to hold warre with Messene, till they had mairered it: which done, they seized vpon Amphia, a frontier Towne of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few escaping.

Hereupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battaile was fought betwene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victorie. The Messenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedemonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre beganne in the second yeare of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, hauing lasted twentie yeares. The two enimic Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedemonians warring the inland parts of Messene, and the Messenians, the Sea coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argines, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and fourth battaile were fought, with as great obliuiousness as the first; suing that, in the fourth battaile, the Lacedemonians were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was still vncertaine though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphras their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many yeares were spent, ere all this blood was shed; for pestilence diseases, and want of monie to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians, forsake all their inland Townes, excepting Thome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more, than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell vs, the Lacedemonians were so obstinate, in this Warre, because of their vow, that hauing absented themselves ten yeares from Sparta, their wiuces sent them word, that their Cite would grow vnpeopled, by reason that no children had bene borne them in all that time: Wherevpon they sent back all their ablest yong men, promiscuously to accompanie the yong women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diadorus referres the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in proesse of this Messenian Warre, when the Demill in an Oracle had aduised the Messenians to Sacrifice a Virgin of the flock of Egyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedemonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lycisus, Epibalus the Priest, willing to saue her, said, shee was only a foistered child, and not borne of the wife of Lycisus: which answer giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lycisus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a yong Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwise he could not preuaile, said openly that shee was no Virgin, but that he had defloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disprove the Louers slander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, aterward falling by other superstitions into despaire of preuaing against the Lacedemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which he loued most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craued peace; which they obtained vnder most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearly fruits of their Land. they were bound to send vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiues, to make solemn lamentations, at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworne to liue in true subjection to the Lacedemonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Astinae, and such as had followed the Spartians in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon so vneuen termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeares it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able yong men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messenians, whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedemonians, and therefore scornng to serue such Masters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe 20 of these was Aristomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Aegyus, who perceiving the vniforme desires of his Countrey-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argines, and Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, beganne open warre vpon the State of Lacedemon. This was in the fourth yeare of the three and twentith Olympiad; when the Lacedemonians, hastied to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their Friends, to deal with their Enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battaile was fought betweene them, and a doubtfull, saue that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, 30 to thinke them their equalls. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeare another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messenians had the Argines, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Aristomenes did so behaue himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of such importance was this victorie, that the Lacedemonians beganne to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement. But one Thyrseus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, reenforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this 40 Aristomenes tooke by surpris a Towne in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set vpon him, in hope to haue recovered the boote.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vnto the Lacedemonians, through the treason of Aristarctes, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with monie, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that all Andania their principall Citie, and the Townes in Messene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be 50 safe abroade, was conuicied, as into a place of safetie. Here the Lacedemonians found a tedious worke, that held them cleuen yeares. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong pcece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers did many incredible exploits that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. He waited all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking king away Corne, Wine, Cattaile, and all provisions, necessarie for his owne people; the Slaues and household stuffe he changed into monie, suffering the owners to redeme them. To remedie this mischiefe the Lacedemonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoining parts of their owne Countre, should bee tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtaeus appeafed this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Arifomenes grew so bold, that hee not only ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, surprifed, and sackt Amycla, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelyhood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Arifomenes was taken prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his desertes to bee remembred, as a thing very strange and meruailous. Hee had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and filled to the ground, was taken vp senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caeue into which the Spartans vsed to cast head-long, such as were condemned to die for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Arifomenes and his Companions adjudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their falls; Arifomenes (howloer it came to passe) took no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among 20 dead carcases, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while hee perceiued by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the toppe) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead bodie. Here vpon hee bethought himselfe, that this beast muft needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ranie through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Arifomenes delue so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. 30 When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Arifomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedemonians in the sieg of Era, were cut in pecces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beleued, that Arifomenes was aliuie indeede.

Thus cleuen yeares passed whilest the enemies houering about Era, saw no likelyhood of getting it; and Arifomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a raie- 40 nie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hidde her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the forme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations. and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Arifomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke-rainie-night, as this was. The slaue that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There hee found Emperamus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon 50 for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreme darkenesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by neare hope of ending ending a long worke; the other maged by more desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of feruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the streets and other passages, which admitted not manie hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continuall toile; their quonies fought in course refreshing themselves with meat and sleepe, and then returning supplied the places of their wearie followes, with fresh Companies. Aristomenes therefore, perceiving that his men, for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing bene three 10 dayes, and three nights, vexed with all miseries, of labour, watching, fighting, hunger, and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker fort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midst of the enemies. Emperanus GeneralI of the Lacedaemonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to giue an open way, leaving a faire passage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arcadia, where they were most louingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruite of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Aristocrates their false hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in fatigues, hee chose 20 out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret vnto Sparta, hoping to find the Towne secure, and ill manured, the people being runne forth to the spoile of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedaemonians would be glad to recover their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyne with him, but Aristocrates marred all, by sending speedie advertisement hereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent backe to Aristocrates, was intercepted, by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his fallshood, which being published in open 30 assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his bodie vnburied, erected a monument of his treacherie, with a note. That the Periuicer cannot deceive God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his sonne Gorgus and other sufficient Governours, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himselfe to make abode in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedaemonians worke at home. His daughters hee bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marrie the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally Aristomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, whence he purposed to haue trauailed vnto Ardyx the Son of Gorgax King of Lycia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were inuited by Anaxilus (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italie, to take his part against the Zancleam in Sicilie, on the other side of the Straights. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeare of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home scrued 50 the Lacedaemonians found means to rebell; but were soone vanquished, and being driuen to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedaemonians, and then followed their ancient Courtinment into Italie and Sicilie, some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and foure score yeares, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, and loue of their forsaken Countrie, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third yeare of the hundreth and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedaemonians, reuoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citie, which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was helde by them euer after, in despite of the Lacedaemonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth stood in feare.

p. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while MANASSES Raigned. Whether DEIOCES the Mede were that ARPHAXAD which is mentioned in the Booke of IVDITH. Of the historie of IVDITH.

ARDYS King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Panjanias, as raigning shortly after the Messenian warre. Ardys succeding vnto his father Gyges, beganne his raigne of nine and fortie yeares, in the second of the hie and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who enchroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Coleophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wanne Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his raigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrie by the Seythians, ouer-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driuen out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wanne the Citie of Sardes; though the Citie or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys, whose long raigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeare of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six yeares after the Messenian warre ended; the same being the last yeare of Manasses his raigne ouer Iuda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these six and fiftie yeares in which Manasses raigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his predecessors had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people too much licence, as caused euerie one to desire the wholesome severitie, of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Pallace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldome gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies, he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiestie, which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, hee did vprightly and seuerely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. Hee cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by enchroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betweene this King, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Hierodotus deliuiers, that Deioces was the first who raigned in Media.

This was he that built the great Citie of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should bee Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holofernes sent to worke wonders, vpon Phud and Lind, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last yeare of Deioce to haue bene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the raigne of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this Booke of Judith to a certaine time, there hath much labour bene spent, with ill successe. The raignes of Cambyses, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue bene fought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, forgoing the destruction of Ierusalem, haue bene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, chosen by Belarminus, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot (I speake of such as fauine would) agree with him. Whilest Cambyses raigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Judith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to haue bene verie fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conueniences, aptly fitting this Historie; and aboue all the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whose iudgement the authoritie of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Raigne of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, verie few, and they faintly, entile him to the businesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must bee, a returne from captiuitie lately forgoing; the Temple rebuilt, Ioscm High Priest, and a long peace, of three score and tenne yeares or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Iewes. Likewise on the other side, we must finde a King that raigned in Arimine, eightene yeares at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refused to assist; one that fought to bee generally adored as God; and that therefore commanded, all temples, of such as were accounted gods to be destroyed; one whose Viceroy or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Ioscm, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes after ward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuersie is, that the Booke of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Tornilius done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he suppoeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and reedified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly bene built by Deioce) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds that from the twelfth yeare to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or six yeares, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Grecian expedition (which he suppoeth to haue bene so long) might giue occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor hauing vanquished and slaine Sphaxad, might then seek to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth vnder Holofernes. So should the Iewes haue done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances, rehearsed before be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historie of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough bee ignorant of the Iewes, and as proud as we shall need to thinke him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away believe, from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is verie hard, that a rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seventeene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, vpon the strength of twelue hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God than himselfe. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this deife of Torniellus: yet if there were any needfullie, of holding the Booke of Indith, to be Canonically, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Historiies, and build some defence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it selfe. That Indith liued vnder none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose workes I haue not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proued by many arguments. That three liued not in the Raigne of Manasses, Torniellus hath proued verie substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabucho-donosor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantasia, it is so plaine, that it needs no prooue at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which haue contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stonie field) haue chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni falsaque vias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

Indith c. a. v. 43.
o. 15.

Surely to find out the borders of Иарнетн, which were towards the South, and ener against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way, I thinke it would as much trouble Cosinographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busie my selfe herewith; having already so farre digressed, in shewing who liued not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

¶ VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

Interregnum

THE first yeare of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeare the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen; a peaceable man and seeming verie religious in his kind. Hee brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good ciuillitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This hee effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he deliuered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better than meere delusions, that serued onely as rudiments, to bring the Saunge multitude of thees and out-laws, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, than their boysterous and wilde natures was other wise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almost sixe hundred yeares after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a peece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of Ibone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said that Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found, his bodie being vtterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of wax, of his owne constitutions seuen, and other seuen of Phyllophic. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to haue a sight of these Bookes, when hee perceiued whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vsie. Hereupon the Senate, without more a doe, commaunded them to bee openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe, vnto wiser ages which he thought would follow, as one that had not bene so foolish as to beleue the Doctrin wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith hee had infected

10 Rome, when hee sat in his Throne, had not left working, when hee ministred the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cesar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better discuffed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure generally effect. Being as it was, they serued as a confutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inueterate.

Numa Raigned three and fortie yeares in continuall peace. After him Tullius Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasses, and Raigned two and thirtie yeares, busied, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had 20 cause to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thyrcanes, caused them to be thinke themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weake for a common enemy, it might bee decided, who should command, and who obey.

There were in each Campe three Brethren, I winnes borne at one birth (Dionysius sayes that they were Colen Germans) of equall yeares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was that the Horatij, Champions for the Romans got the victorie, though two of them first lost their liues. The three Curati that fought for Alba (as Livie tels it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away and thereby drew the others, who by reason 30 of their hurts could not follow him with equall speede, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, he slew them, as it had bene in single fight, man after man, ere they could joyne together and set vpon him all at once. Dionysius reports it some what otherwisc, telling verie particularly, what woundes were giuen and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatij was slaine, then one of the Curati, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curati, whom the third Horatius did comming seuer one from the other as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the olde Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained.

40 For the Citie of Alba did immediatly become subject vnto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Governour, vtterly razed, the people being remoued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had bene chiefe, became ere long dependent vpon Rome, though not subject vnto it, and diuerse petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundrie ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves (vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to bee the maine subject of 50 this Historie.

The seventieth yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the sixth of Manasset. Also the three last Governours for tenne yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find onely the names, Leocrates, Apjander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governours for tenn yeares, were also of the race of Adon and Codrus, but their time of rule was thortned, and from earne of life reduced vnto tenn yeares; it being thought likely, that they would gouerne the better, when they knew, that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeares of the Olympiad, wherein the Chronological table, following this worke, doth set them. For he not onely professeth himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwayes the yeares of the Greekes, how they did answeare vnto the thinges of Rome, throughout all the continuance of his Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first yeare of the seuenth Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeare of Charops his government in Athenis; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who setteth the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the Raigne of Manasses it was, that Midus, whome the Poets fained to haue had Apelles cares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Manie fables were deuised of him; especially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all thinges which hee should touch, might immediatly be changed into Gold: by which meanes hee had like to haue bene starued (his meat and drinke being subiect to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from his miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himselfe in the Riuer Pactolus, the streame whereof hath cuer since forsooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally it is laid hee died by drinking Bulls blood; being invaded by the Seythians.

In this age flourished that Animachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obserued the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milistians, or (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians, hauing obtayned some power by Sea, founded Macutus a Citie on the coast of Egypt. Pjammiteus herein seemes to haue assisted them, who vsed all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus, nor Athenes, were now of power sufficient, to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

About this time Archias with his companion Misellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracuse in Sicily: a Citie in after-times exceeding famous.

The Citie of Nicomedia sometime * Aiscus, was enlarged and beautified in this age, by Zipartes natue of Thrace. Sybilis of Samus according to Pausanias liued about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Misellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracuse: Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time, the Parthenians, being of age, and banished Lacedaemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie, where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Isidore and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified. Also about the same time, Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interenne in the Region of the Vmbria, now called Vrbis in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium, (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megareses: who therefore were vpbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is said to haue bene done in the fine and fiftie yeares of Manasses: that which hath already bene told is enough: the rest, being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referring onely Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

ð. I.

Of AMMON and IOSIAS.

AMMON the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked then was his Father before his conuersion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatrie: for which God hardened the heartes of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after he had Reigned two yeares: Philo, Eusebius and Nicephorus giue him tenne yeares, following the Septuagint.

Iosias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a child of eight yeares old. Hee beganne to seeke after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yeare he purged Juda and Jerusalem from the high places, and

X the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of Baalim. He cauled all the Images, as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stamp to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. Hee also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophesied, in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be borne vnto the house of Dauid, Iosias by name, and upon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall hee sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense vpon thee. a prophetic verie remarkable.

In the eighteenth yeare of his Raigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Heliash the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomie, or, of the Lawe, which hee sent to the King: which when hee had cauled to bee read before him, and considered of the seuerer commandements therein written, the prophetic promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commaunded Heliash, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the messengers in these words. Thus saith the Lord, behold I will bring euill vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Juda, because they haue forsaken mee, and burnt incense to other Gods. Onely for the King himselfe, because he was a louer of God and of his Lawes, it was promised that this euill should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his dayes, but that hee himselfe should inherit his graue in peace.

40 Iosias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to bee read vnto them, made a couenant with the Lord, and cauled all that were found in Jerusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promising thereby to obserue the Lawes and commandements in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iosias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto those Countries,

1. 1. 1.

Countries, that had bene part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Iosias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe againt Sarhaddon, did vse the aduantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as hee was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Psanmitticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus though the Towne held out nine and twentie yeares) did giue vnto Manasses, together with his libertie as much in Israel, as himselfe could not easilly defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone betwene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territorie with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeme the friendship of the Ienes, which had bene lost by iniuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather beleue, that he, hauing already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side hee had for faken, than that hee trauailed in making such prouisions, onely for his minds sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Anecestor, was vpon such friendly termes, as required not only a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requiall. For no persuasions could suffice to make Iosias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Neco King of Egypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates.

The last yeare of Iosias his Raigne it was, whenas Neco the sonne of Psanmitticus, came with a powerfull Armie towards the border of Judea, determining to passe that way being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that Riuer, about Carcemish or Cercassum, for the defence of Syria (as long after this; Dioctesius is said by Amniasus Marcelinus to haue done) or perhaps to invade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth that the trauaile of Psanmitticus had not bene idly consumed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adas Kings of Damascio.

Neither was the industrie of Neco lesse than his Fathers had bene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly haue auailed the Egyptians, and aduanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greekes, that were farre better Souldiers than Egypt could of it selfe afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seemes, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whether Pharao Neco ascended with a mightie Armie.

These two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iosias aduised with himselfe to which of these he might adhere, hauing his Territorie set in the mid way betwene both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessitie tread vpon the verie face and bodie of his Countrie; Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadors, leaue to passe along by Juda, protecting that hee directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmful purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

- Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Son King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian, so rooted vp and tare in peeces, as it could neuer after bee gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Juda in the thirteenth and foureteenth yeares of Ezekia, whilst that good King and his people relied vpon Setbon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proote, to shew the ill affiance, that was in the helpe of the Egyptians, who (neare neighbours though they were) were alwayes vnreadie; when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Iewes renew there ancient league with him, but onely craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime betwene him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Arme, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar, vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Iewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleuee, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp onely by politicke respects, to stop the way of Neco, but thought himselfe bound in faith and honour, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by covenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as hee held in the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enimie.

- Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarietoe the aduice of Ieremie the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Ieremie, nor can finde reason to beleuee. Others hold opinion, that he forgot to aske the counsell of God: and this is verie likely; seeing hee might beleuee that an enterprize grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not bee displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from hearkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood betwene them and their punishment, should now bee taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauing all the strength hee could make, neare vnto Beer-sheba, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco; and there hee eciued the stroke of death, which lingering about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Ieremie the Prophet; who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof into his booke of Lamentations.

§. II.

of PHARAO NECO, that fought with IOSTAS: Of IEROAHAX and IEROIAKIM Kings of Iuda

F these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tells vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should haue reached aboute a hundred miles in length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middle of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toyle some twelue hundred thousand Aegyptians; a losse great enough to make the King for sake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. How focueer it were he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leaued a great Armie, wherewith hee marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vfed the Strauce, as well of his Nauie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, saue onely this victorie against Iostas, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolus, and the Senes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudaea was a Prouince of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to haue beene the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battaile was fought. After this, Neco tooke the Citie of Cadytes, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth.

Horod. 4.

Particularly we finde, that the Phenicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they furrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whercon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustenance, in that long voyage which lasted three yeares. This was the first nauigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, vntill Rafo de Gama the Portugall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phenicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the straights of Gibraltar, hauing Africa still on the right hand; but the Portugals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same straights, leaue Africa on the Larboard, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not beleeue, how the Sunne in this iourne was on their right hand, that is, on the Northside of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the obseruation then made hereof, makes mee the better to beleeue, that such a Voyage was indeed performed.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Aegyptians were bulieat Carchemish, had made Iehobabaz their King, in the roome of his father Iostas. The Prophet Ieremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the sbort Raigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes; for Shallum of Israel Raigned but one moneth; Iehobabaz no more than three. Hee was not the eldest sonne of Iostas: Wherefore it may seeme that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Aegyptian, as appears by the sequell. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudaea. This Countrey was now so farre from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came to Riblah in the Land of Eliath,

where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds and carrie him prisoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdom to Elakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may bee observed in diuers examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdom; an ill gaine, since he could no better vleit. But how euer Iehoiakim thrust by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdom Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stout to giue him peace, when he desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waite his forces vpon Juda: but now the reputation of his good successe at Magiddo, and Carchemish, together with the dissension of the Princes Iehoiash his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue sturmed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet hee did forbear to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Seues had suffered much, in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen to forsake that partie, and joyne with the enemies, to whom if they liued themselves faithfull, who would blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; seeing they were such a people, as would not vpon euerie occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuertheless he laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of siluer, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leaue vnto them some document in the future, of greater punishment then verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So hee departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the vnfortunate King Iehoiakim, who died in his Captiuitie.

The Raigne of Iehoiakim was included in the end of his Fathers last year; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his succellour, did Raigne renne whole yeares; whereas the Scriptres giue him cleuen, that is current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short Raigne, into the first year of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to bee vnworthe of disputation; and so I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction hee was altogether Egyptian, as hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwile, than by generall wordes, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poyson wherewith Ahas and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Iosias, but that it still cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, Yea vnto the chiefe of the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their part therein. The Royall authoritie was much abated by the dangers wherein the Countrie stood, in this troublefome age: the Princes did in a manner what they listid, neither would the Kings forbear to professe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes doe appeare to haue bene instigators. This Holy man denounced Gods Judgements against the Citie, and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrarie to the custome vsed, both in thofe those dayes and since among all Ciuill Nations of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guiltye of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priuiledge.

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment possible to Rehoakim for the Assyrian Lion, that had not stirred in manie yeares, begonne about these times, to roare so loud vpon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nilus, threatening to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Merodach, from opposing the Assyrian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Chareberris, where shortly after this, the glorie of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babyl could not giue attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to loose that Province.

MERODACH the sonne of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Senacherib misadventure and death, together with the dissention betwene his children presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleuen yeares troubled with a powerfull Enemy Ashaddon the sonne of Senacherib, Raigning ouer the Assyrians in Media, from whom whilet he could not any other way diuert his cares, he was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath bene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekie, some part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Ashaddon did not onely set him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Assyria if not (as is commonly but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians I wil not here stand to enquire; his long Raigne following, and his little entermedling in matters of Syria make it plaine, that he had worke enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Iosephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Ninime it selfe; which we may beleue; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great Citie was fire, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded vpon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Assyrian King whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner, but I rather beleue those that hold the contrarie; for which I haue giuen my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should haue looked into those parts, as long as the Iezes were his friends and the Egyptians, that maligne the Northerne Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Raigne, or the beginning of his sonne.

Ben Merodach the sonne and successeour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is hee named by good consent of Authours, and that speake little of his doing s. The length of his Raigne is gathered by inference to haue bene one and twentie yeares, for somuch remaineth of the time that passed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Raignes (which is a knowne somme) deducting the yeares of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner and released him. Hee spied ill in Syria; where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercinarie Greekes, did much preuaile. This may haue bene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his handes some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleged before.

Nabulassar that Raigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater busines in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: in somuch as it may bee thought to haue bene a great negligence or ouer-sight of Pammiticus and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Assyria, and besieged Nimue; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remoue by the coming of Scythians, who in these ages did ouer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is conuenient that I speake in this place, shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were builed in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deiozes, King of the Medes, hauing by manie victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire possibilitie of making himselfe Lord of Nimue.

That Citie (as Herodotus reports it) hauing bene a Soueraigne Ladie was not forsaken of all her dependants, yet remained in such case; that of her selfe shee was well enough.

This makes it plaine, that howsoeuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Countrey; yet it found the means to set it selfe at libertie: as after this againe it did, when it had bene regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Shure warre, and the verie noueltie of suddaine violence, vse to dismay any State or Countrey, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth euen those that are vnwarlike. Nimue had bene the Palace of manie valiant Kings lately Raigning there; it had suffered, and resisted, all the furie, wherewith either Domesticall tumults betwene the Sinnes of Seascherib, or forraigne warre of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderful, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his iourne against it. He and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps he vndervalued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull) it is enough, that we may herein beleuee Herodotus.

Cyaxares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre then his Father, wanne as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the Riuer of Hydy; hee fought reuenge vpon the Assyrians for the death of his Father, and besieged Nimue it selfe, hauing a purpose to destroy it. In rather beleuee Eusebius, that hee tooke the Citie and fulfilled his displeasure vpon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Armie came vpon him whilest he lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictorie (as Eusebius, though farre later than Herodotus, yet hauing scene other Authours, that are now lost, is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it best, to yeeld vnto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilest hee lay before Nimue, were to accuse him of greater improuidence, than ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that hee was faine to leaue the Towne, when a warre so dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrey, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those partes, and with the State of the Chaldee and Assyrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set downe as happening about these times; of which Booke whosoever was the Authour, hee was ancient enough to know the Storie of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine terme, yet it appeares to haue taken effect, in the finall destruction of Ninive by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Agypt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authoritie than the reformed Churches yeeld, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessitie, to affirme, that about these times Ninive was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victorie ouer it, to Ben Merodach: a needlesse conjecture, if the place of Enxebus be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the sonne of Ben Merodach did seize vpon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Countrie of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Sythian warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out readie to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Niniuites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so allwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulassar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, tooke him and them into protection: though afterwards, to their confusion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as shalbe shewed in the Raigne of Nabuchodonosor.

¶ IIII.

The great expedition of the Sythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twentie yeares.

¶ I.

The time of this expedition.

NO that I haue shewed what impediment was giuen by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Agyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Sythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countreies adjacent, in such wise that part of the trouble redounded euen to the Agyptians themselves. Of the Sythian people in generall, Herodotus makes verie large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables, of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them, for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times, which by inference out of his relations, may seeme vry stränge, needeth some answer in this place: least otherwise I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to bee too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeares he saith that the Sythians Raigned in Asia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrie from them. Yet hee reports a warre betwene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Ninive; the siege of Ninive being ere the Sythians came. And further he tels, how the Serthians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountred in Palastina by Psanmitticus King of Agypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, bee trues though not in such order of time as he hath marshalled them. For Psanmitticus was dead before Cyaxares beganne to Raigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his fortie yeares, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that he could not, after those Lydians

dan warres, Raigne eight and twentie yeares together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammitis the sonne of Phraas Neco, by the name of Psammiticus; and this King Psammitis may, by some strained conjecture, bee thought to haue bene he that met with the Scythians: for he liued with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that buisinesse of the Scythian irruption into Palatina, to Psammiticus the Father of Neco, whom hee leaues dead before the Raigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relie vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise then to beleuee him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

- 10 It remanes, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I find of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke necessarie, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall Historie; yet not calic, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neare to vni-formitic.

I haue noted before, that in the Raigne of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouer-ran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardis got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Salyattes, and Halyattes, are wee to find the eight and twentie yeares, wherein the Scythians Raigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Aegyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperitie, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeares, vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Raigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeares compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaues the space verie scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Aegyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue received ere they could bee driuen quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Raigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that he should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdome against the Aegyptians and Iewes, had he stood in daily feare of loosing his owne; to a more mightie Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appears to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole bodie of their Armic, but were the defeatures of some troupes, that infested their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore wee may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeares of the Scythians rule, to as manie almost the last of Nabulassars Raigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of these oppressors.

†. II

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Inuemie.

10 Touching the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Countrie by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remooued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Aegypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischieuous and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countymen, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had bene beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well knowne, and their manie Conquests so well testified in Histories of diverse Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose Rflow did ouerhelme no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we doe now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazones; of manie things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to have spoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, 10 but hard to confute them: There wee find it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Lineage and Nation; howsoever distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers T ribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeede hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrey whether he place in the Well, as near vnto the Ocean and boundes of the Earth, Or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and covered with eternall darknesse, certaine it is that he would haue them neare neighbours to Hell: for hee had the fame quarell to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would haue made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into 20 his works the names of such as liued in his owne times, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserued. And for this reason it is proued by Eustathius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had walted his Countrey. Perhaps, that inuasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamius his discourse with Helen, was the verie same, which Eusebius noeth to haue happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Asia.

This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerj (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in expresse termes written, that they did with joynt forces, yet seeing they inua- 30 ded the selfe same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iournee of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the straights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them assistance. The same Authour, before his entrie into those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to haue bene Wiues of the Scythians, and no lesse warlike than their Husbonds; alleading the example of that Queene, who is said to haue slaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carrie their wiues along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Marius the Roman ouerthrew 40 them, giues proofe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; each place will giue mee better leisuere to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by diuers Histories to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, wee may the better approoue Goropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neare allies.

Now concerning the expulsiion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to haue bene none other than the sending a Colonie of them forth into Asia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this iournee. For the Cite of Nouograd in Russia (which Countrey is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruaile though manie Countreies felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voiage was that, which the same people made five hundred yeares and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Mæotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours, they had in their Armie about three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer manie Countries, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to haue settled themselves in Italie, they diuided their companie, for the more easie passage thither and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Consuls. Mere necessitie enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard aduentures.

10 For their Countrie, being more fruitfull of men than of suttenance, and shut vp on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied them that way to their ouer-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of possession: hauing title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that was to be had, but more euile, people had. Their sturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnes, gave them great aduantage ouer such as were accustomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluties. Wherefore commonly they prouailed very farre; their next neighbours giuing them free passage, that they might the sooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthie places; others hiring them to depart with great presents, so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

30 THE first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leauing on the other side, and behind them, the great Mountaines of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Meopgrelia, entered the Countrie of Pontus, and being arriued in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie whercon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it seems that they bestowed the weakest and most vnserviceable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their carriages, vnder some good guard: as drawing neere to those Regions, in conquest whercof they were to trie the utmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake euen now) dispose of their impediments, leauing them in a place of strength, where Antwerp now stands, when they drew neere vnto Gauls, vpo which they determined to aduenture themselves in the purchase. From Sinope, the way into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionis, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines or any deepe Riuers to staie their march: for Iris and Halys they had already passed.

What battailes were fought betwene these inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Armys, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the Capitall Citie of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I obserue, that whereas Herodotus tels of the acts performed by Gyges and Armys Kings of Lydia, before this inuasion, and by Halyattes and Cresus in the times following; all that Armys did against the Cimmerians, and all, saue burning the Miletiens Corne fields, that was done in twelve yeares by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that hee could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthie of remembrance in those warres, but were glad enough that they did not loofe all.

Certainly, the miseries of warre are neuer so bitter and manie, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seates, labours to roote out the established possessors of another Land, making roome for themselves, their wiues and children. They that fight for the matter are pacified with tribute, or with some other seruices and acknowledgements, which had they beene yeelded at the first, all had bene quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, euen to the cradels of the sucking infants. The mercilesse tearmes of this controuerie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine, the other defend their goods, or loofe their liues without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples hereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such inuasions. But our Isle of Brittain can best witness the diuinitie of Conquests; hauing by the happie victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuile arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Countrey, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible crueltie, eradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprise, as it may seeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arriue vnto. So that by considering the proceesse of the one, we shall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Manie battailes the Danes wonne; yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Manie the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could driue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance euen of vter enmitie, had bred such acquaintance betwene them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great slaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Countrey wide enough to receiue them, as hauing disburthened it selfe of manie thousand, that were sent to seeke their graues abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victorie of Halyattes may haue hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seemes to haue done most in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde herunto my further conjecture, which is, that the matter was compounded betwene the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the Riuer of Halys should diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easteme side of the Riuer was the Countrey of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimerians and other Scythian people; whose wiues and daughters these warlike women are supposed to haue bene.

And herunto the quarrell ensuing, betwene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath verie good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certaine Scythians, vpon whom the Median sought reuenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutual slaughters, should haue joynd in a League of mutual defence for their common safetie: though otherwise it had bene dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoeuer the pretences might bee, of taking reuenge vpon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the warre betwene these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little waight, waight, and lesse probabilitie. He tels of Scythians, that being chased out of their Countrey by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to bee instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archerie. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians vng much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neuertheless otherwhiles misse of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being forward and cholericke, bitterly reuled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dressing like Venison they presented vnto him; which done they fled vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliuers, as the ground of a warre that lasted sixe yeares betwene the Medes and Lydians, the one King demanding these Fugitiues to bee deliured into his hand, the other refusing to betraie such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the massacring of their Countrey men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee should speake.

† IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

AS the Cimmerians held their course Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine Sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and hauing the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed betwene it and Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countreies of Serua and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to attie agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psammiticus Raigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixt yeare of Nabulassar Raigne ouer Babylon (supposing him to haue Raigned five and thirtie; other wise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twentie yeares of their Dominio end, one yeare before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giuing him good leaue to prouide securely, for the inuasion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet liued, as Iosephus out of Berosus relates the Historie.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to vndergoe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serue to remooue these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countreies pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to bee perswaded, that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not thinke; Babylon was nere enough, whether it hee could send these Locusts to graze, than should not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had attie, dealings with them I doe not reade. But it is well knowne, that his Dominions lay in the middle betwene Media and Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may verie well beleue, that they watered their horses in his Riuers; and that he also was content to giue them prouender.

tooke care that they might not looke vpon Egypt; leaſt the ſight thereof ſhould more eaſily detain them there, than anie force or perſwaſion, that hee could vſe, would ſend them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, preſuming more on the great gifts which he ment to beſtow vpon them, than on his Armie that ſhould keepe them backe. Egypt was rich; and halfe the riches thereof had not bene ill ſpent in ſauing all. Yet Pſammiticus tooke the moſt likely courſe, whereby to make his part good againſt them by ſtrong hand, in caſe they had bene ſo obſtinate as to reſuſe all indifferent compoſition. For hee lay cloſe vpon the edge of the Wilderneſſe in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermoſt border of Palaſtina: whence hee neuer advanced to meet with the Scythians; but gaue them leaſe to feele as much of the ſcalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Aſcalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did hee ſlay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke ſo much the better, by how much the worſe they were pleaſed with the heat of a Climate ſo farre different from their owne. Pſammiticus had at his backe a vaſt wilderneſſe, ouer the ſcorching ſands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrarie diſtempers, could ill haue indured to purſue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they fought with him and preuailed: eſpecially the Kingdome of Egypt being readie to entertaine him with reliets, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie iourne. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to viſite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (beſides that he preferred his owne Eſtate from a dangerous aduenture, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him) found all his Coſt well repayed in the proceſſe of his warres in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to moleſt him, being more then euer troubled themſelues, with the returne of their oppreſſors. For the Scythians, reſolving now to ſeek no further, beganne to demaund more than the Tribute formerly impoſed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grieuous exactions, they preſumed to liue at diſcretion vpon the Countrie, taking what they liſted from the Owners; and manie times (as it were to ſaue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they longed ouer the higher Aſia, that is, ouer the Countrie lying betwene the Caspian and Red Seas, and betwene India and Aſia the leſſe. Happie it was for the poore people, that in ſo large a ſpace of ground, there was room enough for theſe new comers; otherwiſe the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon thoſe priuate men, to whoſe wealth anie Scythian did beare a fancie, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few alie, and none able to relieue their fellows. Yet it ſeemes that the heauieſt burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrie not farre from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the conſtitution of their bodies; there alſo it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their inſolent Rule was taken from them.

Herod. lib. 1.

Cyxares King of the Medes, who in this extremitie was no better then a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay vnmanured and waſte, through the negligence of his people; that were out of heart by daily oppreſſions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, reſolved to proue what might be done by ſtratagem. The managing of the buſineſſe is thus deliuered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, ſcaſted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunke; and ſlew them; recovering hereby the poſſeſſion of all that they had loſt.

Such another ſlaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countreymen, with greater cruelties than euer they had practiſed before. That the Scythians, which eſcaped this bloudie feaſt, made any ſtirre in Media, I doe not find; neither doe I read that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuaſion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media was verie strong, and encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse then it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuce of Cyaxares to free his Countrie, tooke good effect, with lesse bloud-shed than hath bene supposed: For if hee surpris'd all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse, in eight and twentie yeares, had so well fetled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Countrie; many (of whom I shall speake anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to 10 returne home, with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe joyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to haue bene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderstood, that a great part of the Seythians, vpon hope of gain, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject vnto Nabuchadnezzar: mens loue of their wealth being most effectfull, in taming the more vnquiet ioue of inordinate • libertie. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, so in his first beginning of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing, had bene accustom'd, 20 to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: and this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to such addition as is of new forces.

Of the Seythian Armie returning out of Media, diuerse Authours report a Story, which confirmes mee in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new seate, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Seythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-felloses to their slaues. These got a lustie brood of youths, that were loath to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were only the children of slaues,
 30 which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Seythians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens eyes) it mult needs be that they were verie Boyes, or else that the Women did verie little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleuee the tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning home wards, which I will set downe, as I find it, in M^r. Doct^r Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They vnderstood by the way that their Cholopy, or Bond-slaues whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Townes, Lands, Houses, Wiues, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet displaying the Villanie of their seruants, they made the more speed home: and so not farre 40 from Novograd, met them in warlike manner marching against them. Wherevpon advising what was best to be done, they agreed all to set upon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whips which as their manner is euery man rideth with all to put them in remembrance of their seruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onset. Which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and strooke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheep before the Driners. In memorie of this victorie, the Novogradians euer since haue stamped their Coine (which they call a Dinggo Novogradskoy, currant through all Russia with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip in his hand. It may seeme, that all the 50 women of that Countrie, haue fared the worse euer since, in regard of this vniuersall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscouian Wife, euen in time of wooing, sends to him that shal be her husband, in token of subjection; being well assured, to feele it often on her own loines. But this was a Document vnto the Seythians, or rather

Sarmatians,

Sarmatians, (for Novograd stands in the Countrey that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their Wiues; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set downe of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countreies; but for that it appears to haue bene a great cause, of the Aegyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Iudaea, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

p. V.

Of Princes living in diuerse Countreies, in these ages.

Having thus farre digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoid all further occasion of doing the like, I will here inserte a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasse, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Aegyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much, as I thought needfull. In Perse, Zulius Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth year of Tosias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding Raigned Foure and twentie yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but verie rich, preuailed so far by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, dis-appointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He beganne in the fourth year of Zedekias, and Raigned eight and thirtie yeeres. In this time it was, namely in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedaemonians, bethinking them how to bee auenged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former warre, entred the Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Philia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacida made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeeres; leauing for successeour his sonne Periander, one of the seuen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, strippd all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue that the wisdome of the Greekes, was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Countrey.

Draco In these times also were Zaleucus, and Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with blood: for hee rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his constitutions were soone abrogated, and power giuen to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were verie milde. He forbid any Gentlewoman to walke abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, vnlesse it were when shee was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse herselfe vp in immodest brauerie, vnlesse it were to inuigile a loue. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would fisme, in breaking the Statutes, to bein such causes challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of iustice, that when his owne sonne had committed adulterie, and was therefore to loose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the yong man (who also lost one) from vtter blindnesse.

// I shall not henceforth need, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time.

time. The Chaldeans will soone fall vnder the Persians; the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greeke; the Greeke, with the Romans; the Romans, with manie Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estates; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirtie hundred yeares, which passed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Ierusalem, we finde little matter, wherein the Historie of Israel had anie dealing with other Nations; than the verie nearest borderers. Yet reade we of manie Kingdomes, that in these manie ages, were erected, and throwne downe; as likewise, manie memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at anie neare distance; all which must haue bene quite omitted, or else referred vnto a verie vnreasonable rehearfall, had they not bene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniencie, may pardon the negligence.

§. VI.

The oppression of Iudaea, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to returne to the Ierish Storie, from whence we haue so farre digressed. In the third yeare of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entred Iudaea with a great Armie, who beseiging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despite of Neco, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but staid not to search them thoroughly; for Neco 30 hastened to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonosor in Iudaea; wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armie, it being a Countrie of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, anie great strength of Scythian horsemen in his Armie, it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrie, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home; and take possession of his owne Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not readie to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeare came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Neco. In this yeare 40 the Babylonian lying vpon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-side) attended the arriuall of Neco. There, after a resolu'd contention for victorie, Neco was slaine, and his Armie remaying forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victorie Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recouered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Egyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldean the yeare before; who contented with such profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to laie anie Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole reservednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammis, who succeeded vnto Neco, beganne to thinke vpon restoring Iehosaz, taken Prisoner by his 50 father, and setting him vp, as a Domestical Enemy, against his vngratefull brother. Against Against all such accidents, the Indean had prepared the vidual remedie, practised by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne Ionne Iechonis King with him long before, in the second year of his owne Raigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeeres olde. As for this rumour of Iehozabaz his returne; the Prophet Ieremie fortold, that it should prouide, saying: he shall not returne thither, but hee shall die in the place whither they haue led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, hauing spent all their Mercenarie forces, and recieued that heaue blow at Carchemiss, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe Steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Neco was not in Egyptus. A Prize who Raigned after Psammitis, did once aduventure to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduentering the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with braud words, telling such frivolous tales, as men, that meane to doe nothing, vs, of their glorious acts: for satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand, the sinceritie of his affliction towards them; which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptorie message to Iehoiakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding therunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Indean lay aside all thought of in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor for three yeeres. At this time Ieremie the Prophet cried out against the Iewes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twentie yeeres exhorted them to repentance, but because they had slopt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seuentie yeeres. The same calamitie hee threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of His furie, whom they had forsaken, and after the seuentie yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same cup, and be vtterly subuerted by the Medes, & the Indeans; permitted to return againe into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Ieremie seemes to haue beene in the fourth year of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom hee sent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King; but fearing the Kings furie they had first set Ieremie at libertie, and aduised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Iehoiakim after hee heard a part of it and perceived the ill newes therein deliuered, made no more adoe but did cut the Booke in peices and cast it into the fire. All which Ieremie caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead bodie of Iehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and that there should be none of his seede to sit on the Throne of Dauid.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tribute to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptians; the mightie Citie of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; and vpon iust confidence of her owne strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seuentie yeeres, was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, and other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, haue faire authority for their warrant. Wherevpon likewise it follows of necessitie, that the siege thereof beganne in the seuenth of his Raigne; as hauing 50 lasted thirteene yeeres.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the severall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule; wherevpon hath risen much disputation. The third yeere of Iehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being deliuered delivered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had revolted from him vnto Phrao Neoa, and sent this Noble Prince, his sonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same yeare. The yeare next following, being the fourth of Iehoiakim, was the first of Nabuchadnezzar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expresse wordes; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeare he conquered Egypt; and then beganne to Raigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durit offend him. The second from this yeare it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundrie Mettals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which beganne in the seventh of his Raigne.

The Citie of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was diuided from the maine, by a deep & broad channel of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrans, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vse them, excelled all other Nations; and euerie Winde, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; wherof neuertheless the iudgements of God (denounced against it by ¹⁰ Ezra, Ieremie, Ezechiel) had threatened the destruction; and the obtinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, vnderooke a vast piece of worke; euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citie of olde Tyris, that stood opposite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libanus nere adjoining that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeares were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remainyng of Nabuchodonosors Petre; and being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seuen months ere hee could make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carrie away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a shelue, with much more violence could it ouerturne, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe, struing as it were, to fill the emptie bellie of this Cormorant; whereas the Aetacemian, did only stop the throat of it. Euerie man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleased him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vse the hand of man euen the hand of man struing, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans Euerie head was made bald, and euerie shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not giue ouer till he was master of the Towne.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice, whether it were so, that some losses receiued, some mutinie in his Armie; or (which is most likely, and so Iosephus reports it) some glorious rumours of the Aegyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Iehoiakim renounced his subjection, and beganne to hope for the contrarie of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leisure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Armie marched directly into Iudea; where the amazed ⁵⁰ King made so little resistance (the Aegyptians hauing left him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and laied hands on Iehoiakim: whom hee first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to bee slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Ass, to be deuoured by beastes and rauenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leauing in his place, Iehoiakim or Iechonias his sonnes whom after three months and tenne dayes Nabuchodonosor removed and sent Prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochaius, and Ioseph, the high Priest. The mother, of Iechonias together with his servants, Eunuchs, and all the able men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captives. This Iechonias, following the counsel of Ieremie the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he thereby avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an in-10 digator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we reade in generall wordes, that hee did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Vncle in the Kingdome of Iuda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Iustice of God. For like as Neco, King of Egypt, had formerly displaced Iehozabab, after his Father Iosias was slaine, and set vp Iehoiakim the sonne of another Mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Iehoiakim who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his sonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehozabab, whom Neco tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias hee required an oath for his faith full obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witness in the same, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeare of Zedechias, Ieremie saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes: the one signifying those Iudaans that were carried away captiue, the other those that staid, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Booke he gaue to Sberais, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visite Nabuchodonosor, willing him first to reade it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these wordes, Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This iourne of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to haue bene in way 30 of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those vnquiet courses, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which hee wore about his owne necke, others hee sent vnto the sixe Kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visite Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enioy their owne Countries; if not, they 40 should assuredly perill by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

Hee also foretolde them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Ierusalem, should also trauaile after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeare Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine, which Ieremie wore, in signe of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it. Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeares, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all these troubles. But Ieremie in stead of his wooden Yoke wore a Coller of yron: and in signe that Ananias had 50 giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, hee foretolde the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough betweene faith and passion, In the eight yeare of his Reigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aids of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose assistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian Yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, hee marched with his Armie in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and belieged it. Jeremie persuaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himselfe: but being confident of the helpe from Egypt and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the Kingdome of Juda should bee extirpate, vntill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Isaiah) hee despised the wordes of Jeremie and imprisoned him. For Jeremie had told the King, that the Citie should be 10 taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but bee taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Jerusalem being, the following year, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra according to Jeremie (Herodotus calleth him Aprie)
 20 entred the border of Juda, with his Armie, to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had bene the principall Author. But Jeremie gaue the Iewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to haue anie trust in the succours of Egypt: for hee assured them, that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans remoued from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprize, and taking Azai in their way homeward returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poore people of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their first extremitie, had manumised their Hebrew Bondmen (as Gods Law required at the year of Iubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had bene at an end, held them perforce to their former, slaueerie. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremie, when the State of Jerusalem beganne now to grow to extremitie, counsell'd Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring 30 him of his owne life, and the safetie of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perjurie, had prouided for him.

Three and twentie Moneths (as some doe reckon it) or according to Iosephus
 40 eigheteene; the Babylonian Armie lay before Jerusalem, and held it exceeding streightly belieged. For they built Forts againe it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extrinsecant contra eam turres lignearum per circuitum, they surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, so as the besieged could neither fall out, nor receive into the Citie any supply of men or victuals. Iosephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, with high Towers raised vpon mounts; from which they did so beat vpon the 50 Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their stations. Now although it were so that the belieged also raised Counterbuildings, like vnto these, Yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions therabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to obey him, found meanes to overthrow all the Citizens endeuours; and to beat downe as fast from without, as they raised from within; the bodie and foundation of his owne workes being guarded by the Walls of Jerusalem interposed; and theirs within, laid open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both famine and pestilence (which commonly accompany men streightly belieged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, when the number, strength; and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entrie, their Dauies did seat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable sight, and finding no remedie of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once, and shitted himselfe together with his Wiues, Children, Princes, and principall seruants, out of the Citie, by a way vnder ground; leaving his amazed and guiltlesse people, to the mercilesse swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremie the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the Counsell of God and the force of Nabuchodonosor; wied now that remedie, which Walphrus truly termeth: triste, turpe, & infelix, uolunt, foamefull, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recouered (by the helpe of the darke night) the plaines or deserts of Jericho: but by reason of the trace, that followed him and his, (cuerie one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) hee was easily traced and purified. How great sooner the companie was that attended on him, yet, as Iosephus reports it, they on whose fidelitie he most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselues into the Delarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conuighed to Rebis or Reblat a Citie (as some thinke) of Zeephtim, where Nabuchodonosor then laie, as a place indifferent betweene Jerusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laied before Zedechias the manie graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable falsehood and perurie where-with he had requited them; he commaunded his Children, Princes, and Friends to be slaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that euer hee should behold in the World, hee caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a stauish manner to Babel, where hee consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most maruclous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Aduicam cum in Babylonem & ipsam non uidebit. I will bring him into Babylon and he shall not see it.

This in the Eleuenth and last year of Zedechias which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the Citie by force; where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the yeare next following, Nabuzardan, General of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the tenth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood 30 foure hundred thirtie and one yeares.

After this vpon a second search, Nabuzardan (nor yet satiated with bloud) commaunded seauentie and two others to bee slaughtered, which had hidden themselues from the first sune, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House, should seruants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judea, and leauing the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: ouer whom he left Governour, Godolias the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iosias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his iustice and equitie, by Iosephus highly commended: This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Jeremies desire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordained by God to exercise his iustice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Jeremie being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Judea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godolias, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Jemes that were left vnder his charge, promising them fauour and libertie. So long as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom hee was established Prouinciall Governour of his owne Nation.

But ere that yeare was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by tenne other chofen men, while Godolias feasted them in Mispha or Mispha, the Citie of his residence, traiterously slew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jewes that accompanied him. This done, hee made an escape, and in his way encountering with eightie persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover vnto him some Treasures, hidden in the fields during the warre. He also tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonosor. This practise and intent of Ismael had bene formerly discovered vnto Godoliah by Iohanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jewes; but Godoliah was incredulous.

10 Judea being now left without a Governour (for Ismael durst not take it vpon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to flie away into Egypt, and besought Jeremie to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judea, God would prouide for them and shew them mercie; but if they sought to saue themselves in Egypt, that they should then vndoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this aduice, the Jewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremie and Baruch to accompany them, they traualled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, nere vnto Taphnes: where, when Jeremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, he was by these his own hard-hearted and vngatefull Countymen, toned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reuerenced him, buried nere the Sepulchre of their own

HE course of Time; which in prophane Histo- 236 ries might rather bee discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, hauing once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the account from
 cable to actions concurrent, than were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date, begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discouer the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the storie of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the original and progresse of things could ill bee sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp are not to be found among those, that haue now no state nor policie

police remaining of their owne. Having therefore pursued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of succeeding accidents is with little interruption or fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the historie of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of Iudricke metalls, discovered by God vnto Nabuchadnezzar, did raigne ouer the earth, when Israd was either none, or an vnraged Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to insilt vpon those authorities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine yeare of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that Kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the yeares of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to rely vpon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmonic, which some haue found in the yeares of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preferre their names, which otherwise might haue bene forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoeuer it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what yeare his raigne beganne or ended, were it not that the raigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discover the meanes of connecting the sacred and prophane histories. For vnder Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Juda, which ended when 70. yeares were expired; and these 70. yeares tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne affords vs meanes of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeare of Cyrus his raigne in Persia, by general consent, is ioyned with the first yeare of the 55. Olympiads, where, that he raigned three and twentie yeares before his Monarchie, and seuen yeares afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuersie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeares vnto the distance betwene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may easily arrue vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundrie parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and indultrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to set downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are the markes whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeares of the world, through any storie, with least interruption, it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe our selues truly of the 70. yeares, during which it continued, euen from Nabuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

A briefe rehearsal of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an answer to the cauals of PORPHYRIE, touching againe S. MATTHEW, and DANIEL, vpon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

10 MAny Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde, that the captiuitie then beganne when Iechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleuen yeare before the finall destruction of Ierusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine distinction betweene the beginning of the captiuitie, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these wordes. In the five and twentieth yeare of our being in captiuitie in the beginning of the yeare, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth yeare after that the Citie was smitten. In which wordes hee begetteth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleuen yeares before the Citie was destroyed. Berosaldus is of opinion that it beganne in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Ioaquim, which hee ende-20 uours to proue out of the second of Chironides, but more especially out of S. Matthew, and Daniel, whose wordes afford matter of long disputation, but serue not to make good so much as Berosaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christi- an religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not vnderstanding how the sonnes of King Iudas were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Por- phyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious booke written against the Christians, 30 affirming that these prophecies and visions remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neare the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, haue sufficiently answered. For the seuentie Interpreters who conuerted the old Testament about an hundred yeare before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greece, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Por- phyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who liued diuers yeares before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iudas the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Ierusalem to haue destroyed it, this booke of Dani- 40 el, wherein he beheld his owne glorie foretold, as the same was plainly expounded vnto him; which not only staid his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Palsterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in Phoenicia.

It is true indeede that the Iewes themselves giue lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accounting his booke among those which they call Ceta- phim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say Esdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonically: secondly, that it 50 was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may assure our selues by testimony of Councils, and Fathers: For in the Councell of Laudicea held about the yeare of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and fortie yeares, this booke of Daniel was received, verified, and confirmed among the other Canonick Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Councill it may be seene, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesseth Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall historie, the fourth booke, and five and twentieth chapter, so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonick booke vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde S. Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzen, and others. For the Hagiographa booke or holy Writings the Jewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalmes, Proverbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Efra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not *Esdra*s, that wrote this booke, Gods commande- 10 ment vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vn-answerable testimonie. Yea which exceedeth all strength of other prooffe, our Sa-uiour Christ who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew and Marke alleageth Math. 24. 17. Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his nineteenth chapter. Further, in the Mark. 13. 14. the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth Dan. 12. verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of *Daniel*s visions.

§. III.

That the 70. yeares of captiuitie are to be numbred from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of IECHONIA.

AVING thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authoritie, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeares. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weaknesse of that which Eusebius 30 and some few namelesse Authors, haue sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Berosidas; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

FOURE Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeares is referred by none that I haue read; to the second by few and with weake prooffe; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel 40 alreadie cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of *Ieremie*s, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vseth these words. Thus saith the Lord: After 70. yeares Ierem. 29. 10. be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeede with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a propheticie out of circumstances, when the propheticie is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had alreadie, in the fourth yeare of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impienitie of that oblitinate people, in these wordes. Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nabuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and

and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladnesse, the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70. years. And when 70. years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here wee see prescribed vnto the captiuitie the terme of 70. yeares, which were to commence, neither when the prophetic was vnttered; nor when Jehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Jechonias; but with the vter desolation of the Citie, whereof Jeremie did againe giue notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophetic, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeares at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the Historie of Juda, where it is said thus. They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him and to his sonnes, vntill the Kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of IEREMIA, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeares. But in the first yeare of CYRVS King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of IEREMIA, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of CYRVS. Wee seldome find one peece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this Prophetic, to haue afterwards bene the Subiect of alteration. For one can hardly deuise, how either the desolation could haue bene expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the euent of the prophetic haue bene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it bee requisite that we bring more prooffe in so euident a case, the ninth chapter of Daniel yeelds testimonie sufficient, vnto this exposition of Jeremias his prophetic, that Jerusalem was to lie wast 70. yeares. For in the first yeare of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had bene promised by prayer, which he made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth vs in these wordes. In the first yeare of his raigne, I DANIEL vnderstood by bookes the number of the yeares, whereof the Lord had spoken vnto IEREMIA the Prophet, that hee would accomplish 70. yeares in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that how soeuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie bee reckoned from the taking of Jehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Jechonias, did accompt, as well they might, the yeares of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall desolation of the Countrey, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabit, beganne in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor the great captiuitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of 70. yeares. This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authoritie of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which alreadye hath bene produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

§. IIII.

Sundrie opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. years.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these 70. years of the captiuitie, and how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Ithreania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnez.zar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honor of his Majestie, where it may seeme that he and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argueno lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnez.zar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie peece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of Tyre, by ioyning it vnto the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peece of earth, and other matter, the reparation whercof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the enemye than their bowes would carrie, but were readie to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Xenophon. Cyropid. lib. 1.

Xenophon. Cyropid. lib. 1. c. 63.

Now as their actions, from the end of Nebuchadnez.zars warres, till theruine of their Empire, were not worthie to be recorded, so was the distinction of their times, and raigne of their severall Kings, vnworthie of the great labour that hath in vaine bene taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. years, we may as reasonably forebear to search into the particular continuance of two or three Southfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children, liuing in the Egyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many haue traualled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. years, not only by the reignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kinges themselves, and in setting downe the years of their severall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerey follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name only three Kinges, Nebuchadnez.zar, Eulmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophetic of Jeremie precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all would dispose of all, according to his owne will, and making it knowne that he had some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, vntill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kinges shall serue themselves of him. These wordes expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kinges, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But in deede I finde no other necessitie of qualification to be vsed herein than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vniuit, if the content of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy T ext were single on the other side.

But contrarywise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are so slender and vn sufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but onely set downe by some Author of equall credite with the rest, might verie well haue found and deserued as good beliefe, as anie of those things which they haue deliuered in this point. For some there are, who following Iosephus, deriue that Empire, as by descent from father to sonne, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeeres, to Euilmerodach 18, to Niglissar the son of Euilmerodach 40, to Labosardach the sonne of Niglissar 9. months, and lally to Balthasar (whom Iosephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeeres. And this opinion (saue that he forebares to reckon the yeeres, and plainly calles Balthasar the sonne of Labosardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alludging Berosus, and Iosephus as a sectator of Berosus for his Authors; though Berosus as he is cited by Iosephus, report the matter farre otherwise. For he tells vs that Euilmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did 20 raigne but 2 yeeres, being for his wickednesse and lust, flaine by his sisters husband Niglissar, who occupied the kingdome after him 4 yeeres, and left it to his owne sonne Labosardach, who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of 9 months flaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeeres. This relation ill agrees with that of Iosephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number eyther of yeeres, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them some authoritie, so that the names which they haue inserted, are taken as it were vpon trust. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last Kings brethren, and sonnes of Euilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleue Xenophon, who saith that the last king of Babylon was immediate succedour to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betwene him that took Ierusalem, and Euilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plaine it is that he hath, out of any Historie sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius, Securus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Euilmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his sonne. And so common grew this explication, that Saint Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Ieremy before cited, prouoes that Balthasar was not the sonne indeede, but the grand-child of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the sonne.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the 70 yeeres of captiuitie, giuing to Nabuchodonosor 45 yeeres, to Euilmerodach 30 yeeres, and to the three sonnes of Euilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonosor 14 yeeres; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest sonne three yeeres, to Lab-Assar the second sonne six yeeres, and to Balthasar the third sonne five.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of 50 yeeres, and in the number of generations, I haue sometime subscribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not fittisfe my selfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserue to be regarded, haue consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar to succede vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whole Historie of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I can not lightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

 Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthasar, by Annus his Metaphisenes, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70 yeares hee pleased among the rest. For in the third yeare of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when hee rose vp he did the kings bulesse: from 10 which bulesse, that hee did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and liue retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to let out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeares haue beene worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceipt, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annus his impostures.

Dan. 1. 9. 11. 13. & 15.

Dan. 2. 49.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70 20 yeares, and these yeares extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nabuchadnezzar, his sonne and grand-child, must haue reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeares of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuitie, with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Euitmerodach and Balthasar, ioyned vnto the yeares following the nineteene of Nabuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euen.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeares of Euitmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18 yeares giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28 yeares, and the two yeares 30 that Berosus hath allowed to Euitmerodach should be written 23: in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the later there should haue bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2): this granted (to wit) that Euitmerodach reigned 28 yeares, whereof five together with his father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49, then 4 yeares of Niglisar according to Berosus, 9 moneths of Labassar his sonne, and 17 yeares of Labonidus or Balthasar make vp the number of 70 yeares to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken, in all copies extant; vpon how weake a foundation do they build, who haue nothing to helpe them, saue onely the bare 40 names of two vnkowne Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had beene entirely extant, were not worthe, to haue that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, 50 I purposely forbear to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answer. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserring to be considered apart from the rest. He giues to Nabuchadnezzar 44 yeares, to Euitmerodach 2, to Belsazer, 5: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the

the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus he accompteth onely 59 years; beginning (as many do) the captiuitie 11 years sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath beene said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running betwene the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition fruitles.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars raigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Eulimerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berofus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Ieremy, that this Eulimerodach in the first of his raigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eate bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continual portion giuen him of the King of Babel, every day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authoritie of Berofus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than 2 years, wherein Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commaundement he had obeyed in yielding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Iechonia did liue it can not be proued; but plaine it is hereby that all his remaining daies he did not eate bread before this King. Now that he liued not so short a while after this as 2 years, it is more than likely, for he was but 55 yeres old when he was set at liberty, having been 37 years in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18 years; after which time it seemes plaine that hee begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to haue bene but a yong man, and one of Darius his Pages three score years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belshazzar, to whom Scaliger giues the next siue years naming him also Laborsarodoch, I should wonder why he calles him Nabuchadnezzars daughters sonne; were it not that herein I find him very careful to helpe out Berofus, by shifting in his Niglisar, as husband to Nabuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his sonne 4 of these years; by which means there remains about one yeare to Belshazzar alone, agreeing neerely with the 9 moneths assigned by Berofus to the sonne of Niglisar. But Ieremy hath told vs that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sonnes sonne (not to his daughters sonne) that the Empire was promised; which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to passe it ouer with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these (whome others, desirous to reconcile Berofus to the Seriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthazar, is by Scaliger thought to bee Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berofian; for Berofus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the traualle of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and iudgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to shew that he himselfe hauing in some points disliked those Writers, whome in generall he approueth, might with greater reason haue wholly reformed them by the Seriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whome Berofus calles Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Seripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not saying that hee wanne it by force of armes; Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, so or of the Greeke translation, which expresseing no force of armes doth only signifie, that Darius tooke or receiued the kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next king entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthazars death, but only the swift accomplishment of his owne prophetic. Neither could it indeede haue properly bene said (if Daniel niel had cared to vse the most expresse termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the cite, did win the kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vse. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the year 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpharus; That Nabuchodonosor, was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine furie, he cried with a loude voice. O Babylonians, I foretell yee of a great calamitie that shall come vpon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the Gods shall auert: There will come a Perlian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring slavery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I beleue little or nothing, sauing that Nabuchodonosor knew before hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copie of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Africa and Spain, I beleue the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moued with the authoritie of it, where it calles a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians, as where it tells of Nabuchodonosor his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the coninnitie and coherence which it hath within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proues nothing, for more fictions haue not wanted their commendations: neither can any man beleue that one so iudicious, industrious and deeply learned as Ioseph Scaliger, would ouer-shoote himselfe in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it seemes that Scaliger, well knowing his owne sufficiency, hath bene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophetic of Daniel were true, that the kingdome of Balthasar was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians; either wee must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must thinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and kingdome, than that his kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue bene Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect provinces, in somuch that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece. The warres of the Medes. Yeat to clear this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chromologers were not to haue beene condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldeen King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein hee varied from Berosus, and others, whose authoritie else where hee gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to beleue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniel, whom I beleue that hee vnderstoode as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect, of the same things things that were contained in the writings of the Jewes, to whose histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Euen so doe Enselmus, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of heathen books making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in generally by the selfe same Ethnick philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth, as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meete to say of Saunders opinion in this point; holding neuerthelesse in due regard his learning and iudgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had bin very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Person and Times of NABUCHODONOSOR his successors.

THOW remains that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknes, who cannot find how the 70. yeares of captiuitie are to be diuided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wisas already is rehearsed, be illagreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Pererius, that wee ought liberally to pardon those whose feete haue failed them in the slippery wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to haue reigned our Chaldeans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by Niglisar and Labosardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Emmerodach and Balhisar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of twenty yeares. First therefore lets consider the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yere Ierusalem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth layd vterly desolate.

Most of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeares of raigne, following therein Berosus. There are who haue added one yere more, and some haue made it vp 45. To dispute about the certaintie were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest it is, that the 19. yere of Nabuchadnezzar, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekia; as also that his eight yere, was the first yere of Iechonia his captiuitie; the raigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeares. This is generally agreed vpon, so that it needs no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Emmerodach, it was in the seuen and thirtieth yere of Iechonia his captiuitie; so that Nabuchadnezzar after his eight yere (which was the first of Iechonia his bondage) reigned 35. whole yeares, and peradventure a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Iechonia was enlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the yere. Subtracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nabuchadnezzar raigne did well-near occupy, those eightene yeares of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the citie, we haue remaining fixe and twenty yeares of the seuentie, that were almost wholly spent, when his sonne began to raigne.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seuentie yeares were diuided betwene the kings ruling in Babylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needefull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slouthfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeares, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniectural; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others haue done; knowing well before hand, that whoeuer shall discouer my error, must doe mee the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making mee to vnderstand the truth.

Of the foure and fortie yeares remaining in accompt at Nabuchadnezzars death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authoritie God enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs fuentene yeares to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow vpon Eulmerodach sixe and twentie yeares. Of the yeare belonging to Darius the Mede I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deluering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captiuitie. That Balthasar did raigne fuentene yeares, we haue the authoritie of Iosephus, before cited in expresse wordes; We haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who raigned so long and Balthasar to haue beene one. But nothing moueth mee so much to belecue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeare of Balthasar he followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his raigne, (a prooffe sufficient of no few yeares, passing vnder this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments tooke end either that yeare or the next.) Secondly the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though we make large allowance to his deedes in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I haue already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the raigne of Eulmerodach was not short: and that men of great iudgment haue found it most probable that hee was King three and twentie yeares. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that booke of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yett confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enimie. How much lesse ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nabuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, we finde not expresse; yett would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach vs provided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroy not thereby the generall truth. More wordes are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelesnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for sixe and twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a nearer resemblance of 8 than hath 7 which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes 8 5 expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie; and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in 8 7 standing for 23, I doe not well perceiue. As for the arithmeticall figures now in vs, they were were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine to this bulineffe; vnlesse we should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a fort wholly giuen over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it be, if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Jeremie, and Daniel, when they seeme his opposites.

§. VII.

of the victories which NABUCHODONOSOR obtained betwene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of Egypt.

W Ith what actions this time of 70. yeares was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little remaining in record. Which may peradventure haue bene some cause that the umetick life was, and is yet sought to be abridged, as not having leife sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well

- 20 deny to many people euen their being. For euey Nation (I know not whom I should except) betwene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some flourishfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruaile, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hearts could haue desired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wisdom great, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Anceitors, which wearied away their daies in the restless traualle of purchasing. Though indeede the raigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuided, that his youthfull and stronger yeares hauing bene exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours past.
- 30 The nineteenth yeare of his raigne it was, when destroying vterly the great and mightie Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoile, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, vntill his three and twentieth yeare, he laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely the Edomites, Moaabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were alreadye become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrians whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-Arme, and
- 40 whose fleet was so strong that they needed not to feare anyemie at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obdinate resolution of this mightie Prince, imploying all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyris did, and endured all that might be in the same quarrell against the common enimie) it appears by the wordes which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyris; AN A, the gate Ezechiel 26. of the people is broken, it is turned vnto mee; for seeing shee is desolate, I shall bee replenished. Yet at the length, euen in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his whereof wee haue alreadye spoken, beganne to appeare about the waters, and threaten them with ineuitable mischiefe.

50 But those prophecies of Jeremie and of Esaie, which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeares, that was prescribed vnto the raigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainly shew, that these followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vterly lost. Thus much wee finde, That the Citizens perceiving the Towne vnable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuertheless it seemes that this euasion serued only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For not only such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which with excellent labour the Affirian made way for his Horsedand Chariots. Thus NABUCHODONOSOR caused his Armie to serue a great seruice against TYRE, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had he no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honor of hauing destroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had bene held inuincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, NABUCHODONOSOR vsed the aduantage of that reputation which hee had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Egypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Countrie so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himself strong enough, to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre anemie to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it bene poorer, yet either it muſt haue bene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue bene established. Neuertheless it was needefull that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countreys adiacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his disposal, or at least be vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurd, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding only their owne gaine had some of them, like Raucens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feede vpon the carcases that fell by the crueltie thereof; others taking aduantage of their Neighbours miseries, occupied the Countreys which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Affirian had satished his furie, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particularly the Edomites and Phisistims had shewed much malice to the Iewes when their Citie was taken. What good seruice they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any it is likely to haue been with reference to their owne purposes, where in they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entred vpon the Countrey of Gad, and tooke possession, as if not the Affirians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practise had of Baalus King of the Ammonites, when hee sent Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouvernour ouer those that remained in Israel, and to carrie captiue into the Ammonites Countrey the people that abode in Manzaph, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Countrey, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conueniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon deserts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vitermost cunning of their cheeuill wits. But Nabuchodonosor did cut asunder all their devices by sharpe and suddaine warre, ouer-whelming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, who fore-told, with little difference of wordes, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie ferie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seemes that Mosab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophetic of Esay, threatening Mosab with destruction after three yeares, as hauing reference to the third yeare following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next yeare after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaues, few excepted, who being preferred by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but liued as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, vntill the end of the seuentie yeares, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

§. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein raising slaine by NABUCHODONOSOR, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who following HERODOTVS and DIODORVS, relate it otherwise.

20 When by a long course of victorie Nabuchodonosor had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise that no enemy to himselfe, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did hee forth-wit take in hand the conquest of Egypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly bene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets Esay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, haue written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authority, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuerthelessse we finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as giues to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of hauing done some spoile in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helps conducing to their purpose, that often-times they preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vp-hold a sentence giuing testimonie to one clause, doe carelesly ouerthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke: but that which they haue spoken of Apries, was purposely referred vnto this place. Herodotus affirms that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein hee telleth not; (vnlesse we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre which he is said to haue made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that hee reigned five and twentie yeares, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne subiects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which preuailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroyed. This calamitie the people of Egypt thought to bee well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous 30 expedition, with a purpose to haue them consumed, that so hee might with greater securitie raigne ouer such as staid at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captaine of the rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust vnto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom hee kept in readinesse thirtie thousand good Souldiours that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquished by the great numbers of the Egyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, vntill the Egyptians, exclaiming vpon him as an extreme enemie to the land, got him deliuered into their hands, and strangled him, yet gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Hierodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus neerely agrees, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Egyptians and Phoenicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sidon, wanne the other townes of Phoenicia, and the Ile of Cyprus, and finally perished as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twentie yeares. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his historie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, fore-told by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefs, than haue the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to persuade those that looke only into humane reasons. For Esay prophesied long before of the shameful captiuitie of the Egyptians, whom the King of Asshur should carry away naked, yong and old, in such wise that the Iewes who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so vnable to defend themselves.

But Ezechiel and Jeremy, as their prophesies were nearer to the time of Execution, so they handled this Argument more precisely. For Ezechiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nabuchadnezzar, as wages for the seruice which hee had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed and goe into captiuitie, yea, that PHARAOH and all his arme should be slaying by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent exposition of these Prophesies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed vnto Apries, by force indeede, but by the vniforme consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Iewes in Egypt should see Pharaoh Hophra deliuered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had beene, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion whereof Hierodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath over-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hill, those very stones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his paullion spread. Yea then was that prophesie no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus. Behold, I will visite the common people of EGYPT, and PHARAOH and Egypt, with their Gods and their Kings, euen PHARAOH, and all that trust in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of those that seeke their liues, and into the hand of NABUCHADNEZZAR King of Babel, and into the hands of his seruants. The clearnes of this prophesie being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherefore looking vpon Iunius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Esopbra to be Amasis, and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Hierodotus with lies, coined vpon a vaine-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the historie of Nabuchadnezzar, was better knowne to the Iewes whom it concerned, than to the Greekes that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather

CHAP. I. §. 9. of the Historie of the World.

10 their believe Iosephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three & twentieth year of his raigne, and the first year of the destruction of Ierusalem, did conquer Ægypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Hierocottus or Diodore; who being mere strangers to this businesse had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of fauthorithy, we should only consider the relations of Iosephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might be verified if it fell by apparant circumstances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets or Ægyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be appro-15 ued as having beene wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspition; yea though no man had opposed the reports of Hierosolatus and Diodore.
 For the great love and honour which the Ægyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimonie of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having wonne great victories, did for one only losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may serue to perswade vs, that a King of Ægypt would seeke, or to demean himselfe, that he might be thought to seeke the destruction of his naturall subiects? As for that arme of thirtie thousand sould-iours Carians and Ionians, which the King of Ægypt whom Amasis tooke prisoner, 20 is said to haue kept for his defence: doth it not argue that hee was a forrainger, and one that armed himselfe against the Ægyptians, wishing them few and weak, e rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than a way needefull, to vse all Arguments that might be alleadged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to haue kept him alieue, doth intimate that hee was some forren Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would haue desired to saue his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not haue yeelded, though it had 30 stood vpon great apparance of truth, considering that the voyce of Truth it selfe cries out against it; but leaue the circumstances prouing the Conquest of Ægypt by Nabuchodonosor to be obserued, where due occasion in course of the storie following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by NABUCHADNEZZAR.

40 Tis a great losse, that the general Historie of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waite which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should haue preferred the memorie of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonosor, wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now un-certaine. That his victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his dominion, than all his former warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Eusebius: who reckons vp in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Country of Ægypt) Phis and And, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Assyrians, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these warres are in a manner vtterly lost, 50 but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument.
 Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obseruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe safe in Ægypt by the well defended situation of his Country, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this bulniffe did more harden than warrerie the Chaldean army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Egyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make through the Arabian deserts, and the much aduantage which the great riuer of Nilus would afford vnto themselves, did litle auail them in prouision for the warre, and much alittlein them (as may iustly be thought) in the time of execution: it being vsually seene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helpes faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the kingdome of Egypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand six hundred and foure score years; but from this time forward it remained fortie years without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians, and then at length it began to recouer by litle and litle the former greatnes, yet so, that it was neuer dreadful vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath bene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wise, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The Riuer is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the riuer failed them, the King himselfe was taken and slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezar, at which time (saith Iosephus) hee slew the King then reigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the Iewes whom hee found in that Countrey. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this bulniffe, and the bulniffe it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three and twentieth yeare of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, is not vnprobably thought by good authors to haue bene at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tells vs that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nabuchadnezar, we must vnderstand, that he was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some haue mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his raigne in the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezar, were as well repugnant vnto the Prophecies before alleaged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconuenience imagine that there were two successiuiy bearing the name of Amasis; others that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nabuchadnezar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being oncgranted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life and kingdome by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the deputie of Nabuchadnezar, seeing that hee was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phenicians, who were, before the Egyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde perhaps, that he whom Nabuchadnezar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; vnlesse wee should thinke that hee had bene a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Countrey: about which it were but frivulous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleue, that Nabuchadnezar made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may guesse, that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authoritie of Iosephus; that this Governour (or some successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probabilitye enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others vie their libertie, and beleue what they list. As for the armie which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garrisons of mercenarie souldiours which were left by the Assyrian for for the guard of his Viceroy, and custodie of the new subdued Prouince : as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembered before out of the Greece Historians, deposed and slew Apries, & take them to have bene the Aegyptian fugitives which then recovered their owne Countrie. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of forty yeares will I gather the Aegyptians from the people wherethey weree scattered, and I will bring againe the captiuitie of Aegypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdome. If the Aegyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deuided matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

Of the sundry accounts drawne from sundry acts of NEBUCHADNEZZAR and of the destruction of Niniue; by him; the time of which action is vncertaine.

- 20 THESE victories brought the greatness of the Assyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnessars raigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnessar his times, might seeme to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third yeare of Iehoiakims raigne (which ranne along with some part of Nebuchadnessars first yeare) and was kept in diet three yeares more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nebuchadnessars Kingdome, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dreame of the great image, foretelling the succession of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which hee referre sundry matters vnto their set yeares; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where hee fore-tells that Aegypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Tyrus, dating his prophecie in the seven and twentieth yeare; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeares held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nebuchadnessars Kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorable action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search.
- 30 Of any warre made by Nebuchadnessar after such times as hee returned from the Conquest of Aegypt I do not reade: excepting that against Niniue, the destruction whereof was fore-tolde by the Prophet Nahum. Niniue had long before bene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath bene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldeans, as Iehoiakim & Zedekias tributary Kings of Iuda had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Niniue followed the Conquest of Aegypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betwene this Citie that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Aegypt that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) vnpossible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnessars raigne; the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disproue it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which beganne at the end of the Aegyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nahum which went betwene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time inter-current. So that to enquire into the very year of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether menaged by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine cunioitie of Tyberius Caesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Heccubus; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seeke to learne what woman that Herzab Queen of Babylone was, whose wooll captiuitie the same Prophet Naam likewise did fore-tell.

DATA. 17.

F the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no monuments extant; save those which wee finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well that he brake out into these glorious words. Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my maiestie? Surely if those things be true that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasthenes, hee might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the aire, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue bene reared, and finished in fiftene daies.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferior to the poorest of men. And not vnderstandedly fell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouerie of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certaintie of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memorie, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: hee neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that hee caused a golden Imageto be set vp and worshipped; ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; velox obliuio veritatis, vt qui datum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statuum sibi fieri iubeat, vt ipse quasi Deus in statu adoraretur: Ad hanc forgetfulness of the truth, that hee who so lately had worshipped (DANIEL) the seruant of God, as if hee had bene God himselfe, should now command a Statue to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might be worshipped as God. From this impietie it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuerie of those blessed Saints out of the fierie fornace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatrie, were assisted by an Angell; preferred from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious wordes, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hallic zeale. Therefore was hee forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduised him to break off his sinne by righteousness, and his iniquitie by mercie towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seemes that that injustice and crueltie were the faults, for which hee was threatened, but this threatening sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men (according to the tenor of the dreame and interpretation) yea compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eate grasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans iudgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeares end. One whole yeares leisure to repent was giuen to this haughtie Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue months, walking in the roiall Palace of Babel, hee was so ouer-joyed and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced againt him, hee vttered those loftie wordes before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maicestall workes which he had reared, as well befeeming his maicestall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heauen, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, which was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon and many other Princes and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were punished for reioycing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde to keepe a iust measure) excepting only this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of David: for other (and some very godly) Kings haue mustred all their forces to the very last mans but few or none haue been knowne to haue been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to reioyce in those good things, wherewith God hath blessed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulnessse to entertaine them with a fullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than opacure cloudes, hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it vnto the brightnesse of eternall felicitie; so that insolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueth of his owne worth, doth aboue all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightning, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these mala mentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placcd further inward than sorowes, cares, and feares; not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlikely token of vengeance neare at hand, when these vnreasonable flutres of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should haue been humbled with a iust repentance and acknowledgement of ill deseruing.

This was verified vpon Nabuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexempld. For he ranne among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seuen yeares hee liued, not only as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast, for a beast hee thought him selfe secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed him selfe in the same manner, and with the same foode that beasts doe; Not that he was changed in figure external according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius only a woman; neither was he changed as Phigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be into a Hinde, nor made a Monke as Dorathus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Hieromes exposition of these wordes. At the same time was my vnderstanding restored vnto me, &c. Quando dicit (saith S. Hierome) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse sed mentem; When he saith that his sense was restored vnto him, he sheweth that hee had not lost his humane shape, but his vnderstanding. Seuen yeares expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodenezor, both to his vnderstanding, ding, and his estate, for which hee acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power and euerlasting being; that he was the Lord of heauen and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his saluation; namely S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyræ, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforesaid Authors apply the same to Balthesar, because Esay both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon ioyntly.

§. XII. Of EVILMERODACH.

AVING already spoken what I could of the succession and yeares of Nabuchadnezzars posteritie; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, which was forty yeares after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis foure and forty yeares of raigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him five and fiftie, saying that he died in the third yeare of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seuen and thirtie yeares, which passed betweene the second yeare of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the first of Cambyses his raigne, wherein hee wanted Egypt; of which seuen and thirtie yeares it is credibly held, that Psammennitus, the sonne of Amasis, raigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeares. But seeing that these two Greeke Historians haue bene abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruaile though they were also deceiued in the length of his raigne. This is the plain answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set downe in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Affyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Egypt, vntill the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath bene proud out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame, and reputation; gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foile receiued by the Affyrian invading Media, emboldened the Egyptians to rebell against him: I will neither vndertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tells that the first fruite of yong Cyrus in warre was vnder Affyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Affyrian Prince, who did let vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen yeares old. If therefore Cyrus liued threcore and thre yeares (as he is said to haue died well stricken in yeares) which is held to be the ordinarie terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeare of Evilmerodach his raigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre beganne more early betwene these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome Neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Affyrians, than in his flourishing estate elate they durst haue vsed. How foucer the quarrell beganne, wee finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Affyrrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proude to digest the losses which he receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew vnto his partie the Lydiens, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong persuasions, hoping so to ouerwhelme his Enemies with a strong inuasion, whome in vaine hee had sought to wearie out with a lingering Wars.

This happened after the death of Affyages, who left the World in the nineteenth yeare of Eulmerodach, at which time Assus tooke possession of Egypt. So that the Affyrrian hauing his handes alreadie full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, seemes thereby to haue giuen the better meanes vnto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did fundrie times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the faire more mightie Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Eulmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophesies, which were many yeares before vttered against Babel by Elsay and Jeremie.

For the Affyrrians, and their Confederates, who trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes, and Persians, vnder their thicke showers of arrowes and darts, were encountred with an armie of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battaile, wherein Eulmerodach was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and vp-held, being shaken and grievously crackt vnder his vnfortunate Sonne, was left to bee sustained by his unworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue overthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

Assus

§. XIII.

A private coniecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Eulmerodach, without wrong to the truth: the qualitie, and death of BALTHASAR.

40 Though I haue alreadie (as it seemes to mee) sufficiently proued that Balthasar was the Sonne, and immediate Succellour to Eulmerodach, yet considering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Niglisar or Niriglisaror, and his sonne Labisardach betwene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nictoris a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some error might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obserue, that the time which Berosus diuides betwixt Eulmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeares in which Nabuchodonosor liued wild among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddainesse of this accident, which came in one hour, could not but worke much perturbation in that state, wherein doublelesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pittied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had beene more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setting the government, whilēt the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the roiall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his Ioue Enilmerodach being to supplie the vter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the vnrepensse of it in yong, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vsfull workes about the Riuer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, and amongst them Ninive. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, vsed practises to get the rule into her owne handes, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leaue it vnto her vngratious sonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue raigned, we doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Niglifar, who got the Kingdome from Enilmerodach, was his sisters husband, which argues this to haue beene the same woman. As for Labassardach the sonne of Niglifar, if at the end of nine Moneths raigne he were for his leud conditions slaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nabuchadnezars rediution (whose terme of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the People. I will not here vse many wordes to confute that which Berosus hath further set downe of Enilmerodach, telling vs that he was slaine by his sisters husband; for the plaine words of Scripture naming the yeare wherein he gaue libertie to sechemis, doe plainely testifie that he out-lived the three or foure and fortieth yeare of his Fathers raigne, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Enilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthasar who was his Sonne and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permittech to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his yong yeares of a mischieuous nature; hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his sister, only for spight and enuie to see him kill two wild beaſts in hunting, at which him selfe hauing throwne his laureline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beautie, said it were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous vilities caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnifortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemy as soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole hee lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battaile to them that daily tooke somewhat from him; Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable security, yet had not that happinesse (such as it is) of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadful vision, which had shewed his ruine not many houres before, euen whilēt he was drinking in that wine, which the swordes of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable raigne of seuentene yeares he perished

20 That the Medes were chiefe actors in the ſubverſion of the Babylonian Empire.

30 THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthaſar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Aſſyria, was ioynd firſt to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus; after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Aſſyria and of Media it ſelfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings beſides himſelfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metaſthenes. Theſe two Provinciall Governours hauing cut downe the laſt branch of Ninus in Sardapalus, diuided betwene them the Eaſterne Empire.

Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the laſt of the race of Arbaces dying about two yeares after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthaſar; the Dominions aſwell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the houſe of Achamenes, the Princes of which blood reigning in Perſia, had formerly beene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

40 Of the Familie of Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, wee ſhall hereafter finde occaſion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes deſcended from Madai the third ſonne of Iſphet; that they had Kings ſome after the flood, Lactantius and Diodorus haue ſignid record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaſpes, and Diodor ſpeaketh of Pharnus with his ſeuē Sonnes, ſlain by the Aſſyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

50 But of theſe who ſucceeded Arbaces the firſt, that freed his Nation from the Aſſyrians. I take the liſt and number from Enſebius, adding Darius Medus: of whome I haue ſpoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are theſe.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious over Balthasar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For wee finde in Daniel that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threecore and two yeares old. And further what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c. And by IEREMIE; The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes, for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Africanus doth well open, who taking authoritie from Diodor, Cassor, Thallus, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus beganne to raigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine, and Hierodotus, are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

§ II.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

OW the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus; it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians: but rather their different relations of his beginnings, haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who denie that Aflyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth that Cyrus was no way descended from Aflyages (whom hee calleth Ashlagas or Aspans) but only that hauing vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and seldome followed, and himselfe sometimes very iustly reproofed of willfull vntruth.

Vigimer a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Aflyages had no such sonnes as Cjaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isoocrates, and before them Cassor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successour. Neither doe Tatians, Theophilus Antiochenus, Iulius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath giuen other Sonne or Successour to Aflyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab autoritate negatiue, doth neuer inforce force conſent; we may bee the bolder (all this great liſt of Noble Writers by him alleaged notwithstanding) to affirme that either Alyages himſelfe muſt have bene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the courſe of time; Or elſe to give him ſome other Succellour, according to Joſephus, and Xenophon, the ſame whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifeſt, and without diſpute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conqueit, Cyrus during his life being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and ſubiect to his authoritie; The ſtrength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Perſians, with other the Vaſſalls of Darius, being ioyned together to com-10 pound it.

 10. ann. 110. 13.
 Xen. l. 8. v. 4.*

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the inſtrument preordained and forenamed by God himſelfe, not only for this action, but for the deliuerie of his Church; a greater worke in the eyes of God, than the ſubiuerſion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull ſoever.

And it may well bee thought, that the Souldiers employed in that ſervice did rather aſcribe the glorie to him that was the beſt man of Warre, than to the Medes, who was greateſt in riches and power. All which alſo falling vpon Cyrus by ſucceſſion, and continuing in his poſteritie, did much augment the fame of 20 his vertue, which among prophane Hiſtorians neuer grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both becauſe hee was old, and did nothing in perſon; as alſo becauſe hee ſoone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was poſſeſſor of what ſoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any ſuch King or Conquerour was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Hiſtorians, they tooke all things from the relations of the Perſians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praiſe of a moſt excellent Prince, making none his equall. Only Daniel in the firſt, ſiſt, and ſixt Chapters of his prophecies; makes it plaine that himſelfe not only liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that hee continued in that eſtate to the firſt of Cyrus, which being the yeare 30 of Daniels death, could not haue bene diſtinguiſhed from the raigne of Darius; if they had begunne together and raigned ioyntly; Neither can it bee imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permiſſion, conſidering that Cyrus became aſter him.

p. III.

XENOPHONS relation of the Warre which the Medes and Perſians made with ioyned forces vpon the Aſſyrians and others.

40

Heſe Teſtimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our vnderſtanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of theſe warres: The cauſe whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Aſſyrians had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, hee beganne to hope that if the Medes could bee brought vnder his ſubiectiōn, there ſhould not then 50 be left any Nation adioyning able to make head againſt him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threeſcore thouſand foote, and about ten thouſand horſe, to which the forces of Perſia being ioyned made an exceeding ſtrong Armie.

The Aſſyrian conſidering the ſtrength of ſuch a Neighbour, invited Craſus King of Lydia, a Prince very mightie both in men and treasure, and with him other

Lords

Lords of Asia the lesse to his assistance, alleaging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmly conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be ealie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements strengthened with great presents, he drew to himselfe so many adherents as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foote, and threecore thousand horse, of which, ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foote were led by Crasus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Ayattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus general of the Persian forces, utterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it selfe could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, posselt himselfe of a great part of the lesser Asia, at which time it was, as I take it, that Crasus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters sonne, preuailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leued, are numbred thirte thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as vsed the Dart and the Sling. So saith Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the patterne of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: So it cannot bee denied, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon mere Historical truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like writer, that in euery speech and circumstance he hath precisely tied himselfe to the phraze of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne inuention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom hee treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politique discourse, and examining but the Historie of things done, it will easily appeare that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, hee hath not in any sort corrupted the bodie.

§. IIII.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great Warre.

HOr it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achamenes, the sonne of Perse being Governour of Persia, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for him selfe the Dominion of those Countries which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honor and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill such time as Deiaces tooke vpon him the full autoritie and maiestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the raigne of Deiaces, are vsually accounted about an hundred and fortie yeares, in the last sixtie whereof there reigned in Assyria mightie Princes, namely Salmansassar and his Successors, whose great atchiuements in Syria and else where witnesseth, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vnder-take any offensive warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betwene these the successours of Belshazzar, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now

Now from the beginning of Deceos to the first of Astiyages, there past aboute ninetie yeares, in which if Herodotus haue written truly, that Pisrartes conquered Perfus, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commaunded many parts of Asia, it had bene but an vnaudised enterprife of the Affrians and Babylonians, to haue waited themselves against the Syrians and Aegyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Perfus, and that the Perfians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Susa or Susar, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Astiyages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Craesus, which after some six yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Perfus stood in so many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It seemeth that the roughness of the mountainous Country which they then possessed, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more securitie than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts; the greatness which they afterward obtained would not haue suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appears, that the race of Achamenes held the Principalltie of Perfus from father to sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the father of Cyrus was King of Perfus: than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Astiyages gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her sonne (whose naturie he feared) might be disabled from any great vndertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Astiyages, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No; it was more likely, that vpon such a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child should haue encreased, and his care bene the greater to haue married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I thinke the deuiser of the mischief intended against Cyrus by his grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achamenids was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperitie did thence deriue himselfe, and vaunt of it: which he would neuer haue done, had they bene ignoble, nor had they bene the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this sort Xerxes in the sequent of Herodotus deriueth himselfe.

Suidas derives this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometime from Magog, of whom they were called Maguſai; which Maguſai, according to Euſebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for thoſe who were afterward called the Magi or Wiſe men. So doe the Greekes, among many other their ſayings of them, affirme, That the Perſians were aunciently written Artai, and that they called themſelues Cephenes. But that they were Elamites, Atoſes and the Prophets, Eſay, Ieremie, Ezechiel, Daniel, and Eſdras in many places confirme: Which alſo S. Hierome vpon Ieremie the ſiue and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight and twentieth, and in his Hebrew queſtions approueth, ſaying: Elam à quo Elamitæ Principes Perſidiæ; ELAM, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Perſia.

And that Citie which the Author of the ſecond booke of the Machabees calleth Perſepolis, is by the Author of the firſt called Elimais, but is now called Siras, being the ſame which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in 30 vaine, and to his great diſhonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexander, at the requeſt of Thiſis the Harlot, burnt it.

The firſt King of Perſia to vs knowne, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Geneſis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Auraphel or Ninias, and ioyned with him in the warre againſt thoſe Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP. III.
Of CYRVS.

§. I.

Of CYRVS his name and first actions.

Touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo sayth, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name; Hierodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intireled by the people.

It is true that for his Iustice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I thinke it be mislaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sunne, in the same Language. Howfoeuer it be, yet the Prophet Ezay, almost two hundred yeares before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus saith the Lord unto CYRVS his annointed &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Prouinces thereto subiect, together with the taking of Cresus himselfe, are not recounted by Enseleius, Cresius, and others, but placed among his later achievements, whose opinion for this difference of time is founded vpon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last warre against Cresus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; and the glorious victorie which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the fite and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue bene vsed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honour of hauing woon Babylon it selfe, which in due place I haue answered. The later seemes to haue reference to the second Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as alter that time these Nations neuer offered to reuolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to belecue with Hierodotus, whome the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of CROESVS the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon CYRVS.

Haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Cresus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydius, the sonne of Atys: Which familie extinguished, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Cumdales being the last, who by shewing his faire wife naked to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereof

(thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne lite by the Queene) the next day slaine. Which done, Cyges enioyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the same to Atyis his sonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrullt the Cimerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Craesus: Which five Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and seuentie yeares. Halyattes the father of Craesus was an vndertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince verie powerfull, and maintained it six yeares, a peace was concluded vpon equal conditions betweene them.

Astyages, the sonne of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Arjenis, Craesus sister, whom he married.

But Craesus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equal strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioyned Phoenicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Craesus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet maistrd Aolis, Doris, and Ionia, Prouinces posselt by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithnians, Carians, Mylians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforst the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Dianacs girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreouer, Athenens out of Berosus (which also Sirabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Craesus obtained against the Sacans, a Nation of the Sythians, in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacas: All which hee performed in fouretee yeare.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the end grow perillous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom hee presented with marvellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he vnderooke him: from whom hee received this riddle; Craesus passing over the Riuer Halys, shall dissolue a great dominion. For the diuell being doubtfull of the successe, payd him with merchandize of both sides like, and might be inuerted either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§. III.

CROESVS his Expedition against CYRVS.

Ereupon Craesus being resolued to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-thinke, that he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the soft silke of wormes, but with the hard skines of bealls; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victoriorus he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which hee already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subiected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this solide Councell, Craesus having prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all meanes to surpris or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I do not finde: for out of doubt, Cresus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilities; so was hee not vnder any in territorie and fame that then liued.

But as Craippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the Gods, because they faouored a disturber and vsurper of the Commonweale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Cresus prosperitie at hand, the leaues of his flourishing fortune readie to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not 10 Admetis Heráman, Apollo, had ginen date to the one, and a beginning of glorie to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainement of diuerse skirmishes, the Persians and Lydiáns beganne to ioyne in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust in vpon the falling off, and aduancement of either Nation: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vail of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Cresus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible rettyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recouered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any perfitute made by Cyrus to retard 20 him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the souldiors, and sent the troupes of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to reassemble at the end of fixe moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

30  YRVS in the following morning finding the Lydiáns departed, put his armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discovered. But hauing good intelligence of Cresus his proceeding, he so measured his Marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sardis, till such times as Cresus had disposed his armie to their Wintering garrisons: when being altogether unlooked for, and vnprepared, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Cresus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinarie Gards, after foureteene dayes siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cresus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust him selfe into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had vndergone the common
40 fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had bene dumbe all his life (by extremitie of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the souldiors to spare Cresus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which he had had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cryed out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demaunded what he meant by that inuocation, he first vled silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he now found it true which Solon had long draw the fire with all diligence to save Craesus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had persuaded him? Or what selfe reason had conducted him to invade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my vnprosperous destinie (the Græcians God flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inueters and conductors of Craesus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierst with Craesus answer, and bewailing his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not onely spare his life, but entertained him euer after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercie indeed, Quæ non causam sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the recall difference discerned betwene that behavior which we call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniuently: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Craesus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliueres, and is here alreadie set downe, that hee should haue beene burnt aliue. It may well bee, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroiicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much misbecoming a generos nature. And it is very likely, that neerence of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had hee beene otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. How-euer it was, the Morall part of the Storie hath giuen credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Craesus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vse him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus him selfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his armie ouer Ataxes into Scythia, he left Craesus to accompanie and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Gouernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow Cambyses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Craesus.

§. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

After this Lydian warre ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mightie, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vnertaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeares did passe betwene his taking those two Cities of Sardes and Babylon, which neuerthelesse I doe not thinke to haue beene wholly occupied in prouision for the Assyrian warre, but rather to haue beene spent in settling the Estate which he had alreadie purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a war made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians; though related as foregoing the victorie obtained against Craesus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus inuaded Scythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battaile overthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparatha, and therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the the lower Asia, grew loone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Croesus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he employed Pactius, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phoenians vnder their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Eolians, and Lycians, who resolutely (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it selfe it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to diuise him, or to rayle that siege, and make frustrate the worke vpon which he did for all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength vnto the taking of that Citie, which beside the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending; was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters vnfordable, so plentifully victualled for many yeares, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their clate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citie so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessaries; whereof though the Towne was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twentie yeares, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want on other would sooner appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the success of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much trouble, and all in vaine, if they did not keepe straight watch and strong garde vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their Commaunder: The consideration whereof mislired vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who hauing bene their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoke of seruitude. Whilst the besieged were pleading themselves in this deceitfull gladnesse; that is the ordinance fore-runner of Iudaicall calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentive, deuised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, hee stayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for hee had left certaine banks or heads vcut, betwene the maine riuer which surrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Nabulissor, finding neither any want or weaknesse within, nor any possibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous feast, publicke Playes, and other Pastimes, and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, besides his wiues, courtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the besiegers know, that his provisions were sufficient, not onely for all needfull vses, but euen for iollitie and excess: Or because he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many distresses were well neere broken, or in honour of his most reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (vsing Daniels words) he lifted himselfe up against the Lord of Heauen: For he and his Princes, wiues and concubines, made carowing cuppes of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he prayed his owne puppetts, made made of Silver and Gold, of Brasse, of Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta sunt stultitia in vasis aureis bibentes lignos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a foolishness it was it (sayth S. Hierome) drinking in golden Cuppes, to praise Gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthasar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certaine words which he vnderstood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement seized him, as the ioyns of his loynes were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recouered, he cryed out for his Chaldeans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their art. In this disturbance and astonishment the Queene hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done vled this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdome in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderstanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor thy father, the King (I say) thy father made chiefe of the Interpreters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit and knowledge and vnderstanding &c. were found in him, even in DANIEL &c. Now let DANIEL be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Dan. 5. v. 67

Oric. & Theod. in Dan. 199^h. Ad. 10.

This Queene, Iosephus takes for the grandmother, Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that shee was not any of the Kings wiues, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dauncing and banquetting, came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others of younger yeares and times, this old Queene remembered well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in mind both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interpret those wordes miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different stile from that he vsed towards his grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these wordes, Keepe thy rewards to thy selfe, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wifemen were vtterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodnesse to his father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprived him of his estate and vnderstanding; so vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe vp against the same God, and presumed both to abuse those vessels, dedicated to holy vses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, prayd and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those wordes, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mane Tekel, Vphraisin, gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbered the time of his Kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods iustice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians.

Dan. 5. v. 18, 19, 30.

The very euening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose enligne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no less filled with the vapours of wine, than their hearts were with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the bankes and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe downe with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates drie for the present, by whose channell running, his armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet sayth) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way were put to the sword, vntill they fated themselues by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an vn certaine tumult.

Such Assyrians Lords as had reuolted from Balsazar, and betaken themselues to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Pallace; which hauing easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the prophetic of Ieremie fulfilled, and that of Esay two hundred yeres before this lubuccion, who in his three & fortieth Chapter and elswe here writeth this destruction so feelingly and liuely as if he had beene present both at the terrible slaughter committed, and had seene the great and vnfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewaylings of euerie furuiuing soule thereunto subiect. His prophetic of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vsed Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldeans, to punish the idolatrie of the Indians, yet Esay teacheth vs in this place, that he did not yet forget that the execution of his iudgements was mixt with a rigorous extremite. For (sayth Esay) in the person of God, I was wrath with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou diddest shew them no mercie, but thou diddest lay thy very heauie yoke vpon the ancient. I will rise up against them, sayth the Lord of Hostes, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the soune and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Euerie one that is found shall be stricken through: and whoe soeuer ioyneth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in peeces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their mines ransacked. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victorie of Cyrus, or that receiued the report from others truly as it was, that could better leaue the fame to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in manie places of his prophcies, which were written two hundred yeres before any thing attempted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors set downe, might seeme altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solimus, and Crisostom, Aristotle in the third of his Politiques, the second Chapter, receiued the report for true, That one part of the Cite knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compass thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and fortie miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, as sixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitracus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geographie giues it a greater circuit, adding five and twentie furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and five furlongs, which makes eight and fortie mile and one furlong: but findes the wall faire vnder that which Diodor reports: And so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirte foot, and their height at an hundred cubites; which is also very much: euerie cubite containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Cite he giues the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and fourescore furlongs in circle; the thicknelle of the wall he measures at fittie cubites, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brass, with posts and hookes to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet *Ej*ay rightly intitle Babylon The Princeesse and glorie of Kingdomes.

Put when Cyrus had wooen her, he stript her out of her princely Robes, and made her a slave, diuiding not onely all her goodly houfes, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his souldiors: but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bondslaves vpon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the raigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enioyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue lasted onely leuen yeares: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings, that are desirous to establish a royall power in themselves and their posteritie.

¶ V I.

The end of CYRVS.

He last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diuersly written. Herodotus and Iustine deliuer, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse Cyrus intued the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an encounter betwene the Persians and these Northerne Nomades, Tomyris lost her Armie, and her Sonne Spargapes, that commaunded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of warre, and following the warre against Cyrus, in a second battaile beat the Persian armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his bodie, and cast the same into a bole of bloud, vsing these wordes; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and satisfie thy selfe.

It should hereby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was persuaded to abate their furie by some forcible inuasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyraxares, father to Ajyages, those Scythians inuaded Media and Asia the lesse, and held the same in a seruile subiection eight and twentie yeares.

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (sayth he) sixe yeares, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I belecue with Vigener, that this Scythian warre was rather the fame which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the Conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the successe of that warre otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (sayth Vigener) because Strabo in his eleuenth booke reciteth, That Cyrus surpris'd the Sacians by the same stratageme by which Iustine sayth he defeated the sonne of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amortheus, King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whome though he ouercame, yet he then receiued the wound of his death, which he suffi- red three dayes after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pasagardes, which himselfe had built, and where his Epitaph was to bee read in his time; which is said to haue bene this: O vir quicumque es & undecumque aduenis, neque enim te aduentum ignorauit: Ego sum CYRVS qui Persi imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terra quomemum tegitur corpus mihi ne inuideas; O thou man, whofoener thou art, or whencefoener thou thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am CYRUS that founded the Persian Empire, doe not ennie vnto me this little earth, with which my bodie is covered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon hope of treasure, supposed to haue beene buried with him, or vpon desire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be fet vpon it. These things well considered, as they giue credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonas, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his bodie in the hands of Tomyris.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Arme of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his sonne would so soone haue transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so farre off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyses beccable in such hast to haue undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleue Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himselfe, that hee could not long enjoy the world, hee called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tansaxers: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others, of the immortallitie of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserting of euerie man in this life; he exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments he had to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things hee vttered, which make it probable, that hee received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he gouerned Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophetic of Esay, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) praordained. Which act of deliuering the Iewes from their Captiuitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, vnto the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth; which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of CYRUS his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

40 Having therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glorie of all which was as a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meete at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Raigne, being perhaps the first that euer hee made, after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Iewes should returne againe into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now endured and finished the threescore and tenne yeares captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things neccessarie and wanting. He also restored vnto them siue thousand four hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jewes, which returned out of Chaldæa vnder their leader Zerobabel, the sonne of Salathiel, and nephew to King Jeconias, and Iesus or Josua the sonne of Josadak, were about fiftie thousand; where, as soone as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritanes and other idolatrous Nations adioyning gau all the impediment they could. So did the Governours of those Provinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jewes, nor the labours and purposes they had in hand. And not onely those which were but Princiall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himselfe; who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was buied otherwise, countermaunded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoever Cambyses did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein reloue themselves out of Esdra's, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life &c. And therefore it istruce, that the Jewes themselves affirme, as it is written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was fixe and fortie years in setting vp, hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if wee seeke the naturall and politike causes which moued Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he governed vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and soueraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembered by Esdra's, written by Belemus, Mathrislades, and the rest, Presidents and Councillors in Phœnicia, wherein they complain, that the Jewes were euermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

E. 2. 6. 29.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Cambyses, hauing it in his resolution to inuade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jewes were defended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudæa; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchadonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue obserued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Councillors & Governours of Phœnicia complained against the Jewes, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hyaspes, as in the sixt and seuenth chapters of Esdra's it is made plaine: and also that those Governours (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclosing of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the sixt of Ezra, the foureteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandment of CYRUS and DARIUS, and ARTASERASTE King of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenteenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reigne of ARTASERASTE King of Persia: which was as much to say as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdra's is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Which acton, though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly purfued by by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest sonne Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanabares: his younger sonne to be Satrapes or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadulisa, and then died, after he had reigned (sayth Herodotus) one and thirtie yeares, or (according to Isifine) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

10 | Of CYRUS his issue: and whether ATOSSA were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with QUEENE HESTER.

YRVS had issue two sonnes Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Cteglas addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyses married; Artystona, Darius Hystaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husband Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruell

20 intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Maccedonian) had against the Iewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vnderstood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should haue bene Efther; whose Historie seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoaque of Persia, was partly grounded vpon the honour which thereby shee thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corynthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women: Wherefore I cannot giue assent to the opinion of Cadoman, who vpon the necre sound of the two names, 30 Atossa and Hadassa (by the later of which Efther was also called) makes them to haue bene one person. For though it be true, that Efther concealing her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Ladie; yet *Cadoman*s inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Efther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Histories could not be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobilitie, must needs haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheless did so well know the parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a verie weakc clayme.

But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. III.

The estate of things from the death of CYRVS to the Reigne of DARIVS.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings and their times as followeth.

| | | | | |
|---|----|---|--------|----|
| Darius Medus , and Cyrus jointly | 2 | } | years. | 20 |
| Cyrus alone. | 22 | | | |

| Darius Longimanus . | 37 | | | |
| Darius Nothus . | 19 | | | |
| Artaxerxes Mnemon . | 55 | | | |
| Artaxerxes Ochus . | 26 | | | |
| Ases , or Asfames . | 4 | | | |
| Darius the last, conquered by Alexander . | 6 | | | |

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added make in all an hundred ninetie and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (sayth Melanibon) of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melanibon coniectureth, doth not account Cambyses in the Catalogue, because his raigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olem, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroulus haue also a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuertheless Enselmus and most of the Latines follow. And so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account: For in this fort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their Raiges.

Chron. Xyene, fol. 135.

| Melanibon 4. | Darius the last. | 6 | | | |

Which numbers, put together, make in all two hundred and thirtie.

This account (as I haue said) the most Chronologers and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authoritie of the Scriptures, as Peuce in his historickall Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding first first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, chap. 36. vers. 22, 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyses in the 11th of Daniel who may indeede be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginnall Commentor vpon the Genesis vnder stands that place; but, vnder correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great fauour and liberalitie to the Iewes being elsewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixth verse is also named Asassuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleuenth of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great warre which hee should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembered.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seuen, who is also called Arthasasta, c. 4. 1. bb. Ezra v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixty, Darius Natus, Ezra cap. 4. vers. 24. & cap. 5. vers. 6. Xchem. cap. 12. vers. 22.

Seuenthy, Artaxerxes Mnecon in Neh. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arjames: for Darius the last he was of another Familie; the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the sonne of Atossa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Astyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Ayattes (Cresus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus raigne to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Babylonia by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuasion of Egypt by Cambyses to the third year of the three score and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement betweene seuerall formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Again, this historical demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomical computation of Ptolomee, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and foure and twentieth year after Nabonassar. And the Era of Nabonassar beganne on the sixe and twentieth of February: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Month of the first year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the account of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomee, we shall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolomee reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twentie Iulian yeares, and an hundred and fortie daies from Nabonassar; to the sixteenth of Iulie in the seuenth year of Cambyses.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyses in the second or third year of the three score and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyses seuenth year in the first of the three score and fourth Olympiad: which first of the three score and fourth Olympiad runnes along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolomee the two hundred and sixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Era and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeares) it agrees with the third of the three score and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, sauing that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the destruction of of Babylon, which is true, and not contrarie to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearfed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of CAMBYSES, and the conquering of Aegypt by him.

It will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, lauing the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof hee was posselt in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Ctesias with others giue him a longer raigne than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before receiued.

In the fifth yeare of his sole raigne, and in the third yeare of the threefoure and third Olympiad, according to Diodor and Eusebius, he inuaded Aegypt, and hauing ouerthrowne the King thereof, Psammetitus, he not only caused him to bee slaine, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

84. 85.

Herodotus and Ctesias giue for cause of this Warre (being no other indeede than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis King of Aegypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessour, which Cambyses did disdain.

How soeuer it were; true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Armic fit for such an enterprife, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Aegypt, Amasis died and left Psammetitus, whom Ctesias calleth Amyrtanus, his successour; who inuoyed Aegypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but fixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him fixe yeares.

But how long soeuer he held the Crowne, in one battaile he lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that hee also trusted him with the gouernement of Aegypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or the suspition thereof, hee caused him to bee slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if wee may beleue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Aegyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxarxes.

That Psammetitus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Aegypt, who died before his arriuall, that hee caused his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vsed, commanded the same to bee burnt, contrarie to the custome both of the Aegyptians and Persians. For the Aegyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugges, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

*Neither did the Romnes euer consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his owne to be deuoured by that element, feazing the Law called Tribus, or like for like, because Antiochus had vntombed the carcase of Cassius Marcius after his death

§. III.

The rest of CAMBYSES his acts.

FTER this victorie obtained in Ægypt, Cambyses sent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Enchelon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Ægyptians.

While Cambyses yet busied himselfe in Ægypt, he so much detested the Idolatric of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torne downe and defaced. That done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-torne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Deuill in defence of his Oratorie raised such a tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is couered, as the Persians were there-with choked and ouer-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Armie, which himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-sent troupe had tried, hee changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to that old Englissh prouerbe, God saith the King, he say saith the Tide.

After his retorne from the attempt of Æthiopia, hee caused Apis the Ægyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in seruice of him that only is, and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) hee gaue it in charge to his favourite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his owne sisters, contrary to the Persian Lawes, hee committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder vpon one of them, called Asteroe, then by himselfe with child, because shee beuailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyses, That because his Predecessors obserued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Iudges and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marrie his owne sister: it being his owne intent so to doe.

The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answer, that there was not any thing written allowing any such continuation, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was allowed to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased them selves, and so, as Xenophon termes it, inueniunt occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Iudges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private satisfaction, hee caused Sisannus one of his Iudges, and perchance one of those which fauoured his inuelluous match, to bee flayed a-live for an vnjust iudgement giuen, and the same his hide to bee hung vp ouer the iudgement seate. After which bestowing the fathers Office on his sonne, hee would him to remember, that the same partialitie desired the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which hee exercised against the sonne of his beloved Praxaspes was very strange and vngatefull. For when he desired to bee truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise: from all men; only it was by many obserued that hee tooke more than vsuall delight in the tast of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, hee vled this replication: And are the Persians double tongued, who also telle me that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then witnesse, whether in this report they haue done mee right: for if at the first thou pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath bene spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true true, and my subjects beleaved. This being spoken, he directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling dead with the stroke, Cambyses commanded his bodie to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly reioicing, shewed it to the Father with this saying, in stead of an Epitaph: New PRAXASPES thou wast resolute thy selfe that I haue not lost my wits with wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such reports.

Many other barbarous cruelties hee exercised, till at the last, according to the phraze of our Law, he became felon de ley. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cædrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdus) Ministers of his domestical affaires, taking aduantage of the great resemblance betweene Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, posselt themselves of the Empire, hee made all halt towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horse-backe, his sword dis-lheathing pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedielesse repentance of the slaughter which hee had executed vpon his owne brother, hee sooner gaue vp his wicked ghost, when hee had reigned eight yeares, accounting therein thote seuen Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while hee was absent.

In Cambyses the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yct Zanab is out of Herome giues him a Daughter called Pantapes, and a sonne called Orontes, who being drowned in the Riuier Ophites by Antioch, the same was after ward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes.

Hee built the Cite of Babylon in Aegypt, in the place where Zatopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Iland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sifter Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene CAMBYSSES and DARIUS.

YRVS and his two sonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Prouinciall Governours of the Empire (to wit, Otanus, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyzus, Asphatines, Hiadarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King, hauing discovered the fraud of this imposture, ioyned their forces together, surprised and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and assistants. In which action (saith Julline) Intaphernes and Asphatines were slaine; but Hierodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded, for hee auoweth, that all the seuen Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into consultation how the same might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanus one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by iust lawes defend their libertie in equalitie, giuing diuers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses; As first, that it was not safe to giue all power to any one, seeing greatesse it selfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, & to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants do commonly vse the seruices of wicked men, and fauour them most; they vsurpe vpon the lawes of their Countries; take other mens wiuces by force, and destroy whom they please without iudgement.

Megabyzus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannic of a multitude was thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without without judgment runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is euer found that excellent Counsailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because euen among few diuinitie of concord is seldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath infort the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, farre safer to obserue the Lawes of our Countrey, by which Kingly gouernment hath bene ordained.

27. 10 The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall gouernment by God established, and made prosperous. And to auoide partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following these seuen Princes should mount on Horse-back, and on him the Kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sunne-rising should first ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment was made, it is said that Darius consulted with the Master of his horse Ocharus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie when the election was resolu'd of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as soone as he came into the same place was the first horse that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes descended from their horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

20 Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the seuen Princes, whereof Darius himselfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vsurpation of the Mages, he diuided the whole into seuen gouernements; Herodotus saith into twentie Satrapies.

of DARIUS his Linage.

40 DARIUS was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achemenides, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successour. For in this sort Herodotus deriues him as before,

Hystaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyses into Egypt; he then ioynd with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the reying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Nieces for his wiues.

Hystaspes, according to Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atanes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who diswaded Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Mardanus, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artozostre his Cosen germaine.

Reinecius giues to Hystaspes six sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Olanes, and Atanes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his gouernement, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

DARIUS deuided equal lawes whereby all his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue access to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to all men that many Nations desired and offered themselues to become his Vassalls: Only hee laid diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not bene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the valew of foureteene thousand six hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyses made a farre off in Egypt, and the contention betwene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke, whereof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vled the seruice of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flie to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the crueltie of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduice to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouerthrowes giuen to the Persians vpon Gallies, hee deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lye before it twentie Moneths.

§. III.

Of Darius his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeare of Darius, hee gaue order that the building of the Temple at Ierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Governours of those Prouinces which are situate betwene Euphrates, and the Phenician, and midland Sea, (whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindred the worke in Cambyses his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thenceforth come neare vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, procul recedite ab illis; With-draw your selves farre from them; In our Englishe, Be yee farre from thence, so wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

Hee also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subjects, That whosoever should thence-forth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the Timber thereof. Hee also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there, (to) destroy all Kings and People that put to their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeares after which decree (the Temple being really furnished with money and all things necessaric from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeare of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

§. IIII.

Of DARIUS his Scythian Warre.

20 After the recouerie of Babilon hee inuaded the Scythians, whose King Darius called Lantimus, and faith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because hee refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, hee built a Bridge of finall Vessells ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, and gaue the custodie of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians and Eolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histians Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greekes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrie, because they ioyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaues, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of libertie as could haue been desired. For the great Armie of Darius entering the desert Countrie called Beslarabus, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any subsistence to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chirim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vnder the Bow and Sword. They were not Prough-men, but Graiers, driuing their Heards from one place to another as opportunity of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their wiues and children. These Waggones they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remouable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chirim, any other Citie than such an Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and waste his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor anything at all, which either hee himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; hee beganne to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into which it had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a badde game, hee sent braue messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile, Or if hee acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeeld by faire meanes, and become his Subject giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe that all was yeilded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and three Arrows: which dumb shew

Darius interpreting by his owne will, thought that hee did yeeld all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas one of the seuen Princes who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a-right, which was thus; O ye Persians, get yee wings like Birds, or dwe under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else yee shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was loone verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian camp, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexing the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night, were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that wthin his hearing, and euen in his sight, they did not forbeare the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs Darius was so discouraged that he forooke his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sicke and weak behind him, and so with all speede marched away towards the Riuier Ister. Hee was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him, yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should neuer be able to doe them either good or harme. Which wordes had certainly bene proued true, had not Hystax the Allesian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meeete, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian Wars.

DARIUS having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Wars hee employed Ataxabasis, who mastered the Pagynians, and transplanted them, and possesse Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the sonne of Syramnis whom Cambyses had exoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of Selyria and Carada likewise taken in for the Persian, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeyfance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Aminias King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Soueraigntie ouer that Kingdome. Aminias doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle wordes, and afterward inuited them to a solemne and magnificent feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present, which being granted, the Embassadors who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, beganne to vse such imbracings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdainig the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to with-draw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall hee entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedie returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured yong-men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long kniues, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a leuer reuenge of this murder. But Alexander somewhat before the death of Aminias, gaue his sister Gyges in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Astia intended, so prevailed, as Alexander der escaped that tempest, which threatened to fall vpon him very suddenly; the warre of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, thrated out at the same time.

p. VI.

The first occasion of the Warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with a releasall of the gouernement in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

10 Now the better to vnderstand the reason and motiues of that great Warre, which followed soone after, betwene the Persians and Grecians, it is necessarie to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie indured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinencie, to be large in unfolding euery circumstance of so great a business, as gaue fire to those warres, which neuer could be thoroughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had railed in Athens.

20 Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set downe, though scatteringly, and in severall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrences of the Easterne Emperors, and the Kings of Iudaea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedaemonians they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some fiftene descents bridled by the Ephori.

30 Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the safetie of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succede him) they changed their former gouernement from Monarchicall to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontida; and of these there were twelue Generations besides Medon, to wit.

Solon

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdome, gave lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquantus Priscus, and were in after-ages deriued vnto the Romans, and by the Decemviri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne daies violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practise and maintenance of a popular government; the estate of Atheni was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the sonne of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contentions and insolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in general. Having by this means obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselfe, and faining that by malice of his enemies he had like to have bene slaine for his loue to the good Citizens, he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men sitting in the State-houise, or Cittadell of Athens, hee made himselfe Lord of the Towne; Pisistratus being then Governour. But the Citizens who in euery change of government had sought to remove themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this vsurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lack of helpe to flie the Towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycurgus toyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yct as the building of his tyrannie founded vpon the dissention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soone after well redified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his owne, he did (as is the vsuall practise of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Familie of the Alcmaonides, whereof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmaonides, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus vpon the first discouerie of their intent, perceiued no other remedie for his affaires than to with-draw himselfe to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. Which time being expired, hauing hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, hee againe recovered the principalltie of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, hee gouerned Athens seuentene years, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirte and three years, faith Elianus, but as Justin hath it foure and thirte, accounting the time belike as well before before as after his severall expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Sonne hee died very old, leaving for his Succellours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seem'd the Lineall succellours of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled

10 Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that hee was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprife vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because hee would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a 20 I know not what strong practise against himselfe, hee beganne to vse the Citizens with great seueritie, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had euer exercised during their usurpations till this time. And therefore the Athenians feeling least that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Cleisthenes one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practise their deliuerie: who calling to his assistance the banished Alemandide, together with an as by composition hee gaue out his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from ed of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twentie years before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Aantides, at other times with Aristophernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprife vpon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour vnder-tooke, twentie years after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus farre I haue digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motiues of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to bee restored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him so-

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betwene Greece and Persia.

50 Nother, and a strong motiue to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece in Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, hauing enioyed their libertie about five hundred yeares, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Cresus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards, as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditarie Scruants to the Crowne of Persia.

Ireland

But as it is the custome of all Nations halfe conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebell againe vpon euery aduantage and opportunitie: so did the Ionians, and other Graecians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men readie to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian bene giuen vnto them for bribes, to hold them in subiection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose only might they held the people in subiection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremitie, they vsed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had bene lost) out of the Seythians hand. Of this great peece of seruice Hystaius the Tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thanks, as hauing bene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Seythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were readie to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe that Darius vsed more fearefull of the harme that Hystaius (being powerfull and craftie) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had already receiued at his hand, found meanes to carrie him a-long to Susa, where hee detayned him with all kinde v'sage of a friend, yet kept such good e'spiall vpon him, as an enemy, that hee could not start away. Hystaius had subtiltie enough to discover the Kings purpose, which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, & more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a small Territorie, than to sit and fealt at the great Kings table, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was managed; being himselfe an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of libertie, none other pleasures than a priuate man might bestow vpon him: life.

Wherefore he bethought him selfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would after wards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion should require. Resoluing vpon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Ariflagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduising him how to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Ariflagoras, who hauing failed in an enterprife vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionians into the same course, which he determined to runne, hee abandoned his tyrannic, and did set Miletus at libertie. This plausible beginning wanne vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and sold as slaues to their citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof hee lately had bene Admirall in the enterprife of Naxos, hee had surpris'd in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, and Captaines, so that now he thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his assistant to peeces, vnlesse that he were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a journey to Sparta, where hauing assailed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedaemonians: hee went from thence to Athens, and with better success be sought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had bene sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring them them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, hauing found verie churlish entertainment. So that the euill which they were to expect in all liklyhood from the Persians, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the persuasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. I wentie Hippus the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Exatrians added five more, in regard of ancient kindnesse that had passed betwene the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces joynd, the Ionians entred the Riuer Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which aduantage they surpris'd Sardis when no enimie was heard of or suspected; inso much, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by retreating himselfe into the Castle; which the Gracians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens; and the Citie flaming.

The Persians at length mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recouered the Market place, strengthened by the Riuer Pactolus, which ranne through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enimies; who well aduising themselves, made all the halt they could toward the Sea side. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Gracians, and found them nere Ephesus; where setting resolutely vpon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest sauing themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Eualcesides, Captaine of the Exatrians, perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preferred. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were sent to Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their teares, be persuaded to make any second triall of their fortunes, on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyse in the world, than the good success which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, wooon a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entering into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to giue them aid by sea, rebelled against the Persians.

The newes comming to the eare of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreame hatred of the Athenians, vpon whome hee vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt such things, but by the infligation of thof, to whom their ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the sollicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gaue onely some forme and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus fare on foot, being like enough to haue proceeded, though he had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreouer did helpe to furnish out a Nauie of three hundred and sixtie sayle against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surpris. In euery fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Ile of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the vpper hand; but they were Phoenicians, Aegyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victorie of any vse to them; the Cyprians, in whose aid they came,

being

being vterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battalles, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recouered the Townes vpon Hellepont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities: when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to feat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike hee landed, ouerthrew him, and cut his troopes in pieces.

About the same time, Hippias the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whome his double-dealing was detected.

But this euasion preferred him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, least the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that hee would haue done, by the buriall which he commaunded to be giuen to his dead bodie that was crucified, and by his heauie taking of his death.

Hippias had fought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his condition, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselves, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promised vnto them the libertie of an open sea, emboldened them to trie the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them vpon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens flaine, their wives and children made slaues, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whome for fixe yeares space they had put to so much trouble.

¶ VIII.

The Warre which DARIUS made vpon Greece, with the battaile of MARATHON, and DARIUS his death.

THis warre with good success finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable success: Darius oblitinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the warre but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whome, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Ægiens and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after diuers encounters forst them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, and made him more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuile warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of shippes fit to transport his Armie ouer the Hellepont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twentie yeares before, and by Ataphernes his brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders hauing their Companies brought downe to the Sea-side, imbarked themselves in six hun-hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betwene Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might alwayes both relieve themselves in their passage, and shrowd themselves from all suddaine tempests and outrage.

To this end they first posselt themselves of Samos, secondly they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not onely forbear to sacke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Apollo erected. And having recouered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubœa: for that Citie (as already hath bene shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria verie straitly, and after sixe dayes assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphobus and Phalagus, they tooke it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus furre the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Eubœa the Persians pass't their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arriued, wherein they were to dispute with their owne vertue against Fortune, and to call lots for their liberie, for their wives, their children, and their iues, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Lacedæmonians for succour, employing in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arædia, encountered in the way a familiar Diuel, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victorie, promising that some one of the Gods should be present at the battaile to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the Gods, and promise of assistance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue bene more stirred vp with Ioud Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any iust cause or solide reason. The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Plataens (who hauing bene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremitie witness their thankfulness and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their aduantage to defend the wals of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of tenne thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Plataens. In the end, and after great diuersitie of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the triall by battaile, prevailed. The Armies being now in view, and within a myle of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troupes; two wings or hornes, as they terme them, and the bodie of a battaile. The Persians, when they perceiued so small a Troopie aduancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather dispositt of their vnderstanding, than possitt with the resolution whereof they made shew. So inuincible and relislesse the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victorie being doubtfully ballanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Greatians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailing, the Greatians fighting for all that they had; the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disorderd and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie cun to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their shippes.

The Perſian Armie conſiſted of an hundred thouſand foot and tenne thouſand horſe; of which there were ſlaine in the place ſix thouſand three hundred, and of the Graecians an hundred foureſcore and twelue. For howſoever it came to paſſe, either by ſtrange viſions, which were afterward called Panics terrores, or by ſome other aſſright, it ſeemeth, that the invading Armie, after the firſt encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and loſt that number, by Herodotus ſet downe, in their diſorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Iuſtines report, That two hundred thouſand of the Perſian Armie were ſlaine, the ſame hath no apparence nor poſſibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perſuader of the enterpriſe was ſlaine, ſayth Iuſtine and Cicero; but Suidas tels vs, That he eſcaped and died moſt miſerably in Lemnos.

Ad. At.

The greateſt honor of this victorie was caſt vpon Miltiades, who both perſuaded the triall by battaile, and behaved himſelfe therein anſwerably to the counſail which he gaue. Themistoctes had his firſt reputation in this fight, being but young and of the firſt beard. Thoſe of the Graecians, of marke and commaundement, that fell in the firſt encounter, were Callimachus and Steleus. It is alſo ſaid, That Cyneyrus following the Perſians to their embarking, layd hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the ſhore, and hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arreſt it with his left; of which being alſo deprived, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the firſt yeare of the threeſcore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the Warre made by Coriolanus againſt his fellow-Romanes: Alexander the ſonne of Amintas being then King of Macedon, and Phenippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch; or Hylbiades, after Helycarnaeſus.

In vita Aſſi.

This great fray thus parted, and the Perſians returned backe into the leſſer Aſia, Miltiades fought and obtained an imployment againſt the Ilanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and paſſing over his Companies in threeſcore and tenne Gallies, after fixe and twentie dayes aſſault he brake his thigh, in ſeeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himſelfe being made vnſtable, and his companies diſcouraged, he returned to Athens; wherethoſe vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his ſeruiſes paſt, and that of all other the moſt renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perſuaſion of Xentippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) caſt him into priſon, and ſet on him a fine of ſixtie Talents; where his weak and wounded bodie being not able to endure the one, nor his eſtate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better fort to each other, with their priuate Faſtions, aſſiſted by the vnthankfull and witteſſe people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious and famous Nation to baſe ſubjection and ſlauerie. Miltiades left behind him one ſonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegiſſipia, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (ſayth Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistoctes in vnderſtanding, but exceeded them both in juſtice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than ſorrow for the loſſe received in Greece, gaue order for new leuiſes of men, and all other warlike proportions. But the Egyptians reuolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great ſtrength and reuenue) greatly diſtracted his reſolution for the reuiuſation of Greece. The diſſention alſo among his ſonnes; of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by ſo great a mother as Atoſſa, diſdained to give place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And laſtly, death, who hath no reſpect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his conſultations and enterpriſes, and joynd him to the earth of his anceſtors, about a yeare after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned fixe and thirte yeres. He left behind him ſiue ſonnes, namely Artabanes, born before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who ſucceeded him, Schamenes gouernour of Egypt, Masiftes and Anabignes.

Of XERXES.

§. I.

The preparation of XERXES against Greece.

XERXES received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre; one to be made against the Aegyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Graecians; of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the success: ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commaunded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artostates, perswaded by many arguments the Europeans warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrarie counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous success of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrarie to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greekes; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this bulesse. For whatsoeuer vndertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the success doe not alwayes answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of her owne nature, which only the diuine Providence, and not any humane power, can contraine.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Graecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Egypt was ended, foure yeares were consumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of fuentene hundred thousand foot, Her. 4. and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleuee Herodotus: for of this multitude, Tragus findes the number left by feuen hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the severall Nations werethe Princes of the blood of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commaundements of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his nearest kindred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of tenne thousand select Persians, called the immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eightie thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Darius, who commaunded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

God can restore them

The Fleet of Gallies were two thousand two hundred and eight, furnished by the Phenicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Aelians, and Hellefontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessells, though commaunded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes the sonne of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessells for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princeesse of Helycarsassus, 10 and the Islands adioyning, which her selfe commaunded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Ziden, in which Xerxes himselfe was imbarked.

§. II.

XERXES Armie entertained by PYTHIUS: His cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates over the Hellefont: and the discourse betwene him and ARTABANUS upon the view of his Armie. 20 hen this world of an Armie was throughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when hee had assembled to the number of seenteene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the bodie of Cleonea, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flockes and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of Siluer, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seuen thousand of the Persian Daries, which make so many of our markes.

The King ourcome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commaunded that seuen thousand Daries should be given him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sonnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whose his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commaunding, that the one halfe of his carkalle should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched. 30

Two things he commaunded to be done before he came to the Sea side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (with the halfe Island or Headland, whercon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountaine and the Chersonesus or Necke of Land it selfe: a worke of more ostentation than of vse, and yet an enterprife of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so secured from the maine, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acroboon, Thysus, and Cleonea. 40

He also gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boates should be made over the Hellefont 50 betweene Abidus and Sestos, the sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne asunder and disseuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commaunded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused sixe hundred threecore and fouretee fourteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge, which by the art and industrie of the Phoenicians was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boarded and rayled, the whole Armie of feuentene hundred thousand foot, and fourescore thousand Horle, with all the Moyles and Carriages, pass euery it into Europe in seuen daies and seuen nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cæsar afterward vsē. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea side, Xerxes took a view of all his Troupes assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried vp and seated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoining: and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeeres there should not any one suruiue of that maruolous multitude; the cause of which sudden change of passion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeeres by the King remembred, is, That the life it selfe which we enioy is yet more miserabell than the end thereof: for in those few daies giuen vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that euery found himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death than of liuing the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrows whereto mankind is subiect, being so many and inuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouerlong; to auoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest but in desired death alone.

With this melancholie discourse Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the inuasion of Greece, against which he had formerly giuen many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good success? Artabanus notwithstanding that he assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to go on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which maruolously affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduersē; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet: in so much, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly recieue them, nor all the Haunts thereof afford them any safetie: and therefore when such shelter shall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderstand, that in such a case of extremitie men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the insatiate desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to giue resistance, yet the want of meanes to feed such an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered disifiable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perhaps to vtter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not misprised them. For to invade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any partie, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding.

derstanding. Such was the enterprife of Philip the second vpon England in the year 1588, who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was very likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not haue lesse in it than two millions of Soules, besides his beasts for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vning Machaues words, Mourir sans couste, die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what serued themselves) for twentie hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoeuer they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleue Heraclotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopyla, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand two hundred twentie men, besides Laundresses, Harlots, and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedie famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to prouide for all things, and that whosoever should enterprife any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconueniences, hee should neuer pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatnesse, or possesse so many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did, and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer vndertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be commended, if any necessitie had enforced him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which hee already commaunded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperitie of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his father Darius had made a deere experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne judgement not sufficient (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Alcedon) were an argument, that hee rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that hee had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it was wisely said of those vncountable multitudes: Non vires habent sed pondus, & impeditamenta potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulk, but weak in force, and rather a luggage than an aid.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Armie, so the diuers Nations speaking diuers Languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded tenne Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, hee had either prevailed by the sword, or forst them to forsake their territorie, or brought them in obedience by necessitie and famine, which cannot be refuted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut downe the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, hee was deceived both in his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom hee employed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, hee himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintered in Thessalie, and led by Mardanius, who persuaded the Enterprife, was in the Summer following vterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

§. III.

of the fights at Thermopyla and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported his Armie over the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the River of Issus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake nere to Pisyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encoun-10 ters he had, and the shamefull and incredible ouerthrowes which he receiued: As first at Thermopyla, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which diuide Theffalica from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had rayted a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedaemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegens and Antinians, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seuen hundred Thebians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the 20 Greekes appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight Xerxes is said to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had vterly despi-sied: and when the second dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had proued vaine, hee was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might haue continued, had not a run-agate Gracian taught him a seeret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of Mountaines, and set vpon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedaemonians, with his three hundred, and seuen hundred Thebians, which were all that abode by him, 30 refuse to quit the place which they had vndertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing lost in this last fight, together with twentie thousand other Souldiours and Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconueniencie might befall him by the vertue of such as had not bene present at these battles; with whom he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this try-all, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring 40 into the field. It is reported of Dioneces the Spartan, That when one thought to haue terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian Arrows was so thicke as would hide the Sunne; he answered thus: It is very good newes, for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution hauing as freely bene exprested in deedes, as it was vter-ed in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedaemonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men.
Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwayes well aduised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course 50 were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that straight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he aduised, That three hundred shippes well manned should be sent vnto the Coast of Laconia, to spoyle the Countrey, and to hold the Lacedaemonians and their neighbours buied at home, whilest Xerxes at his leasure hauing subdued the rest, might after ward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining destitute of succour would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said fleet of three hundred ships should seile vpon the land then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coast of Luconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendez-vous vpon all occasions either of their owne defence or endamaging the enemy: whereby that auncient speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrie-men to haue that Ile drowned in the Sea than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken had it been followed it is not easie to guess. But a contrarie opinion of Achamenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grieuous tempest, which continued three whole daies together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of warre, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseene, that if any such calamitie should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them succour: Therefore Achamenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleets for if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred shippes wee shall send away other three hundred to secke aduentures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by Sea to encounter the rest of the Nauie, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counsell Xerxes yeilded, hoping that his Land-armie and these should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilest both held one course and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was faire deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewise made a sorrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Euboea, where the Persians thinking to incompass them, sent two hundred saile about the land to fall vpon them behinde, vng a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not vnlike, but with farre different successe. For that narrow channell of the Sea which diuideth Euboea from the maine was in the same sort held by a Nauie of two hundred threecore and eleuen saile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly bene maintained by Leonidas, till he was so circumvented as this Nauie might haue been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred shippes that were sent about the land, and the cause of their voyage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleet, and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting saile by night met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirtie vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with soule weather they were driuen vpon the rocks and all cast away. Contrariwise the Nauie of the Greekes was increased by the arriual of silitie three Athenian ships, and one Lenian which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred vp, the other to redeeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policie, they resolved in plaine fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselves into the forme of a Crescent, thought fo to inclose the Greekes, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight indured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parties. For though more of the Persians shippes were sunke and taken, yet the lesse losse fell altogether as heauie vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worfe beare it. Herein onely the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worst, that they forooke the place of fight, leaving the wracke and spoiles to the enemy, who nevertheless were faine to abandon presently euen the passage which they had vndertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely crubt in the battell, and especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they waied anchors, Themistocles generall of the Athenians engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they they should revolt vnto the Greekes or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IIII.

The attempt of XERXES vpon APOLLO'S temple: and his taking of Athens.

10 When Xerxes had passed the straites of Thermopylae, he wasted the Country of the Phocians; and the regions adjoining: as for the inhabitants they chose rather to flie, and reserve themselves to a day of battaile, than to aduenture their liues into his hands, vpon hope of saving their wealth by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his armie he sent to spoile the Temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there been made by diuers Kings and great personages; Of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great multitude that fell vpon the companies which arized at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two 20 Rocks that breaking from the mount Parnassus ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians; it were peraduenture somewhat superstitious. Yet Heraclitus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memorie in the Temple of Minerua, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleued that Apollo was a God, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couctous desire of enriching himselfe by committing sacrilege vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impetic in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuell, by that Holie one, who saith, Will a man spoile his Gods? and elsewhere; Has any nation changed their Gods, which yet are no Gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impetic of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleaged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians; when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the wast which they made in burnings of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterpris against Delphi, this Vizor of holie and zealous reuenge falling off, discouered the face of couctousnesse so much the more ouglie, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by mere mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did may be expressed briefly thus. He came to Athens, which seeing forsaken he tooke, & burnt the Cittadell and temple which was therein. The Cittadell indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should bee safe in woods; > 72 40 den walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palisades: too weak to hold our long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yeeded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the prophetic; whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make direction the interpreter, applying rather the wordes to the present needs, than fashioning the buinesse to wordes.

How THEMISTOCLES the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Trazene, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses, and lands, as their freedome, and the common libertie of Greece. Neuerthelesse this great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the general good of their Countrey, was ill requir'd by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed the wives and children out of their Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was presently resolv'd vpon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and with-draw the fleet to Issmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Perzians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by Land, and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the furie of the enemy. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Ægina have bene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestow'd as in places of securitie) have bene given over into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possid'd with feare of loosing their owne, which they would not hazard, that no persuasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed friends, and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis; As first in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to disleue the fleet, and euery one of the Confederates to with-draw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and estate; Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to obiekt what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shew'd that the fight at Issmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the Straights; and that, besides the safe guard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Issmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by Sea: which they could not so well hope for else-where, as in that present place which gaue them so good advantage. All this would not serue to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom one, vnworthy of memorie, vpbraid Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Countrey of his owne to inhabit. A base and shamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproch that losse, which being voluntarily sustain'd for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as auail'd more than all his former persuasions. Hee told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; hauing well-near two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the world, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which T owne he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proesse of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth hee) will we plant our selues, leaving vnto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and

and of your owne vnthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, beganne to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceiued, vpon so weake termes, that they should be driuen to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend euen to the vttermoſt of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leauing their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessitie should inforce them so farre for the preservation of their libertie; did imploy the most of their priuate wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Naue. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamitie should befall them by land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a strong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a secure passage to any other Countrey. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships they did somewhat amend their Naue. Whereby it came to passe, that, had they beene vanquished, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetuall slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by Sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of no more than three hundred and fourescore borthomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would haue stood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athen had forsaken them; were soone perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forget the enemie, which they had conceiued of the Persians: and laying a-side their insolent brauerie, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

¶ VI.

How the Persians consulted about giuing battaile: and how Themistocles by politic held the Greekes to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battaile to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giuing such aduise as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soone agreed vpon the fight: but Artemisia Queene of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrarie opinion. Her counsaile was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe that the Greece Naue, (vnable other wise to continu long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be disscuered, and euerie one seeking to preferre his owne Citie and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had wonne so farre vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will bee great in forbearing to giue battaile; so on the other side the danger will bee more (said shee) which wee shall vnder-goe, than any neede requirith vs to adventure vpon, and the losse, in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victorie which wee desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is no more than they would haue done, wee sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourney to Peloponnesus is vtterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs, will soone reuolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduise, yet resolu'd vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue bene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that as out of their owne iudgement, which they

they thought most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine persuasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he incamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Aegleus which is opposit vnto the Ile of Salamis, whence at ease hee might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behauiour of euery Capitaine. The neare approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countreimen showed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie marching a-pace thither, did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreacie, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesse to fight for a Countrie already lost, when they rather should endeavour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to the diuinites what miserie would befall them, if loosing the victorie, they should be driuen into Salamis, there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Here vpon they resolved forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently bene done, if the wisdome of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiuing what a violent feare had stopt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this vnwholsome decree; not suffering the very hour of performance to find him busie in wrangling altercation. As soone as the Councell brake vp, hee dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Naue about the Iland, which incompassing the Greekes might prevent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleeued these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, if the Athenian fleet ioynd with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Maister had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all night, sending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the enemy in reare, and landing many of their men in the Ile of Psittalea, which lieth ouer against Salamis, to saue such of their owne. and kill such of the Grecian partie, as by any misfortune should be cast vpon the shore. Thus did meere necellitie enforce the Grecians to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the formost of their enemies, and chaling the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conueniently fight nor fle. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many disasters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquired it selfe that day, doing no one peece of seruice worthie the presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well seeme to haue wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Aegina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-Armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Aegina hauing possessed the straights did sinke or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

of things following after the battaile of Salamis : and of the flight of XERXES.

After this victorie, the Greekes intending, by way of scrutinie, to determine which of the Captaines had beitt merited of them, in all this great seruice; euery Captaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place, as beitt deservring next vnto himselfe, almost euery Suffrage did concurre vpon Themistocles. Thus priuate affection yielded vnto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was serued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, beganne to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were beitt acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart, through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast a warreie vpon his Master, fearing least his counsaile should bee rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to aduenture his life in pursuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by vnder-going his Princes indignation; he aduised the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece vnder the subiection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to sooth Xerxes with many faire wordes; telling him, that the cowardise of those Egyptians, Phoenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than slaues, who had so ill behaued themselves in the late Sea-seruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies benee victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athenis it selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These wordes found very good acceptance in the Kings care, who presently betooke himselfe to his iourney homewards, making the more hast, for that he vnderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to saile to Hellepont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hastic departure, knowing that he would leaue his Armie not so strong, as it should haue benee, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Euithades giue counsaile that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, least necessitie should enforce the Persians to take courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, vnder pretence of friendship, send a false aduertisement to this timorous Prince, aduising him to conuay himselfe into Asia with all speede, before his bridge were dissolved; which counsaile Xerxes tooke very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whereat were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driuen to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly materiall, though the Greekes did most willingly embrace the latter of these reports. Howsoeuer it were, this flight of his did well ease the Countrie; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouerwhelmed it.

¶ VIII.

The negotiations betwene MARDONIUS and the Athenians, as also betwene the Athenians and Lacedaemonians, after the flight of XERXES.

MARDONIUS with his three hundred thousand had with-drawne himselfe into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amynas King of Macedon, as Embassadour to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses recueed, and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retaine their their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought back their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedaemonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest hee should finde good and readie acceptance. Hereupon they like wise very speedily dispatched their Embassadours for Athens, who arriuing, before the Macedonian had audience, vsed the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firme. They alleged that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had only threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of Injustice could not leave them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue indured great calamities, loosing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof bee ruined, and vsfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we vndertake to maintaine as our owne, your wives and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slaueerie and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their wordes and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many arguments to the Athenians, who gaue answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadours; That whilst the Sunne continued his course they would be Enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselves, only desiring the Lacedaemonians, that with all speede they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, having once receiued such a preemprorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica; they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conuoyed themselves into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arriuall of their Confederates.

From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would bee desirous to preserue them from sife, and to haue those which were already laid waist, reedified at the Kings charges; Or if this affection tookeno place with them, but that needs they would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succours did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bee wonne with great rewards, to draw them to his purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrillus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propound them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house heard what he had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moued him to vtter such a vile sentence. Yea the women of Athens in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together, did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution.

All

All this braverie notwithstanding, when they perceived the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in giuing them aide, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their securitie. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnesse in those whom it most concerned to assilt them, they sent very leuere messages to Sparta, complaining of their slacknesse, and threatening withall, to take such course as might stand best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatorie answers, which euery day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded athwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedaemonians waxed carelesse and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quicke resolution, giuing them plainly to vnderstand, that if they should holde on in those dilatorie courses, it would not be long ere the Citie of Athens should be a new course; that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Nauie contained it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe seruice where neede should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest had aduentured ouer farre. So mutuall feare preferred in quiet the Ilands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably obserued by a Counsaillor of Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gaue eare to Mardonius: considering that many dores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as soone as the Enemie should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedaemonians vpon this admonition, making better percell of their owne dangers, were very carefull to giue satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delais, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the evening, vnder conduct of Pausanias; they gaue audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; and deeply swearing that the Armie of Sparta was alreadie farre vpon the journey; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thousand Lacedaemonians, out of the Region adjoining, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though disallasing such want of grauitie, in a matter so important, were neuertheless contented with the finall conclusion; and leuying the number appointed of Lacedaemonian Souldiers, made what hast they could to incamp in Attica. The other Graecians were nothing slack in sending forth Companies, whose neare approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Countrie, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horis, wherein consisted the beR of his power. Before his departure he burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the furie of Warre.

The great battaile of Platæa.

IT were too long to rehearse all that happened in many skirmishes betwene the Greekes and him, in the Countrie of Boeotia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the seat of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by triall of one maine battaile: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Armie of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adjoynded the forces of Thebes, Macedonie, Thessalie, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished furnished his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leaued an Armie of one hundred and ten thousand, of which fortie thousand were waightly armed, the rest were only assistants to these fortie thousand, being armed more lightly, as rather to make excursions and gae chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two Armies hauing eleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable peece of seruice; Marodonius, whose victuals beganne to faile, resolued to beginne the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proserpina, making praers vnto certaine Gods, Demi-Gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Ceres was indeede in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neare vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs, and Demi-Gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Cithæron, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horse; only the Land belonged vnto the Plataens, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Plataens, to make all cleare, did freely bestow their Land on that seldetie Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataens caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to reedifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being readie for battaile; the Lacedæmonian Generall thought it most meete, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thébians and other Greekes which followed Marodonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. T his being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Marodonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heauee proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the brauest Souldiers of Greece) hee did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Marodonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro: Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemy, lie neare to that Fountaine which did serue all the Camp. Hauing therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Marodonius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceede out of mere cowardise) he charged them in reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valor, That the Lacedæmonians being ouer-taken by the Enemies horse, and ouer-welmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victorie were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especial markel lost, before any signe of good success appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Countrie accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether; and with excellent courage receiued the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. Therest of the Greece Armie that was in march, being reuoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedæmonians: only that part of the Armie which which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confederat with the Perfians; gaue them check by the way. Neuertheleffe, the Spartans with other their Affiliants, did so well acquite themselves, that the Perfians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with wooden walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessitie enforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedemonians were not acquainted with the manner of assailing Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane season the Athenians, 10 hauing found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thebansians, did with much labour and courage obtaine victorie, which hauing not long pursued, they came to helpe the Lacedemonians, whom they found wearily toiled in assailing the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves vnder-tooke it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred, with such furie, and iust desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to haue left three thousand alieue, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Perfian Armie first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported; an especial cause of it was 20 the foolish retrait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so; that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it, greater than of the Assailants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages, and hauing lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was vnpossible that they in such a terour and astonishment should make good that peece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, against an Armie of men, farre more valiant than themselves; and inflamed with present victorie. Therefore the same wall which for a few hours had preserved their liues, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leaue them to the slaughtering furie of vnpitefull Victors. Artabazus 30 fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessalie, and other Countries in his way, That hee was sent by Mardonius vpon some peece of seruice: For hee well knew, that had they vnderstood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would haue bene hostile vnto him, and sought with his ruine to purchase fauour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Soldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, hee came to Byzantium, whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnder-taken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and great Conquest; though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-scene, and rather worse, for as much as it beganne the quarrell, which 40 neuer ended, before the ruine of the Perfian Empire was effected, by that Nation of the Greekes despised and sought to haue bene brought into slaueerie. Hereby it may seeme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Perfian Monarchie by the Greekes; who, thus prouoked, entred into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weakenesse of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THe same day on which the battaile was fought at Platae, there was an other battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutyches the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admiralls of the Greeke Naue, at the request of some Ilanders and Ionians slid saile into those parts, to deliuer the Samiens, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-side, hauing left threecore thousand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionis and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Astaptes and Ibrahimites, Admiralls of the Persian fleet, vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a ground, fortifying with Palissadoes and otherwise, as much ground as did seeme needfull for the encamping of all their Land and Sea-forces. Leutyches at his arriuall, perceiving that they meant to keepe within their strength, and resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Gallie close aboard the shore, and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greeke tongue to remember libertie, and vse the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Euboea; trusting that either these persuasions would preuaile; or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breede some ielousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne Companions. It neede not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succcede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now, in his declining estate, gae a willing care to the sweet sound of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauerie, little regarded and lesse feared any treason, to be contriued by their Subiects, were now so warie, that from the Samiens, which were amongst them, they tooke away theiir armes; the *Attic*ians, whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these deuices little auailed them. For the Samiens perceiving that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Platae was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report, of that great battaile, wherein Paulus & Emilius ouerthrew Perses the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure daies, as Linie with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuer Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battaile against the Tarquiniens and the Latines, presently notified at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victorie obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebelle to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was suddainely reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hercupon many did offer sacrifice to the Gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebell; and being with his Armie in march, hee received advertisement by Poste, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembering the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe same victorie, hee found that the report and victorie were borne vpon one day; though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about five and twentie hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeede it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames among many thousand yaine and trifolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noyses; as hee raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horfes and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as hee threatned Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and hee shall beare a noise, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue beene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes, who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heauie hearts, being in great feare, least their owne aduenture should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their Countrey of Greece, which was readie to bee subdued by Mardonius, whilst they went wandering to seeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Platae being noised among them; every man desired that his owne valour in the present fight, might bee some helpe to worke out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritie of spirit, they diuided themselves into two Battailions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedaemonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and fraight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedaemonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palissades and Gabions; and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not face themselves by flight. In this fight the Sarmians did good seruice, as is formerly mentioned.

40 But the Milesiens, who vpon the like ielousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages; did now (as if they had beene set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except a very few, that fled through by-patches. The Lacedaemonians that day did little seruice, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such Companies as retyned in whole troupes; making them flee disperfed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesiens were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Armeie-leauiued against Greece, which was now vterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offensive Warre.

X I.

Of the barbarous qualitie of XERXES: with a transition from the Persian affaires, to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthe of regard.

XERXES lay at Sardis, not farr from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to revenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly giuen over to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom when hee could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because hee respected much his Brother her husband, he thought it best to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meanes to finde occasion of such familiaritie, as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chafitic of the Mother did still reject him, or the beautie of her Daughter allure him; hee soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a virtuous Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in Warre. This yong Ladie hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which hee then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conuerlation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beautie of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon shee conceiued extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant euery request, shee craued that the Wife of Masties, her husbands Brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might bee giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformt the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate crueltie of his Wife, by threatening her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer shee should inflict vpon the innocent Ladie, granted the request; and sending for his brother perswaded him to put away the Wife which hee had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that hee vnderstood how villainously that poore Ladie should bee intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masties refused to put her away; alleging his owne loue, her deseruing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor haue his Daughter whom hee had promised vnto him. Masties was much grieved with these wordes, but much more, when returning home, hee found his Wife most barbarously mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to bee cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogs. Masties enraged with this vilanie, tooke his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince hee was Gouverneur, intending to rebell and aunge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Armie to bee leauied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Companie to the sword. Such was the tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxurie, when it is ioyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouer-throwne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether, in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischiefe done by him to Greece, should let it lie.

But surely whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercellic.

Therefore we may firmly beleue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great; vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so fully laid, that all the wickedness and vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not overthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In warres against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had bene, very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither hee, nor any of his posteritie, did ever make offensive warre, but receiued many losses in Asia, to which the last at Myale serued but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souilder at his owne dores, than in a forraigne Countrey: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better prooue as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many Ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Majestie of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended only vpon the riches and power that had formerly bene acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue bene enuerated, made vnweldie, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poore and hardie Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his Successours were faine to defend their Crowns with money and base Policies; very seldom or neuer (vnlesse it were with great aduantage) daring to aduenteure the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and ielousie vped euery

Citie to enuie the height of her Neighbours walls, and thereby diuerted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowells, which after the departure of Xerxes beganne very well, and might better haue continued, to heu out the way of conquest on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

§. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

FTER that the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mysale: Leotichides, who then commaunded the Gracian Armie, leauing the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the reuolted Ionies, returned with the Lacedaemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and other places, out of which they had beene leued. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a Citie on the strait of the Hellepont, betweene which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellepont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, since the inuasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and the walls of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their Citie, before they cared to couer themselves, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings: Whereof the Lacedaemonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vnwalld, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any priuate millike or jealousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serue to reccieue their enemies, and to be made a Seat for the Warre, as Thebes had lately bene. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their owne Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the aduise of Themistocles, they held the Lacedaemonians in hope of the contrarie, till they had rayled their wals to that height, as they cared not for their millikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to game time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedaemon, giuing him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arriuall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedaemonians expectation being conuerted into jealousie (for by the arriuall of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their owne trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, and determine mine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom hee aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedemonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their libertie also to returne. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was alreadye defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedemonians know, That it was true that the wals of Athens were now rayfed to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedemonians to beleue, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Commonweale and their owne safetie, without direction and aduise from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the wooden wals of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsells and courage, and not thereto taught or persuaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Perfians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time vsfit for quarrell, dissembled their milike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and receivede backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyrene, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselves vpon all occasions.

§. II.

30 The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State vpon the Perfian.

THe Athenians hauing settled things in good order at home, prepared thirtie Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Perfians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twentie; and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sayle for Cypres, vnder the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian; where after their landing hauing possessed themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the Perfians by force the Citie Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behauing himselfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councill of Lacedemon, and not onely accused of many insolent behaviors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Country. In his stead they employed Doeres, who either gave the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandement in that warre, praised the soldiors to complaine; though indeed the wife and vertuous behavior of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable sinceritie, had bene able to make a good Commander seeme ill in comparison of himselfe; and therefore was much more available in rendering those detected, whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedemonians being no lesse wearie of the warre, than the Athenians were eage to pursue it: the one obtained their ease and the other the execution and honor which they desired; for all the Greekes (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatness in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receiuers and Treasurers, and began to leuie money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recouering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the Iesse, and the Islands, from the Perfians. This tribute (the first that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threescore Talents; which was rayfed easily by the honest care of that iust man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, and other worthie Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; so the desire which they conceiued of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these foure hundred and threescore Talents were rayfed to six hundred, nor long after that, ere their couetous Tyrannie had conuected their followers into slaues, and extorted from them yearly thirteene hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were layd vp; and where, at the generall assemblie, the Capitaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for some sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt vp the common treasure in an Island, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commaunder in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Miltiades, who first tooke Erion, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Carisij, and brought into seruitude the Naxij, contrarie to the forme of the confederacie: So did they other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they sayled of their contribution, or disobeyed their commaundements; taking vpon them and vsurping a kind of soueraigne authoritie ouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and giuen vp altogether to their ease, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in shippes; leauing the prouision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and employed in honourable Services, at the cost of those, who hauing lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leui'd vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Afaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phaselis, which hauing formerly pretended neutralitie, and refused to relieue, or any way assist the Greekes, were enforced to pay teene Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearely contribution.

From thence he set sayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Perfian Fleet rode, being of sixe hundred sayle, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fiftie, and hauing a great Land-Arme, encamped vpon the shoare; all which forces hauing bene prouided for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vtterly defeated in one day, and two hundred shippes taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunke, ere euer they had swomme in the Greekish Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very soone presented with a third.

third. For fourescore sayle of Phenicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, vnder the Persian command) thinking to haue joynd themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arriued vpon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Vpon the first notice of their approach Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Sydra, did so amaze them, that they only fought to runne themselves on ground; by which meane preferring few of their men, they lost all their shippes. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persian, that, omitting all hope of preuailling vpon Greece, he condescended to whatsoeuer Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting libertie vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Asia; and further couenanting, That none of his shippes of Warre should sayle to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyane. and Cbelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glorie of the whole Nation, till such time as, vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the Empire of Persia; in which Warre few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but serued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of XERXES by the treason of ARTABANUS.

BEfides these losses, which could not easily haue been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gaue iust cause to the Persian of seeking peace vpon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vncle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his maister did easily take small occasions to shed the bloud of such, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, began to repose lesse hope of safetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignetic, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his crueltie, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himselfe had bene innocent) he accused Darius the sonne of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedness he got the Kingdome, and held it seuen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the sonne of Xerxes, he was by him preuented and surpris'd, it were hard to affirm any certaintie. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme torments, according to the sentence, whereof the truth is more auncient than the Verbe.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

The banishment of THEMISTOCLES: His flight to ARTAXERXES newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

ARTAXERXES being established in his Kingdome, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessitie of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune against the Greekes, than he or his predecessors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their owne merites in that seruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Islands of the Greekes, but, euen within their owne walls, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democratically. Herein they were so insolent, that no integritie nor good desert was able to preferue the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than; by flattering the rasall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deedes to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles, who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might graunt him the libertie to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, wherby he was banished for tenne years, as a man ouer-burthen some to the Common wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedaemonians, who charged him of consulting with Paulanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Here vpon Themistocles finding no place of securitie against the malice of two such mightie Cities, was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himselfe into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of marus the Lybian, (who incested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikeliness of good successe, in leading a great Armie of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decidered the great conflict betwene thankfulnessse to his well-deseruing Prince, and naturall affection to his owne ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poylon.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

Then was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his owne Captaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred sayle frong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had beene concluded, which was likely to haue beene kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made fo good prooue of the Grecian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any shippes of warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate; yett all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waite of an enemy too farr ouer-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were 20 in doubt, left the league which in his owne worse fortunes hee had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues and power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profite; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilest they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and be vnable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the straights betwene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince or State, that being mightie at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countries, or to inflict one or 30 more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morsell, to insatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily haue swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians, confining Egypt, hauing found how greatly the Country was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian garrisons, conceived rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sodaine of his owne Gardes, or leuie out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated; the naturalls of the Countrey, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a reuolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdom than a good sword. Further, he per-
 40 swaded himselfe that the people, vnable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance; would easily be drawne to accept him (the author of their deliuerance) for king. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly slaine Achaemenes the Viceroy; diuers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him king, shewed the most of their endeuour for prosecution of the warre. But hee considering his owne weaknesse, and that the meanes of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceiued well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured; at what price soeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the 50 great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the souldiers therein embarked; he intreated the Commanders to share with him the kingdom of Egypt as a farre greater reward of their aduerture, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether hee or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would haue beene contented with an equal share, and subd. or be 783

not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination vnnecessarie. Hee was possessed of the peoples loue, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entered the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they layd such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes well devise what means to vie for the recouerie of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by 15 setting the Lacedaemonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke home-wards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure assistance of the Greekes: one against the other; by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainement of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedaemonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whome in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Armie in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and means to their reliefe, who had now the space of sixe yeares defended his matters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriuing in Egypt, was first encountered by the revolted people; ouer whome he obtained a victorie, which made him master of the Countrey; whilst the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie. It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supplie, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, hauing reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessities made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were fōrt to forsife themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eightene 30 moneths siege, turning away one part of the Riuer by diuers Trenches, assaulted the Athenian without impediment of waters, took their Gallies, and put all to the sword, saue a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same entertainement had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians hauing heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell vnawares among the Phenician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyreus and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians sixe yeares warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indiscretion to vndertake many enterprises at 40 once.

Prosopites an Island between the Riueres of Taly and Pharminus, two of the out-lets of Nilus, towards Alexandria.

Mendesium is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Bosotinus and Dioleus. But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, runneth into the Sea by the Citie Palaestis.

¶ VI.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

NOrwithstanding these ouerthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedaemonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one ouer the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Ceeryphalia; the other ouer the Aeginets, neere vnto Aegina; where they sunke and carried 50 carried away three score and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the suddaine, and besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moued, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, invaded Megea; where, after a great fight, with equal losse, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to set vp their Trophies, as Victors in the former battaile, were vnerly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons, and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited neare to Tanagra by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians, (at which time the Theban horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about three score daies after, the Athenians entred Bœotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wanne Phocia on the gulfie Oeteus, and euened the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render vpon most base conditions as to beate downe the walls of their Citie, and to giue them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories they sackt and spoiled many places vpon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wanne vpon the Corinthians, and overthrow the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those sixe yeares that a part of their forces made waie in Ægypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thebais, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharalus, who had chased Orestes our of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicionis, and had victorie ouer those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five yeares, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships, but they were againe allured by Amyntus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Maritill and Wooddie parts of Ægypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the land, incountred a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, ouer both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Ægypt.

p. VII.

OF ARTAXERXES LONGIMANVS, that he was AHASHYEROSH
the husband of Queene HESTER.

40 These Ægyptian troubles being ended, the raigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by some restrained into twentie yeares, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnto him foure and fortie. He was a Prince of much humanitie, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His fauour was exceeding great to the Iewes, as appeareth by the Histories of Ezdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needlesse traillaie; considering that all the late Diuines haue taken very much paine, to shew that those two Prophets were licenced by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahashueresh who married Hester. Whereof if it be needfull to giue prooffe, it may suffice; That Ahashueresh liued in Susa, raigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore must haue been a Persian; That hee liued in peace, as appears by the circumstances of the Historie, and vied the counsaile of the seuen

Princes,

Princes, the authoritie of which Princes beganne vnder Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certaintie of his marriages with sundrie wiues, from none of whom he was diuorced, but left his first wife Mossa, the daughter of Cyrus, alinc in great honour, thee being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; doe manifestly proue that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Iew, That at the perswasion of Mardocheus, Iosachim the high Priest the sonne of Iesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memorie of that deliuerance. Now the time of Iosachim was in the raigne of Artaxerxes, at the coming of Esdraus, and Nehemias: Iesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragical loues, wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as hee had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the storie of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who liued but one and twentie yeares, whereas the two & thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artaxastha is expressed by Nehemias. A gaine, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the seventh yeare of his raigne (wherein this marriage must haue bene celebrated) came not neare to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Ahasuerus, it is enough to say, that Mardocheus hauing been carried from Ierusalem captiue, with Tebonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was unlikely to 20 haue liued vnto their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Susa, raigned from India to Ethiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Iosachim the high Priest: and further hee had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh yeare of his raigne; which good fortune might well giue occasion to such a Roiall feast as is described in the beginning of the booke of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hesters storie by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who adds the authorities of Iosephus, affirming the same, and of Philo, giuing to Mardocheus eightene yeares more than Isaac the Patriarch liued, namely one hundred fourescore and eightene yeares in all, which 30 expire in the sixe and thirtieth yeare of this Artaxerxes, if wee suppose him to haue bene carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeares old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

BV it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their ciuill warres, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Aegyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this the Lacedaemonians vnderooke the warre called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Boeotians reentred their owne Land, and mastered two of their owne Townes posselt by the Athenians, which they soone recovered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens the Boeotians, Eubaeans, and Loeceans, (Nations opprest by the Athenians) set vpon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slaine or taken, whereby the Boeotians recovered their former libertie, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Islanders of Euboea tooke such courage vpon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to conquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedaemonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now wearie of their yoke, had slaine the Athenian Garrisons, and ioyned themselves with the Cerinthians, Sicyonians, and 50

Epi-

Epidaurians. These newes hattered Pericles homeward with all possible speede; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plystanax, the sonne of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his firrt intent and recouered Euboea. Finally, the Athenians beganne to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeilded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Countrie of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirtie yeares. After fixe of these yeares were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Milesians against the Samiens) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulles, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the citizens were forc't to yeeld themselves vpon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their owne walls, to pay the charge of the warre, and to restore whatsoever had beene taken by themselves, or by their practise, from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this Briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeares after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Cite thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it conuenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrie at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athen and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

§. I.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athen and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

GREECE was neuer vnitid vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Estate; vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiectiōn. For every Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeeld obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian warre (deemed the General quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honor of the victorie, to their owne vse and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude: very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preferre their libertie; of whom the Lacedaemonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserued best the plague of tyrannie, hauing first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetual Warre. For vntill these two Cities of Athen and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing euery State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian war (the effects whereof in true estimation could not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mistred all, forasmuch as euery conclusion of one warre afforded henceforth matter to some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the warres, commenced betwene one Citie of Greece and an other, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decid'd, either by the authoritie of the Amplesianes, who were the generall Council of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedemonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

These Lacedemonians had liued about foure hundred yeares vnder one forme of Governement, when the Peloponnesian warre beganne. Their education was only to practise feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner of life as they vsed. For brauerie they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinarie meales being in common Halls, where all sared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they liued Stoic-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glorie of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrarie to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policie, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betwene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as baste in the execution; The Lacedemonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, and such as would in cold bloud performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe that the Lacedemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and assured, that sought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in straight subjection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Towne of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seenteene hundred thousand men, belowed all their wealth vpon a Naue, and (assisted by the other Greeks) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mightie in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they imploied their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and haue-Townes, of their owne Countreymen, as stood out against them. All which was easly suffered by the Lacedemonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breede contention betwene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Plataens, when they of Plataa repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduise, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Heteby it was thought, was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their Neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serve to encrease their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

Nevertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent upon suddaine prosperitie, and maintayning the weaker Townes against the stronger; incroched apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much intraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much a-do) they concluded to redress by warre the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the Gods; whereto hauing for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they beganne to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the Estate of Athens, should be set at libertie; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly pressed, that if they might obtaine it they promised to abstain from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entring into a warre, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were willing to vndergoe.

But the Athenians would yield to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedemonians were Superiour, both in number and qualitie, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and hauing the generall fauour, as men that pretended to set at libertie such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all provisions, of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who loone grow wearie, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe first and second yeares expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrie people driuen to flie, with their Wiues, Children, and Cattel, into the Towne, whereby a molt furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Mylenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, and the siege of Plata their confederated Citie, which they durst not aduventure to raise, besides some small ouerthrows receiued. The Lacedaemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrie of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals beganne to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which waited as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wanne the Towne of Plata, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mightie by Sea, did subdue Mylene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that Warre, the Lacedaemonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deal with such enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselues might, and did receiue. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athens was plentifully relieued with all necessaries, which came by Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that estate; and therefore these inuaders tooke small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mightie Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilest afflicted. Wherefore they beganne to set their care to build a strong Naue, wherein they had little good successe, being casily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skillfull in Sca-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst vndertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans receiued at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they receiued at Pylus a very fore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Coryra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a straight necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Ile. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in halt they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall strength and site of the place. By holding this peece of ground, and hauen, they in reason expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countrie adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in straight subiection, yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the near neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be reued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedaemonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haven, lying almost in the midway betwene them and Coryra, make them able to sur-round all Peloponnesus, and wait it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Na-10 to, to recover this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well forefaw, little fearing the grievous losse at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vaine made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the haven, placing four hundred and twentie choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Inland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter betwene the Ille and Pylus; likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, betwene the Inland and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut vp this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stufte, wherewith to fortifie round about, and block vp 20 the peece on all sides. But in the meane season, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the haven, did breake and sinke many of their Enemies vessels; tooke sience, and inforced the residue to runne themselves a ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartians abiding in the Inland as good as lost.
 Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custome in great dangers) to advise what were best for the publike safetie; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Ille, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The con-30 ditions of the truce were, That the Lacedaemonians should deliver vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Towne, nor the Athenians against the camp: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Fleish, should bee daily carried into the Ille, but that no ships should passe into the Inland secretly: That the Athenians should carrie the Lacedaemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held vterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The 40 Embassadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begunne the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedaemonians did doe to them for peace, advising them to make an end of warre, whilest with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in stead of concluding vpon euen termes, or desiring of meeke recompence for losse sustained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to bee restored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedaemonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treatie of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Ille, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassa-50 dours returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captaines that they should, according to their covenant, restore the ships, which had beene put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should bee held void; now (said the Athenians) yee haue assaulted our Garrisons, and

and thereby are we acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so farre ou-er-weighted honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Laceda- emonians driven to vse many hard meanes, for conuincing of victuals into the Ile; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedaemonians were now so farre from waiting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrey to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendeuous of all that were ill-affected vnto them. 16

§. V.

How the Lacedaemonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

T Herefore they indeouored greatly to obtaine peace; which the Athe- nians would not hearken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with the continuance of good successe, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrells; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Ile were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerey through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferior vnto Peloponne-
sus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters receiued, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon, and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedaemonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most bene aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedaemonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Naue which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceede lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were ferentely de-sirus to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuise the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treatie of peace to good and speedie effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and readie to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoide. The estate of Arges, which had ancient enmitie with them, was now, after a truce of thirtie yeares well-nigh expired, readie to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferior vnto Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedaemonians could neuer farre prouaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe. This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought that by waisting the Ter-ritorie of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not only the Athenians should haue beene brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the warre was vnder-taken haue bene so firmly knit to the Lacedaemonians, that they should for loue of them haue abandoned the Argues, to their owne fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in readie money, and meanes

CHAP. 8. §. 5. of the Historie of the World.

to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme, that the Peloponnesians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Naue, could doe vnto them, yea as Masters of the Sea, to wearie them out, as in effect alreadie they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could not endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedaemonians were glad to use the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much a-doe they procured, as seemed equall and ealie; but were indeede impossible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall.

- 10 The resolution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedaemonians should restore first. These had won more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athenis had taken them; y some, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and deliuerers, and not compelled them to break in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands; but had beene rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuolting, notwithstanding what former articles were drawn, and concluded, for their securitie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receiue the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedaemonians entred into a more straight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argines, who being (as they thought) likely to haue succed for peace at their hands, as loone as things were once compounded betwene Athenis and Sparta; did then themselves plainly vnwilling to giue care to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make force worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had euer bound vnto them by well-deferuing in the late warre, or found so troublesome, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) were little worse than friendship. It bred great Ielousie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue such a conjunction betwene two so powerfull Signories; especially one claue threatening eury one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countrey, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed Enemies, was violently throwne vpon the Lacedaemonians their vnjult friends: whereby it came passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might haue beene abandoned to the discretion of their Enemies, as alreadie in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely vsed the aduantage.

§. VI.

of the negotiations, and practises, held betwene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnr-littable, and able to make way through all impediments, had bene so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens vjually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedamonian would haue endured to lay downe his weapons and yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune could haue bene so great, as should haue drawne that Citie to releue it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes.
But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall mark, being ouer-lated by enemies, in the land before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vterly wearying the accustomed Spartian resolution, had made it sit downe, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans beginne to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vn-fortunate; but other lesser Citiees joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to doe much, they conceiued a strong belief, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the bale condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We couriously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance; we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing in-iuriously our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuie at the greatnesse of Athens day-ly encreasing) the Lacedamonians had entred into the present warre. But these Corin- thians did only murmur at the peace, alleading as grieuances, that sometownes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Maninians who during the time of warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discouer themselues; feare of ruenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argiues feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselues to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giving for that purpose vnto twelue of their citizens, a full and absolute commission to make alliance betwene them and any free Citiees of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were let thus open to all com-mers; the Maninians began to lead the way, and many Citiees of Peloponnesus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by priuate respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconuenience might arise to them by these courses, the Lacedamonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stoppe the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had bene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Citiees which had not entred yet into the alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedamonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this:

this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not for sake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta, and that reason did as well binde them to holde themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part, (which had yielded vnto peace with Athens) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no Diuine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without 10 prouision of restitution; & that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworne vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebel against Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason and religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oth was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vndertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would doe as they should finde cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors
 20 with this answer, they made all halt to ioyne themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diueritie both of sinceritie and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedaemonians; as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argues, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argues in warre, yet rather the 30 Argues in war than the Lacedaemonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argues, as they had done: but the different formes of gouernement, vied in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of inuouation, by joyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This bulesse hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians beganne to bethinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They sought therefore to come to some temporarie agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had 40 dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment, with one citie that shewed against them more stomach than force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made, with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loath to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired, but into priuate confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should nor make peace nor warre without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be scene the great advantage
 50 which absolute Lords haue as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are serued by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any one Signorie, that hath bene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferior to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsion means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demaned themselves as Tyrants.

But

But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their wordes good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedemonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not bee restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panaete, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedemonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recouer Pylus) vnesse they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were faine to doe, though knowing it to bee contrarie to the last agreement betwene them and Athen.

The Lacedemonians hauing broken one article of the league made betwene them & the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panaete, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to haue beene excused by the Lacedemonian Embassadors, who coming to Athen (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had beene detained at Thebes) hoped with gentle wordes to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enimie to Athen should reside in Panaete, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vsed such base collusion as stood not with their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebans; hauing destroyed a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by warre, to make good the covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough wordes, meaning with as rough deedes to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athen and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeare, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull young Gentleman in Athen. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to bee rendered to them by covenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades whose Nobilitie, riches, and fauour, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, wherby himselfe might procure some honourable employment, vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendred ought sine their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedemonians (though indeede against their wills) had broken all covenants with them. Now the State of Athen had fully determined to retaine Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedemonians should, and might require, vntill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereunto they were bound, euen to the vmoist point. This was enough to make them sweate, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delinerie of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades withing a speedie beginning of open warre, sent priuily to the Argiues, and gaue them to vnderstand how fitly the time serued for them to associate themselves with Athen, which was enough to giue them securitie against all Enimies.

The Argiues vpon the first confluence of many Estates vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these suddaine apprehensions of vaine joy, were suddainely changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately beene conceiued of Argoi. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians

Athenians had sought securitie from Athenians and when a false rumour was noised abroad, that Athenians, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then beganne the Argives to let fall their creits, and sue for peace vnto the Lacedaemonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauitie, and were not ouer-hastie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athenians, their owne Embassadours, accompanied with the Acantians and Eleans, to make a league offensive, and defensive, between 10 their Estates and the Athenians,

Of this businesse the Lacedaemonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour, or profit, others held it the wisest way, hauing done so much, not to stick vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution preuailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who coming to Athenians with full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Coun-

20 cell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recouerie of Panacie: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieved the Lacedaemonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters euen betwene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Tylus might be restored vnto them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argives might be called a-side. Faourable audience was giuen to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their wordes good. But all

30 this faire likelihood of good agreement was dashed on the suddaine, by the practise of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedaemonian Embassadours, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communitie of Athenians, least the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie, and yeeld to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadours beleued him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as hee had aduised them. Herevpon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing afforded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to Athenians for none other purpose, than to hinder the people from streng-

40 thening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrarie to their oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athenians, whom a pleasing errand would hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedaemonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill bene seconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off, till he himselfe with other Embassadours might fetch a 50 better answer from Sparta.

It may seeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Alcibiades was able to carrie a matter of such importance, when the Spartian Embassadours might haue cast the load vpon his owne shouldert, by discouering the truth.

But the grauitie which was vsually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handfomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well haue been thought vntrusty men, had they professed themselues such as would say and vn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sower message to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the paines to rebuild Paniste, and should immediately renounce their alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argiues, and their Adherents. The Ephors at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a-new to keepe the articles of the league betwene them and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadors, a new league was made betweene the Athenians, Argiues, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselues recovered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disfigure them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late warre by misfortunes, than in sundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amicitie, they had left sundrie of their old friends to shift for themselues. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most of that which they lost in warre; all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the accessse of new Confederates.

§. VII.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

T was not long ere the Argiues and their fellows had found businesse, wherewith to set the Athenians on worke, and make vse of this conjunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did not (as principals) in set each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, beganna a-new to range themselues vnder the Lacedæmonians, and follow their enligens. One victorie which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neare to Mantineæ, against the Argiue side, helped well to repaire their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The ciuill dissention arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amitie of the Athenians in expresse wordes, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space space of time the multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Beside these vproers in Peloponnesus, many affairs were made to raise vpon troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readinesse for execution, prevented some things, reuenged other, and required all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedemonians growing wearie, they beganne to be quiet, retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not as yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two fleets to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight and utterly discomfited.

DVring this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re-intertained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whither they sent a fleet lo mightie as neuer was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driuent to banish himselfe, for feare of such iudgement, as else he was like to haue vnder-gone, among the incensed people; partly by the insuasion which the Lacedemonians made vpon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so farre from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the successe of things in Sicilia such, as without helpe from Athens; could giue any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning, the enterprife had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Island, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtaining the better in sundrie battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieved with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their fleet was shut vp into the haven of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affaires went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand vpon hard termes, for that the Lacedemonians, who had beene formerly accustomed to make weainesome yearely iourneys into Attica, which hauing pillied and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades, (who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Towne of Decelea, which was neare to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countrie round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the Citie it selfe.

In these extremities, the percurf obliuiance of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backs, and at their owne doores, an enemy little lesse mightie than themselves, did yet send forth an other fleet into Sicily, to inuade a people no lesse puissant, which neuer had offended them.

It often happens that prosperous euent makes foolish counsaile seeme wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was fild to turne vnto the best. But where vnfound aduise, finding bad prooffe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iustly blamed for a miserable issue. This second fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuoy home the former, that was defeated; after some attempts made to smale purpose against the Siracusans, was finally (together with the other part of the Nautic, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the haven of Siracuse.

case, whereby the campe of the Athenians, vnterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp and flie away by Land, in which flight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ouerthrowne in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischief well deseruedly fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophodes and Ptilodorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicily, whereas indeede there was not any meane or possibilitie to haue made warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappy enterprise, did rather chooseth to hazard the ruine of his Countrey by the losse of that Armie, wherein consisted little lesse than all the power of Athen; than to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour, vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolved to condemne him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdome and necessitie required it. For (said he) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor will giue care to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogether hearken to suspicious and vaine rumours that shall be brought against vs, yea these our Soldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safetie, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth, and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the iniustice of his people; and had well vnderstood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a precedent and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectation of safetie than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the campe breake vp till leuen and twentie daies were past. His timoroulnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, and the course of Nature, would be as vnjust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the slouthfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cæsius the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retrying the broken remainder of Crassus his Armie delated by the Parthian Archers was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answer that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the nearer danger of Enemies vpon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule,

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Governours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vnjust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

Of the troubles where-into the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie, in Sicilia.

10 THe losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accompted a very little lesse calamitic to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citie about scuen yeares after was taken by Islander. For now beganne the Subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconuenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had beene their Subjects; others hauing a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not threewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolencie,ooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the gouernement into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captaines which were abroad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocratie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withstand this innovation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismayd that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but euery man was afraid of his Neighbour, least he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Majestie of Athens was vsurped by foure hundred men, who obseruing in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only such as were first allowed in priuate among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approue and giue consent, for whoeuer presumed any 30 further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murder. By these meanes were many decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authoritie, which neuertheless indured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was at the Ile of Samos, did altogether detest the dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Achibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised vnto the Lacedaemonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Achibiades had at the first bene very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his seruice done to that State was not growne to be the object of enuie. But when it appeared that in counsaile and good performance he so farre excelled all the Lacedaemonians, that all their 40 good successe was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; especially Agu one of their Kings, whose wife had so fit yielded her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends there could not forbear to call her yong child by his name. Hereupon order was taken that Achibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discouering the Spartan trecherie, conuicighed himselfe vnto Tissaphernes; whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conuersation and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roi's affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings treasures and forces in those parts. Then beganne he to aduise Tissaphernes, not so farre
 50 forth to assist the Lacedaemonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, where by all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile hee made way to other practises, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only fauourite of so great a Potentate) hee plaied his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Gouernors; or at least to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approved his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie whereof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that them selues being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedamonians, desiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne authoritie, and the greatesse of their Citie, if they might, but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preferue their owne power, or safetie at least, than the good estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundrie ouertures of peace to the Lacedamonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to bee trusted than the wauering multitude; especially considering that the Citie of Sparta was gouerned by an Aristocratie, to which forme they had now reduced Athens. All these passages betweene the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedamonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the Citie of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was not inclined to make composition; from which vponiuster ground the enemie was much more auerfe, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not vnknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, hee receiued some small losses. Likewise the Naue of Peloponnesus made thew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue bene regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisdome, they should rather haue forborne to present vnto the Citie, or to the Countries neare adjoyning any terrour of the warre. For the dissention within the walls might soone haue done more hurt than could be receiued from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeede gaue occasion to set the Citizens at vniue, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by means of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authoritie, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repell forraine enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed them selues from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernement a full restitution of the foweraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citie, but only to fise thousand; which companie the foure hundred (when their authoritie beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as assistants: herein seeming to doe little wrong or none to the Commonaltie, who seldom assemble in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeede into the hands of so many, it was soone agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should bee recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Samos should bee requested to vndertake the gouernement: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How ALCIBIADES wanne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile, made their Generall, and againe deposed.

10 His establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good successe in the warres. For the Lacedamonians were about the same time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydus, his arriuall with eightene ships gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; hee ouerthrew and vterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedamonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransom their Citie, and fortified Chrysolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the distresse of the Armie in these few wordes: All is lost; MINDARVS is slaine; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

20 Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedamonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, tooke Selymbria, besieged and wanne Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which euen in those daies was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Nauiie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and hee driven to banish himselfe againe; only because his Lieutenant, contrarie to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

30 The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first; and the losse which thereupon they received, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduersitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after iniurie received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arriued at the fleet, hee presented battaile to Lysander the Lacedamonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victorie, as to vndertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fiftene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had bene vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Nauiie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellespout, called Bizantus, where hee had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The battaile at Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

40 After this time the Athenians, receiving many losses and discomforts, were driven to flee into the Hauen of Mytilene, where they were straightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessitie enforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vndermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was was fought at Arginosa, where Callistratus, Admirall of the Lacedaemonians, looting the honor of the day, persecuted his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue bene expected, that the ten Captaines, who joyntly had command in chief ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies seruice, and so happie a victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if willfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessells to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very iust answer; That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intents. This excuse auailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had bene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange that, vpon such an accusation maintained with slender euidence, men that had well desferued of their Countrey should be overthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolue them, saue only Socrates the wife and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe releued by other vessells in the storme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this judgement was reuerfed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceiued and peruerfed the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of iniustice; but the diuine iustice was not a-sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The battaile at Egos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the yeare next following, hauing scoured the Aegean Seas, entred Hellaspont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and rooke the Towne of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the Nauie of Athens, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampsacus taken before their coming, they put in at Seisus, where hauing refreshed themselves, they failed to the Riuer called, Egos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goates-brooke, or the Riuer of the Goate; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampsacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbour. The next day after their arriuall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned againe to Egos-Potamos, and thus they continued five daies, brauing euery day the Enemy, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards euening.

The Castle of Atelivides was not farre from the Nauie, and his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countreymen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making warre in his owne name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiuing the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soone fore-see and preuent it. For they lay in a roade subject to eue-

ry weather, neither neare enough to any Towne where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so farre off as had bene more expedient. Sesius was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Naue every day, as soone as they were turned from brauing the Enemie. Therefore Achilles willed them either to lie at Sesius, which was not farre off, or at the least to consider better how neare their enemie was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to his Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not bene for these opprobrious wordes, hee could (as hee told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedaemonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or vterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that hee might so haue done, by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Straights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leaue their ships to the mercie of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath bene rehearsed, hee left them to their fortune, which how euill it would bee hee did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the advantage of his Haure, was not carelesse in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessells after them, who observing their doings, related vnto him what they had seene. Therefore vnderstanding in what carelesse fashion they romed vp and downe the Countrie, hee kept all his men a-board after their departure, and the fifth day gave especial charge to his Scouts, That when they perceiued the Athenians disembarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sesios, they should forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speede that strength of Oares could giue, to Agas-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-board their ships, not many neare them, and all in great confusion vpon the newes of his approach.

In so much that the greatest industrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue ouer Athenas desperate, and made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus, all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in peeces. Thus was the Warre which had lasted six un and twentie yeares, with variable success, concluded in one houre, and the glorie of Athenas in such wise Eclipsed, that shee neuer afterward shone againe in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victorie, Lysander, hauing taken in such Townes as readily did yeeld vpon the first fame of his exploit, set saile for Athenas, and ioyning his forces with those of Agis and Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Cities, which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to bee wonne on the souldaine, hee put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, hee did thereby cut off all prouision of vituals, and other necessaries, from the Cities, and enforced the people by mere famine to yeeld to these conditions. That the long walls, leading from the Towne to the Port, should be throwne downe; That all Cities subiect to their Estate, should bee set at libertie; That the Athenians should bee Masters only of their owne Territories, and the fields adioyning to their Towne; And that they should keepe no more than twelue ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedaemonians did, and follow the Lacedaemonians as Leaders in the Warres.

These

These articles being agreed vpon, the walls were throwne downe with great rejoycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the Citty, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduise, although it was not entertained, yet were thirte Governours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolence and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable flauerie.

The only finall hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirte Tyrants perceiuing this, aduertised the Lacedaemonians thereof, who contriued, 10 and (as nowe domineering in euerie quarter) soone effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedaemonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew verie odious to all Greece, and by Combination of manie Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authoritie, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epaaminondas, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citty of Sparta (besides other great losses receiued) was sundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the seuerall Estates: and Signorics of Greece, were growne so jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedaemonians, Athenians, Argines, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citty could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrie remained rather cunctly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander,

Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had been dependants, and followers, yea almost mere Vassalls to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselves in-deede become their Masters.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

20

VRING the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably enjoyed a long raigne over the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Baslard, whom the Greece Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short raigne little to be regarded) place next vnto him, or to Xerxes the second, who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue bene the sonnes of Hesperus) held the Kingdome but one yeare betwene them, the yonger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I haue said before) to pursue the Historie of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise then as they shall bee incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vitious Prince, did perish after a moneth or two, if not by surfeit, then by treacherie of his as riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he flew vnjustly Bagoramus a principall Eunuch, and would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Baslard, had not bee forecene it, and by raising a stronger Armie than this hated King Sogdianus could leaue, seized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing slaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeares. Amyrtus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and hauing partly slaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe to firmly with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it over to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the furie of their ciuill Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his sonne Artaxerxes. Likewise Amorges, a subject of his owne and of the Roial bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicil, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the Illanders and others, subject to the State of Atheni, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedaemonians being destitute of moneie, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Naue, without which it was impossible to aduance the warre against the State of Atheni, that remained powerfull by Sea, were driuen to craue his assistance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league betwene him and them were set downe in more precise termes, wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre jointly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bene his, or his Predecessours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre ensuing sitting

fung (of which I haue already spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedemonians he got Amorges a-lie into his hands, who was taken in the Citie of Iafus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Neuertheless Aegypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot bee the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subjects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Parystis his owne sister, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mne- 16 mon, that is to say, the Mindfull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that euer Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leaue vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealousie vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death prevented the comming of his yonger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betwene these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, wee shall haue occasion to speake some- 20 what in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place most conuenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subersion of the walls of Athens, which gaue end to that warre called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the vnhappie Countrie of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirtie Gouver- 30 nours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a bodie of their Law, and make a collection of such ancient Statutes, as were meete fit to be put in practise: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessitie of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being vncertaine, it was fit that such men should giue iudgement in particular causes, to whose iudgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to bee ordered, were become subiect. But these thirtie hauing so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deferre it by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them 40 in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themselves, how casie a thing it would bee vnto these thirtie men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace; or what else they listed, when condemnation without due trial and proofe had beene once well allowed. Having thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of gouernement, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne companie to Sparta, they informed the Lacedemonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keepe the Citie free from all rebellions motions, to which purpose it behoued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedemonians to send them 50

them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approved, and a guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants beganne to take heart, and looking no more after safe and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from Houfe to Houfe, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able, to make any head against this wicked forme of government: wherby there was such effusion of blood, as to Themamenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellowes to bethinke themselves, and provide for their owne securitie, and his destruction, least he should make himselfe a Captain of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave vnto them some part of publique authoritie, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they beganne afresh to shed the blood, not only of their private enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man upon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Themamenes vntered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Cristias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priuiledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but haue the accustomed triall) heooke vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Themamenes, and so reduced him vnder the triall and sentence of that order. It was well alleged by Themamenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans, vpon which consideration hee aduised them all to conceiue no otherwise of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but (euery man choosing rather to preferre his owne life by silence, than presently to draw vpon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neare him) the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poison.

§. III.

The conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposition.

40 After the death of Themamenes, the thirtie beganne to vse such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and causing them to flee into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their libertie, and the generall good of the Citie. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolved to hazard their liues in setting free the Citie of Athens. The very thought of such a practise had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Sentient men, or thereabout, were the first vndertakers, who with their Captaine Therasybulus tooke Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athens. No sooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than seke meanes to prevent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Laclemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the Citie, which aboue all they wcre to make good, they left the moit of their guard, and two companies of Horle, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying liege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasylbulus were encreased from seuentie to seuen hundred, which aduentured to gise charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred & twentie. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the thirtie had resolved to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, wherinto they might make an ealie retreat, and saue themselves from any suddaine perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouernement had brought them into such danger, they were so faire from seeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iustice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera cititer, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of latetic, than by extending their crueltie vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasylbulus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasylbulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were slaine to the number of seuentie, only yet the victorie seemed the greater, because Critias, & one other of the thirtie, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasylbulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect that the thirtie were deposed. Neuertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who hauing communicated with the thirtie in their misdeedes, sent to be called to a shapaccount, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernement could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who crauing aide against Thrasylbulus, and his followers, had fauourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by Land and Sea, vnder the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the ielousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had bene the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oathes, to make warre against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, least the Lacedæmonians should annex the Territorie of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to be doubted that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he enuied. Therefore hauing in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasylbulus his partie, made a shew of warre, he finally wrought such means that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and such others, as were like to gise cause of tumult, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing with-drawne themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some inuouation, whereupon the whole Citie rising against them, tooke their Captaines, as they were coming to Parlie, and slew them: which done, to auoide further inconuenience, a law was made that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully obserued, the Citie returned to her former quietnesse.

Kkkk

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of CYRUS the younger.

§. I.

10 The grounds of CYRUS his attempt against his brother.

10 THE matters of Greece now standing vpon such terme, that no one Estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedemon; yong Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully profecuted the warre against Athens, did send his mes-20 sengers to Sparta, requetting that their loue might ap-peare no lesse to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous warre against the Athenians. To this request, being generally, the Lacede-monians gaue a futable answer, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all seruice that hee should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himselfe, and the Lacede-monians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue been the recompence of his deserts, or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the waies, which vnder the Macedonian Ensignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and ope-30 ning vnto them the riches, and with all the weaknesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which hee referred to another generation; than to giue into their hands that mightie Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Parysatis the Queene-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger sonne, being seconded by the earnest fauour of the people, and readie desires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; hee found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not safe to attempt any meanes of displacing him, by whose disfauour himselfe might 40 easily loose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly bee able to maintaine his owne life. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, tre-cherie, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vling by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well bee thought that Queene Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mightie Empire. And it was very true that Parysatis had vsed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleaging that (which in former ages had bene much auailable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilst his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was 50 a crowned King. All which notwithstanding, when the most that could bee obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoyning: then did this Tissaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily

easily beleued, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent back into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of CYRVS, and his first entrie into the Warre.

THe forme of gouernement which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their feuerall Prouinces, was in many points almost Rcgall. For they made Warre and Peace, as they thought it meete, not only for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings, to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedaemonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waighting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon hee first beganne to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his jurisdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that hee was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in priuate quarrells. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardise despised, although he durst not aduerture to take armes against Cyrus, yet percciuing that the Miletians were about to giue vp themselves into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other Townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preferue his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In leauing Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he took not only the men of his owne Prouince, or of the Countries adjoining, whose liues were readie at his will; but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elswhere in Greece; but all of them readie to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their feuerall warres, that the Souldiers might bee held in continuall exercise, and readie in armes vpon the sodaine. Cyrus hauing sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forth with summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his assistance, being thirteene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, he could very easily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to loofe time in small matters, that was to bee imploied in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subiect to the Persians, had invaded his Territories, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leauing Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leasure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered that so great an Armie, and so strong was neuer led against the Routers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause cause taking a band of five hundred horse, hee posted away to carrie tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How CYRUS took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

10 The tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statira, against Parisus, the Queen-Mother, whom shee called the Author and occasioner of the warre. But whilest the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger haltened vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his numbers much increased, by the repaire of his Countreimen, though moit strengthened by the access of seuen hundred Greekes, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who resorted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muller, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) hee made in Phrygia; where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which 20 contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a brauerie) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggers forsaking their cabins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a joyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, becaufe they were preit to the warre against their will and dispositions; whereas his Armie was drawne a-long by mere affection and good will. Neuerthelesse he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to seeke excuses, telling them that Abracomus one of 30 the Kings principall Captaines, and his owne great enemy, lay by the Riuer, against whom he requied them to assit him. By such deuices, and excesiuue promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greekes considering, That who so passed the Riuer first, should haue the most thanks, and might safely returne if the rest should refuse to follow them, they entred the Fords, whereby were all finally perswaded to doe as some had begunne, and being allured by great hopes, they resolued to seeke out Artaxerxes, wherof euer he was to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raised an Armie of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident vpon this huge multitude, as to aduenture them in triall of a plaine
 40 battaile. Abracomus, who with three hundred thousand men had vnder-taken to make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himselfe toward the Kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedaemonian fleet, by the benefit whereof to haue transported his Armie. I doe not finde that this cowardise of Abracomus, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe till five daies were past after the battaile, receiued either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himselfe, were all made of the same mettall.

50 Therefore Artaxerxes was vpon the point of retiring to the vtermoost bounds of his Kingdome, vntill by Teribazus, one of his Capitaines, he was perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Prouinces to the Enemy, who would thereby haue gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disputation of Title to a Kingdome is most aduantageable) would haue growne superior in reputation. By such aduice the King resolued vpon meeting with his brother, who now beganne to be secure,

cure, being fully perswaded that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King hauing cast vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broad, and eightene foot deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe as to be farre distant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betweene CYRUS and ARTAXERXES.

THe Armie of Cyrus hauing ouer-come many difficulties of euill waies, and scarcitie of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving that the great feare of Artaxerxes, and being past this trench, marched carelesly in great disorder, hauing belowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beasts of carriage; when on the sodaine one of their Yaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the Riuer Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they law not till it was after-noon. But when they law the clowd of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and percieued by their neare approach how well they were marshalled, coming on vey orderly, in silence, whereas it had bene expected, that rushing violently with lowd clamours, they should haue spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in distent, being all embattailed in one bodie and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his owne, did not with the corner and vtmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks beginne to distrust their owne manhood, which was not accustomed to make prooffe of it selfe, vpon such excessiue oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should bee so easily chased. Neuerthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, hauing learned (contrarie to their custome) to giue charge vpon their enemies with silence, had not learned (for it was contrarie to their nature) to receiue a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that becally rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and sithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twentie) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bene assured vnto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompasse the Greekes, and to set vpon them in the reare, he aduanced with sixe hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge vpon a Squadron of sixe thousand which lay before the King, that hee brake it, slaying the Capitaine thereof, Artageses, with his owne hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole companie of sixe hundred, very few excepted, beganne to follow the chase, leauing Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leaue the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I see the man, and presently with a small handfull of men about him ranne vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the breast. Hauing giuen this stroke, which was his last, he receiued immediately the fatal blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vnder the eye with a dart, throwne by a bale-fellow, wherewith stoned, he hee fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was vnpossible to haue recouered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safetie; not caring afterwards for their owne liues, when once they perceiued that Cyrus their Master was slaine. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to bee forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troups, and vtterly dismayed such Persian Captaines, as were now, euen in their owne eyes, no better than rebells; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes, making all speede, arriued quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hee met with Tissaphernes, who hauing made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was readie now to ioine with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, beene sufficient to counteruaile all disfaisters receiued; the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would haue yeelde dittle comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwise, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great slaughter through them, in such wise that hee rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field, gaue chafe to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set vpon them in reare. But these good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a brauerie, than with purpose to attempt vpon these bold-fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom hee would seeme to haue slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough by shewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore hee aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might haue encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neare them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled vpon the spurre; so that none remained in the place of battaile, save only the Greekes, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondered that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that hee was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was fittest for them, hauing that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had giuen them no leisure to Dine.

¶ V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how ARTAXERXES in vaine sought to haue made them yeeld vnto him.

150 T was now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might serue for foode: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their wearie bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entered by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceiued

Handwritten note: The hard estate of the Greeks after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vaine sought to have made them yeeld vnto him.

perceiued that the basenesse of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greekes: which gaue him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Armie, should liue to carrie tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore hee resolued, to trie all meanes, whereby hee might bring them to defraction, and not let one escape to carrie tidings of that which hee had seene: to which purpose hee sent them a braue message the next morning. Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gate, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertised that morning from Arius, a principall Commander vnder Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would ioyne with him, but resoluing to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arius, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would ioyne with them, and pursue the victorie. Before they receiued any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Captaines very insolent: One told them that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeeld their Weapons; another, that hee would die ere hee yeeldd to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as hauing the victorie, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them for, whether he desired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie hee meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Grecian, waiting vpon Tissaphernes, answered, That the King hauing slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the midst whereof hee held them fast enclosed with great Riuers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold vp their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These wordes, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that hauing nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilst they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruicable, but should they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretie speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes, and his Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalimus being a Courtier, and imploied in a businesse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a Statesman, to be cheekt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdom here in failed him. For whatsoever he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowne than that he brought an vnhonest message to his owne Countrimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lises, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprisid by treachery of the Persians, being a priuate Gentleman, and hauing neuer seene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had bene to Cyrus, offering their seruice in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vse of them. But the finall answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto hee required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I understand stand you? as choosing peace if we stay, otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politique Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose.) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feede vpon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rolled with arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes beganne to returne hom-wards.

10

T night they tooke their way towards Arius, to whom they came at mid-nights, being forsaken by foure hundred foote, and fortie horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in peeces; for had they been kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such assistance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleas'd to make covenants with them for mutuall assistance vnto the last. Whereunto both parts hauing ssworne, he aduis'd them to take another way home ward, which should bee somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to releue them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purpos'd themselves to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because hee would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Graecians being wearie and hungrie, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countrey, should be very fearefull: but it is almost past beleefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came Messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the qualitic of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to runne ouer the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkeable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greekes (as he said) wanting wherupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full. Artaxerxes dissembling the indignitie, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, sending them guides who conducted them to a place where was plentie of victuals to releue them.

§. VII.

How TISSAPHERNES vnder colour of peace betrayed all the Captaines of the Greekes.

Itherto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselues into any straits or termes of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subtile Fox Tissaphernes, who circumuenting the chiefe Commanders by finelights, did mischieuously entrap them, to the extreme danger of the Armie. 10

He told them, that his Prouince, lying neare vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countymen at home, would not bee vnthankfull for such a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearse the great seruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that aduertised him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that hee, together with the King, did emer their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth hee) did I alleage to the King, entreating that he would giue me leave to conduct you safe into Greece, in which suite 20 I haue good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answer to him, who hath wiled me to aske you, for what cause yee haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that peace should bee granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereunto both parties hauing sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all business, came vnto them againe after twentie daies, and then they set forward. 30

This interim of twentie daies, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt; the Brethren, and Kindred of Ariens, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that hee daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had bene. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relie vpon couenants, and sit still whilst the King laid snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to call themselues againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting 40 withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith hee saw no reason why the enemie should haue clogged himselfe if he meant mischiefe, hauing power enough to doe them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable Man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to bee the more esteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or bafe respect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his fallhood was such, both in substance and in successe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man after I A lye may finde excuse when it grows out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of vntruth, the fallhood is most abhominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his owne strength against the diuine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable consequences.

table effects, and is followed with fure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captaines, whom hee subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the rest. The bulinesse was contriued thus: Having trauailed some daies together, in such wise, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very jealous of the great familiaritie, appearing betwene Tissaphernes, and Arius; Clearchus thought it conuenient to roote out of Tissaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had growne in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, hee renewed the oath of Confederacie, which had paſt betwene them, shewing how religiously he meant to keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tissaphernes, hee promised that their loue should appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he would make vse of their seruice against the Assyrians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Prouince, or against the Aegyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all diuine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any close acufation or suspition, whereby might grow some vaine inconuenience to either of them, vpon no iust ground. The faithfull Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to minde how many waies hee could haue vsed to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by burning the Countrey, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs haue perished by meere famine. For which cause hee said that it had bene great folly, to seek to perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his handes; But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their safetie, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance, but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mis. Finally, hee invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention betwene them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceiued, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inerior Leaders, to repaire with him to the campe of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had bene to some common Faire. But being there arriued, Clearchus with other the five principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Persian Horse-men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had bene done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in hand, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Arme, saying, That they brought a message from the King, which Arius deliuered to this effect. That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was iustly rewarded with death; that Mennon and Proxenus, two other of the five Coronels, for detesting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Armes, which were due to him, as hauing belonged vnto his seruant Cyrus. When some alteration had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but hee willed them to send backe

Mennon

Macon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandment their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiss to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tisaphernes, the reward which he afterward receiued. He saw his Prouince wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiuing from his Master conuenient aide of men and money, hee did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailing him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flie from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. Burnow let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betraied brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischicke vpon the whole Armie.

§. VII.

How XENOPHON bewetened the Greekes, and in despite of TISSAPHERNES went off safely.

Great was the heauinesse of the Souldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the cuill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Armie to be such, as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, beganne to aduise the vnder-Officers of Proxenus, his companies, whose familiar friend he had beene, to bethinke themselves of some meane, wherby their safetie might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serue to giue them hope, and aboue all perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercie of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succede in the places of those who were slaine, or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tisaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had bene wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceede, marching towards the heads of those great Riuers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tisaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they receiued by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon prouide slings, wherewith he ouer-reachd the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were employed among the carriages, he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers, to shoote compass, who had bene accustomed to the point blanke. By these means did hee beare off the Persians who assailed him, and sometimes gaue them chace with that band of silitic Horses, which being well backt, with a firme bodie of foormen, and seconded with troupes of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemy to lie a-loose. Tisaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possess the tops of Mountaines, and places of advantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeede the surest, of burning the Countrey. With great sorrow did the Greekes behol'd the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Countrey, as granted by the enemy himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which were the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, That being neare vnto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Countrey, passing over some high Mountaines which lay betwene them. This course they followed, which could not haue auailed them if Tissaphernes had begunne sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumvent them by his fine wit.

p. I X.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

20 Ntring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inamour to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vs'd the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrey, were of much vse against these poore trauailers, afflicting them in seuen daies, which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betwene the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes refreshed themselves one day, rejoycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they saw certain troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leauied by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Ionia. The Riuer was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Ford, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chafe a way the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite men, gaue succour to the Reare ward, against which the Carduchi being lightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Xiphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tigris; though Ptolomie place them farre more to the East vpon the Riuer of Cyrus in Media, wherein hee differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case deserue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riuers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may indure the Censure of a Critick. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tigris, not much above Arsacqaria springing out of Xiphates, and running by the Towne of Sardena in Gardene, a Prouince of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Centrites did arriu.

How TERIBAZYS Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fauored peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

THe Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fittie or threescore miles to the heads of the Riuer Tigris, and passing ouer them, trauailed as farre further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus at the Riuer Teleboa,¹⁰ which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small; but Ptoleme and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrie for the Persian, and was in great fauour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to haue beene a Schoole where the Art of fallhood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greekes, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he leaued an Armie, and besetting the straights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped wel to make such benefit of their securitie, as might giue him the commendations of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes 20 to make many fires, and scatter themselues abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discouered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out; and comming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arriue there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Paviilion, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousness) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went northward, and passing Enphrates, not far below the Springs thereof, trauailed with much 30 difficultie through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrie, through which they marched, had their wintering houses vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaille, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselues in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Carttaile) some Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

¶ XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countreies bordering vpon the Riuer of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the Riuer Phasis, neare whereunto the people called Phasiani Taochi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the pece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flie, euery one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrie the the Greekes did enter were the Tauchs, who conuaying all their prouision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattails were taken; the people, to auoid captiuitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselves vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattails, which serued to feed them, traouailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions; liuing; who were glad, when after seuen daies journey they escaped from those continuall kirmishes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Berberians. Hence traouailing through a good corne-Country, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the scythians, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoyning, vs'd them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Towne) hee led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to wait it with sword and fire. After sixe daies march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Mo-

 20 schies, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macedones, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had bene sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the land of Colchis, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabizond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchis entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like; for the Armie, hauing now good kisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirte daies together, for bearing only the Borders vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Armie beganne at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosecuted the same purpose to effect.

AVING now found an Hauten Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, and change their tedious Land iourneys into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cheersophus a Lacedaemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by means of Amesibus the Lacedaemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that hee would prouide

Vessells to imbarke them. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the slaying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vie them for their nauigation. Least all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoyning to cleare the waies, and make an easie passage for them by Land; wherunto the Souldiers were vtterly vnwilling to giue care, being desirous to returne by Sea: but the Countrie fearing what inconuenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, for saking their

Companions, who had put them in trutt to bring ships into the Port of Trabizonde: the other tooke Merchants and Passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessells were staid to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals beganne to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchis, neare vnto the Campe, was already quite wasted, they were faine to imbarke their sick-men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerajus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Armie being mustered was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countie of the Mosynaci, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to joyn with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

a Mosynaci a Nation of Pontus Cappadocia

b Cotjora a Port-Towne in the same Region.

c Sinope a Port-Towne in Lyculia, a Colonie of the Mysians.

The next place of their abode was Cotjora, a Greeke Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerajus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hercules the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custodie of the Gates. Provision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were unwelcome to Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatening to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, that mere necessitie had entred the Armie to teach those of Cotjora a good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deale with them and the Paphlagonians at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cotjora to releace the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the manie and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Paribienus, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceived, that the Cite of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to imbarke every one man of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of dissention which arose in the Armie; and how it was imbarked.

Evertherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnities which now beganne to dissolue and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilist they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honorable worke to build a Cite in those parts, which were soone like to prove great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countre, divining of his successe by the entrails of bealts. The Sooth-sayer, whom he employed, had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Ar-taxerxes would not give battaile in ten daies: hee therefore, having preferred his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diuersitie of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Herales, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the povertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should giue successe to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vnder-tooke to giue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece: One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that hee would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their journeyes end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby itaied from out-running his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceiued, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope and Herales, knowing that the Armie was now resolu'd for the voiage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution; thought it the wildest way to furnish them with a Nauie whilet they were in good readinesse to depart, but to keepe the money to themselves. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceiued with faire hopes, repented much of their basse offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, praied him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, and sailing to Phasis, where they might seize vpon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the buisinesse, they began to worke the principall of their owne followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becoming publike, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had wonne the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carrie the Armie quite an other way from their owne home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gaue them satisfaction and withall complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylus, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greekes; the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to haue beene sought, for that the Greekes hauing now their Fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whether Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admirall Anaxibius, who promised to giue the Armie pay as soone as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIIIIL

Another great disension and distraction of the Armie. How the ministers were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by XENOPHON.

THE nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make prouision for themselves, that they might not returne home empty handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, hee might the more conueniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commandor of all, in whose fauour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displeas the Lacedaemonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitiue who forsooke the Armie at Trabizand, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing so him in the entrails, that threatned ill successe to his government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied vpon Cherisophus a Lacedaemonian. It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntarie Armie, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbade him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their desire, which was, by right or wrong to get wealth wherefoeuer it might be found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cherisophus had bene Generall but fixe or seuen daies, when hee was deposed, for hauing bene vnwilling to robbe the Towne of Heraclea, which had sent presents to the Camp, and bene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had failed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Riuers, which would haue giuen impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take thir way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get somewhat for them selues; telling them that all their prouision would be spent in three daies, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrie, victuals, and other necessaries, could not bee had without money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand peeces of money, called Cyzicenes, which summe amounteth to two thousand and siue hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the summe raised to ten thousand Cyzicenes: at least which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Least therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudencie and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceiued themselves to be disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fell to mutinie, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians, and Achaens, they forsooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. About foure thousand and siue hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captaines, sailed vnto the Port of Calpas, which is in the mid-way betwene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue bene sparcd now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Bizantium, to meete him at the mouth of the Riuer Calpas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuicgh him ouer into Greece; for which cause hee tooke his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confinnes of Heraclea, and Thracia Asatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Countrie to the Propont. The Mutiniers who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselves into ten Companies, every Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, siue or fixe miles from the Sea; in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the countrie surprisid on the suddaine, and sacked all at one time.

The

The place of Rendeuous was an high peece of ground, where some of them arriued, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slip't at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Countrey, and finding the Greekes loden with bootie, took the aduantage of their disorder, cutting in peeces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians, and Acheans: who wanting the assistance of horse, and hauing
 10 neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to stand merely vpon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds receiued, the Larts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, and enforced to craue parlie. Whatsoeuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yeilded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without which the Greekes well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incented, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers, whether they knew
 20 ought of any Gracian Armie, passing along those parts: and receiuing by the true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly throwne themselves, hee marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discouer, and to seoure the wates; the light armed foot-men tooke the hill-tops on either hand; all of them setting fire on whatsoeuer they found combustible, whereby the whole Countrey seem'd to bee on a light-flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approached. That night hee encamped on a Hill, within fiue mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to bee quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiuing this, thought certainly that hee would haue fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all hast to dislodge. Early the next morning 30 Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to haue giuen battaile, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but hee maruilled that the Greekes were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquire, that they remoued at breake of day, and perceiued by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpas, in which journey hee ouer-tooke them. They embraced Him, and His, with great joy; Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that hee should haue come by night, where finding themselves deceiued, they were afraid least he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to ouertake him, and joyne with him. So they arriued at the Hauen of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any 40 motion to disioyne the Armie, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers peeces of seruice done by XENOPHON; and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betweene the Lacedaemozians and the Persian.

150 THe Hauen of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient seate for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused caused them to halt away, fearing least Xenophon should finde some device to haue fetled himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to lue at home, neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wiues, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now delirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeede forbid their departure: so long they were intored to abide in the place till victualls failed, neither would the Capitaine, leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes aduenture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neare at hand; in which enterprife he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in wait to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scattered abroad in seeking bootie, slew six hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that suruiued, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and vnsumished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; which hauing entrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to indure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmeest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Assistants. In this journey his demeanour was very Honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoining, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainely, that hee had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarian, hee would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victualls to sustaine them in the place, and ships to carrie them away? wherefore hee willed them rather to fight well that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than an other day fasting; and not to regard the vneasie returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by which hee might flie from them. These persuasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, remouing their Families, and leauing all that could not sodainely bee conuighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to itay. When forecentring further into Bythimia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chrysepolis, a Citie neare unto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, leaſt their long ſtay in that Countrie might breede in them a deſire to viſite his Prouince, where they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore hee ſent to the Lacedaemonian Admirall, entreating him with much inſtance and large promiſes to waite them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibum the Admirall conſcending, promiſed to giue the Souldiers pay, as ſoone as they arrived at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreatie of the Perſian, who in the heighth of his pride had thought them ſo ſurely imprifoned with mightie Riuers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to ſurrender their Armies into his handes, and ſo yeeld their lues to his diſcretion. How diſcourteouſly they were intreated by Anaxibum, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they ſeized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophons perſuaſion they forbare to ſack, I hold it ſuperfluous to relate. For the reſidue of their doings appertaine little to the generall courſe of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, ſo did it both diſcouer the ſecrets of Asia, and ſtirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterpriſes, than euer their forefathers had vndertaken. Likewiſe it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italia; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedaemonians ruling inſolently, but without diſturbance. True it is, that the ſeedes of the Warre ſhortly following, which the Lacedaemonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already ſowne, before theſe companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Townes of Ionis, which had ſided with yong Cyrus againſt Tiſſaphernes, if not againſt the great King, prepared to rebel, which they thought ſafer, than to fall into the handes of Tiſſaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians beſought the Lacedaemonians to ſend them aide, whereby to recouer their libertie; and obtained their requeſt.

For a power was ſent ouer, vnder conduct of Timbro a Spartan, who beſtowed his men in ſuch Townes as had already revolted, to ſecure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offenſiue Warre.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilst they were menaged by the Lacedæmonians.

ð. I.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of XENOPHONS Armie, to make Warre vpon ARTAXEXES.

T seems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxexes took their fauour; he wroth vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Armie had reucaled the basenesse of those effeminate Asiaticques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon termes of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking vpon this huge vnweldie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to giue them resistance, in that long journey of foure and thirtie thousand two hundred and fiftie fure furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one year and three moneths. Neuertheless the ciuill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their owne estate; leaving it questionable whether Agesslaus, hauing both the fame, and faire greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimitie and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable artificements. For how highly so euer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and Tollower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being onely a few incurfions into the Countries lying neare the Sea, carrie no proportion to Xenophons owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Cannon the Briton with six thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrey; through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperour Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agesslaus and his warres in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

ð. II.

B. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

HIMERO receiuing Xenophons men, beganne to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to reuolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernement of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Mater did loue him. The managing of the warre begunne by Himero, was for his opprefions taken out of his handes, and committed to Dercylidus a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low Countries of Asia was diuided betwene Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercylidus who did beare a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be forrie to see his Corriuall throughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province, in few daies, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrie of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue easie successe to the attempts of Dercylidus. Zenis a Dardanian had beene Deputie to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procur'd his Office, wherein shee behaued herselfe so well, that shee not only was beloued of the people vnder her gouernement; but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certaine Townes adjoining; and sundrie times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Myssians and Pisidians. For shee had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great seruice. But somewhat before the arriual of Dercylidus in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Atidias, whom shee trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stifle her, and kill her sonne of seuentene yeares old; which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to haue beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his fowle treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driuen into teares of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercylidus, to whom the Townes of Atidias, that held against Atidias, did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne stood out foure daies (against the will of the Citizens, who were conscious of libertie) the Governour striuing in vaine to haue kept it to the vse of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities Gergebe and Scepis, which the Traitor held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, sent Embassadors to Dercylidus, desiring leaue to speake with him, and pledges for his securitie: vpon the deliuerie of which hee issued out of Scepis, and comming into the Campe, made offer to ioyn with the Greekes vpon such conditions, as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercylidus, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at libertie. And presently vpon these wordes they marched toward Scepis. When Atidias perceived that it was in vaine to striue against the Armie, and the Townes-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercylidus, who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Atidias, he left the Citie free, and departed toward Gergebe. Atidias did not forsake his Company, but followed him, earnestly intreating that hee might bee suffered to retreatie

ra ne Gergethe: but coming to the Gates he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to open the Gates, w^hereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did notrefuse to serue vnder his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mama were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had beene Subject to Pharnabazus, who was enimie to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World hee might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight daies taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end heeooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer ensuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, besides the waisting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being foure or five miles in breadth, by which means eleuen Townes with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewise the Citie of Aarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with prouision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vneacie to recouer all the Townes of Ionis: Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearly Office) being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessitie, yet was he not in his owne danger required with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing respect to the Kings seruice, came to assist his private enimie Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne doores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the Riuier of Meander, and not looking to haue been so soone encountered, marched carelesly through the Countrie: when on the very sodaine the whole Armie of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercinarie Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in aduantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multtude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine.
 Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Flanders and others, of such places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselues to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honor, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs haue brought them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had beene followed, who per-ceiuing the opportunitie of so great a victorie, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, beganne to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to craue parlie; and the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tissaphernes might recieue answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Asia might enjoy their owne liberties and lawes, but contrariwise on the other side, that the Euelamoniens should depart Asia, and leaue the Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; only it serued to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoid the warre by procrastination, which he durst not aduenture to finnish by triall of a battaile.

§. III.

How the Lacedamonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, concerned against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedamonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces receiued by them during the late warres, when leifure was wanting to the requitall of such petty injuries. These Eleans being 10 Prefidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine vpon the Citee of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnitie; and publicly whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vsed great contempt toward the Spartians, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a peremptorie message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at libertie the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the vnuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of such 20 Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meeere Vassals to themselves. In their late warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found caused this goodly Title of libertie to worke very slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeares together they sent an Armie into the
 + Countrie of the Eleans: the first yeare an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwaies forbid the prosecution of any enterprife in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeare, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citee it selfe was driuen to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enioy their libertie, and to haue her owne walls throwne
 30 downe. Only the Prefidenthip of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would, in time comming, vse modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercie of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were assitant to the Lacedamonians, excepting the Corinthians and Boeotians, whose aide hauing benee of as much importance in the late Peloponnesean Warre, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smother their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victorie; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece, to Thebes, and Corinth, only securitie against Athens, but such a securitie as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mightie Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weales to adhere to 40 either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the warre to extremitie, leauing the one Citee naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both, it was then (if not necessarie to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartians to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victorie or composition made some good end with the Perfians, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IIII.

The passage of AGESILAVS into Asia. His warre with TISSAPHERNES.
How TISSAPHERNES was put to death, and the warre directed into an other Prouince, through perswasion and gifts of TITRAVSTES his successer. How carelesse the Persian Licutenants were of the Kings good.

AGESILAVS newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victorie, which, not without cause, he expected vpon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to joyne with that of Dercylus, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aulis in Boeotia, a Haven, lying opposite to the Iland of Euboea, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon hee meant also to doe sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but saying that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers, they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Countrey in any new warre; therefore, waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Hauing landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treate of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to libertie all the Greeke Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought only to winnetime of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agesilaus was busie in seeing the Estates of his Confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was the comming downe of these forces, which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plaine message from Tissaphernes, that either hee must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by perjury deserued vengeance from Heauen, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Townes which lay betwene him, and Caria, that they should provide victuals, and other necessaries for his Armie, did easily make Tissaphernes beleue, that his intent was to invade that Prouince wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vsit for horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plaines of Maender, hoping thereby to stoppe the passage of a heauie foot-Arnie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrey which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoile without resistance, till such times as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelue men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the maiestie of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to entrench that part of his forces. By which meanes hauing enabled himselfe, whilest winter lasted, hee entred vpon the Countrey of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the year would permit, and not only tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaines of Maender, without assistance of their infanterie, hee gaue them battaile, and had a great victorie, taking their Campe in which hee found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon

Tissaphernes

Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardise had abscnted himselfe from the battaile, or following some other builicse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Matter hauing him in ditruist, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which hee much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, wer: taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tibraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succcede him in the gouernement. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by perjurie hee could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-wearing of his owne wisdom, euen in that part of cunning wherein he thought himselfe most perfect. For supposing, that by his great skill in subtle negotiation hee should one way or other circumuait the Greekes, and make them wearie of Alex, he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Matters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet; but rather to temporise till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much misooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would hee much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such meanes whereby the danger it selfe might haue bene auoided; as not louing to haue warre whilst by any conditions (honorable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tibraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadours to Aggelauus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had bene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Aggelauus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transfere the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tibraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defensive part. For Aggelauus hauing entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his seuerall Prouinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed they knew that their heads might easily bee taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Prouinces, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne gouernement could be preserved free from wast and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side I can ascribe to nothing so deseruedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concupines, and Ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so viuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Prouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrey giuen in charge vnto each of them recieued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as euery one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but satte still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces it had not bene vneasie to recompence the spoile of one Countrey, by conquering another, or defending a third from farre greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Treatie betweene AGESILAVS and PHARNABAZVS.

AGESILAVS hauing thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phyrgia, burning and wasting the Countrey without resistance. Hee tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not winne Cities and Places of strength, which might haue encreased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood vpon bad termes with the great King, whom hee lost againe as easily, by means of some slight iniurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neare as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-back against the Athenians together with his faith which had neuer bene violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Agessilus did make a faire offer to him, that if hee would reuolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrey wherein hee was at that time only Deputie to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make warre against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and hee commanded to obay another, hee would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest employment could be found else-where. The excuse made by Agessilus, and the with-drawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessarie business elsewhere; but because his Countrey would yeeld great bootie; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedaemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards required their vnthankfull suite with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiuing that Agessilus meant nothing lesse than to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wife course whereby the Citie of Sparta was not only driuen to looke to her owne, and giue ouer her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had bene gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her her owne Territorie. He sent into Greece fiftie talents of siluer, to bee employed in raising warre against the Lacedæmonians; which treasure was, by the subtile practise of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argues, and Corinthians, that all those Estates hauing formerly borne secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open war. And least this great heate of the incedd multitude should, for want of present exercise, beginne to faint, and vanish away in idle wordes, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Armes, that they themselves might seeme Authours of the quarrell. Some land there was in the conuice of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adjudged vnto them, and receiued yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to loose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recouering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tennants) requited with an inuasion made vpon Phocis, waiting that Countrie in the manner of open warre. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betwene Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, and readie consent to their suite, it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deserue the acknowledgment of injuries receiued, vntill location of reuenge were offered, and then to discover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wills, hauing no other war to disturb them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countreies about Phocis, and with such forces as he could leaue, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Pausanias, like wise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who refused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to ioyne with Lysander, and make a pcedie end of the war. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what helpe they could abroad, forasmuch as their owne strength was farre too little to make resistance against such mightie preparations. It was not vnknowne to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were other wise affected in heart than they durst vter in countenance; but the good wilhes of such people were liide available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could; by which manner of ferquertation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, & make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publick allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompened with friendship lately shewen in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrans, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honours sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasibulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had bene well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtesie which they had receiued. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedæmonians in this Warre; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilist Pausanias lay still, still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the bulinesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pausanias did not meeete him, as had beene appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victorie did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were soone reuiued by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late bataille, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territorie, for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his returne to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driuen to flee into Tegea, where hee ended his daies in banishment.

§. VII.

How Agessilavus was called out of Asia to helpe his Countrey. A victorie of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, ouercomes the Lacedaemonian fleet; recouers the maiestie of the Seas; and rebulds the walls of Athens.

THis good successe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubarians, Locrizans, and Acaronians, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Armie, determined to giue bataille to the Lacedaemonians, as neare as they might, to their owne doores; Considering that the force of Sparta it selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adiunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agessilavus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their assistance, passed the straights of Hellespont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had giuen bataille to the Lacedaemonians, and the remainder of their Associates, but with ill successe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chafe in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedaemonians, who meeting them in good order, wonne from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedaemonians, and made the victorie of that day entirely their owne. The report of this bataille meeting Agessilavus at Amphipolis, were by him sent ouer into Asia, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had since his departure seene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admirall slaine. The same man, whose endeaour had brought the Athenians into order, by aduancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedaemonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was despoiled of her old reputation, and scarcely able to maintaine an Armie by Land for her owne defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to haue the Greekes diuided into such factions, as might vtterly disable them from vndertaking abroade, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not neede any more, to seeke peace by entreatie and commemoration of old benefites, at their hands, who vn-provoked had sold his loue for thirtie Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was surprised by Lysander at Argos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Nauie, wherewith he requited the losse receiued at Argos-Potamos; by repaying the Lacedaemonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victorie Conon failed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberalitie of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victorie, so throng a Nauie, and so much gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their walls, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouering the Signorie which they had lost.

Athenians

§. VIII.

Of sundrie small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedemonians loose all in Asia; The Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

10 NEuerthelessse the Lacedemonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeares the honour of their estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agessilus obtained the better with his horse-men, from the Thessalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He watted Baotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee ouerthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Countrie of Loeris: which done, he returned home.

The game of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battailes of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposit vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agessilus charged them in their returne from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Armie by the Loerians; and some other exploits by the Lacedemonians performed against the Corinthians, were repaid with equall damage receiued in the parts adjoining; many Townes being easily taken, and as easily recouered. The varietie of which enter-seats was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawne by the losse of the Hauens of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victorie obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian forces at Lechaon; whereupon the Theban Embassadours being sent for, and willed to doe their mesage, required only in forme, to haue a safe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incursions wherein the Achaens, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnians, who held with the contrarie side, vntill Agessilus repaid these invaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnians that they were driuen to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Townes of Asia perceiued, that the Lacedemonians were not only intangled in an hard warreat at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having lost their fleet at Onidus; they soone gaue care to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should vse their owne lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Governours. Only the Citie of Astus did stand firme, wherein Dercylidas lay, who did his best to containe all the Townes about Hellepont, in the alliance of the Lacedemonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thorsybulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Leibos to their ancient acknowledgement of Atheni.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedemonians. Of sundrie fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of ANTALCIDAS.

50 ABout this time the Spartans beganne to perceiue, how vnseafe a thing it would bee, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselves, allied with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not only to renounce the Greekes inhabiting habiting Asia, and to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, and euery Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute libertie, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Countrey would so be weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stirre against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Countrey being so broken, and rent into many small peeces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensiu warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till hee had made himselfe Maister of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the Dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athenis, they chose rather to giue all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weake; than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe joyned together against the Lacedaemonians, did by their feuerall Embassadors oppose themselves vnto it, and for that it was thought safest for Aristoxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedaemonians yet more, than by interpoling himselfe to bring friends and foes on the suddaine to an equalitie. Especially Struthas, whom Aristoxerxes did send as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did seeke to repay the harme done by Agessilus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cutoff; Thimbro was sent into Asia to make war vpon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piratic and robbrie, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthe of remembrance. Thimbro was slaine by Struthas; and in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllidus was removed from his charge at Abydus, because hee had not impeached Thrasylbulus in his enterprises about Hellepont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprisid and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasylbulus, departing from Leibes toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Apendus; the Citie of Rhodes hauing long before joynd with the Lacedaemonians; who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratic, or the Governement of a few the principall Citizens, where as contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Souerainetie into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the Townes of their Confederates a Governement like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especial cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athenis. The people of Egina roused vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Egina, and besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedaemonian fleet, the Ilanders beganne a new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirteene. The loss of these ships was soone recompensed by a victorie which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Egina, whereupon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athenis, hauing but newly raised her walls; hauing not by any fortunate and important battaile secured her estate from dangers by land; but only depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Euagoras, when the maistris of the Seas was so full assured, that an Iland lying in the eie of Piratus, had abilitie to vex the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weening of that Citie did cause it vntually to embrace more thanie could compass; so the insolencie and shamelesse iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselves farr out of sight, and to seeke employments at such distance as might secure them from the eyes of the enuious, and from publike iudgements, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; iphocrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrey well could haue spared, with which hee returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Aegypt, whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus carelesse of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Hauens. For Telamias, a Lacedaemonian, being made Governour of Argina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Naue of Athens, as it lay in Piraeus; thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Mariners were a sleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tavernes. Wherefore hee failed by night vnto the mouth of the Port, which entering at the breake of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, & few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with marchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessells, also three or foure Gallies, hauing funke or broken, and made vnerueiceable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Phaenibazans, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom hee liued about the Court; and many Officers that faoured the Lacedaemonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance, the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not haue needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giuing freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Countrey into as many seuerall States as there were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become arbitrator and decider of Controuersies between the Greekes, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne; the Iles of Lenno, Imbrus, and Seirus be subject to Athens; all other Greek Townes, as well the little as the great, bee set at libertie; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, vpon them the approuers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedaemonians by reuolt of their Confederates, and the necessitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedaemonians taking vpon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argines to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Boeotia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the government: the Thebans themselves being also comprehended vnder the name of Boeotians; but caused the Maninians to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleaging that they had formerly bene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeede to chastise them, as hauing bene ill affected to Sparta in the late war. By these courses the Lacedaemonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities hauing lost all their dependants, would be vnable to make opposition.

The warre which the Lacedaemonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

WHilest these warres, which ended without either victorie or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mightie, that shee did not only command her Neighbour-Townes, but was become terrible to places farre removed, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the vsuall pretence of the Lacedaemonians, to set at libertie the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being nearell vnto the danger of these incroching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedaemonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would bee too siring for all Greece, if some continuance of time should giue it reputation, which only it wanted, wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did found of compulsion, protesting that either they must warre upon Olynthus, or become subiect vnto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hattie leaue of 20 men, two thousand being presently sent away with promise to bee seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the bodie of the Armie following them surpris'd the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the hands of Phœbidas the Lacedaemonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the flange of their Countrie. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made betwene them; which caused the Lacedaemonians to doubt whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthe of reward or of punishment; In conclusion, profit so farre ouer-weighed honestie, that the dedde was approoued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, manie driven into banishment, and the T raitors rewarded with the gouernment of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedaemonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power hauing strengthened the Lacedaemonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe to their obedience.

§. X I.

How the Thebans recovered their libertie, driving out the Lacedaemonian Garrison.

AFter this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeares, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found meanes to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for feare of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laied betwene these two, that soone found very good successe, being managed thus. Seuen of the banished men forsooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned turned from worke, and so passed vndiscovered vnto the house of Charon, whom Phylis as the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemne feast being then held in the Citie, Phylidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustfull men, that hee would conueigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, hee told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, vnlesse they would dismiss their followers; because the Gentlewomen, who attended with out in a chamber, would not endure, that any of the seruants should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking aduantage of the Governours loose behauiour, slew them all vpon the sodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garmets. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where faising themselves to come to the Governours vpon buisnesse, they got admittance, and slew those which were of the Lace Laronian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prison, slew the Goaler; and set at libertie such as they thought meete, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants knowie.

The Captaine of the Castle hearing the proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than in deede they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practise to discover such, as would be forward vpon occasion of reuoluing. But as soone as day-light revealed the paine truth, all the people tooke armes and besieged the Castle, sending halty to Athen for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adjoyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speede to assist their Countreimn, but procured some Athenians to joyne with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeluded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arriued at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recouering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bene taken from the Lacedamonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers, with a toilsome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thebes, to insult the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Hauens of Athen, which failing to take, hee wasted the Countrie adjoyning, and draue away Cattaile, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully looking how to with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra to the battaile of Mantinea.

§. I.
How Thebes and Athens joynd together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THE Lacedemonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonorable rule they held, that all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected, the practise of which doctrine, euen by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate, but when it was put in execution by insufficient ouerweening men, it seldome failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vnjustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Pharbidas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Piræus.

For howsoever Agesslaus did spoile the Countrie about Thebes, in which he spent two Sommers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise beganne to looke abroad, failing to the Ile of Coreyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea prevailed, began as in the Peloponnesian warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Nauie; afflicting so the Lacedemonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had beene very likely that the course of this war, should haue soone come to a good end, which neuertheless, being persecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the Citie of Sparta as much dejected as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiuing how Thebes eneroched euery day vpon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had beene dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselves, whilst engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolued to settle the affaires of Greece by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, that it was their intent to finish the Warre; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwile that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace, which came to passe being so wrought by the couragious wisdom of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedemonians and Athenians did soone agree; but when the Thebans offered to swear to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians; Agesslaus required them to swear in their owne name, and to leaue the Boeotians free, whom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, that the Citie of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by setting the Lacônians free; for that the Signorie of Boeotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agesslaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne back out of Achaia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glorie which he had hoped to attchieue by the Persian Warre, did now very passionately vrged that point of setting the Baotians at libertie, and finding it as obstinately refused, he dalst the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forth with to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which he did, and was there slaine at Leucitra, and with him the flower of his Armie. This battaile of Leucitra being one of the most famous that cuer were fought betwene the Greekes, was not so notable for any circumstance forgoing it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battaile (betwene 10 which and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twentie daies) the Lacedemonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neare; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greaest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the litle R egion of Booia, did now beginne to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise that soone after they brought an Armie of threecore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much due the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly indured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, recheitence, and many other vices vnto 20 ties, made rullie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians took vpon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. EPAMINONDAS invaded and wasteth the Territories of Lacedemon.

The Athenians, refusing to take advantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedemonians; did neuertheless finely giue them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For, taking 30 vpon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agefilau (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left vnperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athenz, where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, vnder the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hercupon beganne fresh garboles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne 40 pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, reedifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondence with the Lacedemonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedemonians durst not giue impeachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraigne helpe. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agefilau had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, & were become head of the Locrians, Acar-nanians, Euboeans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entered Peloponnesus in fauor of the Arcadians, who had vpon expectation of their coming, obtained from giuing battaile to Agefilau. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost sixe hundred yeares were spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Hercules, had seized vpon Laconia, in all which time the found of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrey: Ten yeares were not fully past since all Greece was at the denotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other Enemie States had dared to set foot on, sauing by health, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were alhamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedemonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preferue the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Slaves or Slaues, as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, and somewhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Cerimbra and some Townes of Peloponnesus they received speedie assistance, the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaninondas returned without battaile, hauing rebuilt the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedemonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The composition betwene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe invaded and spoile Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THis journe therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might bee Generalls by Land. This had bene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to haue serued under the Lacedemonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the authoritie should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacedemonians other five, & so successiue that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very slowly aduanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaninondas, who foraged the Countrey without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betwene Athens and Sparta did, by diuiding the conduct in such manner, disfile the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people were not inferior to others in strength of bodie, in courage, or in good Souldieriship, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernement, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by encreasing whose greatest they should strengthen their owne yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbourhood, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing been made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedemonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon the Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates as to their Enemies.

§. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Persians, with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

The Thebans especially rejoiced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that, without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proved fo ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoeuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only victorious ouer the Lacedemonians, but Patrons ouer the Thebadians, and Moderators of the great quarrells that had risen in Macedonia, where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amynas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage into Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captaine Pelopsidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especial points were, That Assene should remaine free from the Lacedemonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their Ships of Warre to Sea, only the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none recieued much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how farr it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many waightie considerations resolve, to binde the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should bee on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had bene ancient enemies to his Crowne, and, having turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundry grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedemonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nathus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedemonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though, by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet having renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprise, had not they bene enuiech by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwaies discovered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against Athens; And finally having offered much contumely to Agesilans when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good seruings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore unlikely to looke abroad, whereunto if perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haven towne, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the requests of Pelopsidas, as farr forth as hee might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meane which the Greeks had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Prouinces. For had then the affairs of Greece beene so composed, that any one Citie might without empachment of the rest haue transported an Armie, to assist the reuolting Satrapes, or Viceroyes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phoenicia, humane reason can hardly finde the means, by which the Empire could haue been preferred from that ruine, which the diuine Councell had deterred vnto the daies of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthie Prouinces, wanting a firme bodie of good and hardie Souldiers, was in short space dissolved and van-isht like a mist, without effect. these Asiaticques wearied quickly with the troubles and dangers incident to warre, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to bee the first that by treason to his companie should both redeme the former treason to his Prince, & purchase with all his owne promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a suddaine storme, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly laid downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardab; as also because in the whole raigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuasion of Aegypt, I finde nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time, passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domestical; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poison and mischieuous practises shee had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, shee forth the wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the leud desire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the persuasion, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace doe readily entertaine. That his owne will was the supream law of his subject, and the rule by which all things were to be measured, and adjudged to be good or euill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pelopsidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured that they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne advantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuall, a long endurance of the same felicitie to him and his, or (at the least) a full securitie of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared.

 But such foundations of eternitie laid by mortall men in this transitorie world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at libertie, and the Thebans made protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controversies that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would entere into this Confederacie; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors, drawne thither from all parts of Greece, when an oath was required for obsecration of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatorie an-swere was made by the Embassadors, who said that they were sent to heare the articles; not to swear vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not need it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatness, but left them as it found them to relye vpon their owne swords.

How all Greece was divid'ed, betwene the Athenians and Lacedaemonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatnesse drawe all her followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoyne their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the partie of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in dislike of those who by strong hand were readie to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not sodainly aspire without some injurie and much enuie. The Cities of Thebes abounding with men whom necessitie had made warlike, and many victories in few years had filled with great spirits, & being so mightie in dependants, that they had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) vnder such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already shee had got good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argues had bene alwaies bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing bene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of loosing all: which caused them to suspect and enuie nothing more than the greatnesse and honor of Sparta, taking truce with her when shee was at rest and had leisure to bend her whole force against them, but firmly conjoyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argues were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and prouoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedaemonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these waivering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worth of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, and seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheless accept this new Confederacie, not relinquishing the old, because they found that, howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedaemonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes; which without them was vnlike to inuade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather halten, than by any meanes flay, the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Isthmus, and had bene aduerser to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grieuous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visite Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laied hands on, vnder pretence of employing it to publike vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countymen, as people desirous of inuouation. This was done: but the vp-roare thereby thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe learly pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to iudge of their fidelitie, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly wordes did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mightie a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to bee made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought meane to settle the affaires of their Countrey, by drawing things to some good conelusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now readie to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedamonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew that all their forces, and best prouisions, would bee no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had bene accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerful Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now verie gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that the command of the Arme in chiefe, should be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible inuasion of Peloponnesus by EPAMINONDAS.

ERTAINE it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a verie firme consent, and vniforme care of the common safetie. For beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argues, and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received the intelligence, that the Arme coming from Athens would passe by Sea, where upon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forth-with declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be vpon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedamonian Captaines to fortifie Maninaea with all diligence, and to send for Agefilas to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men, which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall vpon his Encimies, that had not an vknowne fellow brought hastie aduertisement of his purpose to Agefilas, who was then well onward in the way to Maninaea, the Citie of Sparta had sodainly bene taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding anie defence that could haue bene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agefilas in all flying hast got into it with his Companies, whom the Arme of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedamonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire advantage vpon Maninaea. It was the time of Harvest, which made it very likely that the Maninians, finding the warre to be carried from their walls into an other quarter, would vse the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cat-taile into their fields, whilest no enimie was nere that might empech them. Wherefore hee turned away from Sparta to Maninaea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Atlantians (according to the expectation of E-paminondas) were scattered abroad in the Countrey; farre more intent vpon their narucit-bulinesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattle, being vnable to recouer the Townes, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should haue taken all their prouision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-dearely beene redeemed, by that Citie returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians comming to the succour of their Confederates, 10 whom they thought to haue found at Mantineæ, were very carnally entreated by the Citizens to relieue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any couragious aduenture to deliuer those who otherwise were giuen as lost. The Thebians were knowne at that time to bee the best 20 Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies bene giuen to the Thebians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but only in desire of relieuing her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantineæ, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat, and giuing a lu- 20 sine charge vpon the enemy, who as brauely received them, after a long and hot fight they remained masters of the field, giuing by this victorie a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Berotians arrived in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Assitants were not farre behinde.

§. VII.

The great battaile of Mantineæ. The honourable death of EPAMI-NONDAS, with his commendation.

30 EPAMINONDAS, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Mantineæ ha-ving failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorabile character of his expedition; resolved to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his owne Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for 40 that battaile, where in historie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such, as promised the accomplishment of his owne desire, he made shew of declining the enemy, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when hee should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with verie much tumult, as in so great and sodaine a danger, the enemy ranne to Armes; necessitie enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that daies seruice vring them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, 50 by a third part. The Mantineans (because the warre was in their Countrey) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians; the Athenians had the left wing, the Achaens, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the Lacedæmonians, Lacedaemonians, hauing by them the Arcadians; the Eubians, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thebaisians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argines held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans preuailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians; who not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were ouer-laid with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thebaisian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retreat was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouraging some Companies of foot, which had bene sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argines, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it beganne to open, and was readie to turne back, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came vp to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedaemonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: vnlesse perhaps the Lacedaemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the first brunt, and sune of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, wherof the Thebans, by practise of a few yeares, cannot bee thought to haue gotten a habite so fure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obliuate stiffnessse of the Enemies to bee such, as neither the badde successse of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Beotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them giue one foote of ground; taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by thea duantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleaue the whole battaile in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day wonne by the Thebans, who may iustly bee said to haue carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereton the battaile was fought, hauing driuen the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retayning of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable only among the Greekes, and serued merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtayned somewhat, which the Enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battaile, none daring to abide them in the field: wherof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowess. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedaemonian Squadron, and forced it to giue back in difaray, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Companie of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, hee neuertheless with a singular courage maintayned the fight, vning against the Enemies many of their Darts, which hee drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Antierates, hee received fo violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his breast. Hereupon hee sunke downe, and was soone conueighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his tail somewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would haue got his bodie) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chafe, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trouble of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Philistians, That when the head of the Dart should bee drawne out of his bodie, hee must needs die. Hearing this, hee called for his shield, which to haue lost was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. Hee bad them tell him which part had the victorie; answere was made, 10 that the Bacotians had wonne the field. Then said hee, it is faire time for mee to die, and withall sent for Solidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both slaine; which being told him, He aduised the Thebans to make Peace, whilest with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his bodie; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them that the victories of Leucitya and Martinaa were two faire Daughters, in whom his memorie should liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to bee matched in any Age or Countrie: for hee equaled all others in the severall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Iustice, and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wisedome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertues; in every part whereof hee so excelled, That hee could not properly bee called a Warre, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Proudient Capitaine; all these Titles, and many other, being due vnto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduct, made a perfect composition of an Heroique Generall. Neither was his private Conuersation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroad. For hee was Grate, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular ease, and of much mildnesse; a louer of his People, bearing 30 with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might winne and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer more bene an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoyning, and the highest command in Greece.

¶ VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Martinaa. The voiage of AGESILAVS into Aegypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betwene him and POMPEY the Roman.

10 This battaile of Martinaa was the greatest that had euer bene fought in that Countrie betwene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Plataa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Graecian valour; neither were the practise of Armes and Art Militarie so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and dailey exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, whose excepted which were vnder taken againſt forraine enemies, prouing for the moſt part vnfortunate. But in this laſt night all Greece was intereſſed, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victorie with greater care of the ſucceſſe, or more obſtinate reſolution. All which notwithstanding, the iſſue being ſuch as hath bene related, it was found beſt for euerie particular Eſtate, that a generall peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed, euerie one retayning what hee preſently had, and none being forced to depend vpon an other. The Mefſenians were by name comprifed in this new league; which cauſed the Lacedaemians not to enter into it. Their ſtanding out hindred not the reſt from proceeding to con- cluſion; conſidering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to ſhew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it ſelfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue ſome breath and reſt to all the Countrey, ſo to the Cities of Athen and Sparta it afforded leiſure to ſeek aſter wealth by forraine employment in Egypt, whither Ageſilau was ſent with ſome ſmall forces to aſſiſt, or indeede as a Mercenarie, to ſerue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Scor King of Egypt, went now as a voluntarie, with ſuch forces as he could raiſe, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the ſame ſeruice. Theſe Egyptian Kings deſcended from Amyrtas of Sau, who rebelled againſt Darius Nothus, hauing retained the Countrey notwithstanding all intestine diſſentions, and forraine inuafions, during three Generations of their owne race, were ſo well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (caſily procured with gold) they conceiued great hope, not only to aſſure themſelues, but to become Lords of the Prouinces adjoining, which were held by the Persian. What the iſſue of this great enterpriſe might haue been, had it not fallen by Domestiſall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is that the rebellion it ſelfe had ſoone come to nothing, if Ageſilau had not proued a falſe Traitor, joyning with Nectanebus who roſe againſt his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Armie which the money of Tachos had waged. His fallhood Ageſilau excuſed, as tending to the good of his owne Countrey; though it ſeeme rather, that hee grudged becauſe the King tooke vpon himſelfe the Conduſt of the Armie, vſing his ſeruice only as Lieutenant, who had made full accompliſhment of being appointed the General. Howſoever it came to paſſe, Tachos being ſhamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had repoſed his chief confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his ſubmiſſion gaue him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who ſeemes to haue bene the Nephew of Tachos) raigned in his ſtead. At the ſame time the Citizens of Mendes had ſet vp another King, to whom all, or moſt of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Ageſilau fighting with him in places of advantage, preuailed ſo farre, that hee left Nectanebus in quiet poſſeſſion of the Kingdome, who in recompence of his treaſon to the former King Tachos. and good ſeruice done to himſelfe, rewarde him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of ſiluer, with which bootie ſailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in warre, free from couetouſnelle, and not reproched with any blemiſh of luſt; which praifes are the leſſe admirable in him, for that the diſcipline of Sparta was ſuch as did endue euerie one of the Citizens (not caried away by the violent ſtreame of an ill nature) with all, or the chief, of theſe good qualities. Hee was neuertheleſſe very arrogant, peruerſe, vnjuſt, and vaine-glorious, meaſuring all things by his owne will, and obſtinately perſecuting thoſe courſes whoſe ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had ſilled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia ſhould be ouerthrowne; with which conceipt being tranſported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, hee did euer after beare ſuch hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Eſtate by mee- neceſſitie to grow warlike, and able, to the vter diſhonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loſſe of all her former greatneſſe. The commendations giuen to him by Xenophon his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the balance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the Solemn gnuitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundrie Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time, or other some quarrell with euerie Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and medled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which varietie he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did manie, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they are very like;

10 Each of them was the last great Capitaine which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrie by his owne Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The resemblance was neuer than the equalitie. Indeede the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Caesar, whom he had entored to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Governement only being changed, But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forsaited vnto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of 20 Sparta was presently lost: and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much blood lost ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soone vpon the death of Agesilaus giue vp the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countrie was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foote, and more

30 to bee regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

10 THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD: INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the raigne of PHILIP of MACEDON, to the establisling of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONVS.

20 THE FOURTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.
30 Of PHILIP, the Father of ALEXANDER the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings raigned in Macedon before PHILIP.

40 THE Greeks, of whom wee haue already made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine Warre, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superiority, doe still, as in former times, continue the inuasion and vastation of each other.

50 Against Alexes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their liber-tie, with as happy successe, as euer Nation had,
and with no lesse honour, than hath euer bene acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a trial, and experience, more than fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as what soeuer could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported ouer the Hellepont, as sufficient, to entertaine and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of marke in the world, that they vnder-stand, and perils, by the hands and harmes, which they least feare, so feared it at this

this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew euen then more violent in deuouring each other, when the fast-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, haue serued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sat nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Gracians perswaded themselves) in any one age likely to recouer their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeede, it was not in their Philosophic to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great Riuers are once swollen, fast-running, and intraged. No, the Greeks did rather employ themselves, in breaking downe those defences, which stood between them and this inundation: than seeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by OROSIUS: Græcia Civitates dum imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes perdidicunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the Sonne of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirme, of Jupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argues; who are listed as followeth. About some sixe years after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countrie, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hating them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle bene directed, to follow the first troupe of those beaats, that should either lead him, or lie before him; He pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entred their Citie without resistance, and possesit it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the reit of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeares. Canus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelue yeares. Tyrinus followed Canus, and ruled eight and twentie yeares.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrinus, gouerned one and sitie yeares: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus Antiochenus, and others, affirme, that he appointed a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Æge: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenide failed in him: a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceiue, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argæus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie yeares.

Philip the first, his successour, reigned eight and twentie yeares.

Europus followed Philip, and gouerned six and twentie yeares: in whose infancie the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victorie, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recouer their former losse, or to looke at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King present;) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so voide of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Ariminus, of Clotarius the sonne of Fredegunda.

Aleatas succeeded Eropus, and tuled nine and twentie yeares.

- 10 Amyntas the first succeeded Aleatas, and raigned fiftie yeares; Hee liued at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Sythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Ewrope, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadours, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behauiour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Successour.

Her. En. Justin. &c.

Alexander, surnamed the rich, the sonne of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and fortie yeares. He did not only appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughtering of the Persian Embassadours, by giuing Gyges his Siller, to Bubares of the bioud of Persia, but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region betwene the Mountaines of Olympus and Hemus, to be vniuered to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardanius made General of the Persian Armie; Alexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three Sonnes, Perdiccas, Aleatas, and Philip.

Her. 8. Plat. Polib. Just. &c.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and raigned in all eight and twentie yeares. The Warres which hee made were not much remarkable: the Storie of them is found here and there by Poces, in Thucydides his first fixe bookes. He left behinde him two sonnes; Perdiccas, who was very yong, and Archelaus who was base borne.

- 30 Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at seuen yeares of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the yong King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily fell therein by misadventure. But Archelaus staid not here: for hauing thus dispatched his Brother, hee slew both his Vncle Aleatas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Aleatas, his Cousen Germaine, and enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeares.

Plat. in Gorg. Arist. Pol. 5.

- This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though hee made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That hee fought by all meanes to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sonnes, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and hauing raigned seuen yeares, hee was slaine in hunting, either by chance or of purpose, by Creatans.

Orestes his yonger sonne was committed to the education of Eropus, of the roial blood of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill; for Eropus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which he held some fixe yeares: the same who denied passage to Agellanus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

- 50 This Vsurper left three sonnes, Pausanias, Arganis, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Eropus, and hauing raigned one yeare, hee was driuen out by Amyntas the sonne of Philip, the sonne of the first Perdiccas, the sonne of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preferred, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Aleatas, and his sonne Alexander. This Amyntas raigned rained (though very quietly) foure and twentie yeares; for he was not only inficted by Pausanias, afflicted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two yeares dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olympians, his Neighbours neare the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Matters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice, the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his second wife Gygea three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomeus, surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much about one yeare, in which time he was inuaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Æropus, but defended by Phocæus the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great summe of money) to leaue his yongest brother Philip in Hoistage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being inuited by the Aleuads against Alexander the Tyrant of Thebæ, hauing redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thebans to his assistance entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey, with whom he also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the sake of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practiced the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomeus Alorites did put in execution by means whereof hee held Macedon for three yeares, but was soone after slaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodorus hath it otherwise of Philip: being made pledge, and faith, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hoistage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conuicted to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet liuing) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hoistage a second time by Alexander his Brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slaine Alorites his base-brother, gouerned Macedon siue yeares, and was then slaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iustine affirmeth, that he perished by the practise of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

§. II.

The beginning of PHILIP'S reign; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

PHILIP the second, the yongest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, hauing bene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernement of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which hee had vnder Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes returned into Macedon, in the first yeare of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourecore and thirteene yeares: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was inuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a sonne, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouer-grw his modestie, and he was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set vp in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Argæus; sonnes sonnes of the late Vsurper Aeropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. These heaueie burdens when Philip could not well beare, he bought off the weightiest by money, and by faire promises vnloided himselfe of so many of the rest, as he ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon, and that the Athenians with a fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land vnder Manias, did beate vpon him on all sides and quarters of his Countrie: Yc after he had practised 10 the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he preuented their recouerie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Arganis the sonne of Aeropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retreat from Aeges, that he forced him to abide the battaile; which Arganis lost, hauing the greatest part of his Armie slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoiding thereby the present furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to returne into 20 Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betwene him and the Athenians for that present, and for this clemencie hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

¶ III.

The good successe which Philip had in many enterprises.

NOW had Philip leisure to looke Northward, and to attend the Ilyrians and Paeonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which 30 he invaded with so prosperous successe, as hee slew Bardillus, King of the Ilyrians, with seuen thousand of his Nation, and thereby recouered all those places which the Ilyrians held in Macedon; and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, hee pierct that Countrie, and after a maine victorie obtained, heeconsort them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he hastned speedily towards Larissa, vpon the Riuer Peneus in Thessalie, of which T owne he soone made himselfe maister; and thereby he got good footing in that Countrie, whereof he made vse in time following. Now although hee resolued either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Countrie were the 40 best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safetie to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, least while hee invaded Thessalie and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either with draw him, or ouer-runne Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous Riuer of Sirimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He also recouered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the Citie of Crenides (sometime Datus) and called it after his owne name Philippi: to the people whereof St. Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in Mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the aduancement of *Philip*s affaires, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make sixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that hee might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olymians; whom the better to saisen vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territorie, meanning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their owne Estate, manie yeares.

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greekes, he took the faire occasion to deliuer the Citie of Pheres in Thessalie, from the tyrannie of Lycophron and Tiphonius. Who, after they had conspired with Thebe the Wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the libertie of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former libertie. Which act of Philip did for-euer after fasten the Thessalians vnto him, and to his exceeding great aduantage, binde them to his seruice.

§. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew PHILIP into Greece.

Bout this time, to wit, in the second yeare of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battaile of Maninaa, and about the eighth yeare of Artaxerxes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of euery great alteration in the World there is some preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned, so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceiued against the Phocians, not only reach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wreat the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves beating downe their owne defences, to giue him an easie passage, and beating themselves, to giue him victorie without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne slaucerie, sauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proude by their victorie at Leuctres) were the inflammers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swaied most, they caused both the Lacedaemonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphes. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedaemonians: and for reuissall were exposed as Sacrilegiers, and accused, to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to inuade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philamellus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazard that Cassius after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngratious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sack the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollis ground, they had so much offended their neighbour-God, and their neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to preuaile against all that had commision to call them to accompt. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the warre was ten thousand talents, which in those daies serued them to wage a great many men, and such was their success in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomachus cast himselfe head-long ouer the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Cheronefus, both to defend themselves against their bad-Neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his ciues. It is said, That hee

Phil. P'pian. Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thefalians engaged in the holy Warre, entred Theffalie with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped so to entertaine the Thefalians at home, as they should not finde leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Theffalie, but both the Thefalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being 10 present) were vtterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Theffalie, Onomarchus drew speedly towards Beotia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Beotians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misaduenture, after hee had re-enforced his Armie, returned with all speede into Theffalie, there to finde againe the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time incountered by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foote, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, sixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged 20 by Philip. Those that fled were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed alongst the coast, commanded by Chares, but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein dcouered ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Theffalie, and Pheres made free as before.

ð. V.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practises of PHILIP.

30 From hence Philip resolved to invade Phocia it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedaemonians they retrencht his passage at the Straits of Thermopylis. Whereupon hee returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Mityberne, Torone, and other Townes, hee quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is said that Philip hauing put to death Arochelass his halfe brother (for Amyntus had three sonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gygae: but Philip elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two younger held themselves
40 within Olynthus; and that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the warre, Lactine affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might any way serue his turne; all his affections, and passions, how diuers soeuer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and therinto conuerted. For hee neither forbore the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie, hee esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter, Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest to be made greater, could loofe the sense of other mens sorrow and subiection. And because hee thought it vaine to practise the winning of Olynthus, till hee had inclosed all the power they had within their owne
50 walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere hee fate downe before the Citie it selfe: which done he bought Euthierates and Lasphemes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countrie and Common-weale, by whose treaton hee entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaues by the

the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee advised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That hee should make his assaults with siluer speares: Whereupon Elorae well and truly said.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain): So when in the contention betweene the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie, and Iustice, but with a powerfull Armie, and hauing beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How PHILIP ended the Phocian Warre.

He warre still continuing betweene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy Warre, the Bacotians, finding themselves vnable to subsist without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselves; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred and fourecore thousand Crownes, but when with these supplies they had still the worst in all their attempts against the Phocians, who held from them three of their strongest Cities within Bacotia it selfe, They then befought Philip of Macedon that hee would assist them in person, to whom they would giue an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obey his commandments in that Warre.

Now had Philip what hee longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Bacotia, where being arriued, Phaltecus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to flock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and with-drew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leauing the Phocians to the mercie of the Conquerour, and for conclusion he had the glorie of that Warre called Sacred, which the Gracians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten yeares, and, besides the glorie, hee posselt himselfe of Orchemene, Coronea, and Corisus, in the Countrie of the Bacotians, who invited him to be victorious ouer themselves. Hee brought the Phocians into seruitude, and waisted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, referring to himselfe the yearly tribute of threecore talents, which make sixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of pietie for seruice of the Gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyctiones, which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian Sacriledge.

§. VII.

How PHILIP with ill success attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

PHILIP after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughter'd many thousands of the Illyrians; and Dardarians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their revenues. But his next enterprize against the Perinthians staid his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated upon Propontis, in the mid-way betwene Sellis and Byzantium; a place of great strength, and a people resolv'd to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and assisted them. Philip late downe before it with a puissant Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults, and built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But hee was repel'd with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persians with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood upon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieued from Athens, Chios, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their Neighbourhood, and the easie passage by water, gaue them often and readie helpe, Philip remoued with the one halfe of his Armie and besieged it, leaving fifteene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be short, hee failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnder-take diuers enterprizes at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions; Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refusal. In the meane while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence by the taking of an hundred and thre score and ten Marchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, lead them into Scythias; but he was also vnprosperous in this enterprize: For the Triballi, a people of Messia, set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatt part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How PHILIP overthruwing the Greekes in the battaile of Cheronaa, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of PHILIP.

AMONG these Northren Nations (part of which hee suppress, and part quieted) he spent some eight yeares; and in the ninth yeare, after the end of the holy Warre, he was to his great aduantage invited againe by the Graecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobaid the decree of the Amphyctones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Loerians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissians, the rest were not of themselves able to constraine them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resolving vpon this enterprize; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe back; nor other dissuasion than a maling power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forth with to march; the same being compounded of thirtie thousand foote, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition

expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Plataea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this forme would fall on themselves, yet were they disswaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choise (having drawne the Thebans to joyne with them) to leaue the enjoying of their estates and their freedom to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orators eloquence cost them deare. It is true that he could farre more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, then make them to be such as they were. Hee might repeat vnto them (with wordes mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but hee could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Artiades, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had paid with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrarie faction hee was at this time in disgrace, and not imploied: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although some thousand of the Athenians aid the killing, and the like number well neare of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of worthie men on that side to hold vp the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choyse Captaines of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip so shining a victorie that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, Asia, and Aegypt; so it cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Gracian glorie: Yea their libertie (saith Curcius) with their large Dominion wonne with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer lost.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to his disadvantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraigntie ouer all Greece and beacknowledged for their Capitaine-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cleerona, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed ouer therest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soone after (according vnto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soueraigntie) by the general States at Cornith, stiled The first Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, hee compounded an Armie of great strength, and vnder the commandment of Atalus and Parmenia, transported the same ouer the Hellestioni into Asia, to beginne the Warre. Of his enterprise against Persia hee fought the successe from the Oracle at Delpbos, from whence hee receiued such an other convertible riddle, as Craesus did when hee attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the expolition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did Philips ambitious desire to inuade Persia abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, where with himselfe was threatned, he vnderstood to be deliuered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feast and passimes thereat appointed hee inuited all his Friends and Allies, with the principall persons of the Gracian Cities, from whom hee receiued much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeede the feast of his Funerall. For having refused to doe justice to one Paulonias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Atalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to be carnally abused by diuers base persons, T his Paulonias grew into so great detestation of the Kings partialitie in so fowle a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had liued fixe and fortie yeares, and reigned siue and twentie.

Iustine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death hee boldly avowed, by the honour hee did vnto Pausanias in crowning his dead bodie, in consecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of ALEXANDERS greatnesse were laied by PHILIP.
Of his laudable qualities, and issue.

10  Ow although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side the Sea, and had scene the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse, and perfection, yet he was herein happy that he liued to see his sonne Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laied so foundly for him, with so plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more ealie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings were vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For besides the recouerie of Macedon it selfe, in competition betweene him and the sonnes of Evropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places possessed by the Ilyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the overthrow of Olynthus, a State that dispised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greeks, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; Hee left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them both for their valour and judgement in the Warre were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that wore a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to so great vertue, impiouly murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challengeing eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio, neuer did any thing worthie of renowne; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that He was Valiant, Wife, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this fauour of Pietie, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) wee finde a good example in his dealing with Arcasion, and Nicanor; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; Hee answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in euery mans owne power to bee well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip had relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that hee was a better Philition for euill speech than they were.

50 His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembered by Cicero, and Gellius; and by Dion: and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyanus and Frontinus, his wife sayings by Plutarch. And albeit hee held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his raigne, yet was hee not the true and next Heire thereof: for Amynas the sonne of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom hee had the protection) protection during his infancie) had the right. This Amyntas hee married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philips base sonne Aridæus, her Vncle by the mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death, Aridæus by extreme torments: Eurydice shee strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians, (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexanders death flaine at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonus.

By Andata, an Illyrian, his second wife, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed 10 before.

By Niceaspolis, the Sister of Jason, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had TheSalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married, but shee was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra, the Nece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder on Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra hee had likewise a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breast.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

Hee had also two Concubines, Asinoe, whom, after he had gotten with child, hee married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolome, King of Aegypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a publike Dancer, he had Aridæus, of whom wee shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great. §. 1.

§. I.

A briefe rehearse of ALEXANDERS doings, before hee invaded Asia.

ALEXANDER, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father, being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his raigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and feneentene yeares after Rome built, and after his owne birth twentie yeares. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the Gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, 50 I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three generall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and foreboding the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, beganne to consult about the recouerie of their former libertie, and to adventure it by force of Armes. Alexanders yong-year's gave them hope of preuailling, and his suspected feneritie increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to liue slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his estate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tombe; and the celebration of his Funeralls, hee first fastened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions, and bodily slauerie, other than their seruice in his warres; and vsed such Kingly austeritie towards those that contemned his yong yeares, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded them selues of the crueltie of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, He made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the Statcs of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Capitaine-Generall against the Persians, vpon which warre Philip his Father had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recouer some places on 20 Asia-sic, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprize against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire markes of riches, Honour, and large Dominion, hee now shot at both sleeping and waking; all other thoughts and imaginations were either grieuous or hateful. But a contrarie winde ariseth; for hee receiue th aduertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedaemonians, had vnited themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recouerie of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demajibenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persias; the deuise he vsed was more subtile than profitable, for he caused it to be bruted that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a Companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeede a certaine Doctrine of Policie (as Policie is now a daies defined by fallshood and knauerie) that deuised rumours and lies, if they serue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly auailable. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Warres; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that finde themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occasions perilous, summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Vnters of such trumperie, and for them feare vpon necessarie occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not only very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Graecians, of whose assistance he thought himselfe assured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot indure to striue against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which hee purposeth to recouer: and it no lesse becommeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Renolters, as that himselfe, with the Armie that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. 50 Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be received againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Graecians. Wise men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King

prises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Geetes, Agrians, and other Saluage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which after diuers ouerthrows giuen them, hee made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than libertie; the Greekes had enjoyed it ouer-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander halseth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirtie thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the Citie, and ganeth the Inhabitants some daies to resolue, being euen heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeede, he was to draw bloud of the Graecians, by whom hee hoped to free himselfe elsewhere, that hee offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliuer into his hands Phonix and Prasibytes, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in steed of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, Demanded Philotas and Antipater to bee deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then laied in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon and many other Princelices, could either haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perilled in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailable, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirtie thousand sold for slaues, at the price of four hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Graecian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleodas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He praised the King to beleuee that they were rather misle-led by giuing basie credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Succesour. Hee also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse, the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour hee bare to learning, hee pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at libertie Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the libertie of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble-woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him rauished, hee threatened to take her life vnesse shee would confesse her treasure, shee led the Thracian to a Well, and told him that shee had therein cast it, and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, shee suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their Citie so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterpris of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Graecians betooke themselves to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few daies hee inuadeth.

§. II.

How ALEXANDER passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellepont, and being readie to disimbarke, hee threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of deiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waite in their owne Territory, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possess. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirtie thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neare vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his owne coast, he put to death, without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinnesmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly aduanced, not sparing such of his owne as he suspected, Hee also tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelitie he doubted, thinking by vnjust crueltie to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrarie to the policie which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing verie well with the iustice of God; For all that he had planted, was soone after withered, and rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead bodie to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia-side was brought to Darius, he so much corned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing filled him his seruant on a letter which hee wrote vnto him, reprehending his dilloiatie and audacitie (for Darius intituled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinnesmen of the Gods) hee gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander a-live, whip him with rods, and then conuey him to his presence: that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Ethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Affrica.

In this fort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians; But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men vnto acquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and Steele against the sharpe-pikes, swords, and darts of the hardie Macedonians, I say besides all these, euen the opinion they had of their owne numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and Jewells of Perſia, both which they needed, so the Persians who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obaied the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his seruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power ouer them, they only then obaied, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did iustly and violently require it. For saith VEGEIVS: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles pro alium cupit, ut inornat in obitu; nam sciendum est in pugna usum amplius prodesse quam uires; As the well-practised Squaller desires to come to battaile, so the raw one fears it: or only to beate rude strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his Storie, That it was hard to judge, whether his daring to vndertake the Conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondrous at. For at the Riuer of Granick, which severeth the Territorie of Troy from Propontis, the Persians fought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and 10 bank of the riuer to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuell of the water; Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seems to mee, that the victorie then gotten was exceeding ealie, and that the twentie thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kill'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by reuiling. For had those twentie thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or after Plutarch, two thousand and siue hundred horse-men, armed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spirbridates and Rhasaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly how those Gracians in Darius his pay holding themselves in one bodie vpon a peece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercie was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foote-men, and two and twentie Horse-men.

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granick.

THe winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terrour vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as hee obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once been beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Straights, and Mountaines, they will soone haue perswaded themselves, that such an enemy, vpon equal termes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. 40 It was therefore Machabees counsell, that he which is resolute to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies, of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the waies. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Countrey be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an inuader? Yet are they such, as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauike ouer them; but they giue no securitie to those that lie behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lumbardie perswaded themselves 50 that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines

Mountaines had made fittell of all other for such a seruire, were busied in custodie of the Alpes, Francia appeared in Lumbardie, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arruall. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such fort, as they leaue but one Gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyla, haue seldome bene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldome (if euer) haue they been attempted in vaine? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopyla; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly foeuer they had bene locked and barred, yet were those countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the back-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witness. The deepeit haue many Fords; the swiftest and broadest may bee passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enough to beate his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come oier, to his losse, than by struiuing in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly if a Riuer were sufficient delence against an Armie, the Isle of Monte, now called Anglesey, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea; had bene safe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foards. Whereby hee so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleeuing nothing could bee hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Brittaines were men stout enough; the Persians were dauntles.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the Riuer of Gramick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seeke an ealier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some safer meanes. For hauing beaten them vpon their owne ground, hee did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Profectors.

Soone after this victorie hee recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trellians and Magnesia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, hee receiued with great grace, suffering them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For hee obserued it well; Novam Imperium inchoantibus vltis elementa fama; It is commodious vnto such as lay the foundations of a new Soveraignty to haue the same of being mercifull. Hee then by Parmenio wanne Miletus, and by force maltred Helicarnassus, which, because it resisted obstinately, hee razed to the ground. From thence hee entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had bene cast out of all that shee held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her Sonne and succesor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part as hee left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. Hee then entred into Lycia, and Pamphilia, and obtained all the Sea coasts, and subiecting vnto him Pisidia, he directed him selfe towards Darius (who was laid to be advanced towards him with a maruailous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victorie laied vnder his feet.

While hee gaue order for the gouernement and setting of Lycia, and Pamphilia, he sent Cleander to raise some new Companies in Peeloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, seated on the Riuer Maander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle only holding out, which also after fortie daies was giuen vp: for so long time hee gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas hee pass on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a Citie called Gordium, the Regall-seate, in former times, of King Midas. In this Citie it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when hee knew not how to vndoe, hee cut it a-sunder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophetic did promise to him that could vniuite, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophetic, by hewing it in peeces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the East, hee tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Leibes, Sco, and Cos, the charge whereof he committed vnto two of his Captaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most conuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie talents to defray the charge; and with all out of his first spoile gotten, he sent threescore talents more to Antipater his Licutenant in Greece, and Macedon. From Celenus he remoued to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee multried his Armie, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted the themselves vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where hee left Catus Governour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arriued.

Here hee vnderstood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this only Captaine hee had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders hee had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vnderaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, conuerted the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize, such spirits have bene stirred vp in sundrie Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinite spirit of the Finer sell, piercing, mouing, and governing all things hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were maruailous, and would hardly haue bene vnderaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discovered the Riuer of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of victorie, where with he ranne ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, That he was neuer encountered by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than Desert places, and the meere length of tedious Iournies could make, were like the Colybias of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse material, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captaines, and those better followed than themselves, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies; and still prevailed ouer those, that would not haue yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are doe seldome liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardie and well-ordered State, than to tread downe and vtterly subdue a multitude of seruile Nations, composing the bodie of a grosse vnweldie Empire. Wherefore these Parua Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like abilitie, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to bee rather admired for the substance substance of their actions, than the exquisite menaging: exactnesse and greattwee concurring so seldome, that I can finde no instance of both in one, save only that brave Roman Caesar.

Having this farre digressed, it is now time that wee returne vnto our Easterne Conqueror; who is traouailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recouer the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recouered in his first battaile; vpon which, by certaine incriptions, he made them partakers of his victorie. Herein hee well aduised himselfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaineth in the Warres, as hee doth of the spoiles, shall neuer bee long followed by those of the better sort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glorie; as the weake in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and siluer.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander coming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defensible; and withall, as Curius noeth, hee beganne ouer-late to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Alexander: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to wait all the provisions for Men and Horse, that could not bee lodged in strong places, and alwaies to giue ground to the Inuader, till hee found some such notable aduantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victorie. For the furie of an invading Armie is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans; hee might perchance haue saued his owne life, and his estate: For it was one of the greatest encouragements giuen by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes when hee inuaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdome; Pericles, though the Lacedemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not bee drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, we will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their owne Countries, to charge an invading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pempey was well aduised for a while, when hee gaue Caesar ground, but when by the importunitie of his Captaine hee aduentured to fight at Pharsalia, hee lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsells which promise successe in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mightie preparation of Charles the Fifth, when hee inuaded Prouence, by waisting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and dissolve the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the aduise of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, inuading their Countrie, and could not bee perswaded to linger the time, and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twentie thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois set vpon King Edward at Cressie, and King John (when the English were well neare tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue have bene wasted to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great furie, neare Positiers, to joyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the Fifth of France made another kinde of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blowes, and followed his aduise which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smooke; and it is reported by Bélsey and Herraults, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that hee wanted from him the Duchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

344 But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short lined, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, 10 or know not how to put in execution any sound aduise. The courtie which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexitie, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne; or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia bene wasted whilst Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia bene defended by Arsenes, Governour of that Prouince, with the best of his forces; hunger would not haue suffered the enemie, to stay the trial of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue bene maintained, yet might Cilicia at better leisure haue bene so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue bene broken, by seeing out miseries with painefull trauaile. 20

But Arsenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to wait, and spoile the Countrey; or rather, as may seeme, to find himselfe some worke, by pretence of which hee might honestly runne further away from Alexander. Hee should rather haue aduentured his person in custodie of the Streights, whereby hee might perhaps haue saued the Prouinces; and in the meantime, all that was in the fields, would haue bene conueighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driuen from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the lesse worke in destroying that litle which was left abroad. Handling the matters hee did, hee gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arsenes made all halt to joyne himselfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, beganne to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countrey behinde their backs, had exposed themselves vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian Swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrey (which honour they saw that Arsenes himselfe could well forbear) they speedily followed the foote-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Harueſt. Thus 40 Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had bene alienated from the Perſian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIIL.

Of the vnmarrlike Armie leaued by DARIUS against ALEXANDER:
The vnuadvised courses which DARIUS took in this expedition. Hee is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners. Of some things following the affection betw judgement 743.

10 IN the meane season Darius approached; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetic thousand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Iustine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at lix hundred thousand.

20 The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to set out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his owne safetie, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beate Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and fise yong-men, answering the number of the daies of the yeare, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sonne: Next after these followed ten sumptuous Chariots, inlaid and garnish with siluer and gold, and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelue general Nations, which the better to auoide confusion, did hardly vnderstand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serue very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foore marched, with the Persians called immortal, because if any died the number was 30 presently supplid: and these were armed with chaines of gold, and their coates with the same metall imbrodered, whereof the leeuces were garnished with pearle, baites, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great inciuilitie to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuosè induit us miles, se virtute superiorum alijs non existimet, cum in preijs o- porteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis nuntiri, quoniam hostes vestibus non de-bellantur; Let no man thinke that he exceedeth those in valour, whom hee exceedeth in eey garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Pappus that this ad-uice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Somnites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all sware either to preuaile or die, thirrie thousand of them hauing ap-40 parrelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, had the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, & per pilla atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no bodie, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like companie, fiftene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breede the more terrour) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen.
Then came Darius himselfe, the Gentlemen of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the Gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serue, but they serued their turnes of these, by 50 changing their massie-bodies into thiane portable and currant coine. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged Eagle of the same metall: The hinder part being raised high wheron Darius sat, had a covering of inestimable value, This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with siluer, and their heads gult; which they meant not to imbrow in the Macedonian blood, for feare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his person two hundred of the blood Royall, blood too Royall and pretious to be spilt by any valorous aduencure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdie fellows, like the Smutters, would haue done him more seruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if hee had meant to haue vied he would haue marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the R careward, the same being led by Sisymbrius the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawne in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-back, with fiftene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wiuces of the Nobilitie, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Coneuibines, and a world of Nurles, and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apperelled, By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had bene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was farre fitter to behold those sports than to bee present at batailles. Betwene these & a companie of slight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this fort came this Mage-game-King into the field, incumbrd with a most vnecessary traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled, and for the most part so eliminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue incouraged the nakedd Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoeuer else hath bene wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparion of spoile and riches, The rich ships are boarded vpon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly inuaded. Our English Nations haue attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royalls of plate, and Pistolets, which had they bene put to it vpon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countrie, they would haue turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contending that they had bene brought with our reason to the Butcherie and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations, for as the needie are alwaies aduentionous, so plentie is wont to thinne perill, and men that haue well to lue, doe rather studie how to lue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car estuy' a rien a gaigner, que des coups volentiers il ny va pas; No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Southsaiers, hee would haue satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrailles of Beasts for successe. For leauing the description of this second bataile (which is indeede no-where well described, neither for the confusion and hallic running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that three score thousand Persian foot-men were slaine in this bataile, with ten thousand of their horsemen, Or (as Curcius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horse-men, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred and fourescore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleue that this small number rather died with the ouer-trauail and paine-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes receiued from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers; they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters,

ters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honor beene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetic and his estate at leffe. Darius by this time found it true that Charidemus a banished Gracian of Athens had told him, when hee made a view of his Armie about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which hee had assembled of diuers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would bee found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the countie, whom in passing by they would deuour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaie; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattrailed in grosse Squadrons, which they call their Phalians, well couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great aduantage, would make so little account of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertaine (hauing so great abundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, hee would repent him ouer-late, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had beene accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth) as he commanded that this poore Gracian should bee presently slaine: who while hee was a funding in the Tormentors hand, vsed this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom hee had giuen this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deserued punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduise.

It was the saying of a Wife man. Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita formate sunt, ut aspera qua vitilia, nec quisquam nisi iucundum accipiat; That Princes safetic is in a desperate case, whose eares iudge all that is profitable to be too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasing.

For libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilij est eius vita, & essentia, qua crepta consilium euasit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduise giuen him by the Gracian Souldiers that serued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: but had they beene Counsellors and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men beene able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, vnder their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retreats haue beene made by them, though the rest of the Armie in which they haue serued, hath beene broken.

At the battaile of Raenne where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a Squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndimaid; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not intire by their escape, hee was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminenti, mali opus ipsorum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the bulwesse of selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider the danger, which the mischiefe hanging ouer their heads may bring: and as truly of those that know the warres but by heare-say. Quod valentes sunt & preualet ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They haue abilitie enough, and so spare, till dangers appeare, but when perill indeede comes they get them gone.

These Gracians also that made the retreat, aduised Darius to retire his Armie into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might might have fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once then might haue bene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was so contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Grecians which gaue the aduise, and to cut them in peeces as Traitors. The infinite wisdome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Governours, so as they can neither giue nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needes fight with Alexander vpon a straightned peece of ground, neare vnto the Citie of Iffus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduise of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best advantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elfewhere) taken prisoner, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, Yet Alexander mastered his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobolus the Historian, That he embraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Oebus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wiues and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; At which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Iffus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bulhoon fixe hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phancia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Citie of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it troade on his heeles, for Antigenus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leauied; the Lacedaemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battaile, forsaking both the partie of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander, to honour Ephesion, whom hee loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the Kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustaine his life, being of the Royall blood, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wilth that hee could beare his prosperitie with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which hee commended in an other mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompanie, and could not gouerne, his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, importing the ransom of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsasing, in his direction, to liue Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned returned him a more comelull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had alreadie cast lease, the one a resolu'd well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdain'd the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How ALEXANDER besieged and wanne the Citie of Tyre.

10 ALXANDER comming neare to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which hee tooke very thankfully, returning them answer that he desired to offer a sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom hee was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old Citie adjoining, now abandoned and desolate: To bee shott, Alexander resolu'd to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the 20 Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, hee filled the passage of the Sea betwene the Iland and the Maine, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne a sunder, yet with the helpe of his Naue which arriued (during the sieg) from Cyprus, hee came all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seuen Moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the sieg had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused 30 two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and referu'd for slaues (saith Diodore) thirtie thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirtie thousand. Many more had died had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conuic'd great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie. + 1011. 18.

Happie it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrians hauing dreamt, that this God meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe. 25

It is true, that it was a notable enterprize and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay 40 betwene the Iland and the Maine.

The gouernment of this Territorie he gaue to Philetas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Ephesion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How DARIUS offered conditions of peace to ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

50 IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laith the losse of the last battaile to the straightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatening to incompass him in the plaine Countries, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuer of Euphrates, Tigris,

Tyrus, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things: for hee that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betwene the Riuer of Alyx, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dowry with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victorie and his owne vertue had posselt him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receiue any; and that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdained to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe ouer Riuers. It is said that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander hee would accept of Darius his offers, to which Alexander answered, That so would hee if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Betis a faithfull seruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege wherof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; Hee found better men in this place than hee did at the former battailes, for hee left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was forst to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first beganne to change condition, and to exercise crueltie. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Iosephus calleth Behemeses) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assaultants; he bored holes through his feete, and caused him to be drawne about the streets, whilest he was as yet aliue; who being as valiant a man as himselfe, disdained to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had hee to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his ancestor Schulles, who did the like to Heclor? It is true, that crueltie hath alwaies somewhat to couer her desormitie.

From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Armie towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Prielt, being subiect and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Iewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the Citie couered with his Pontificall-Robes, to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests & Leuites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so vnusuall, stately, and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that hee fell to the ground before the high Prielt, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; Howsoeuer it was, I am of opinion, That he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophetic of Daniel had been read vnto him, when he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could discourage him or feare him. Hee confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, hee saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so appaialed, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose hee had in hand with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended onely by the light of his phantasia, hee now beheld with his bodily eyes; wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phoenicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) hee gaue the Iewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their owne Religion.

Ø. VII.

ALEXANDER winnes Ægypt: and makes a tourne to the Temple of HAMMON.

From Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Ægypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant Asiaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Cite of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this wee see that the Kings of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gave to the valiantest man hee had but the command of one Cite, and to the valientest toward the gouernement of all Ægypt. When he had set things in order Ægypt, he beganne to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon; so foolish had prosperitie made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels-back was spent, hee could not but haue perished, had not a maruailous shower of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreme despaire. All men that know Ægypt, and haue written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there, but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the Armie; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Armie was cast back, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Iupiters Temple. Arianus from the report of Ptoleme, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That hee was led by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true; But many of these wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay hovering directly ouer his head at the battaile of Ibus; That a Swallow flew about his head when hee slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him; at Helicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Aëtopus; practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrrians made their defensue ingines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West-Indies haue many such pretie tales, telling how they haue beene assisted in battaile, by the presence of four Ladies, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselves doe hardly beleue. The strangest things that I haue read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nouarra, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had bene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Tremoules and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperiall Switzers vtterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Iupiter Hammon is all described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the south, between whom and the territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebaïc, or the superiour Ægypt, with the Mountaines of Lybia, and the Riuer of Nilus, are interjacent, and on the North he joynes it to a Nation, called Nisitanones, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith hee) vpon the spoiles of shipwrack, whereas the Temple or Groue of this Idoll hath no Sen neare it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; thre Nisitanones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came neare the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answers might bee giuen in all things, agreeable to his made ambition, who affected the title of Iupiters sonne. And so hee was saluted Sonne of Iupiter by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defectiue in the Greeke tongue; For whereas he meant to say Opaidion, he said Opaidios, that is; of sonne of Iupiter, in stead of O acare jonne: for which Gramaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumor presently spread, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one, when he was imploied against Gorgon, The other, against Anteus and Buſiris; and seeing these men had derided themselves from the Gods, why might not hee? By this it seemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeede he made himselfe one; by thinking to come from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deitie, hee had prazized the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleating to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a boſſe carried in a Boate, or by a Ramme, or a Rammes-head; I see that many wife-men have troubled themselves to finde out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who lived saith St. Augustine in Moses time.) Es qua de ajs veteres fabulis suis conscribere non sunt namum curioſe perneſtiganda; We muſt not over-curioſly search into the fables, which the Ancients have written of their Gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell beganne to be preached in the World, the Devill in this and in all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Caesar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesseth.

There is found neare his Temple a Fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boiling water, and at Noone as cold as any yce, to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by Saint Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arianus, Curtius, and others, and indeede our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How ALEXANDER marching against DARIUS, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

From the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men he heard the Philosopher Plammes, who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generally, and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that hee acknowledged none for his children save good men.

He gave the charge of the severall Provinces of Egypt to severall Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Westermoſt branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdomes of the lesſer Aſia, Phoenicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victorie would readily have redeemed;) he led his Armie towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a River for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tells vs, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waightie stones, and those that moued not but lay in the bottome, were so round and well polished by continuall rolling, rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slipperie a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, otherwise than by joyning their hands and enterlaicing their Armes together, making one waightie and entire bodie to resist the swiftpassage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable helpe, the Channell was so deepe towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should haue made head, as the foot-men were infort to lift their Bowes and Arrowes and Darts ouer their heads, to keepe them from being moistned, and made vnscruiceable by the Waters. But it was truely and vnderstandingly said of Isomer.

10 *Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Quis quotidie ducit pater vitarumq; Deorumq;*

The mindes of men are euer so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World by the surfeit of misgovernment haue bene subject to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall distresses, So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feuer, and thereby become frantick and without vnderstanding, forelshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

20 But Alexander hath now recouered the Easterne shores of Tigris, without any other difficultie, than that of the nature of the place, where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vneuen forces hee durst haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them hee forsooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could eaily haue ouer-come. But it is commonly scene, that fearefull and cowardly men doe euer follow those waies, and counsells, whereof the opportunitie is already lost.

30 It is true that he set all provisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serue themselves ouer Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to haue distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse when vnseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as no thing was wanting to the competence of the Armie which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to wath, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saued and recouered. This, Mazeus might haue done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not haue pursued them, leauing the strength of their foote out of sight, and farre behinde.

§. I X.

The new provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battale of Arbela.

40 DARIVS, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Aegypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather serued to make vp the names of men, than to make resistance. Arianus hath numbered them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse
50 four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius who musters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thousand foote, and nere fiftie thousand horse, comes (I thinke) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassalls, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all sorts some three or foure hundred thousand, with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Assyria to haue ouerborne the few numbers of the invading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre.

Q999 3 with

In omni praelio non tam multitudo, & virtus inducta, quam ars & exercitium solent præfere victoriam; In caeteris battaile skill and practise doe more towards the victorie, than multitudo and ruse audacitas.

While Alexander gaue rest to his Armie after their passage ouer Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant, (as the multitude alwaies are)ooke it for a certaine preface of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, T hat for the ambition of one man, a man that disdain'd Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Sonne of Iupiter, they should all perish; For hee not only infort them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heaueus themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being readie to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moone was a certaine preface of good successe; for that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as some Almanack-maker had bene no small foole in those daies.

Of this kinde of superstitious obseruation Caesar made good vse, when he fought against Ariouiscus and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainly loofe the battaile, Caesar forst them to abide it, though they durst not giue it, wherein hauing their mindes already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Armie in effect perished.

These Egyptians gaue no other reason than this, T hat the Gracians were vnder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glorie of being obscured. T his judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noised through all the Armie, all were satisfi'd, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though denied since, was well obserued then. Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducit; Lae not a Capitaine leade his Armie to the fight, when it is possessed with matters of terror.

It is truly obserued by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we finde it in all Stories, and often in our owne, that by such inuentions, deuiled tales, dreames, and prophesies, the people of this Land haue bene carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and fill to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neare the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized written by Darius to the Gracians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppress'd with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seem'd no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first brute suspected that some dishonourable violence had bene offered her, but being satisfi'd by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal Gods, T hat if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre it on so iust and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last triall by battaile offered these conditions of peace.

T hat with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and resigne all Asia the lesse, and with Egypt, all those Kingdomes betwene the Phenician Sea, and the Riuer of Euphrates, T hat he would pay him for the ransom of his Mother, and his other other Daughter thirte thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leaue his Sonne Ocebus in hostage: To this they fought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be removed, aduised with his Counsell, but heard no man speake but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. Hee told him, that the Empire betwene Euphrates and Hellepont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retyning of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vse than their persons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his aduise, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune; and left himselfe a Successor of able age to haue enjoyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure himselfe of what they had vsurped vpon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeares after. The truth is, that Alexander in going so farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperitie, became a loucr of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreame crueltie. Yea, as Seneca hath obserued, the taint of one vnjust slaught, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beautie of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors lay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the Wife and Children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master; that thanks to an enemy was improper; that he made no warres against aduersitie, but against those that resisted him, Not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet hee could not (were it otherwise) resolue in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Treason offered him, it was alreadie his owne, and if Darius could beate him back againe ouer Euphrates, which hee had alreadie past, hee would then beleue that he offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwisc he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre, which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession, wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For conclusion, hee told them, that hee came into Asia to giue, and not to receive; That the Heauens could not hold two Sunnes: and therefore if Darius could bee content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, hee might perchance bee perswaded to giue him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

p. X.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not bee so strongly fought as report hath made it.

50 WITH this answer the Embassadors returne; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazæus to defend a passage, which he neuer yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night, so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terrour in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victorie, and resolues to bring with him the day.

day-light, to witness his valour, But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell giuen by Parmeno was more found: For it is a ground in Warre, Silpaues necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est: noli in tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, he laggred & intrenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surpris had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and for some sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna milites valens reserunt, licet non potuissent refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis pugnatur, quam seruum exterius; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight; if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more egerly than Steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arianus, were fortie thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse; these belike were of the Europaen Armie; for hee had besides both Syrians, Medians, Aegyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vsed but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetoric; for by the two former battailes vpon the Riuer of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria Vitoriam parat, animamq; victoribus auget, & aduersis inuertit. One victorie begets an other, and puts courage into those that haue already had the better, taking spirit away from such as haue beene beaten.

Arianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victorie inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmeno was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Rare-guard was broken and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long vnrresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his reitrait. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuevs vs in accompt but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies-work; saying, That Ephessian, Perdiccas, and others of name, were wounded. Arianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius,) thirtie thousand according to Arianus: Ninetic thousand, if we beleue Diodor. But what can we iudge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these foure or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as sixe or seuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the bankes of Euphrates, and had armed but sixtie or threecore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to haue past that Riuer so easily, much lesse the Riuer of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, Hee abandoned all places of aduantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so far into the bowells of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibilitie of escape by reitrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choise, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way constraime his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that inuaded them.

§. XI.

of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Susa.

DA R I U S after the rout of his Armie recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the flight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a reitrait into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians greedie of spoile and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obied than approved.

Alexander soone after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred vnto him: for the treare which conducted Darius took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had bene twice beaten, should rather haue sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neare the place where he abid the coming of his enemies; if he had bene victorious he might haue brought it after him at leisure, but being overcome, hee knew it vnpossible to driue Mules and Cammels laden with gold 20 from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the ouerthrow hee had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head to runne away with the more speede. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praterita magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend then amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom Darius had most confidence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citie. Also the Captain of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, flattered the freetes with flowers, burnt frankincense vpon Altars of siluer as Alexander passed by, and deliuered vnto him whatsoeuer was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King;
30 after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite riche in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betwene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When hee entered the Castle hee admired the glorie thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found amounting to fiftie thousand talents of siluer vncoynd. The Citie it selfe I haue elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and the Circuite, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of foure score foote high, and on the toppe thereof (being vnderborne with Pillars) a Groue of beautiful and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princeesses might 40 walke priuately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things but most of all in Voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie foure and thirtie daies, consuming that time in banquetting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much loosened the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of warre which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painefull cruauale, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were crested, & Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Captaines which were found by certain 50 selected Iudges to haue deserued best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing downe of the foote-bands in this latter age hath bene the cause (saith the Marshall Monnier) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath bene bestowed on euerie Picque Boy or Spurn-Cow, for when the Captaines of foote had a thousand Souldiers vnder

one Enigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable and the Kings were lesse charged, and farre better serued. King Henric the eighth of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good shippes, but to men of knowne valour, and of great estate, nay some time he made two Gentlemen of qualitie commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him sixe thousand foote and five hundred horse, out of Macedon, of Thracians three thousand foote and the like number of horse, and out of Greece foure thousand foote and ioure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon could hardly be brought againe, Le quitter la plaine par dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge vnto three of his owne Captaines, deliuering withall into their hands to supply al wants a thousand talents: but to grace Mazens who rendred the citie vnto him, he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Beryssines that gaue vp the Castle, and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolemie, Herodotus, and Elianus call Atennonia, sytuate on the riuer Euleus, a Citie sometime gouerned by Daniel the prophet. Abulites also, gouernour of this famous Citie, gaue it vp to the Conqueror with fiftie thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this fort did those Vassalls of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures.

Diademeareth of more than foore thousand talents in bullion, and of nine Millions of coined gold.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazens might haue furnished his owne King from Babylon, and while he liard foure and thirtie daies at Babylon, Abulites might haue holpen him from Susa: and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persopolis might haue relieved him: for the great masse of treasure was laid vp in that Citie. But who hath sought out and friended fearefull adueritie? It is certaine, that benefites binde not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedie of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune only studie the conservation of their owne greatnesse.

And therefore was Alexander well aduised, that whatsoeuer titles he gaue to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persopolis, with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would haue returned to their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings are neuer to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor euer to be trusted with the defences of any frontier Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the sending whereof they may redeeme their libertie and estates loot.

Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Xaquara, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fontarabe, in the year 1523.

It is said, that Charles the fifth hauing promised Charles of Bourbon the gouernement of Marselles, if he could haue forst it, and whereof he made sure accompt, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that hee meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise, because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (reuelod from his Maister) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

The gouernement of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, Alexander comitted to his owne Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazens and others, in giuing them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius his Mother and her children to repose themselves.

ð. XII.

How ALEXANDER came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

From Susa Alexander leadeth his Armie toward Persepolis, and when he fought to passe those Mountaines which sunder Susiana and Persia, hee was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Straights, called Pyle Perfidia, or Susiside; and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was for to saue himselfe by retreat, causing his foote to march close together; and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountaine-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Countrie, discovered vnto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforced to fight vpon euenground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon hee fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receiue him) hee returned and gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Switzers vndertaking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanship had not faued them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had bene ill paired for 10 their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greekes, saith Curtius, (Insine numbers them but at eight hundred) having bene taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue bene knowne to their Countrie-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandses, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was readie to receiue him, and praised him to double 30 his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoile the Kings treasure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arrivall, and they that staid followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the libertie of the Souldiers, to spoile and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had bene laied in ballance with Persepolis, would haue weighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulke and maine store of the Persians. For after the spoile that had bene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and silver, and other Jewells; there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twentie thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in 40 Susa, and gaue the same for all honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the fruit of the place was Niciasides, a creature of his owne. The bodie of his Armie hee left here for thirtie daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troupes of chosen foote, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non ille tre vult, sed non potest stare. He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not indure the extreame frost, and make way, but with extreme difficultie through the snow, that Alexander lorfooke his horse, and led them the way. But 50 what can bee more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can indure it? His walking on foote did no other wise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse indure it. For mine owne little judgement I shall rather commend that Capitaine, that makes carefull prouision for those that follow follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extreme necessitie, than those witlesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of hauing indured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glorie and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victualls was their first care. For it was a true saying of Caligni, Admirall of France; That who so will scape that beast (meaning Warre) must beginne with his bellie.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberallie, of his clemencie, towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowling cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the companie and familiaritie of base Harlots, he beganne to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis, to bee consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrarie, who told him that it was a dishonour to detroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most frong perswasion to the Aians, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby aliene their hearts: For they might well beleue that hee which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vailation) to hold their possession. Ferevantiem crudelitas sequitur, Crueltie doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For so it fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

ð. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius, Darius
his death.

About this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which hee meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as hee had, which was numbred at thirtie or fortie thousand) he determined once againe to trie his fortune. Hee therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that hee could neuer be beaten by any aduersitie of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same disposition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) hee approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the Gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes vsed, and in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that, the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain prest towards Naburzanes to haue slaine him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, seeing seeing Alexander was at hand, and that hee would at least make shew of for getting the offence made, which the King being of a gentle disposition willingly yielded vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remoues his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greekes, which had in all the former battailes serued Darius with great fidelity, and alwaies made the retreat in spite of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the treason of Bessus, but it was not in his destinie to follow their advice, who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell, but hee inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by 10 Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things, by which the louers of the world and themselves, are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, faetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being ouer-come with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnnatural Traitors, hee praised Atabazus his faithfull seruant to depart from him, and to provide for himselfe. In like sort hee discharged the rest of his attendants, all saue a few of his Eunuchs; for his guards had voluntarily abandoned him, His Persians being most base cowards, durit not undertake his defence 20 against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to ioyne with him, who had beene able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man followes. It had bene farre more manlike and King-like, to haue died in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Atabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to be bound like a slaue by those ambitious Monsters that laied hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honors hee had giuen them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which about all things should haue 30 moued them, could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeede to hope it, for infidelitie hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and laied in a Cart, covered with hides of beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not bee discovered; and to adde despight and derision to his aduersitie, they fastened him with chaines of gold, and so drew him on among their ordinarie carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Nabarsanes perswaded themselves to redeem their liues and the Prouinces they held either by deliuering him a prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was againe the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villanie, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish, and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his comming, halted after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his foot-men beyond their powers, hee mounted on horse backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with fixe thousand other Horse, rather ranne than marched after Darius. Such as hated the treason of Bessus, and secretly forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus tooke, and how neare hee was at hand: for many men of worth daily ranne from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his 50 pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his reare, Bessus brought a horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to saue himselfe. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the beasts that drew him, and slew two poore seruants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian Swords. Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursute of the vanquished preit with thirst, as he was refreshing him selfe with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Team of wounded beaits breathing for life, and nor able to moue, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne blood. And by a Persian captiue which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie, Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can be comforted) that hee cast not out his last sorrowes vnhcard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this Messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his owne honor, and for the safetie of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. Hee also, hauing nothing els to present, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace vsed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal Gods to submit vnto him the Empire of the whole world. As hee was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to desire the Gods to reward his compassion.

§. XIIIII.

How ALEXANDER pursued BESSVS, and tooke into his grace DARIUS his Captaines.

T was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauells were neare an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, hee was greatly grieued; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments hee therefore vsed to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former traualles. In conclusion, hee wanne their consents to goe on: which done, leauing Cyrenus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with sixe thousand Horse in Parthemia, hee enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. Hee passeth the Riuer of Zioborus, which taking beginning in Parthia dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe vnder ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth againe and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zendracarta, the same Citie which Ptolomie writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, hee rested fiftene daies, banquetting, and feasting therein.

Phatispernes, one of Darius his greatest Comanders, with other of his best followers, submit them selves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and gouernments. But of all other hee graced Artabazus most highly for his approued & constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had serued Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end they render them selves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedaemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. Hee was also wrought, though (though to his great dishonour) to receiue Xabarzanes that had joyned with Bassus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of THALESTRIS Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shew'd, that such Amazons haue bene, and are.

10 Ere it is said, that Thalestris or Minthea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to visite him, and her suite was, (which she easily obtain'd) That shee might accompanie him till shee were made with child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) shee returned into her owne Countrey.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonen businesse, may iustly breede suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lysimachus (then King of 20 Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage; was laugh't at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons, as Lysimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke upon him to write his acts; which to am-

3. plifie, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the Riuer of Indus; saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables disparag'd the truth of his great exploits. Yet as wee beleue and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaues the matter vndetermined.

30 Therefore I will here take leaue to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people.

Julius Solinus leaues them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Met. finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the Riuer Therwoodon; the other, neare the Caspian Sea; Quos (saith hee) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas.

The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Valianus, who hath Commented vpon Mela) illas proximos Amazonibus fuisse.

40 It is certaine that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. PTOLOMIE sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neare the Mountaines Hippaci, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Plinie tells vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandæons, or Padeans, so called after Pandæa the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest deriue themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus.

Medis leuibuss, Sabæis
Imperat hic sexus: Reginarumq; sub armis, Barbaria pars magna sacet.

Claud. de cæj.
Proferpine.

ouer the Medes, and light Sabæans, raignes
This female sexe: and vnder armes of Queene, Great part of the Barbarian Land remaiñes.

L. 2. Dionysius Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith hee) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a Riuer falling into the Euxine Sea neare Sieracium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom hee tells vs that the Scythians call Æopata, which is as much as Viricides, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Athens the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Mausolon and Auentinus report, which they performed fortie yeares after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe wee reade of Penthesilea, That shee came to the succour of Prisimus.

L. 2. 6. 7. An. Marcellinus giues the cause of their inhabiting vpon the riuer of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the Warres they made with diuers Nations, and of their ouerthrow.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellanicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope Queene of the Amazons by Siercules, and by him giuen to Theseus, though some affirme, That Theseus himselfe got her by stealth when shee came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gele and Leleges once a yeare, Nations inhabiting betweene them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Eran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made downe the Riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the yeare 1542. (vpon which Riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed fixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councill of the Indies, That hee both saw those women and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Viricus Schmidel, that in the yeare 1542. where he sailed vp the Riuers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrie, called Seherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of siluer, which hee had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breast, and liue a-part from men, saue at one time of the yeare, when they feast and accompanie them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteene degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities, in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered mee for truth by an ancient Cassidy of Gniana, how vpon the Riuer of Papamena (since the Spanish discoueries called Amazons) that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vprobable report.

Ø. XVI.

How ALEXANDER fell into the Persians LXXVII: and how hee further pursued BESSVS.

NOW as Alexander had begunne to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperitie had so much overwrought his vertue, as he accompted clemencie to bee but basenesse, and the temperance which he had vsed all his life time, but a poore and dejected humor, rather becoming the instructers of his youth, than the condition and state of so mightie a King, as the world could not equal. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the Gods; hee was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him; hee ware the Robes, and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should doe the like; hee entertained in his Court, and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtians, and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proude, voluptuous, and detestled manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicitie, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the Gods, whom he serued (detesting the vices of the inuaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe contrarie to the religion he professeth (which how Idolatrous soeuer it were, could not be but fearefull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannie he vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea those that were dearelt and nearest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse, That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example the Macedonians were in the end of so many trauales more impouerished in their vertues, than enriched by their victories; and that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the conquered were the baser slaves. Neither were the opinions so reuersed, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgements he was most jealous; and making it knowne to the Armie that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that hee had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, hee had arguments enough to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so farre engaged) be cast away. And because they were pelled with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed to be the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans fardells to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but haue proued most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things, which they had bought with their painefull trauales, and with their blood; than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happie temeritie ouer-come all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him that Satibarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernement ouer the Arrians, was revolted, whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, he sought him out, but the Rebelling hearing of his comming fled to Bessus with two thousand Horse. Hee then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire with the aduantage of a strong winde, wonne a passage ouer a high and vnaccessable Rock, which was defended against him with thirtene thousand foote. For the extremitie of the flame and smoke forced them from the place, other wise inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill Warre of France certaine caues in Languedoc, which had but one entrance; and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last by certaine bundells of straw let downe by an yron chaine, and a waight stone in the middest, those that defended it were so smothered, as they rendred the melues with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also, some three yeares before my arriual in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie people, who did fet the long drie-graffe on fire to the calward of them, (the wind in those parts being alwaies East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoke, there was not any one that escaped. St. Iohn Borrows also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by hauing the graffe fired behinde him, but the smoke being rusefully discovered, hee recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come inuade any part of those Countries, that they alwaies, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the graffe and sedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemie than a handfull of straw set on fire, die the death of honnie-Bees, burnt out of the Hiue.

§. XVII.

A conspiracie against ALEXANDER. The death of PHILOTAS and PARMENIO.

ALEXANDER was after he parted hence no where resisted, till he came into Asia, to the East of Babilonia, where the chiefe Citie of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of Sartibarcanes, but in the end hee received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and siue hundred foote, and neare siue hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His iourne out of Persia into these parts is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to hinde Bessus in Babilonia, he leaues it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Thyreanis; from thence he wanders Northward towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaines Coronus into Asia, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimnus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a yong-man whom he loued, into the same treason. The youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, beganne to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue slaine him for securitie of his owne life. So constrained by feare, hee made hew as if hee had beene wonne by perswasion, and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, hee was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine orten of them, all men of ranke; whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned vp so Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the companie of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Cebalinius with the whole Historie; whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Cebalinius (who might with least suspicion) should goe to the Court and vtter all. Cebalinius, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole businesse, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which hee promised to doe, but did not. Two daies passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter; but still excused himselfe to Cebalinius by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspicion, and caused Cebalinius to adresse himselfe to another, one Meivon, keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Cebalinius and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealment of the treason,

Ion argued his hand to have beene in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein haue I so offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke PHILOTAS more worthis to be King than I? Dimnus perceiuing, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded him selfe that hee liued no longer than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion which his silence might iustly breede. His answer was, That when the practise was revealed vnto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but fruituolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This error of his, (if it were only an crour) although Alexander, for the notorious seruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas him selfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the intligation of Cyaterus, hee againe swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Iudges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this businesse; and how hee perswaded him selfe, that he could neuer finde a better occasion to oppresse his priuate enemy, than by pretending pietie and dutie towards the King. Hercoo a Poet of our owne hath giuen a note as much better as it is more generall in his Philotas.

20 See how these great men cloath their private hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood,
And arm'd with power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent;
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessaries vnto ends vnjust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
30 The needfull 'st vnder taking with distrust,
So that base vilenesse; idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so that the King, following the aduise of Cyaterus, had refused the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him beganne to binde him; he cried out vpon the King in these wordes: O ALEXANDER, the malice of mine
40 Enemies hath surmounted thy merite, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were vrge against him by Alexander him selfe; (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (nor the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Insiper Hammon; He answered, That he could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the Gods, and yet he could not but withall grieue for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that hee held my glorie in despiight. See what a strange Monster
50 flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vild garments, and bound like a Theefe; where hee heard him selfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers

Hecitor and Nicanor having beene loſt in the preſent Warre. Hee was ſo greatly oppreſſed with griefe as for a while he could vter nothing but teares, and ſorrow had ſo waſted his ſpirits as hee funk vnder thoſe that led him. In the end the King asked him in what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the ſame wherein I had pleaſed the King to accuſe him, which hee did to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderſtand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perſwading the aſſembly that hee diſdained the language of his owne Countrey, and ſo with-drawing himſelfe, left him to his mercileſſe enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, ſeeing the King who had ſo ſharply inuaid againſt him, would not vouchſafe to heare his excuſe. For, 10 not his enemies only were imboldened thereby againſt him, but all the reſt hauing diſcovered the Kings diſpoſition and reſolution, contended among themſelues which of them ſhould exceede in hatred towards him; Among many other arguments which hee vſed in his owne defence, this was not the weakeſt, That when Nicomachus deſired to know of Dimnus what men of marke and power were his partners in the conſpiracie (as ſeeming vnwilling to aduenture himſelfe with meane and baſe Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntus, and ſome others, but ſpake not a word of Philotas, who by being commander of the Horſe, would greatly haue valued the partie, and haue encouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas ſaid well for himſelfe, it is likely that Dimnus, 20 thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though hee had neuer dealt with him in any ſuch praſtiſe. And for more certaine prooſe that he knew nothing of their intents, that praſtiſed againſt the King, there was not any one of the Conſpirators, being many, inſorb by torments or otherwiſe, that could accuſe him, and it is true, that aduerſitie being ſeldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the moſt part found fo malicious, as ſhee rather deſires to draw others (not alwaies deſeruing it) into the ſame danger, than to ſpare any that it can accuſe. Yet at the laſt, howſoever it were, to auoide the extremitie of reſiſtiſſe and vnnatural torments, deuſed by his proſſect enemies Craterus, Conus, Ephelſion, and others, Philotas accuſed his owne ſelfe; being perſwaded that they would haue ſlaine him 30 forthwith. But he failed euen in that miſerable hope, and ſuffering all that could be laid on fleſh and blood, he was ſorit to deliuer, not what he knew, but what ſoever beſt pleaſed their cares, that were faire more mercileſſe than death it ſelfe.

Of this kinde of iudiciall proceeding St. Auguſtine greatly complaineth as a matter to be bewailed, ſaith hee, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in ſua cauſa quiſq; torquetur: & cum queritur vtrum ſit nocens cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto ſcelere certiffimas penas: non quia illud commiſiſſe detegitur, ſed quia non commiſiſſe neſcitur; What ſhall we ſay to it, when one is put to torture in his owne caſe; and tormented wholeſt yet it is in queſtion whether he be guiltie; and being innocent ſuffers aſſured puniſhment for a fault of which there is no certaintie, not becauſe he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but becauſe other doe not know that he hath not committed it. 40

It had beene enough for Alexanders ſaſtetic if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the reſt would not much haue grieved thereat, becauſe he was greatly ſuſpected. But Hemolans, who after ward conſpired againſt him, made the Kings crudelie and delight in blood the greateſt moſtiue of his owne ill intent. T herefore, ſeene ſpeaking of Alexander, ſaith thus: Crudelit as nimine humanum malum eſt, inangnum iam miſi animo; ſerua iſta rabies eſt ſanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abieſto homine in ſilueſtre animal tranſire; Crueltie is not a humane vice; it is unworthie of ſo mild a ſpirit. It is euen a beaſty rage to delight in blood and wounds, and caſting away the nature of man to become a ſavage Monſter. 50

For the concluſion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confeſſion that Philotas made were to giue end to the torments which hee could not any longer indure, or that the ſame was true indeede; For (ſaith he) in this caſe, they that ſpeake truly, or they that denie falſly, come to one and the ſame end. Now while while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lynesies, lonnein-Law to Antipater, who had bene three yeares in prison, should bee flaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by following those whom the King fauoured; they were dismissed. But Parmenio was yet left; Parmenio, who had serued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia; That had depreft Atidus the Kings enemy; that had all waies, and in all hazards, the leading of 10 the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of Warre, and, to say the truth, hee that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glorie and same he had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlike that he would haue dishonoured his fidelitie in his eldest age, hauing now liued threescore and ten yeares) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flatterie had possit themselves of his affection; it was resolved that he should be dispatch. Polydamus was imploied in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be thort) linding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his 20 Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. His exatvs PARMENIONIS fuit, Lib. 5. Murtius

This was the end of PARMENIO (saith C VRTIVS) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthe of praise.

§. XVIII.

How ALEXANDER subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people, How BESSVS was deliuered into his hands. How he 30 fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obediencethe Arsians or Euergetians; he made A- menides (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Governour; then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Mennon to command our them.
Heere the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelue thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he past through some colde regions with difficultie enough. At length hee came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie which he honoured with his owne 40 name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his olde Macedons, worn with age and with traualles of the warre. The Arians, who since he left them were reuolted, hee subdued againe by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Eriginus. And now he resolues to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabacus is made Governour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, inso much as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not a-50 gainst their persons but their shadowes. He found on the banks of this great Ri-uer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boares, bridges, or raffe, but was fott to sow together the Hides that covered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie; which Bessus might easily haue distrest, if he had daied but to beholde the Macedonian Armie afarre.

farre-off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigrus, and other passages, and yet now, when this traitorous slaue had styled himselfe a King, he durst not performe any thing worthie of slaue. And therefore those that were nearest vnto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit Spitamenes, Datsaphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne safetie, and by the memorie of Bessus his Treason and crueltie against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his neck like a mansife Dogge, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemy.

In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Towne inhabited with 10
Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before hee returned out of Greece, whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Countrie-Language. These most cruelly (after they had receiued him with great ioy) he put to the sword, and destroyed their Citie. At this place he receiued Bessus, and, hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twentie thousand Mountainer assailed his Camp; in repelling whom he receiued a shot in the leg, the arrow-head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foote.

L.7.

Soon after he came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Peronidinus takes to be Samar- 20
chand, the regall Citie of the great Tamerlane. It had in compasse threecore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Heere hee receiued the Embassadors of the Seythians (called Autans) who offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly againe with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion by the fame Spitamenes and Catanes who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Citiees were resolutely defended against him, all which, after victorie, hee defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these hee receiued a blow on the neck which struck him to the ground, and much disabled him for many daies after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom 30 he employed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched (on if we may beleue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais; vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria threecore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within feuenteen daies after the walls built. The building of this Citie is said to haue bin occasion of a war betweene him and the Seythians; the Seythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Seythians, offering warre in such terrible manner that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sicknesse for verie feare, should neuertheless make suit for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander 40
(not intending the conquest of those Northerne deserts, but only the defence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victorie described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ranne beyond the boundes and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Tragus haue greatly mistaken this Riuer which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Iaxartes, that runnes betweene Sogdiana and Seythia, which Alexander pass ouer, while Menedemus was imployed in the recovery of Samarchand: But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe is neere twowithousand miles distant from any part of Bactria or Sogdiana, and the way desert and vnkowne. So that Alexander had (besides Iaxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and manie others to swimme ouer, ere hee could recouer Tanais; which (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discovered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imployed all the time that he liued in Asia in that trauaile.

Where-

Wherefore it is enough to beleue, that the Asiaticke Scythians, making some offer to dilurbe the erection of this new Citie, which was like to giue some hindrance to their excursions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defence Armes, easily chased some tenne or twelue miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iourne; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not verie farre into that wast Countrie, where hee could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other busines than to set vp a monument.

Therefore of the Macedons are said to haue bene slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be, in passing a great Riuer, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible, to set downe the numbers of such a perill in battell: yet Cesar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath bene so inquisitiue into the greatnesse of their owne successe, that writers haue bene able to deliuer such particulars by credible reporte: I holde it not vnlawfull to set downe what we finde; especially when it serues to giue light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they flew (a thing not vsuall in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatnesse of Alexander) and the little bootie that was gotten, doe make it probable, that this warre was no better than the repulsion of few arouing Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Moscovites, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was assuring himselfe of those Scythians bordering vpon Saxartes, he received the ill newes that Menedemus was slaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand foote, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion and to take vengeance of Spitamenes, makes all the hast he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burnes, and laies wait all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leauing a new Gouernour in that Prouince.

To repaire this losse he receiued a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, hee returns towards the South, and passeth the Riuer of Oxus; on the South-side whereof hee built sixe Townes neare each other for mutuall succour. But hee finds a new Start-up-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirtie thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong peece of ground on the top of a high Hill, whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to winne by faire words, hee made choife of three hundred yong-men, and promised ten talents to the first, fiftie to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirtie of their men, and then made a signe to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was already mounted vp, yeelded simply to Alexander mercie, and was (with all his kindred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue bene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe; Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Island of Stark, joyning to Garnsey and of that gouernement, was in Queen Maries time surpris'd by the French, and could neuer haue bene recouered againe by strong hand, hauing cattle and corne enough vpon the place to feede so many men as will serue to defend it, and being euery way so inaccessible that it might bee held againt the Great Turke. Yet by the industrie of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. Hee anchored in the roade with one ship of small burden and, pretending the death of his Marchant, befought the French, being some thirtie in number, that they might burie their Marchant in hallowed ground, and in the Chappell of that Iſle; offering a present to the French of such commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, nor not so much as with a knife) the French-men yielded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their boat, not filled with a dead carkaffe, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French received them at their landing; and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vp the Rocks with great difficultie; some part of the French tooke the Flemish boat and rowed aboard their ship, to fetch the commodities promised, and what else they pleased, but being carried they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had entered their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the dore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin set vpon the French; they runne to the Cliff and crie to their companie aboard the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the boat charged with Flemings yielded themselves and the place. Thus a Foxe-taile doth sometimes helpe well to peece out the Lions-skinne, that else would be too short.

ϕ. X I X.

How ALEXANDER slew his owne friends.

FTER these Sogdan and Scythian Warres, wee reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other frivulous matter, and that he committed the gouernement of Maracanda, and the Countrie about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him some after, for valuing the vertue of Phisip the father before that of Alexander the sonne, or rather because hee objected to the King the death of Parmentis, and derided the Oracle of Hiammon: for therein he toucht him to the quick, the same being deliuered in publike and at a drunken banquet. Clytus, in deede, had deserued as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular saued his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolence was intolerable. As he in his cups forgat whom hee offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgat whom he went about to slay, for the griefe wherof he tare his owne face and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would haue slaine himselfe.

Wine begat furie, furie matter of repentance; but praeceding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewallings. Omne vitium ebrietatis & incensit, & detegit, obstantem malis conatibus verendum remouet; ubi postedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit; non facit ebrietas vinia, sed praerabit. Drunkennesse both kindles and laies open euery vice; it remoues out of the way that frame which giues impediment vnto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkennesse in deede at her diuours vices, then makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Besius, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dabians also seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-rebels, disposed of the Provinces which hee past ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as hee lost in one Tempest a thousand of his traine. From hence hee inuaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Countrie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortianes who submitted himselfe vnto him, sealed him greatly, and presented him with thirtie thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdain'd, yet none of them durst use any freedom of Speech after Cytus his death. From hence hee directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twentie thousand armed men.

120000 men

In the meane while hee would needes bee honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee imploied two pernicious Paralites, Hegu and Cleo; whom Calisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments used to the assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassalls; That the opinion of Sanctitie, thought it did sometime follow the death of those who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet living in the World. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carowing feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the Gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie to bee reuenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death, not for that hee had betrayed the King to others, but because hee neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolatus and others (which they confest) hee caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne a-sunder vpon the rack: This deepe, vnworthie of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hic est ALEXANDER crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit; Occidit Persarum milia milia: opponitur, & CALLISTHENES: Quotiens dictum erit; Occidit DARIUM: opponitur, & CALLISTHENES. Quotiens dictum erit Omnis Oceano tenuis visus, ipsum quoque tent suit nouis clausibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thracie usque ad Orientis terminos prouolat: dicitur, sed CALLISTHENES occidit. Omnia licet antiquis Ducum Regumque exempla transferat, ex his quae fecit nihil tam magnam erit quam scelus CALLISTHENES; This is the eternal crime of ALEXANDER, which no vertue nor felicitie of his in Warre shall euer be able to redeme. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, He did so; and he slew CALLISTHENES: When it shall be said, He slew DARIUS; it shall be replied, and CALLISTHENES: When it shall be said, hee wanne all as farr as to the very Ocean, there can also be aduerted with vnusuale Nauies; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient, it shall be said with all, But hee killed CALLISTHENES. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts makes so much to his glorie, as CALLISTHENES to his reproach.

Of ALEXANDERS iourne into India. The battaile betweene him and PORSUS.

With the Armie before remembred, of one hundred and twentie thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves vnto him, hee entertained louingly, the rest hee constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. Hee then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendered vnto him. From thence hee removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom hee made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dedale, and thence to Assdera,

Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victualls failing, he diuides his Armie: Ptolemie led one part, Genon another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded vnto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe he restored it: at the siege of this Citie he received a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himselfe: he wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as hee arrived at the Riuer of Indus: Comming to Indus hee found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Armie, and ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Countrie to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Countrie, and sixe and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his successe and assistance. Hee made Alexander know that hee was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this division to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourescore talents of siluer coine, which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was covetous of glorie, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, hauing heard that Alexander had receiued his enemy Omphis into his protection, refused to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne strength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, hee thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had already beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Partie and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee received this manly answer; That hee would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolues to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troupe of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely slaid somewhat longer ere he had sene India. The Riuer was foure furlong broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacite. Alexander sent Ptolemie vnto the Riuer with a great part of the Armie, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolemie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troups and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleeueth that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bene come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had passit. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hages with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure sight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse: for there had fallen so much raine, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Sythians and Dahians had the Vanguard, who so galled these Indians as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons & those in them. Perdiccas also gaue vpon the Indian horse-men, and the one & the other were forced to recolle. Porus moues forward with grosse of his Armie Arme, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recover his Reare : Alexander being followed with Ephesston, Ptolomee, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indus horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leontus, bee directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foote, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried vpon one of them of the greatest stature. By these means the Macedonian foote were most offended; but the Archers and Lighters being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Macedons, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head and ranne over the foote that followed them : In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victorie fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number : for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countrey people. Yet for his owne person he neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Arme, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he receiued his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How ALEXANDER finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

120 Forbare to trouble my selfe and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauales : or of those petty Wars which Alexander made betweene the overthrow of Porus, and his falling downe the Riuer of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be persuaded to beleuee, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen betweene London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandevile who died in the year 1372. and had seene so much of the World, and of the East Indias, we accepted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he an other reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillemus in Liege, where the religious of that place keepe some thinges of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence; For an honorable memoire of his Excellence, faith Guichardine.

Galic. in Disf. of the low Countries,

40 The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Riuers of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Acetes, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now possessed by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlane, who commands all that tract betweene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrey towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a ship of London, suffered shipwrack in the year 1609. and some of the companie trauielled ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Agra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Phylastratus in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East Indias, tells vs that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander sought by all means to our shame) when they indured to subiect vnto them the Oxydraces, a people inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainly knowne, that the great Kings of the vnterrmost East, haue had the vie of the Cannan, many hundreds of yeares since, and euen since their first ciuillite and greattite, which was long before Alexanders time. But Alexander pierst not to farre into the East. It sufficed, that hauing already ouer-wearied his Armie hee discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the Riuer of Ganges, was the powerfullst King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twentie thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than euer to proceede in this disco-uerie and conquest, yet all the art he had could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great desarts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was nearer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would bee no otherwise, deuised a prettie trick, where-with hee hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabines for the Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher manglers than his Horses could feede in. He caused all furniture of Men and Horses to be made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered these Armour and Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondered at by the Sauages. Proportionally to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his Iournies end. This was a readie way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing saue a suspicion that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he shroue so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Aceines, and there determined to set vp his fleet where Aceines and Sydapsis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how farre he had past towards the East, he built by those Riuers two Cities:
 the one hee called Nicea, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here againe hee received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thra- asian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twentie thousand Armour, garnished with siluer and gold, which hee distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuers he wanne many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxdracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Beowulf of South- ampton, frivulous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the Riuer with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himselfe vnto him. Hee leased these Embassadours vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuositie that could be deuised, who soone after their dispatch returned a-game with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirtie Wagons, and to each foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainements ended, he sailes towards the South, passeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly or compelled by force: among these hee builded another Alexandria. Of many places which hee tooke in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptoemie (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an hearbe which Alexander dreamt that he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neare the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a suddaine shuffled one vpon another by the Flood, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie banks of the Ri-uer,

uer, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed, but after hee had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, hee part out of the riuers mouth some few milles, and after Sacrifices offered to Nephtus returned: and the better to infor me himselfe, hee sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arianus in the beginning of his sixt Booke hath written this passage downe the Riuer of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessells, in which hee transported his Armie, the Commanders that were vled therein, and other the martiall provisions made.

Near the out-lets of this Riuer hee spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteene daies march from thence recovered Georasia, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twentie thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse, which hee carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

§. XXII.

Of ALEXANDERS Riot, Crueltie, and death.

20 Rom Georasia Alexander led his Armie into Carmenia, and so drawing neare to Persia, hee gaue himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice beee hatefull enough in it selfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-men followed the feast, for ASPASTES one of his Princiuall Governours hee commanded to be slaine, so as neither did hee deserve of what punishment hee was qualified by his crueltie, nor his crueltie binder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While hee retreined his Armie in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foote and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had beene imploied in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made, by the Deputies of the Provinces in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the vertue of him whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander and the other chiefe, with sixe hundred Souldiers by them imploied, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: eury one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

30 Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discouerie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

40 As he drew neare to Babylon hee visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Persagada, now called Chelquer: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagas, an Eunuch in especiall fauour with the King, was neglected, hee not only practised certaine loose fellows to witness against Orsines, that hee had robbed Cyrus Tomb, for which hee was condemned to die; but hee assisted the Hang-man with his owne handes in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phadates to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Caperas (saith CURTIVS) esse preceptis ad representanda supplicia, nec ad deterrora credenda. Hee beganne head-longly to shed blood, and to beleene false reports. It is true, that hee tooke a way to make all men wearie of his gouernement, seeing queles more fearefull than all the aduentures that can be made against it.

50 At this time it is said that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had liued three score and thirteene yeares. Whether herein hee followed the custome of his Countie, being an Indian, Or sought to preuent the grieffe and incommodie of elder age, it is vncertaine: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and forethewning Alexanders death, he promised to meete him shortly after at Babylon.

From Persargada he came to Susa, where hee married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giuing her yonger sister to his beloued Ephesion, and fourescore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thousand yong souldiers out of his conquered Prouinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon hauing lauidly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fixe thousand talents, and fixe thousand hired-Souldiers, but he was rejected in Greece, and there slaine. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelitie of the Greekes, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yet hee sent commandment that they should againe receiue their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselves, (except the Asbenians; though they refused that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there folowed a maruailous discontentment in his Armie, because he had resolued to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer indure the trauell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asia. He vsed many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempest of their furie.
 But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine threed, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Cra- terus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessalie, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greekes in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fi-delitie, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainely, if Alexander had not taken counsell of his cups, hee would haue cast some better colour on this alteration, and giuen Antipater a stronger reason for his remoue, than to haue imploied him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Baby- lon, the warre being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remoue, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple:
 Princes, though jealous, doe not stand in doubt of euery man ill-affected though valiant; but there is a kinde of Kingly courage, compounded of hardnesse and understanding, which is many times so fearefull vnto them, as they take leaue both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After hee had sent for Antipater, hee made a iourne into Media to settle things there; where Ephesion, whom hee fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse; hangs his Pibition; and beslowes vpon his Monument twelue thousand talents: After which hee returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if we beleue Curtius (whom Pistarch and others gaine-say) Ant- ipater by his Sonnes, Cassander, Philip, and Ptolema, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poison, Thesalus (who was of the conspiracie) hauing invited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, hee quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainely the Princes of the World haue seldome found good by making their ministers ouer-great, and thereby suspitious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to bee a debt, but is perswaded that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassalls, will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The only restoration, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his liberalitie makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be obserued. It may be that Antipater hauing commanded two or three Kingdomes twelue yeares, knew not now how to play any other part; so more than Caesar did, after he had so long a time gouerned the Gaules, where hee vterly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruel
 and

and vngratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though hee feared some ill measure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenia, Clytus, and Calisthenes, hauing bene so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrarie, but that the King had resolued to haue given him some other great gouernement in Asia: the old Souldiers thence returned, hauing perchance desired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

φ. XXIII.

Of ALEXANDERS Person and qualities.

10
 O wfoeuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot bee excused, no more than his vanitie to be esteemed the sonne of Iupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkennesse, which others make the cause of his feuer and death. In that hee lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Caesar found just cause to deride him, as if the well gouerning of so many Nations and Kingdomes, as he had alreadye conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his branes withall. That he was both learned and a loue of learning, it cannot be doubted. St. Erasme Bacon, in his first booke of the advancement of learning, hath proued it sufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That hee did not enquire what he came him to accept, but the King to giue: of which SENECA; Animo sui videtur et regis, cuius sit stultissima. Nihil enim per se quemquam deceat. Resert quid, sui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non consistit: habebatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubiq; virtutis medius, neque peccat quod excedit, quam quod deficit; It seemes a braue and royall speech; whereas indeede it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe becomes a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approved. Let honours bee proportioned vnto the persons: for where as vertue is ener limited by measure, the excesse is as faultie as the defect.

20

30
 For his Person, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resolued that hee had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as him selfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended simply, wee should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Thebes, Russians, and maltese Dogges. For certainly it is no way praise-worthie but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which we are imploied for the seruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

40
 If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who haue bought their glorie with so great destruction, and effusion of blood, I thinke him farre inferior to Caesar, and many other that liued after him, seeing he neuer undertooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted, nor was euer encountered with any Armie of which he had not a most maistring aduantage, both of weapons and of Commanders, euery one of his Fathers old Captaines by farre exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemeth, Fortune and Destinies (if we may vie those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heapes of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdomes that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, wee will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Sonne, giues this iudgement of them. Quod non minores facere pestes mortalium quam inuadatio, qua plerumque non omne persulsum est, quam consueatio qua magna pars animantium excarnet; That they were not more hurtfull to mankind by their conquests, than by their conquests they they were no lesse plagues to mankinde, than an ouer-flow of waters, drowning all the euell; or some burning drought, whereby a great part of liuing creatures is scorched vp.

50

CHAP. III.

The raigne of ARIDEVS.

§. I.

Of the question about successiō to ALEXANDER.

THE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, hauing lost his only eye. For, that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance vnteffectual, and harmefull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (vnder the diuine ordinance) were, partly the vncertainetie of Title to successiō in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the stubborn pride of Alexander himselfe, who thinking none worthe to be his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leauing euery one to his owne fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting vpon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendering it vnto Amyntas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his proper strength, he assured the Crowne vnto himselfe: Amyntas neuer attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his raigne. Wherefore Eurydice (the sole issue of his marriage, ought in reason to haue beene acknowledged Queene after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbade the raigne of women. But the excellent vertue of those two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laied in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Roiall seat.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues had issue by none of the principall of them. Barsine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a yong Sonne: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnely married) was left by him great with child. But the basenesse of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleged in Barre of the Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra

Cleopatra the sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, and Aridaus his late brother (sonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspition, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe incapable of the Sovereigntie: Aridaus (besides his ballardie) was neither for person nor qualitie fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the ballardie was neither for (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsaillers hauing ouer-laboured their disagreeing wits in deuiling what was best, were content for very wearinesse to take what came next to hand.

- 10 Ptolomee (soone after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the halfe-Persian broode, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should bee giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomee was called the sonne of Lagus, but repired of Philip: who hauing vsed the companie of Arifinee Ptolomees mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so, that hee hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of those dissentions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to red. Eue their quiet with subjection to one, deserring regard by his blood, and trust for his vncertainty, or whether hee desired only to get a share to himselfe, which could not haue come to passe had all bene giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that hee thought not on preferring Aridaus before himselfe; and therefore gaue such countaile as suited his owne and other mens purposes. Yeathis deuis of his tooke place in Greece, though not in forme as hee had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue assembled at Alexanders omptic chaire, as Ptolomee had conceiued the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King as Aridaus, no wiser then the chaire it selfe. Also the controuersies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

- 30 But as these counterfait shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often take check by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to goe more directly to worke: so was it like to haue fared with Ptolomee and the rest, when Arifanus, an other of the Captaines, interpreted the wordes of Alexander; saying, That hee leic his Kingdome to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) hee deliuered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should bee disposer of his owne purchases; and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plaine enough, so long as no man would interpose an other construction: eury one being vncertaine how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or because they would not be of the latel, vrged Perdiccas to take vpon him the estate Roiall. Hee was no stranger to the Roiall blood; yet his birth gaue him not such reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom hee had bene very inward, and that especially since the death of Ephesion (a powerfull Minion) into whose place hee was chosen. For his owne worth hee might well be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his priuate valour. But very furly hee was: which qualitie (joyned with good fortune) carried a shew of Majestie; being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

- In the present bulinesse a foolish ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had bene great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Arifanus, hee would needs counterfait modestie; thinking that eury one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the weightie burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse enuious the more solemnitie hee vsed in the acceptance. It is truely said, He that faineth himselfe a sheepe may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe, Melager, (a man by nature entious,

uous, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly inuighed against him. In conclusion he pronounced, that whosoever was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Melager.

§. II.

The election of ARIDÆVS, with the troubles there-about arising;
the first diuision of the Empire.

DVring this vp-rore, mention was made of Aridaus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Melager hauing with-drawne himselfe tumultuously from the companie of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great; therefore he produced Aridaus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolue what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed-man, took vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with sixe hundred men, and Ptoleme with the Kings Pages took vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders bodie lay: but the Armie conducted by Melager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, and enforced them to accept Aridaus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus who was of the Roiall bloud, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobilitie. Perdiccas abode in the Citie (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be readie to take the opportunitie of any commotion, that should happen among the infantrie. The King (who was gouerned by Melager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not vexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauitie, that they departed honeste than they came; being forrie of their bad enterprife. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rore, which the King seeking to pacifie wanted authoritic, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was aliue: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprife, which hee imputed to Melager; abandoning the furest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeald, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renewed out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now joynd himselfe with Leonatus kept the fields, intending to cut off all promission of victuals from the Citie. But after sundrie Embassies passing betwene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Authors of sedition giuen vp into their hands; the King, that Melager might bee joynd with Leonatus and Perdiccas; as a Third in government of the Armie) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacherie lurked vnder their great facilitie. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue professed where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had bene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart giue it life; and windie spirits they were which moued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injurie done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might bee punished. Perdiccas (as a louer of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receiue their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Armie. The plot was maliciously laied: Had Meleager giuen way to seditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of dissention; and thereby with publike approbation might haue bene cut off, as hauing often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weake a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he battened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleaning of the Armie. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitie set in array, a-part from others, as if they had bene of sundrie sorts; met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their severall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the commencing of the horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such; as discovered no jostling palme nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horse-men; of which custome Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Aridaem was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before hee had sought the death of Perdiccas at the insligation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were call vnto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when hee disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial friends. Hauing therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the advantage; when hee saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sancuarie: for thither they sent and slew him.

Leonatus

The Armie being thus corrected was led into the Citie, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, diuided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Aridaem the office of a Vistor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funeralls of Alexander thought vpon; whose bodie hauing bene seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poison appearing, how great fouer the suspicion might bee. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridaem: one of the Captaines, who was two yeares preparing of a great and colly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laied; many coarces of his friends being laied in the ground, before before that of Alexander was belovved in Alexandria, a Cittie of his owne building in Egypt.

p. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

WHilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begunne in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. Hee knew the famous qualitie of the Graecian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in euery Cittie hee would haue a sure partie. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wanne by this prouide in iunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled, yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyrannic. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more, than was needfull, of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well iustifie by reason: neuertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leosthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leaue an Armie, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to doe: great numbers of Greeke Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which time the Cittie of Athens declared it selfe, and more honorably than wisely, proclaimed open Warre against the Macedonians, for the libertie of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gaue battaile to the Boeotians, who sided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming in all hast, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a-farre off, which deceiue all mortall wisdom, euen when they seeme nere at hand. One moneth was scarcely past, since nothing so heauily burthend the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Macedon; which hee then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conueigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succede Antipater in the gouernement of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that hee had a priue charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should bee sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the young Souldiers, newly to bee leauiued in Europ. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour gour was such, as could hinder rebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted euery lewd government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having litten Viceroy ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuie of a Court, wherein they had bene his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to precipitation, working first the Kings death by poison, given by his Son Isolans, Alexanders cup-bearer, or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his Sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare he had, which I note in this place as the ground

19 of effects to be produced in very few years.

At the present Crates was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying neare, solicited to make haste. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse; which Multer was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countie being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeede who had long stood firme for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might haue done great seruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the libertie of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessaly trie the fortune of a battaile with Leophtenes, rather (as may seeme) feareing the increase 20 of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not cheekt at the first) than presuming on his owne strength. For Leophtenes had of Athenians, Asiatians, and Mercenaries, two and twentie thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse hee brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his owne Countie: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well prouided of all things necessarie to beare out a siege. Thither did 30 Leophtenes follow him, present him battaile againe; and vpon the refusal close vp the Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will wee leaue him for a while, trauiailing in the last honourable enterprife that euer was vnder-taken by that great Citie of Athens.

. 3. IIII.

How Perdiccas employed his Armie.

40 King Aridaus living vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vse of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom hee should visit in his Government. A stranger Armie then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that vnstedied condition of things to make better worth to him than many Prouinces could haue been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicea the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

50 Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Countie, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, euery from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Stossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancesters had (indeede) bene oppressed by the Persians; but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatal Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slaine) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians roome. This hee did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertaine his Armie, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdome, furnished with Provinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his owne particular to have one opportune place of sure retreat, vnder the gouernement of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirtie thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse (a strong Armie, had it not incourted a stronger, and better trained) wanne the victorie, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much crueltye did he vse the victorie: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, hee crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and so deliuered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men liuing he trusted most.

An other part of his forces he had committed to Pythion; rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Pythion was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twentie thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were soone wearie of their vnpleasant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke advantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythion went, more delirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discouering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoiles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoined it vnto Pythion's Captains (his owne creatures) that they should see this command executed. These directions for vse of the victorie might haue proved needlesse; so vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a Hill nor farre off. This dismayed the rest, and gaue the day to Pythion: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and libertie vnder condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies hee might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territorie. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse wherof Pythion might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foote, and eight thousand horse, of these which followed Pythion, leaued; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoined to giue assistance to that business: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in peeces all those poore men who had yielded them selves; leauing Pythion as naked as hee came forth to returne vnto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mightie about the mightie, and had faire leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lusian warre taketh ending.

The proceſſe of the Lamiſian Warre.

WE left Antipater hardly beſieged, wanting meanes to free himſelfe without ſuccours from his friends in Aſia. Thoſe helps not appearing ſo ſoone as he expected, he came to parle with Leojiſthenes, & would have yielded vnto any termes of reaſon, wherewith men poſſeſſed with hope of victorie doe ſeldome ſimit their deſires. Leojiſthenes willed him without further circumſtance to ſubmit himſelfe to diſcretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him ſuch a diſhonorable compoſition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worke with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring war, the Ætolians (whether wearie of ſitting ſtill at a ſiege, or hauing buſineſſe which they pretended at home) took e their leaue, and returned into their owne Countrie. Their departure left the trenches ſo thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to ſallie out vpon his enemies to their great loſſe; for many were ſlaine, and Leojiſthenes himſelfe among them, ere he could be re pulled into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved; their victuals waſted, and they were not ſtrong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus who was neareſt at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his owne leading no more than 4000. foote, and 2000. horſe, againſt Seuthus the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Lysimachus not without loſſe, had gotten one victorie, yet the enemy abounding in multitude felt not the blow ſo much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonus was earneſtly ſolicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haſt to the reſcue. He had the gouernement of Phrygia the leſſe, and was able to raiſe an Armie of more than 20000 foot, and 2500. horſe, whether leaied out of his Province, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the iourne into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come.

30 For Cleopatra had written vnto him, deſiring his preſence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her ſelfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not ſo cloſe as had beene requiſite, and therefore brought himſelfe into great ſuſpition, that ſoone ended with his life. Antipater choſen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leojiſthenes, hearing of his approach forooke the ſiege of Lama, and took the readie way to theſe great Conquerors of Aſia, with purpoſe to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they ſhould ioyne in one. He had (notwithſtanding the departure of the Ætolians) the aduantage of Leonus in horſe, by the odds of 2000. Theſſalians; in other things he was equal to him; in cauſe he thought himſelfe Superiour in the fortune of that day he proued ſo: for he was a great victorie (chiefly by 40 virtue of the Theſſalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonus himſelfe; who fighting valiantly was driuen into a marſh peece of ground, where he found his death, which deſperately he had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home not far from the place of his natiuitie. He was the firſt of Alexanders Captains which died in battell, but all, or moſt of the reſt, ſhall follow him the ſame way. After this day the Athenians did neuer any thing fitable to their ancient glorie.

The vanquiſhed Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, & too proud to ſie. They betooke themſelues to high grounds, vniſt for ſeruce on horſe-back, and ſo abode in ſight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their 50 ſtrength to be at the greateſt, and fearing leſt that of the enemy ſhould increaſe, did earneſtly ſeeke to determine the matter quickly by an other battaile. But ſtill Antipater kept himſelfe on ground of aduantage: which gaue more than reaſonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquiſhed. This recheleſſeſſe (incorrigible in an Armie of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were much defaced by loss at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captiuitie of Craterus came on, of which wee neuer could be deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Armie hauing made great marches from Chios, passed ouer into Europe, and coming into Thessalie joynd himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being joynd in one, contained fortie thousand waightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and fifty thousand horse; of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse, in foot eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antipater labour to auoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceived their battailes (ouer-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of a hundred and thirtie men, they had purchased only the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet herof was great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subject vnto the full command of one General, and being euery one desirous to preferue his owne estate, and Citie; concluded to make a treatie of peace with Antipater, who being a subtle artificer, & well vnderstanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed every Citie to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuiſe was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greekes choosing rather to abide the coming of their Assailants, whose vnreasonable carelesnesse betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus being & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the armie of the Confederates wanted meanes & courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlkely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamitie.

§. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by ANTIPATER. OF DEMOSTHENES his death.

He Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions giuen to the most forward inuiting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Aetolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing bene Authors of this tumult; and their fate was not great; the seat of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who fate full at Athens, deuiling vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their doores, before their consultation could finde issue. He was readie to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Phocion, with Demetrius the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demetrius as a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, grauitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the the government of the Citie to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance; to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and forme of a Democracie. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now delivered from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out that this was a mere oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few men acting upon the publicke right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had beene wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them lands to manure, leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athenes.

For the same end (yet withoutall for satisfying his owne suspicions and hatred) hee caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to bee slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, bene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have paill'd for very milde; whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have farre-extended their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speake and write, condemne him vtterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all civill Nations, that the will done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptunus, in the Isle of Calaurias; there did Arcelus (sent thither by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswade him to leave the place, but not so prevailing he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respite as it had bene to write some bar, secretly tooke poison which he had kept for such a necessitie; and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution upon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. Hee loved monie well, and had great summes given him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did hee ill (me thinke) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Countrey, great rewards, for speaking such things as tended to his Countreys good; which hee did not cease to procure; when the Persians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can indure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeve Lucian, who tells us, That it was Antipaters purpose to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a steadfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athenes being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and lover of his Countrey, yet applying himselfe to the necessitie of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet favourable to the vanquished) hee endeavoured carefully to preferre.

p. VII.

How CRATERUS and ANTIPATER were driven from their Ætolian Warres into Asia. The grounds of the first ciuill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose pouerie was not so easily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fallnesse, into which they conueied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and vtterly debarred them of reliefe; then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yeeld themselves to the Macedonians: who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue so stubborne enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke euery houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giuing them whatsoever conditions they would aske; yet with purpose to call them to seuer account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitie, when once they should haue settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is the disposer: in whose high Councell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Prouinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so farre from taking effect, that it serued merely as an introduction to all the ciuill warres ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticke expedition, which did set the World in a vprour, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe: The other, as of all men the best beloued, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Armie. Next vnto these had Perdiccas beene; whom the aduantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to haue consoled with these two, and to haue beene with them a third partner in the gouernement of all: to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite an other way. Ariarathus was a very simple man, yet serued well enough to weare the title of that Majestie, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practise was more seuer than had beene in the daies of Alex- ander: the desire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preferring themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fire lulture to their actions, as may dazzle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath alreadye bene shewed. The Thracians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfaite Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was utterly razed; the children sold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example growne desperate, when after two or three daies triall they found themselves unable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses and set the Towne on fire, in the flame whereof the young-men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to sift the ashes of the burnt Citie for gold and silver; but Perdiccas had businesse of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without imploiment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, while others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their severall Prouinces. Hee purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seat of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the offices of his Procurators (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiccas holding authoritative, the match with Cleopatra might easily bee made. So should greatness meete with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomee might giue, who held Egypt, well fortified with men, but much better without of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomee would follow of himselfe, or bee driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then governing in Phrygia, a bulie-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas; and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great vndertaking, as any of Alexanders Captains. His imploiments had bene lesse than some of theirs, which made him also the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, nor by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and sounded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a jealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Iudge that fought his death. This deuise Antigonus would not seeme to perceiue, but prepared himselfe in thew to make answer, in case, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Demetrius aboard of some Armenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings, as finished the Armenian warre before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceiue their owne danger: so his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderstand that his intentions were laied open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could not only for defence, but (as hauing on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomee being aduertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearly they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his gouernment of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the middlest of these garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great solemnitic, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie coming against him.

§. VIII.

PERDICCAS his waunge into Egypt, and his death.

PERDICCAS, uncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolved to sit vpon Ptolomie, leaving Eumenes to keepe to his vie, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.

It may seeme strange, that hee did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quicke end with Ptolomie; or hee thought that Craterus would not be readie for him soone enough. Sure it is that hee tooke a bad course, and made it worke with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behauiour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which neuer faileth to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined. An affection founded vpon opinion of an vnjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relating: for hee did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels Wall: thither hee marched by night, with more hast than good speede; for Ptolomie preuenting him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauiing himselfe not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, hee gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehemēt, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made an other iourne; (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficultie hee beganne to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where hee meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore hee placed his Elephants about the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it; to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of the water. A great part of his Armie being arriued on the further banke, the channell beganne to waxe deepe; so that whereas the former companies had waded vp to the chinne, they who should haue followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rising of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of so manie Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedie there was, but such as had passed must repasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the cōmick, and could not bee reliued by their fellows. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the Riuer, wherein about two thousand of them perished, a thousand were deuoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle euen to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swimme recovered the Campe, many were carried downe the streame, and driuen to the contrarie banke, where they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing libertie to their tongues which long time had concealed the euill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomie, which did set them in an vp-rore. Ptolomie had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his handes a hie, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the Riuer had cast vpon his side; and finally, sent their bones and ashes to bee interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only moue the common Souldier, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honorable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vsing them like slaues. The fedition growing strong wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which hee had suffered by his procurement, after the victorie vpon the rebellious Greekes,

Greekes. Pylbon had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diuision of the Provinces made Governour of Media; hee had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had neuertheless bene scornfully vsed by him, which now he required. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the horie, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the foot-men having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud misgouerning authoritie of Perdiccas. Hee might haue liued as great as any, could he haue suffered any as great as himselfe; yea, peraduenture ma-10 liter of all, had he not bene too matterly over those which were alreadie his.

The next day Ptolome came into the campe, where he was joyfully received; he excused himselfe of things past, as not hauing bene Author, or giuen cause of the Warre, and was easily beieuced: the fauour of the Armie being such toward him, that needs they would haue made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this hee refused. It was an office fit for one, that would seeke to increase his greatness with his trouble. Ptolome was well enough alreadie; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deseruing of him hee procured that honourable charge to Pylbon, and to Aridaus the Captaine, who hauing had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexan-
20 ders Funeralls, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the middle of these businesse came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arriued two or three daies sooner, had bene entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would haue giuen such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to haue accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would haue giuen them well-come, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of EUMENES in the lower Asia.

BEfore wee procede in the relation of things, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those businesse in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whilest Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian warres. Alectas, the brother of Perdiccas, and Nephtolemus, had receiued command from Perdiccas to be assitant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alectas made flat answer, That he would not; alleging the backwardnesse of his men to 40 beare armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Nephtolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly he repined at the Precedencie giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discouering, through the counterfaiete looks of Nephtolemus, the mischiefe lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that hee might stand vpon his owne strength, he raised out of the Countries vnder his iurisdiction, about fixe thousand horse, giuing many priuileges to such as were seruiceable, and training them well vpon 50 Not without great neede. For when vpon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespan) for the inuasion of his Provinces, hee willed Nephtolemus to come to him with all his power, Nephtolemus did (indeede) aduance, but in hostile manner, though vnproouoked, presented him battaile. Nephtolemus had secretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed farre vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horse driuen out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting downe their Pikes they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull seruice. Antipater and Craterus endeuored with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betwene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearely loued; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had vnderaken to maintaine.

Whilest these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well hee might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victorie was wonne, for they would all forth-with reuolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to giue him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to condescend to his motion, and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might preuaile much, as the force which hee drew along. For he had in the middelt of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behauiour, and apparrell; whereby hee became verie gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia, with discontented eyes, as reproachfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to ioyne with Ptol. mic. Craterus vsed great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines after a great victorie. But hee had a warie and well aduised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wilddome foresaw all that was to bee feared, and the meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battaile, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Armie following him: (yet the Armie following him was such as much exceeded his owne in footmen, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more vnesaie to keepe the Macedonians from reuolting to him, than from knowing him. Hercupon hee tooke in hand a strange peece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing, prosperously accomplished. Hee gaue out reports that Neoptolemus was returned with such companie as hee could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not farre off) to ioyne with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom hee knew to be despised and hated among them, (as hauing been vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plaine field, whilest they valiantly fought in his quarrell) hee tooke great care to keepe them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpeter should bee admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had hee beene knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himselfe. To these also hee gaue in charge, that without speaking or bearkening to any word, they should runne vpon the enemy, and giue him no leisure to say or doe any thing, but fight. The directions which hee gaue to others, hee did not faile to execute in his owne person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as hee vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrarie side, hee held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and readie to charge charge the enemies as soone as the distance would give leaue: A rising peece of ground lay betweene them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discouered each other; but that of Eumenes currey way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iour-

 10 nes, which ouer-haistly they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of triuolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in surprizing them as enemies) to discouer himselfe to his old friends and fellow souldiers; of whom hee could see none. Phonax a Tensidai, and Artabazus a Perfian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions began to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeme, he bad his men fight and winne
 15 the day, and take the spoile to themselves. But the Beare whose skinn hee sells is not yet caught: If his ground whereon the battaile was fought gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts; especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as soone as they had discouered one another could not containe themselves; but with great rage met bodie to bodie, and letting loose their bridles grappled so violently together, that their horses ranne from vnder them, lea-
 20 uing both of them tumbling on the ground: Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawne, where-with hee houghed the other, causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receiued many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the 25 place, and was there (being haife-dead halfe-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose reulings hee required, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had hee not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his fol-
 30 lowers to runne away vpon the spurre, and secke shelter behind the battailes of their foot. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accom-
 35 panied with the same fortune that had assailed him when he fought in person: Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phonax, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when hee was charged by men of little eli-
 40 mation or note. Otherwisc it is not vnlike, that he might haue either carried the day, or preferred himselfe to a better aduenture by giuing ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whilest he fought to preferre his reputa-
 45 tion, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound receiued; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foot by many that knew him not, and so perished vnknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where hee lay made great lamentation, as hauing alwaies
 50 loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Arnie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh them-
 55 selves, which (by his permission) hauing done, they flae away by night, and fled toward Ampater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former wainne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heauily; and the Armies lying further off were iraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof 60 it manifestly appeared, that hee was as forie as any that pretended greater beneuolence. His Arnie wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giuing to them the spoile of such Townes as were ill-affected to him. So hee deemed the loue of his owne men, who of their owne motion appointed vnto him 65 a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had bene Traitors to Perdiccas hated him for his faithfulness, as greatly, as they thought that he would hate them for their fallhood; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor; and con-

condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

¶ X.

Quarrells between Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector.

Python resigns his office, into which Antipater

PER. 15. chofen.

PYTHON and Aridamus being chosen Protectors of King Aridamus, and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two Python was the greater in reputation, yet farr too weake to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridamus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a masculine spirit, well understanding what shee was or should be, and thinking her selfe able to support the weight which Fortune had laied vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne rite. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her father King Philip, was married (as hath bene shew'd) to Antipater, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the only sonne of King Perdiccas, Phlips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; shee had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Carya Queene of the Phrygians, a Prago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were so that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Raxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent, or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing shaken off such a ranke-rider as Perdiccas, would not after ward be reined with a twined threed. Python bearing him selfe vpon his office took vpon him to giue directions in the kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controll, vnto the same name, with more authoritic, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, seeing this, would needes resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vn certaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the farr worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritic confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successour. Eurydice was nothing sorrie at this course; for now shee thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne wil, being freed from the trouble some assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue only the King their Soueraign. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindered (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent wearienesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonien campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neare at hand arrived in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power that hee needed not to worke by any close deuises, as Perdiccas had done; he had no concurrents; all the Governours of Prouinces that remained aliuie acknowledged him their better; yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that warre.

§. XI.

ANTIGONUS Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battaile of EUMENES, and begeth him in Nova: He vanquisheth other followers of PERDICCAS.

10

Here begins the greattess of Antigonus, whose power in few yeares ouergrowing the rest wanted litle of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie employed in the publike seruice, till such times as hee might find occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vnderooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnreasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Armie strong in number, courage, and all needfull prouisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all wayes of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practise failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was nere him, yet looking so carelesly to him selfe, that he and his were surpris'd, when he thought his enemies farre off. An other follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in companie with Antigonus) kept his treacherie secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had vnderaken, Antigonus 30 presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, Generall of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrarie side, with such as he could get to follow him:
 but was closely followed by some, whose companie he desired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecoverable mischief which this traiterous practise brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battaile, which disabled him vterly to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get posses-40 sion of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and almes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Menaender (who was set to looke vnto their cariages) brought and published amongst them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. He had found Menaender (returned to their campe) great 50 their long seruices, all which he might haue taken: but fearing least such a purchasse should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menaender to flie to the mountaines, whilst he detained his men (whom authoritie could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to stripp them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to rauish their wives; but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good wil to them; but out of meeke subillitie had auoided those precious letters, which would haue hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all carriages to be ouer-burdenfome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than auailable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wulking them to thift for themselves; and retaining onely fife hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When hee had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him vp and downe, he came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him than necessitie required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a litle Fortresse in the borders of Lycania & Cappadocia, so strongly situated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonus followe him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose he entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vpon where Antigonus leauing sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iourne into Pisidia against Alectus and Attalus, with whom hee made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seised on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captaine as Eumenes, so haue defended them. Alectus and Attalus, as they had bene too secure before his comming, so were they too aduenturous in fighting at the first sight, vpon all disadvantages: and their folly was attended with futable euent. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Alectus fled to the Citie of Termessus, where the loue of the yonger sort was toward him so vehement, that stopping their cares against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needes would hazzard their liues and their Countrey in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing. For the Governours of the Towne hauing secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the yong men to fall out; and vying the time of aduantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Alectus, who vnable to resist slew himselfe. His dead body was conuied to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torne was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone the yong men interred the carcasle with solemne funerals, hauing once bene minded to set on fire their owne towne in reuenge of his death. Such fauour had hee purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soeuer, is insufficient.

PTOLOMEIWINNES Syria and Phoenicia. The death of ANTIPATER.

WHilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enioy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Onely Ptolomee looking abroad wanne all Syria and Phoenicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the manning. He sent a Lieutenant thither with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas, but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Soldiers, farre from assistants, and vainely relying vpon the authoritie which had giuen him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickely, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those buisnesses in Asia. Hee had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Asians, which Nation had stirred in the

quarrell of Perdiccus, prevailing farre at the first, but soone loosing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in the Chalcian expedition. In this Polyperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so farre forth, that (suspecting the youth of his owne Sonne Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeares old, hauing alwayes trauielled in the great affaires of mightie Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was ienalous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions.

10 In his priuate qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behaviour, not vnlearned, as hauing bene Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had bene much mouled by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne hee compelled to abstaine from coming into Macedonia, or entermelding in matters of estate: yea, at his owne death he gaue speciall direction, that no woman should bee permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet, ere long, by sorrowfull experience approued to haue bene found and good.

§. XIII.

OF POLYSPERCHON who succeeded vnto ANTIPATER in the Protectorship. The insurrection of CASSANDER against him.

POLYSPERCHON was very skilfull in the art of warre, hauing long time bene Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as he vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his buisnesse more formally, then wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage hee called to coun-
 30 saile all his friends, wherein, for weightie considerations (as they who weighed not the contrarie reasons held them) the Queen Olympias was renoued out of Epirus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and X strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all maiestie, that might giue au-40 thoritie to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the bounds of dauntie such as could not by force haue bene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefe laie vndergarded in their bosomes. Cassander the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiency in Polyperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could hee discern such odds in the qualitie of himselfe and Polyperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was left Captaine of one thousand, which Office by practise of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to implice. He should thereby haue bene as Campe-master, or Lieutenent generall to the other: a place no way satisfiing his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had 50 relied on his Father were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had bene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and drawe in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captains by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene Enydice, who had in priuate rendered him such courtship, as was due only to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because hee saw Polyperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the country, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them vpon the safest course, and mozt free from all suspition. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Armie, before the businesse were set on foot; and to doe this, oportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his gouernment of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, beganne to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such fort that hee manifestly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in neede of a ciuill Warre; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, that the friendship which had passed betwene his Father and them, would auail him somewhat. Wherevpon hee secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conueied himselfe on a lodaine ouer the Hellepont, that he might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polyperchon worke by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memorie of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him that Ptolomie was readie to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedie dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaid him with the same coine; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearely loued, hee would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus castled one another with words, they were nothing slack in preparing the common meanes leading to their seuerall ends.

¶. XIII.

The vnrworthy courses held by POLYSPERCHON, for the keeping downe of CASSANDER.

Great necessitie there was of timely prouision. For Polyperchon needed no other intructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the readie disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well hee knew that one principall hope of Cassanders was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Gracian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly,) he called an other Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose handes Antipater had committed the supreme authoritie, should forth with be either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankefull nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Sonne went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose only bountie had enabled him to doe it? or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many many worthe men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their private Enemie, gave the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally malign'd the Empire: But as in mans bodie, through sinnewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrarie hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdivided in faction, are more enraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their nearell purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are divided from them in the maine trunk. Herby it comes to passe, that contrarie religions are invited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in, to take part in civill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; shee hath taught the arme to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: they are depraved affections, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetful of the more generall good, for which they were created.

* The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranne vnder the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sodaine from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appeare to haue some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vnfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polyperchons decree.
The death of PHOCION.

30 Neither the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hastie desires.

Nicanor, as a trustie follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That he 40 had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time haue put into their hands a faire opportunitie of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonians yoke. Fame more grieuouly would they haue bene offended, had they knowne the instructions, which Cassander had given to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retain Munychia, any injunction 50 to the contrarie notwithstanding; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Praus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauen, against the High-Towne. How to accomplish this he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to doe that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their Councell, assembled in the Praus there to consider 60 of the Kings Proclamation; whither vpon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was readie to breake forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Masters of their

their owne, which how to vie they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand, the Athenians (who did alwaies measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captain following Polysperchon, and then lying neare at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion who then governed in Athens, a man very vnlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politike dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon beganne to deuise vpon taking Piramus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne iust reuenge. He leauied as many 10
Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munyelia; which done, he issued into Piramus, tooke it, and entrenched himselfe therein: to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselves vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending more mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before shee durst weill adventure to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider 20 more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordeined, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them haue themselves. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne bandes, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His sonne Alexander notwithstanding this, made faire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to entermeddle with the buisinesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceiued against him they powred out vpon Phocion, depriving him of his Office. This 30 was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundrie passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought euerie one that best could inueigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the euill threatening them. In this hurlic burlic was Alexander deuising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much priuie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carrie, but that his negotiation was discouraged, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was so farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driuen to seeke sauaguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commenda- 40 tion to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, readie to enter with an Armie into Athens. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deserts, (hauing alwaies bene friends to the Macedonians, as farre as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchon's familiar friend, went along with them, (in an euill houre) who promised to him selfe and them great fauour by means of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of judgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the belt of them, easily 50 changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good successe. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue hee gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how

CHAP. 3. S. 16. of the Historie of the World.

how to get into his owne handes those keyes, with which Cassander held them fast lockt vp: finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false and dishonourable man, hee stood waivering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeede have done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece beganne to call their eies vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which then was growne to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian

10 Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) vpon Phocians heeles, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemn audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exterior shewes of maiestie; yet all too little to change Ardene into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as hee saw others doe. For beginning of the blamefull Polysperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and flane: This was enough to eclipse his heartie affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadors he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest

20 were pronounced guiltie of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to die. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion, a man very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. First and for tie times had hee beene chosen Governour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent: so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued, such of which as were no pretenders to the same vertue. Hee was a good Commander in Warre; wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of having followed his counsaile: nor any private man of hating trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of silver, and offered to bestow vpon him of four Cities in Asia any one which hee would choofe. But Phocion refused these & other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pouertie: wherein hee liued about fourescore yeares, and then was compelled by the vnjust iudgement of wicked men to drinke that poison, which by just iudgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any worthe man resembling the vertue of their 40 Ancients.

§. XVI.

Of POLYSPERCHON his vaine expedition against CASSANDER.

50 NOt long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polysperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Armie, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only hee had giuert some impediment to the enemy; who not contented with defending what he held beganne to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, hee left his sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals; to writtand his further incroching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrey sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had beenc in other parts of Greece. First, he beganne to fight with Lacedæmons, restoring the Democratic, or Popular forme of government. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beenc made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: the vulgar sort being very readie to seale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the blood of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wilhed well to Cassander; especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fiftene thousand seruicable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And neede there was of such resolution. For Polyperchon comming thither with all his power did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betwene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assailants having failed to carrie the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the townelmen perceiuing their drift prepared boards driuen through with long nails, which they vsed as gall-throps, following them slightly, covered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beat vpon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these prouisions they made happie vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driuen back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polyperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leasure as was requisite, hee forooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leauing some part of his Armie to lie before the Towne for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to ioyne with Aridæus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole Fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the ouerthrow gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well sent out Nicanor againe, assuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For hee sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee had caused to bee wafted ouer the Straights in small Vessells by night; these before day-light setting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay securely on the Land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successfe by Land, brought Polyperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudie decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne sword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiuing that he had left them to thurst for themselves, and was not able to giue them protection against the enemy which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Governour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly resolted into him; as to an industrious man, man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie set in a combustion, vncasie to be quenched; which presented vnto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

p. XVII.

ANTIGONVS seeks to make himselfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with EUMENES, who disappoineth him. Phrygia and Lydia wonne by ANTIGONVS.

ANTIGONVS had in Antipaters life time a firme resolution, to make vnto himselfe the vmoit benefit that hee might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire season for auancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the buines in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Armie remaining, saue onely the continuance of the siege of Nora; a small thing of it selfe, but as hard as a greater matter, and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present estate was manifestly subiect, would in continuance of some yeares (which hee might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feat was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow sickly and vnseruiceable: which made him to practise many deuises of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued thus vp in this manner about a yeare, his hopes came to good passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himselfe, whose forces held him besseged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiency of Eumenes, and considering his fidelitie shewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in manning those high delignes, wherein he doubted not that hee should bee withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. Hee sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a greater Lord than euer hee had bene, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as hee desired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take, which done, hee might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes percing the forme of the oath perceiued the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few wordes, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding wordes and summe of all that hee were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonus, omitting all reformation of dutie to the King or any other. This hee liked not, holding it vnwisely to become a sworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the maistrie; and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soeuer hee gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would hee not therefore breake off the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of enlargement which might perhaps beeloug in coming: but seeming to bee well agreed with Antigonus, hee prepared to giue vp his Holde and depart. As for the oath itselfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his wordes, and gaue him leaue to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus, and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as hee came downe to the Sea-side, to remone remoue some of the Governours of Prouinces, behauing himselfe according to the authoritie which hee had recieued of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did hee want sufficient pretence whereby to iustifie his proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not hee himselfe aswell reaine the Leutenantship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme conuenient whilest hee liued, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To giue a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith fastidied, he had threecore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thurte Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that percieued his drift, and prouided to resist him, was Aridaus Governour of Phrygia; who fortified the Townes of his owne Prouince, and fought to haue wonne Cyzicus, a faire Hauen Towne, and seated very conueniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hercupon Antigonus tooke occasion to commaund him out of the Countrie. Aridaus was so farre from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Neuertheless finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, hee tooke such companies as hee could drawe along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedie of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good wordes) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath alreadye bene declared.

ϕ. XVIII.

ANTIGONVS pursues EVMENES, EVMENES hauing authoritie from the Court raiseth great warre against ANTIGONVS in defence of the Royall house.

ANTIGONVS hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or moost of Asia thelesse, was able to haue entred Aaceden, and seised vpon the Court; which that he forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would haue bred as much ieiouisie in Cassander, as feare in Polyperchon, which might haue brought them to termes of reconciliation; It would aske more time then hee could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to thinne, then to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war vpon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore hee bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand foote, and foure thousand Horse, made great hast toward Sicilia, hoping to suppress him before hee should bee able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well knowne in the Court, hee had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as hee should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Prouinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and bee ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the olde Souldiers, called the Argasides, or siluer-theeded bands, commaundment was giuen to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred hundred horse, before this authoritie was given him : but now he purposed with all the strength which hee could make, to fight with Amigonis in defence of the Roiall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and her Nephew the sonne of Alexander; and in the meane time to giue her his aduice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for shee was desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in Epirus, still such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, hee promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seed of Alexander.

10 Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire scarce any one could bee found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wiues, and children, might repose firme confidence, sauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedon in blood, borne at Cardia, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled hee was to traualle as farre as Persia to gather together an Armie sufficient, to reuolt the enemies that pursued his heeles.

¶ XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. OLYMPIAS takes ARIDEVS and ERYDICE, whom shee cruelly puts to death.

OW, foras much as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Provinces did enter meddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the roiall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particu-

30 culars of the warre it selfe, to shew breifly how the great ones did mutually it and affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which ouerthrew most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as like wise to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue beene depending.

Arideus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bid-

den. Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Governour to a King 40 of his owne making.

6 Erydice the Queene discouering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deciding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure heretofore; and the pleasure which hee tooke in the amorous Queene, made him resolute, both to suppress the linage which hee hated,

50 and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who raigne ouer all, so as they might raigne in their severall Countreys, and establish their authoritie in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough alreadie, if their ambition would haue suffered them to see it.

Pitlo and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Penegetes and some others with much adoe hardly made resistance, vntill such time as Euменes came to them; who procouped to himselfe great matters which he liued not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with Repdames) hated the children of her husband by his other wiues. It was thought that shee had giuen poyson to Aridaus, which failing to take away his life had much impaired both his bodie and wittes. Now she considering, that Euменes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily preuailed in Greece; thought it the best way to ioyne with Polyperchon, and set vp as King, her Nephew Alexander, the sonne of Roxane, remouing Aridaus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polyperchon, who ioyning with her entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes wrote verie earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set asid all other businesse, and come to succour her. Shee herselfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as shee could, vntill shee thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

These two Queenes met armed, as if the matter should haue been determined by their owne hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding herselfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victorie without blood, thought that all things would succeed as easilly, and that vpon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her; whatsoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Aridaus and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, shee led them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare least the people should haue commiseration of him, that had reigned almost fixe yeares and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliuered Aridaus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice shee sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poyson, willing her to chooſe the instrument of her owne death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then chooſe out all whom shee commaunded to be slaine. His brother Iolans that was alreadie dead and buried, shee accused of poyson giuen to Alexander; and thereupon caused his Tombe to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death bed, called this outrageous woman to the government of the Empire.

How CASSANDER was reuenged vpon OLYMPIAS.

† I.

The great expedition of CASSANDER, OLYMPIAS souts her selfe in-10 to Pydna, where CASSANDER besiegeth her. ÆACIDES King of Epirus, comming to succour OLYMPIAS, is for-taken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

ASSANDER at that time laie before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whiche when all these ill tidings were brought to him, hee neuer failed to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Coun-trie, (though Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, hee willed his as-sociats to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne and so in al, but 20 hee tooke his iourne toward Macedonia, carried headlong with the greedie desire of iust reuenge. The Ætolians had taken the Straights of Thermopyle, in fauour of the Queen and Polyperchon, to hinder his passage; but hee, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as hee could, great and small, with which hee transported his Armie into Thessalie. There hee diuided his companies, appointing some vnder Calles, a subtile Captaine, to hold Polyperchon busied, who then lay incamped neare to Perrebas; with the rest hee marched directly against Olympias. Shee, hauing once preuailed by the respect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care now to appeare Maiesticall, than to make herselfe strong. To this end 30 shee made a solempne progresse to Pydna, a Sea towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flour of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong sonne Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designement: who, during his minority, kept the Soueraigne power in her owne hands. But all this pompe serued to little vfe, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himselfe before the walls; onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all partes arrive, to rescue persons of their qualitie. And hereof there soone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Æacides King of Epirus, made great hast to bring succour to Olympias, his co-40 sen, with whom Deidamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; and finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprife. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Armie, brake out at length into such termes, that when hee had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authoritie, with which hee thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him and hee compelled to forsake his Kingdom, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries, a banished man, his people ioyning with the enemy, against whom hee had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was closed vp straightly, both by Sea and Land, so that 50 neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe bee conueied into it; but it held out as long as any foode was left, no memorable seruice being done there, whilst great actions were managed abroad.

† II.

A continuation of OLYMPIAS her Historie. POLYSPERCHON defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. OLYMPIAS yeelds to CASSANDER.

NOW, though order of time require it, that wee should rehearse the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leauing Olympias yet a while to the hower of her destinie, which grows the faster vpon her, because shee may discerne it coming; yet that we may not bee compelled to interupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; we will heere (as else where we haue done and elsewhere must) continue to an end one Historie, that may not be therewith distracted, when wee shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like maner disappointed, as their former trust had bene, which was reposed in the succours of the Epiros. For Calles, who was fent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Armie with monie, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fitt for no other bulincle of warre, than a swift retreat. When famine had so farre prevailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellows, and sawdust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue; (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yeelded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Countrey. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the euent, came in a pace and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortality was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noysome sent of the dead; Olympias be thought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that shee had wherein her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to bee vnto her as a house of torment, and a laile, out of which shee should not bee deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vtterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kinde of life, shee offered composition; and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who hauing fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himselfe as good as master of her bodie) a graunt of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Arissonus, to whom Olympias had giuen charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Countrey, taking courage from the successe of some pettie seruices wherein hee had prevailed, beganne to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to winne Cassanders fauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to hee, that he should giue it vp. Hee did so; and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke inouation.

† III.

The death of OLYMPIAS, and her Condition.

WHEN Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, shee herselfe was called into question, and accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so styled in her affliction, which in time of prosperitie shee called iustice) by her committed. There was shee, (being not heard, nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted ted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders mitigation; who (to halt the execution) sent her word that he would furnish her with a ship and other necessaries, to save herself by flight: which when she refused, saying that shee would plead for herselfe, and tell her owne tale; hee dissembled no longer, but sent vnto her such men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. Shee was daughter and sister vnto two Kings of Epirus, wife and mother vnto two the mightiest Kings of that or many other ages, a stout Ladie, and of vnreproueable chastitie; but her ambition was boundlesse; her hatred vnappassible, and her furie in reuenge most vnwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other wiues and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought priuie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, hauing first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beaulty furie broiled the other aliuie in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwile louing her well) forbad her to meddle in the government of Macedon. But God, more seuerely vnto cruell Tyrants, than onely to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue and fulfil the rest of her wickednesse; (which was his iustice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others) after all which hee rewarded her malice by returning it vpon her owne head.

CASSANDER, celebrates the funerals of ARIDEVS and ENYRIDICE, and seeks to make himselfe King of Macedon.

After her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Aridaus and Enyridice, among their Progenitours, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Ladie Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip by any other of his wiues; that by her hee might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her yong sonne, to close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to increase his fame, and purchase loue, hee built a Citie, called by his owne name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He reedified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twentie yeares wast, being vtterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily preuailling in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia for lesse tiles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

§. I.

The iourne of EVMENES into Persia. His wife dealing with those that ioynd with him.

EV MENES, having ioynd vnto his companie the Argyrasides, made halt into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his journey through Calesyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaim those Prouinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath bene shewed) by Ptolome, to the Kings obedience. But to effectuall this, his halt of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconuenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyrasides were so froward, that they seemed to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelitie was so vntreadie, that he might haue more easily dealt with open Traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authoritie by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore hee feared, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely in a rich pavilion, wherein an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had bene present at their consultations. Thus hee freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolome requested them, & Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant, which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as reiecting the Kings authority, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relie vpon their assistance, who stood other wise affected than his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countrie of Babylon, in such wise, that Seleucus, having in vaine assailed to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be ridde of him. Thus he came to Peneestes, and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his companie, because of the differences betwene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiortie, grew very hot among them; eury one finding matter enough, to feed his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giuing advice, and best able to reward, by means of the authoritie giuen him, to take what hee pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes hee wonne to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

How ANTIGONVS, comming to see upon EVMENES, was driven off with losse.

ANTIGONVS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where hee had wintered; and taking to him Pitbo and Selenus, with their men, hee marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Cattle of Susa, and was retired backe toward Persia, keeping the Riuer of Tigris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riuer were well garded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he tooke. Before he came to Tigris it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foote, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drew them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned, verie few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yeelded themselves prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the hate of that Countie in the dog-daies, breeding discates in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Pitbo with him (leaving Selenus to besedge the Cattle of Susa) and seeking to goe the nearest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arriue in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

of EVMENES his enning. A battaile betweene him
and ANTIGONVS.

AFTER his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine he would haue had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyraspides or Silver-shields were verie inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose Dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates; and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes, perceiuing whereunto those doings tended, suffered him awhile to keepe good cheate, till the time of warre drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orantes Governour of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polyperchon, to ioyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine joy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingness to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest apparence of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, hee being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine to be carried in a litter, the Armie marched in verie bad array, and was likely to haue bene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his litter, and vpon the sodaine did call his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a farre off, could not resistane from giuing him deserued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewardes to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, hee came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; other wise, hee was inferiour in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victorie was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lie farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the signe of victorie; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies, crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victorie had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men verie honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (hauing tarried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

§. IIII.

Of diuerse stratagems practised by ANTIGONUS, and EUMENES, one against the other.

THUS did the warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the side which had hitherto preuailed, being hindered by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe hee could find no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Betweene him and them, the way was not long, being onely nine dayes journey, but very bad, through a rough drie wildernesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer, and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring twentie fise dayes journey, hee forooke, partly for the length, partly and chiefly, because hee would come vndiscovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not haue them deserted a farre off. This commaundement had bene well obserued foure or fise dayes, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bolde to cherish themselves, being neare to their wayes end. The light of these fires gaue notice of their comming; which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captaines, they were so astonished with the sodaine danger, that in all hast they betooke themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as hee appointed, who failed not in making his word good. Hee tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, witherwith hee occupied certaine toppes of mountains, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a conuenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundrie places, as if the whole Armie had bene present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe prevented of his purposes; and began to feare least hee should be compelled compelled to fight, whilſt his men were tired with a long and painefull journey. Therefore he reſolued to turne aſide, & take the way to ſuch places, as might better ſerue to reſreſh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the firſt, as knowing how readie Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, conſidering that no enemy ſtirred about him, he began to pauſe, and thinke in himſelfe, that ſome what or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he cauſed ſome inhabitants of that Countrey to be taken, and brought before him; of whom hee learned, that they had ſene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops.

10 It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had bene ſo deluded. Therefore hee went againſt theſe troups with great furie, meaning to take ſharpe vengeance on them, for hauing ſo deceiued him. But by this time, ſufficient ſtrength was arrived there, which could not bee forced without much buſineſſe, and long ſtay. All the Armie was come, ſaue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, beſides thoſe beaſtes, had no more than foure hundred horſemen in his companie. Antigonus hearing of this ſupply comming to his enemies, ſent about two thouſand horſe, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was ſaine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and ſo to defend himſelfe as well hee could; for his horſemen, ouerſlaied with multitudes were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the ſpurte. Neither knew they, who ſate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them, for on all ſides they received woundes, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troups of horſe and foot, that came vnexpected to thereſcue; and charging the aſſailants vpon the backe, draue them to ſeek their owne ſafetie by ſpedie flight. Theſe were ſent by Eumenes; who though hee knew not what his aduerſarie meant to doe, yet hee knew very well what was fitteſt for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himſelfe, provided the remedie.

§. V.

The conſpiracie of PEUCESTES and others, againſt EUMENES his life.

BY theſe meanes Eumenes waينه great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a moſt expert General, and well worthe of the chiefe commaund. But Peuceſtes, and the other Captaines, guiltie of their owne much inſufficiency, were ſo transported with enuie, that they could now no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held 40 communication, as vpon a neceſſarie point, how they might finde means to murder him.

Surely, it is great iniuſtice to jmpute the miſchiefe, contriued againſt worthe men, to their owne proud carriage, or ſome other ill deſerting: For, though it often happen, that ſmall vices doe ſerue to counterpoyle great vertues; (the ſenſe of euill being more quicke and laſting, than of good) yet hee ſhall bewray a verie fooliſh malice, that, wanting other teſtimonie, will thinke it a part of wiſedome, to find good reaſon of the euills, done to vertuous men, which often times haue no other cauſe than their vertue it ſelfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of ſingular courteſie, of a very ſweet conuerſation among his friends, and 50 carefull by all gentle means to winne their loue, that ſeemed to beare him any ſecret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrow him, which euen they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee ſhould not be ſaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they conſiſſed that it ſtood beſt with their ſafetie, to be gouerned by his directions. Of this treaſon,

son, he was quickly aduertised by Eudamus, to whom hee had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he vsed to borrow monie when he needed not, to the end that they should bee carefull of his good, for feare of loosing their owne. Considering therefore, and discouring with himselfe of the villanie intended against him, hee made his last will, and burnt all his writings that contained any matter of course were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number, than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had bene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that hee forbore, either to loose the battaile willingly, or to flie into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length hee resolved to doe his best against the common enemy, and after wardes to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

B. VI.

The last battaile betwene ANTIGONVS and EVMENES.

He Souldiers, especially those old bandes of the silver-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in arraie; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces, but the chiefe Commanders were so mischeiuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke vpon being beholding to him for the victorie. Yet hee ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horseman from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse, in fighting against their owne fathers, would now bee punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seauentie yeares olde, strengthened more by continuall exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often bene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most Auncient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew verie penitent, and aduanced heauily, suspecting their owne cause, and feareing that the threatnings vttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therefore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, he did set forward courageously against the enemies, that were readie to giue him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Penseles, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meane to make head against him on the sodaine, and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithon, hee bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a leisurable retreat, expecting the euent of the other side.

So they joyned verie fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne such a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leisure and opportunitie to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, euen in their owne opinions, farre inferior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-shields, who slew above five thousand of them, loosing of their owne, not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defence. Yet 10 his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the enimie could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Pencestes, with one thousand five hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battaile, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himselfe. And though hee failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter he did so beate vpon them, which camein his way; that the victorie hung along time in suspence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloude of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that pass'd vndiscover'd beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly garded, (for that the whole bodie of the Armeie lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Pencestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not onely haue defended them, but peradventure haue surpris'd those which came to surpris'e them, & so haue done as good a peece of seruice as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in bodie and minde, that he could not giue an eye to e-30 uery place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe euery way ouer-charged, began to giue backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companions in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as hee was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soone as he had any leisure to heare how things went, whereupon hee presently ordered his men for a fresh 40 charge, and sent for Pencestes that was not farre off, requesting him to bring in his mea, and renew the fight, whereby hee trusted, not onely to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themselues with the spoiles of the enemies. Pencestes not onely refused to joyne with him, but immediatly withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to retume into their Campes. Yet Antigonus opene'd hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunitie to offend him: the other halfe hee committed to Fisbon, willing him to set vpon the Silver-shields in their retreat; which 50 yet hee forbore to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; when Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoile which hee got, by surprising his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

p. VII.

How EUMENES was betrayed to ANTIGONVS, and slaine.

EV MENES, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to chere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduanage. For their braue demanour that day had so crueld the enemy, that hee had no power left wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Cartes after him, through that great Wildernesse, ouer the high mountaines.

But these perswasions auailed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captaines would needs returne into the high Countries; & the Souldiers had no desire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Tentamus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times readily consented vnto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigonus) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their seruices in the warres of Philip, and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with a little entreatie performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he louingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answer pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliuer him aliuie. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more joy of their victorie, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeme by another fight, in the middelt of this goodly talke they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they hald him aways and stopping their cares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so farre, as to loosen one of his hands and let him kill himselfe, but brought him aliuie (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had bene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine to send a gard of horsemen and Elephants, to keepe him from being smothered, whom he could not sodainly resolue either to kill or saue. Verie few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus was one, the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly, thinking belike, that if hee were saued, he would soon be the chiefe in great reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it awhile in his own power to reuertle the sentence, as desiring (if it might be) to haue him liue his friend; haist of other businesse made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the traualles of the worthe Generall, Eumenes; who had with great wisdome, fidelitie, and patience, laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie, but more notable was his government of himselfe in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, with out full power to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Galpar de Coligny, Admiral of France, in our dayes, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soone after in the massacre of Paris, That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Silver-shields he burnt aliue; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-shields, that had betrayed lo worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carie them into farre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priuie charge, to consume them all, as prepared wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or to much as once behold the Seas, that beate vpon the shoares of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How ANTIGONVS slew PITHON, and occupied MEDIA. How hee removed Governours of Prouinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away PEVCESTES.

THe two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the reit of the Winter; the common Souldier idly the principall men intenuely bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithon began to consider his owne desertings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course, hee was driuen by necessitie to truit many, of whom he stumbled vpon some, that were vnsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of disention betwene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom hee meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reportes, coming daily to his eares, did finely delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander, his authoritie in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the loue of the souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offensive warre. But what neede had he to vse the sword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begunne with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme circlely through the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Prouinces; and a Captaine, to suppress all commotions: thinking belike that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this, he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he vnderstood his owne might in esse. For he placed and displaced, at his pleasure, Governours in all Prouinces; leaving none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting such as lay too farre off to bee dislodged easily.

Pevcestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheare to redeeme old offences; but was deceiued; hauing to doe with one, that could not be taken with such baits: he was caried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer tooke effect. Thus he, that enuiet the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the the fortune of his enemy, after which he liued a contemptible life, till hee died obscurely a man forgotten.

How SELEVCVS was chased out of Babylon, by ANTIGONVS, The great riches of ANTIGONVS.

SELEVCVS was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antigonus, and now gaue proofe of his heartie affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Caille of Susa to meete him on the way, rendering vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. His offer was so great, that Antigonus (through hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleue it; but vsed him with excessive kindnesse, for teare so good a moode should change. In that Caille he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made vp twentie five thousand talents. Hauing all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent, to leaue no Countrie behind his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beseeching the maiestie of a King. All this he accepted with great grauntie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the reuenues of that Prouince. This demaund Seleucus held vnreasonable; saying, that it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerful; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessitie, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue, as Pithon and Peneestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fiftie horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomes Dominions; desiring him to protect him from the violence of such a man, as was equal to oppresse all, that in former times had bene his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countreies were yeilded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them hee wanted all pretences and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange prophetic to Antigonus, bidding him looke well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, hee should recover Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie beleeuers may giue credit to this tale. Had it bene true, methinkes, Antigonus rather should haue hanged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whome the destinies preferred for so great purposes.

When hee had settled things at Babylon, hee tooke his iourne into Cilicia, where hee wintred. There hee tooke vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yearly income to amount vnto eleauen thousand Talents.

Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

§. I.

10 The combination of PTOLOMIE, CASSANDER, and others, against ANTI-GONYVS. Their demands and his answer.

His great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, enuid, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, had priuily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practises hee had some notice; the good entertainment giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them seuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their loue toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his halty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie; it being likely that a good armie should preuaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, heooke the way toward Syria, and was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honor that he had thereby gotten. In which 30 war, forasmuch as they being his Confederates must haue endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole estates, if the contrarie faction had preuailed; they held it very iust, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voiage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making betweene them all an equall diuision, of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best bee to euery ones liking, if hee would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellespont, to Lyfimachus; for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victorie, he might well spare some of those westerne Provinces, 40 to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had bene driuen so iniuriouly, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses recieued, hee should yet bee able to receme peace when soeuer he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such his friends, for feare only, least it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them worke, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profits of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeede they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his meanes kept 50 their their governments, wherof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the counsell of estate in Macedon. But what meruaile was it, if they considered not how he had saued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitiue, and begging foucour, he was by his meere bountie reſcued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (ſaid he) in thoſe daies command me to ſurrender Prouinces, and giue him his equal ſhare of my treaſures; but (for his Fathers ſake) deſired me to pittie him, and help him againſt his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now preſumes to threaten me. As for Selenus, how can he complain of wrong, that durſt not ſtay to plead his right? I did vſe him well; but his conſcience told him that he had deſerued ill: eſe he wou'd not haue fled. Let them that ſo curiouſly ſearch into my doings, conſider well their owne, which ſome of them can hardly iuſtifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings; and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

d. II.

The preparations and beginnings of the Warres.

hen the Embaſſadors were diſmiſſed with this anſwere, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiuing that he ſhould bee inuaded from Europe, as ſoon as hee were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea-coaſts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Aſia: giuing him alſo in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia ſome that were already ſent ouer to moleſt him. Likewiſe he diſpatched Meſſengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnuſhined of monie, to draw friends to his ſide, and raiſe vp troubles to his enemies. Eſpecially he laboured to make himſelfe the ſtrongelt by Sea; to which purpoſe he rather haſtened, than foreſlowed his iourne into Syria, that he might get poſſeſſion of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid poſt-horſes throughout all Aſia, to giue ſwift aduertifement of all occurrences, he inuaded Syria, that was not held againſt him by any power ſufficient to maintaine the field.

Ptolomie lay in Egypt, the ſtrength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Prouinces hee kept with a few Garrifons, better ſeruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities, and Places, of that Countrey, and beganne to ſet great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ſhips, which was one of his moſt earnest cares. In theſe buſineſſes hee conſumed a yeare and three moneths; not idly. For hee tooke Toppes, and Gazars, which were yeilded vnto his diſcretion, and well ſed. The ſtrong Citie of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end, by famine, to render it ſelfe vpon compoſition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not aſleepe, whileſt theſe things were in doing, though he kept himſelfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeede it behoued him to doe. His forces were hot able to ſtand againſt Antigonus in plaine field, but likeli they were to increaſe, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheleſſe by Sea (where his enemy was as yet vnradie) he ſent his Fleet into all quarters, wherof Selenus had the chiefe command.

Selenus paſſed with an hundred ſaile along the coaſt of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little diſcomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many petty Lords; of whom the greateſt adhered to Ptolomie; the reſt were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with ſharpe ſteele.

The ſame commoditye of aide by Sea encouraged the Prefident of Caria (called alſo also Cassander, but not the sonne of Antipater, howsoever by the painefull and learned writer Reimerus Reinescius, he is by some our sight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolemeus, and his Confederates, and busily employ in their quarrell all his forces, which hee had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now hee threw himselfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

¶ III.

10 How each partie sought to winne the assistance of Greece. ANTIGONVS his declaration against CASSANDER, ALEXANDER the sonne of POLYPERCHON renoueth from ANTIGONVS, who had set him vp.

IN the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, whose aide which way soeuer it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the first Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand, and caused Polyperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowle himselfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Captaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, That Cassander had very cruely slaine Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not here with contented, had shut vp in close prison the poore Ladie Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himselfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie Thessalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match 30 vnto for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in mere despight of those dead Princes, Philip, and Alexander, hee had plann'd the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Cittie by him built, and called by his owne name Cassandria; and had reedified the Citie of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her sonne; and should 40 yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Emie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome, this he did, not because he was careful of their good, but for the neede which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not only the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the Rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing, but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Roiall blood. But concerning his loyaltie to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be decieued with vaine shewes. His vnder-taking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got eafie beliefe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolemeus strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more seruiceable in warre, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceiued himselfe, not without great cost. For he gaue to Yyyy 2 Alexander

Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon five hundred talents, winning him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had, with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrarie factions; and he himselfe perceiuing, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what use he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: hee thought it a good part of wisdom, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which he could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore, he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuersie; letting him know, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to haue them weare themselves, whilest he was buised elsewhere, that so at length he might finde oportunitie to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Provided, that hee should from thenceforth, renounce all confederacie made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithfull league with Ptolomie, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, hee might well persuade himselfe, that the Countrie which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be wonne by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, so filling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, (which hee did not carrie verie secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept fo good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Stygians; who thinking thereby to haue made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and hauing by severitie taught them obedience, did afterwards containe her Armie in good order, and governed those places that shee held, with the loue and commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Aetolians rise against Cassander in fauour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of Antigonus, utterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. Antigonus draws nearer to Greece.

Antigonus, when he found, that with so much monie he had only bought an enemy, beganne to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduersaries, in Greece, by stirring vp the Aetolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greece Sets, by whose assistance he might bee the better able to deale with Ptolomie, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the success he expected. The Aetolians, a factious Nation, and alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but fo, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wanne some of their owne Countrie; forthed the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Thyrians, whom he vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no armes against Cassanders friends.

- On the other side, as many petty Ilands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the Fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia toward Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolomies Naue; Polyxenus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had bene sent into Peloponnnesus against Alexander, finding no neede of his seruice in that Countrie, because Alexander was come ouer to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprisid. He rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces hee placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slaine, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haile to helpe his fellows that were on Land; but whilst hee with all his Fleet were intenting only to that business, Polyxenus appeared at their backs; who as soone as hee perceiued their disorder, halted about the Cape, and charging them behinde suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings cauled Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, hee sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: so the parlie was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the Warre, and thereby to haue equall cause of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seeme to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the reuolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equall the Confederacie, made betwene the Stolians and him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had bene in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his aduantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerse to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

- Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, monie, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territorie by addition of Syria, hee prized at a higher rate, as if thereby hee had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomies his enemy, and strengthened the bodie of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, hee meant to proceede as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no monie.

- That which most molested him was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse, wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had hee cause to feare, lest the people, being tied vnto him by no bond of allegiance, might vpon small occasion reuolt from him, to men of as honorable reputation as hee himselfe. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore hee left part of his Armie in Syria, vnder his sonne Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twentie yeares old, hee appointed many ancient Captaines as assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest hee carried with him into Phrygia, where hee meant to winter.

d. V.

How LYSIMACHVS and CASSANDER vanquished some enemies; raised against them by ANTIGONVS. The good successe of ANTIGONVS in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against CASSANDER.

THe coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the proesse of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselues were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with monie, and other aide. The Ætoliens likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Æacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselues. Hee sodainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne to their dutie. He fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wild Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrey. Finally, he ouer-came Seuthes; and following the heat of his victorie, slew Pausanius in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ranfome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Ætoliens. For he wasted their Countrey; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victorie, fought againe with their forces ioyned in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Æacides the vsfortunate King. Finally, hee draue the Ætoliens out of most of their Countrey, and forced them to seeke their safetie among the wild Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduersaries with painefull trauaile; after which they remained only lauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure wanne all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing libertie vpon all the Cities he tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countrey of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Ile of Eubœa, and many places of the firme Land were by these meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, readie to doe or suffer any thing for him, that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the libertie indeede, which others promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wile to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made thew as if he would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselues, if any forraigne succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrey; draue his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Governour of Achens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before bene raised out of her old ruines by the mere power of Cassander; of which act hee was accused by Antigonus, as if it had bene some hainous crime: Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the loue of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miserable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

¶ V. I.

Victories of PTOLOMIE by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which PTOLOMIE and SELEVCVS wanne, against DEMETRIVS the Sonne of ANTIGONVS.

19

the presence or neareness of Antigonus gave life to his affaires in the lower Asia, and Greece; so the delignes of his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the year preceding hee had overtopped them. The Ile of Cyprus, whose Princes wauered betwene contrarie affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomee, was visited by an Egyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomee, in his owne person, easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Gouvernour of the whole Countrey. With the same fleet he ranne alongst the Sea-coasts, wating a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers Subjects were oppressed, made all halt out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and lighte-armed foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did he tire himselfe and his followers, in hallic seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many dayes, if neede had for required. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the success. For Ptolomee was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certaine, whether hauing lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would returne vpon those maritime Countreies; or make toward Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeede gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a royall Armie, which he leuied with all conuenient speede, for the recouerie of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelyhood, and returne the way that hee came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomees coming with a puissant Armie, to giue him battaile. Hereupon he called to counsaile his principall friends, who aduised him to giue way to the time, and expect some better opportunitye in the future: being a yong man, and weakly furnished with meanes to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomee and Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceede from the cold temper of those aged men that gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the sonne of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his owne title weightie enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such odds of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, hee resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the advantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome iourne ouer the Desertes of Arabia.

Ptolomee

Ptolomie and Seleucus siluing out of so rich a Prouince, as Aegypt, came to well prouided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt not any great grieuance of the cill way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they undertooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius, of Elephants they were vtterly vnprouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastned together with chaines, and sharpened in such manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, which (besides that they had aduantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate seruises, by them performed that yeare, whilet the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine iourneys, or long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striving more to winne honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as hauing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who vpon no necessitie would needs fight a battaile with disadvantage, beganne to appare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to loole by her than he could get: but in this fight there was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the error brought vpon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kinde of ware hardly to be resisted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were forcibly hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and preuailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lie vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they beganne to shrink, and many of them to prouide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that hee himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as farre as to Asolus, which was about thirte miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carrriages was in Gaza, whither some of his companie turned aside, hoping to siue such goods, as in hast they could pack vp. This foolish courerousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, and cloied vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch, others, to carrie out what they had already loden, Ptolomies Armie brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie altogether.

This victorie restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For betwene Gaza and Phanicia no place offered resistance. In Calesyria and Phanicia, some townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Capitaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honorably entreated, in respect of his fidelitie.

§. VII.

How SELEVCVS recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the higher Asia. The ERA of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which beganne with this Dominion of SELEVCVS.

10 While Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperitie, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortunes which hee found so favourable, that recovering first his owne Province, hee became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

20 This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of vnlikelhoods. His traine of no more then eight hundred foote, and two hundred horsel, a number too small, to haue beene placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which hee carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough, whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; 30 but let that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wishing them, ill to speede. Some of the Maceonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Enignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance; for every man of them should haue beene troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who reuolted to the enemy, with more then a thousand Souldiers following him, so dimaied therof, that they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the 40 Hottages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his securitie in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bellowed in Media and Persia, forces conuenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betwene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza, had opened vnto Seleucus the way into those parts; he found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. 40 Having now gotten what he sought; it behoued him to seeke how he might keepe his gettings; for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helpe, came with ten thousand foote, and seuen thousand horsel, either to saue all from being lost, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had wonne.

Against this power, Seleucus had only foure hundred horsel, and somewhat about three thousand foote, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations hauing yielded him many louing subiects, but few souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neare to the Riuer of Tigris, he withdrew himselfe 50 from the place where his resistance was expected, into certaine marishes not farre off; where he lay secretly waiting for some aduantage. Nicanor thought that hee had bene fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine securitie, his campe was taken by surprize, the first night of his arriual; the the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundrie of the Captaines, were slaine, he himselfe was drinen to flee for his life into the Deserts; and the whole Armie yeelded vnto Selencus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Prouinces, to acknowledge him their Lord, without any further stroke stricken.

This victorie of Selencus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vsed by the Iewes, Chaldaens, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeare of this Era. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which, there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the five hundred and nineteenth yeare of NABONASSAR, was the fourscore and two yeare of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned GAVRICVS, That the first of these yeares was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirtie and eight yeares after NABONASSAR. With the obseruation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to haue bene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldaens had obserued it, in the same yeare; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Selencus the fourescore and two yeare; and the last of the hundred thirtie and seuenth Olympiad. These obseruations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in Historie, and the yeares of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vnremembered fractions) if they seeme to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthe of note; that these yeares of the Greekes, were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one yeare, that is found betweene actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeares distance.

§. VIII.

How PTOLOMIE left all that he had wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by those that had bene subiect vnto the Persian Empire. Of diuers partie enterprizes, taken in hand by ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS, with ill success.

N A happie houre did Selencus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staid longer vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomie could haue spared him none at all, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hauing lost the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which hee and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire, of requiring him, with some as braue liberalitic. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could bee spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Prouinces thereabouts; and aduertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeme his honour lost. Antigonus, vpon the first newes of this ouertrow, had said, That

That the victorie which Ptoleme wanne vpon a bearded Boy, should bee taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon desire that his sonne, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his owne reputation, He was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptoleme hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuertheless follow his owne businesse in Caeleſyria; thinking it enough, to send part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had bene already vanquished, when their forces were entire. This peradventure would haue bene sufficient: had not Cilles too much vnderualued the power of such an Enemie. Hee thought that this yong Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now bee more carefull of having a faire way at his back, than aduenturous in setting further forward, then vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all fears, as one that were already Master of the field, and should meete with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this carelesse march; he tooke the lightest of his Armie, and made his iourne with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him aliuie, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit serued not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of Ptoleme, with equall fauor, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptoleme so weakened by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptoleme; and therefore he fortified himselfe in places of aduantage: Ptoleme on the other side was loath to engage himselfe in an enterprise, wherein he might perceiue, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driuen to make a shamefull retreat, or a dangerous aduventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haste, not so much to relieue his sonne, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the yong man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victorie, he brought such forces, as might serue to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, laied by his sonne; whom from this time forwards, he imployed in matters of greatest importance.

Ptoleme had now lesse reason, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to haue assailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduised him to retire into Egypt; allcaging many good arguments, to that purpose: which they might well perceiue to bee agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good success against Perdiccas, in the like defensiu warre. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honor; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddaine passion of feare: and he departed at faire leisure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrie that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by peeces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captaine of a strong Armie, to make himselfe Lord of a great Prouince.

We may iustly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victorie of Alexander had ouer-runne, with so hastie a course, as gaue him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not only by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions contentions for superiouritie betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betweene Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nimue; the Perſians, and many Countreſſes; argue a more manly temper, to haue once bene in thoſe people; which are now ſo patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they ſuffer themſelues to be diſtributed, fought for, wonne, loſt, and againe recouered, by contentious Maſters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the Fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more ſtrange, if we ſhall conſider, how the ſeueral States of Greece (many of which had neuer poſſided ſo large Dominion, as might cauſe their Spirits to ſwell beyond their abilitye) did greedily embrace all occaſions of libertie: and how theſe proud Conquerors were glad to offer it, deſiring to haue them rather friends than ſeruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It muſt therefore be noted, that moſt of theſe Countreſſes, had alwaies bene ſubject vnto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords; whom the Babylonians and Perſians long ſince had rooted out, & held them in ſuch bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Maſters. This had vtterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Perſian Empire: ſo that wanting within themſelues al ſoueraign power, or high authoritie, the life and ſpirit of euery Eſtate; then lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had bene members.

Why the Perſian Satraps, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, ſtrive to lay hold vpon thoſe Prouinces, which had many ages bene ſubject vnto them, and ſcarce foure yeares in quiet poſſeſſion of their enemies; or why at leaſt they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did ceaſe to affright them) to get their ſhares among his followers, if not wholly to diſpoſſeſſe them of their new purchaſes: it is a queſtion, wherein, who is not ſatisfied, may finde no leſſe reaſon to ſuſpect the Hiſtorie, than authoritie to confirme it. For we ſeldom reade, that any ſmall Kingdome, preuailling againſt a farre greater, hath made ſo entire a conqueſt, in the compaſſe of ten yeares, as left vnto the vanquiſhed no hope of recouerie, nor meanes to rebell; eſpecially when ſuch diſorders, or rather vtter confulion hath enſued, by the furie of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cauſe why the Macedonians held ſo quietly the Perſian Empire, is well ſet downe by Macchiavell; and concerns all other Kingdomes, that are ſubject vnto the like forme of Governement: the ſumme whereof is this. Whereſoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects vnder the condition of ſlaues; there is the conqueſt eaſie, and ſoone aſſured: Where ancient Nobilitie is had in duer regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkiſh Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader ſhould preuaile ſo farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren be vſeth not to ſuſter alie) were taken or ſlaine: the whole Empire would quickly be wonne, and eaſily kept, with our any danger of rebellion. For the Paſſies, how great ſoever they may ſeeme, are meere ſlaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion any one man, whoſe perſonall regard could get the people to follow him in ſuch an attempt, where in hope of priuate gaine, ſhould not counteruaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwiſe, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conqueſt, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though hee further got the better part of the Countrey, and were by farre the ſtrongeſt in the field. For, beſides the Princes of the Roiall bloud, there are in the Kingdome ſtore of great men; who are mightie in their ſeueral Countreſſes, and hauing certaine Royalties and Principallities of their owne; are able to raiſe Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwaies ſtirre vp and inflame them, ſo that vntill euery one peece were wonne, and euery one (an endleſſe worke) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought brought vnder or destroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to bee satisfied at full, in all their demands; and hauing what they would, they soone returne to their old allegiance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another, as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needs not to feare any perill, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flie to the enemy, whereby he looseth all that he formerly did hold, or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must adventure to excuse himselfe vnto his Maister, who seldom forgives the Captaine, that hath not striven by desperate valour, against his misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subject vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leave vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him assistance, if aduersitie should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turkes Basques prouinciall Governours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse and vtter ruine of the Turks Empire, can loose any foot of his proper inheritance, and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conqueror, who hath no other device painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slaverie.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, voide of libertie in the Subjects, and vtterly destitute of other Nobilitie, than such as depended vpon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall blood, and others, descended from the Princes that joynd with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia; but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safetie in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vncles, Cosin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves; it is ealie to be discerned, in that example of crueltye, practised by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Masistes, which hath bene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satrapes, or Governours of the Prouinces, it is needlesse to cite examples, proving them to haue beene meere Slaves; it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuches, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobilitie in Persia, may be added the generall want of libertie, conuenient among the people: a matter no lesse amiable, in making ealie and sure the conquest of a Nation, then is the cause assigned by Machiuel. For as Aesop his Ass, did not care to runne from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heauier burthens, than his Maister caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke; Nor will be hastic to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, then was that whereunto they had bene long accustomed. This was it that made the Gaſcoignes beare ſuch faithfull affection, to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iuriſdiction in Lumbardie; for the Townes that they wanne, they wanne out of the hands of Tyrannous oppreſſors: and this did cauſe the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had bene ſubject vnto the poſteritie of Alexanders followers, to ſerue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were ealed of many burthens, which had bene impoſed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tameneſſe, which we finde in thoſe that had bene ſubjects of the Perſian Kings, the reaſons are apparent. Yet ſome of theſe there were, that could not ſo eaſily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede bene abſolutely conquered by the Perſian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such alſo were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: againſt whom Antigonus ſent part of his Armie; thinking therewith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaine that hee ſent fell vpon the Nabaſthians, at ſuch time as they were buſied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrbe, Frankinſence, and other ſuch commodities. All, or moſt of theſe rich wares, together with ſiue hundred talents of ſiluer, and many priſoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their coming was ſuddaine, and vnexpected. But ere they could recourſe Syria, the Nabaſthians over-tooke them, and finding them wearie with long marches, made ſuch a ſlaughter, that of foure thouſand foot, and ſixe hundred horſe, only fiftie horſe eſcaped. To reuenge this loſſe, Demetrius was ſet out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not reſiſted by any Armie, but by the naturall defence of a vaſt Wilderneſſe, lack of water, and of all things neceſſarie. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein hee loſt not much honor: for they craued it, and gaue him preſents. Returning from the Nabaſthians, hee viewed the Lake Aſphaltites; whence hee conceiued hope of great profit that might be raiſed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandric of his ſonne, Antigonus was well pleaſed; and appointed men to the worke: but they were ſlaine by the Arabians, and ſo that hope vaniſhed.

Theſe petty enterpriſes, with the ill ſucceſſe accompaning them, had much impaired the good advantage againſt Ptolomeus: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loſſe of thoſe great and wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected; neither was it faſe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Aſia ſhould haue bene expoſed, to the danger of ill affected Neighbourſ. A middle courſe was thought the beſt; and Demetrius, with ſitene thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, was ſent againſt Seleucus. Theſe forces being ſent away, Antigonus did nothing: and his ſonne did leſſe. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themſelues from neceſſitie of fight; ſome places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without letting in Garrifon more men than he could ſpare; neither did hee get much; and therefore was faine to ſet out the brauerie of his expedition by burning and ſpoiling the Countrie; which hee did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemies, who thenceforth held it as his owne aſſured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his ſonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reaſonably thinking (as may ſeeme) that in ſuch an vnſetled ſtate of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the ſurie of the firſt brunt; or elſe it would bee vaine to ſtrive, againſt all difficulties likely to ariſe, where want of neceſſaries ſhould fruſtrate the valour, that by length of time was like to become leſſe terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore, leauing behinde him ſiue thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, rather rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces, could doe little more than nothing, forsooke the enterprize, and went back to his Father.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the house of ALEXANDER was destroyed.

10

THese ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with vnicemutual traualle, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred but meeere desire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulnesse growing vpon the slow aduancement of their seruall hopes, that made them willing to breath a while, till occasion might better serue to fight againe.

20

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Provinces which euer one held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a false colour, to the bulinesse: That the sonne of ALEXANDER by ROXANE, should be made King, when he came to full age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at libertie. The aduancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, seems to haue beene a matter, forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to make himselfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more nearly touched Cassander. For in his antulodic was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in fort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that fought to haue put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betweene them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this conclusion of peace, grew vp faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the sonne of their laterenowned King.

30

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince must first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine over a thousand men, it not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Aridaus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne strength. He in the meane time, by his readinesse to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himselfe from that ill-fauoured imputation, of seeking to make himselfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

40

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greekes to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto bene the subject of much idle discourse: but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held scarce any Towne of theirs; Cassander occupied most of the Countrie: which if he should let free; he must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the meane season, the Countries lying betweene Euphrates and the Greeke seas, together with a great Armie, and monie enough to entertaine a greater, might serue to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes, as high as euer they had bene.

With much disaduantage doe many men contend, against one that is equall to them them all in puissance, Cassanders friends had lett him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where euey one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are wearie. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects vnto any man; much lesse to the sonne of an Asiaticke woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding vp his gouernement, which he must haue done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Ladie of singular beaurie, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to haue her sonne; being as yet vborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately vpon the death of Alexander, she had vided the fauour (if it were not loue) of Perdiccas, to the satisfiing of her owne bloudie malice, vpon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius; whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For hauing by a counterfeitt letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Ladie into her hands, shee did, by assistance of Perdiccas; murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were shee and her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the neare approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander, was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein euey one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Here vpon all of them (except Lysimachus and Selenus, that had worke enough at home) beganne to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improue his owne stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellas: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomee, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander. Ptolomee, complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing, to be set at libertie. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia; where he wan four Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his Enemies.

After this; putting to Sea with a strong fleet, he ranne along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voiage alured vnto him a Nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requittall of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe, as he had bene to his owne Vnkle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at libertie, appeared not so plain, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where hauing free see some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation, of finishing the long desired worke, that Cratesipolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyperchons sonne, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomee had concieued a vaine beleefe, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: where by with little labour, their libertie might bee gotten; and hee be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long feruitude had well-neare extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer reouer freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit thereof; but satte idely still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedemonians, about these times, beganne to fortifie their Towne with walls; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both ir, and the discipline that vpheld it, were too much impaired) that had bene a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

197 The Athenians were become as humble seruants, as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honor of Demetrius Phalerens, as there were dayes in their yeare. This Demetrius was now their Governour; and he gouerned them with much moderation: but in spite of their hearts, as being set ouer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Countrey stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them, to set their helping hands, to their owne good; and to furnish them with the promised supplies, of monie and victualls. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as judging the commoditie, that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the businesse, he changed his purpose; and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sigon and Carthibin in his owne possession.

20 Before the coming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had bene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warre among barbarous Princes) he found means to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellis; out: making his owne advantage, of their discontentments. By the like skillfull practise, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger: and made those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made so great a stirre in the raigne of Arsidam, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enter againe vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

30 The name of this yong Prince was Hercules: hee was begotten on Baryne, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had bene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother, had moued such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders only liuing child, had procured vnto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very iust and honorable. There were indeede more hearts then hands, that joynd with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him, that least ought, had not bene most fickle. Cassander had raised an Armie, to 40 withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceiued to be with Hercules. Therefore he assured Polyperchon himselfe, with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he prevailed so farre, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill, chooling rather with many curses, and fowle dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble name with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

X. Antigonus had not all this while bene a sleepe; though his losses were hitherto the chiefe witnesses, of his hauing bene a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of those places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieved him, to see Cassander incurre the generall hatred of men, by committing those murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him, that was the most powerfull: or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomie swcat, in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrells, he could well haue afforded them leisure, and haue thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking bigge vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused fo many of them, to revolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes, vpon that fortune, whereon their own shoulde haue depended. Against this entrie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedie, such as was like to giue him a goodly title, to the whole Empire. 16

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes, whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howeouer shee discovered much willingness thereunto, yet was shee in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsion: either because his fancy being an old man, was not ouer violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparent wrong. Shee had bene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death shee came to her brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with providing her of an husband. Shee therefore, being a luttie widow, suffered her bloud, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that shee supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Parramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: saying, that shee was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay, in a manner, void, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had bene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while shee her selfe desired only a proper man, with whom shee might lead a merie life. To this purpose did shee inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haste; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, shee had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomeus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wiues already, Ptolomeus had many wiues, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wiues, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindred not his sute: for hee had already obtained it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall tollerance. To him therefore shee bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iourne from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Antigonus had now a Woolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had bene the way, by which he might haue incurred a generall hatred, falling perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Ladie lesse respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouvernour of Sardes; willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischieuous conspirers, against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, we neede not aske: for seldome is that bloudie crime intenuated; and neuer so ill imobred, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the cruelty, of these powerfull, but mercedlesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were loone after cast downe, ouerwhelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequle will declare.

How Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, gaue libertie to Athenes, expelling the Garrison of Cassander. and of those parts. The moderate honors decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

One being left aliue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledged no Superior, should freely protest themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill beleemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbeare it: neither seemed it conuenient in the iudgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatness by that foule murder; the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plausible enterprise, euen the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honor as would not only downe all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of roialtie, wherof in seeking modestie, hee was not cometous. To this purpose, hee deliuered a strong Armie, with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and five thousand talents of siluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to beginne at Athenes, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athenes before he was expected: so that without resistance he entred the Hauens; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolome, Cassanders good friend, had bene arrived. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Pholereus forooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia stroue to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly streaine themselves, to the obseruance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Ladie Crateopolis lay in Pattos, and had a great desire to see Demetrius, hoping, belike, that the might, by his meanes, better her estate, and recouer her Townes of Sydon and Corinth, detained by Ptolome (to whose Lieutenants, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered monie for the surrender of them. Yet the only business he pretended was love. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrie of Megara, and taking a companie of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long iourne to meete with her. This troupe also, he caused to lodge a great way from his Tenth, that none might see her when shee came. As closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any termes of reason, by taking his deare lone prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly vpon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himselfe in a old cloake, and creepe away disguised; leaving them to ransack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medley of conditions; especially an extreme dissolutenesse in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industrie in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deuiling Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For aduersitie made his valour more actiue: prosperitie stupified him with an overweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he listed. His fortune was as changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till shee had wound vp the thread of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assault Munychia by force, that so hee might accomplish the libertie of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that scoured the walls, prevailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it and wanne the place in two daies. The walls, and all the defences of that peece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom without was given their libertie, with promise to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lower, than of any other victorie, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industrie. For the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: consering to bafe flatterie, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when hee centred their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of DEMETRIUS the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the Gods their Saviours, ordaining that every yeare, there should be chosen a Priest of these Gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the Gods; like as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a fruitlesse diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not only corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to be of no vse. For he could not handsomly take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse hee would seeme to approve their vanitie, in loading him with more than humane honours. Yet was he so tickled, with this their fine handling him, that when their Theodori, or Consulters, came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Come, and Timber to build ships; he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weak e is great power in resisting the assaults of flatterie.

§. XI.

The great victorie of DEMETRIUS against PTOLOMIE in Cyprus. How AN-TIGONVS and DEMETRIUS tooke upon them the stile of Kings; wherin others followed their example.

From this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a bulnesse of greater difficultie: meaning to imploy his seruice against Ptolomie in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed, 10 to establish a generall Counsaile; that should treat of matters, concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the same time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Melros, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands: whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other, to oppresse the Greekes, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased friends: it followed, that he should conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pittifull Tragedie had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Licutenant in that Isle. Nicoles, King of Pa-20 phos, was entred into some practise with Antigonus: yet not so farre that he thought him selfe past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps, the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicoles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to haue him yeelded to the death. Nicoles offered to clear himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that die he must, and bad him come forth quietly.
This desperate necessitie, caused the vnhappy King, to rid himselfe of life: and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that shee not only flew her selfe, but perswaded the wies of her husbands brethren, to doe the like. Alas those bre-30 thren of Nicoles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddainnesse of this calamitie, did shut vp the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Men-elaus deserued the blame, for his rigoros proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolomie: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cyprus did litle or nothing against him: either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter 40 indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves haue the rule of their owne Countrie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But hee was beaten, and drinen to saue himselfe within the walls of Salamis; where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour hee had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retain possession of the whole Island. His greatest helpe at the present, was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could winne from him, nor good vsage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to 50 keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution haue stood long, against the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not halted to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and fortie Gallies, besides two hundred ships

ships of burthen, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This fleet made a terrible shew, when it was delcied a farre; though more than halfe of it, was vnfit for seruice, an fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie sent vnto Demetrius, a threatening message: willing him to be gone, vnlesse he would be ouerwhelmed with multitudes, & trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant, repaid him, with words of as much brauerie, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sieyon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eightene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomie; better stord, with weapons fit for that seruice; and very well furnished with Engines in the prowes, to beat vpon the Enemie. Neuerthelesse he stood in great doubt, of threecore Gallies, that lay in the Hauen of Salamis, least Menelaus with them should set vpon his back: in which case, it was likely that all should goe very ill with him. Against this mischief, hee bestowed ten of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horse-men on the shore, to giue what assistance they could, he with the rest of his fleet, puts to Sea against Ptolomie.

The fight beganne early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull success. The Generalls were not ranged opposit one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleet. Each of them preuailed against the Squadron wherewith he encountered; but the success of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselves vnto speedie flight. As for Ptolomie, he was faine to leaue his aduantage vpon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relieue and animate those of his owne which needed him in another. Where in hee found his losse ouer-great, to be repaired, by contending any longer, against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to saue himselfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battaile, no vnusuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could haue beene expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-seruices, which the Greekes and Phantians, that were with Demetrius, had, about those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherin consisted no lesse, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manued. Further, we may reasonably iudge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carying the strength of Ptolomies Armie, did not more encourage his owne men and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight; than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight, they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vaine conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was vtterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Hauens; which they manfully performed, as great necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrarie, they that finde some part of their feares vaine, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceiue an opinion of their owne abilitie to doe more than they had thought vpon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

What focuser the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken, or sunke. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of Fortune; but yielded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelue thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, horic, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of Spirit, was found, in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had seduced the Egyptian by Land: none of them repoling any more confidence in Ptolome, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally beleueed, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Ile of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a yeare, till he were aduertised of the issue. In this moode Arisfodemus found him, a notable flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured, with the Message of these good newes. Arisfodemus had bethought himselfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: He caus'd his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very sadly that no part of his tidings, might appear in his countenance. Report of his arriuall (for it was knowne where he had bene) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be wonne from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and softly forward, with a great throng at his heeles (that seru'd well to set out his Pageant) vntill he came in sight of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Arisfodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voice salute Antigonus by the name of King; vttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pompe, as before he had couered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus, and to his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus in requitall of the long surlence, wherein Arisfodemus had held him, said that it should also be long ere he recieued his reward. But the title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his sonne.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long, ere their fellowes were readie to follow the good example. Ptolome his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected, for the losse of a fleet: therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head: Seleucus had, before this time, among the Barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now he vied the stile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented, with his owne name: whereby howsoeuer he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his crueltie, against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sonnes, after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill success, as will appear, when they shall enter vpon the Stage; whereon these old Tragidians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the same persons, beginne to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes alreadie past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the warres betweene the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedonia, Thrace, and others: vntill all ALEXANDERS Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of ANTIGONVS against Egypt, with ill successe.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as becoming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope, to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, hee resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand; when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eightene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with foure-score and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred ships of burden. The Land-forces he commanded in person: of the Nauie Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was readie for the iourne, the Sea-men aduised him, to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his haile desire, to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsaile; impuring it rather to their feare than skill. Wherefore he departed from Antigonias (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was soone changed into Seleucia, by his mortall Enemie) and came to Gaza; where hee met with his fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more haile hee made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie ten daies prouision of vittuals; and had many Camells loaden with all necessaries for passing the Deserts, ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Casius, which is neare adjoyning to Nilus, he saw his fleet, riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many ships wanting. It had beene sorely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driuen back to Gaza, or scattered else where into such creeks as they could recouer: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessells, did so long beat it vp againe the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremitie, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirstie, and Sea-beaten Souldiers receiued reliefe; After these painfull trauielles there followed a Warre no lesse painfull than to little purpose, for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to end the warre there, or if his guards should happen to be fort, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakening of the Assailants, as he should alterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertaine the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus sought was to come to blowes speedily, Ptolomie on the contrarie to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood hee had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers raised vpon the Riuer in vaine, Ptolemie assaied the faith of his Souldiers with good successe, for with great gifts, and greater promises, he scried them ouer so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemy, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolemie had turned him out of Egypt, ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments, but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt: had he not readily remoued his Armie further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already bene wonne from him. To prevent therefore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a fort retreat, hee secretly practiced the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burden must bee laid of his entrance, and leauing Egypt.

It is indeede lesse prejudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Copcellours and Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed than on the Director, for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vassall; Charles the first, as many other Princes haue done, laid the losse and dishonour he receiued in the inuasion of France, by the way of Province, to Antonie de Leua, whither justly or no, I know not; but howsoever all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof is rather a testimony of Certainty to giue any violent aduice in doubtfull enterprises, is rather a testimony of loue, than of wisdome, in the giuer; for the ill successe is alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue sometime knowne it that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, haue not only bene disswaded, but held in a kinde by strong hand, from hazarding their owne persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer bene called to a Marshalls Court.

¶ II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by DEMETRIVS.

His departure of Antigonus left behinde it many dead carkasses, and a great deale of joy in Egypt. Ptolemie held a solemne feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side with the report of this his late felicitie, though it appeared but in a defensiu warre. Antigonus on the contrarie flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the joyes of his enemies for witness of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare saucrs by the last bargain, and himselfe, as he supposed, hauing lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retreat. Howsoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fashion, for that which he could not cleaue a-sunder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he resolved (leauing the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be forst, either to relieue, or to loose; and hereby he doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and thereby a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed ships, by which it not onely beat off all Pyrates and pettie Theeves, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous time (in which they must eyther refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and a part, or joyne themselves to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Aegyptian, both becaufe the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, & neighbourhood was fearful vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettie iniuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while he made a more waightie preparation to pursue the warre against them openly and strongly. All things soone after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, he employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terrour vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance, and seruice against whomsoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this charge came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, and not by loue; raised his demands to an intollerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him and libertie to lodge in their Port as manie ships of warre as himselfe pleased: these conditions, more properly to be imposed vpon a State already conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodiens their lost courage, and made them resolute to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow Citizens, than to make themselves fellow slaues with them.

Demetrius hauing refused the faire conditions offered, and the Rhodiens the fearefull ones propounded them, makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of batterie; in the inuention and vse of which, he neuer shewed himselfe a greater Artisan, then in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults giuen them for a whole yeare, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they indured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreme, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Graecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and officers of the Citie.

Herunto Demetrius was brought by the vsual policie of warre, and state: for while, with the floure of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhades, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practise and surpris, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which hee himselfe led as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and indangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhades; then to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, then that the Rhodiens erected statues in honour of Lysimachus, and Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most reliefe, they consulted the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple that it must shortly looke) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe our into Asia, while himselfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellepont, beganne to make hot warre vpon the Subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyne with him, by faire means; winning others by force, and wasting the Countrie round about.

To repress this vnspected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastie journeyes, and came soone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to driue Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the comming of 10 Seleucus; keeping himselfe the whilest from necessitie of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to bee soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourne: which enforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus bene so froward, that hee refused to yeeld vnto any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neare with a mightie Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great 20 aide from Ptolomie, that was joyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obaid. Before his departure our of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driuen to leaue any part of his Armie for defence of the Countrie; and that his iourne might bee without any such blemish of reprobation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should bee at libertie. Cassander was glad to bee so rid of an Enemy, that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. 30 It sufficed, that for the present, euery one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuersie in Asia.

¶ IIII.

How ANTIGONVS was slaine in a great battaile at Ipsus, neare vnto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

SELEVCVS, with his Sonne Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferioriour to that of the Enemy. In greatness of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Ciuill) they were rather vnanswerable, than equall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had bene reputed a King indeede, when the rest were held but Virrupsers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, hauing giuen proofe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and enriched the Art of warre with many inuentions, which euen his enemies, & particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stolen away from him to saue his life; with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iourne; and Lysimachus, that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeilded to their opposites: yet so, that as 40 ancient ancient Captaines vnder Philip and Alexander; two of them were held worthie enough, to receiue any bencht that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope, wherof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the molt part hardie and well exercised: many of them hauing serued vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twentie yeares had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections; the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessitie of fighting, than the oblitinate qualitie of their Lord, that needs would be Master of all. Antigonus had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and three-score and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were sixe thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and a hundred and twentie armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had auailed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or preasing little good like to ensue, grew very pensiue, communing much in priuate with his sonne, whom he commended to the Arme as his Successor: whereas in former times he had neuer been so iocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had bene accustomed to make his sonne, or any other, priue to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoeing the fight, or afterwards deuised, I hold it needlesse to recount: Diana of Ephesus dwelt neare to the place of battaile, a bulie Goddesse in many great fights, and therefore likely to haue bene thrust into the scabb, if any matter, nearly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleene that these two so gallant Armies, contayning well neare all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthie Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much varietie, wherewith euery storie aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorabile things in the battaile, were these. Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when hee had broken, and put to flight, hee was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he neuer gaue ouer his pursute, but left his Father naked, and loit thereby both him, and the victorie. For when Seleucus perceived this aduantage, he enterposed his Elephants, betwene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus: and with many troupes of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wherofeuer it lay molt open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to reuolt from their Lord, whillt they were fairly inuited, than to sustaine the furie of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize, or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight: exposing their Generall to the last end of his delinies. Antigonus was then foure score yeare old, very fat and vnwieldie, so that hee was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. Hee had about liim some of his molt trustie followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceiued a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder companie meanes to charge you; he answered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon DEMETRIUS will releue vs. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his sonne should come to the rescue, hee receiued so many Darts into his body, that he tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearefull hopes, together with his troublefome life.

His great abilitie in matter of Armes, together with his insatiable desire of Empire, haue sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vsed insolence towards all a like, as if it had bene some vertue nearest representing a Kingly Majestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie forsooke him in his last necessitie. For those Kings and Princes that call all the careful inducours of their Vassalls, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest seruices: shall finde them selues vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is onely that staies by aduersitie) not only the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued; in part he leitt it to be verified vpon his son.

§. V.

How DEMETRIVS forsaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to SELEVCVS and PTOLOMIE, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entering into new quarrells.

Or Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to saue himselfe, with foure thousand horse, and five thousand foot, by a speedy retrait vnto Ephesus, whence hee made great haste towards Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremitie. But whilest he was in the middle of this course thither, the Athenian Embassadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admittid into their Citie. These were Embassadors, not Theori, or Consulers with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersitie despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauens, of which he now stood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall liue to teach them their old language, and speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships he sailed to the Issmus, where he found nothing but master of discomfort. His Garrisons were euery where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Arme and Fleet, without monie or meanes, wherewith to sustaine him and his followers, any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part, of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the word of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue. For to put himselfe into the field, on the side of Asia, hee had no power, and to inclose himselfe in any Towne, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate. Hee therefore creeping thorow those bulshes, that had fewest beiers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, whereof hee gaue all the spoile, that was gotten, to his Souldiers: his owne losses hauing bene too great, to be repayed againe by small prizes.

In the meane while, the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Prouinces, of which their late victorie had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage, by being present and Master of the field. For neither Ptolomie, nor Cassander, were at the overthrow giuen, hauing onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led: who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise diuided from his owne Territorie than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order bene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made only in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victory: at which, neuertheless others did repine, and though they neither could, nor durst, accuse him of ill dealing, for the present, yet seeing the over-greatness of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of state as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined: for he read it in the Law vniuersall of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselves of all vnprofitable passion: the hatred of each to other, and their ioues being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so farre too light, as Seleucus who had to day slaine Antigonus the father, and driuen Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow, how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storie of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so distempered, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though he were his wife) vnto him, and how his passion was discouered by his pulse; is generally noted by all Writers. But neyther did this alliance betwene Seleucus and Demetrius; betwene Ptolemie and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolemie; though for the present it brought one of them again into the rank of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betwene Christian Kings haue done in later times: namely betwene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, then those of the same later times haue beene, as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan, and others, the Reader may obserue: betwene whom from the yeare of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, ninetie and five, when Charles the eighth vndertook the Conquest of Reyles, to the yeare one thousand six hundred fiftie and eight, when Henrie the second died, the Histories of those times tell vs that all the bonds, cyther by the bed or by the booke, cyther by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit, by giuing his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recouered Cilicia from Phlitarchus, the brother of Cassander; who had gotten it as his share in the diuision of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to holde it by his proper forces, from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire; neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Consideracie he should haue done, against the common enemy. So Phlitarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Cassander; whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet, being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the same time he tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolemie (plurallitie of wiuces being familiar with these Macedonians; that had learned it in their Easterne conquests) and so was he by two marriages, rather freed from two enemies, then strengthened with two friends; for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise then might serue to aduance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolemie, could both of them haue beene contented better, that Demetrius with helpe of their countenance, should seek his fortune some what farther off, than settle his estate vnder their noses. Particularly Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe: and Ptolemie had a great appetite (wch yet he concealed a while) to the Isle of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine haue set his new father in law vpon the neck of Lysimachus, or whether hee were indeede greedy of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for readie monie,

his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keepe as much Land as hee could, having alreadie found in Cilicia twelue thousand talents of his fathers treasurie, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeas'd Seleucus, that in angrie termes hee demanded the Citie of Tyre and Sidon, to bee surrendered vnto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. In stead of giuing them vp, Demetrius tooke present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his sonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had alreadie taken more then well hee knew how to gouerne. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should haue found friends, out of enuie to the stronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius wanne the Citie of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vse the libertie, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyrannie of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempered Citie was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging furie. Hee brought against them all the force that he could wel spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any businesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprize in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But hee soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where hee wanne diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Countrie of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals; being also destitute of meanes to keepe such a Nauie, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolemie, who (trusting thereby to winne the loue of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie ships with corne, and sent them to releue the hungrie Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hastened them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come so neare, that they might be discrid. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Sonne did fight for a dead Mousie, which dropped downe betwene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadours to yeld vp the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victorie, did not only forbore to take away the liues of these vthankfull men; which they had submitted vnto his mercie;

mercie; but out of his liberalitie gaue them foode, and placed in Office among them such as were most acceptable to the people. Nevertheless hee was growne wiser then to trust them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bad him take their Hatens, and dispose of them at his pleasure, he was ready to lay hold vpon the word, and leaue a sure Garrison within their walls, to keepe them honest perforce: After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedaemonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibilitie to take their citie: when the dangerous news called him in all haste, of Lysimachus and Ptolomie, that preuailed faster vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lysimachus had wonne many Townes in Asia; Ptolomee had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were straightly besieged. While he was thinking himselfe which way to turne his forces, a notable peece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soone after him, Philip his eldest sonne, whose two yonger bretheren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Thebessalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder soane: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gaue a faire luitre to Alexander's cause: drawing the generallitie of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queenes death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his partie good without some forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius, who how they dealt with him, it will soone appere, in the following Tragedie, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had bene one that shifted well for himselfe, at such time as euery man sought how to get somewhat in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. Hee was cunning in practise, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. Hee deeply hated the memorie of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympius he had an hereditarie quarrell, derived from his Father, whom hee could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by crueltie, that hee vsed against his friends, both alie and dead, as it made him aduenture vpon shedding the Royall blood; wherewith, when once hee had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose liues hindered his purpose, argues him to haue bene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such crueltie being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a farre off the dangers, that may quietly passe away: and seekes to auoide them by base and wicked means, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympius and Roxane it may bee said, that they had well deserued the bloudie end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill befelmed that Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexander's children had by no law of men deserued, to die for the tyranie of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the diuine Iustice brought swords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the crueltie of this bloudie man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

ð. VII.

OF PYRRHVS and his doings in Macedon. The death of CASSANDERS children. DEMETRIVS gets the Kingdome of Macedon; preuailes in warre against the Greeks; Loseth reputation in his warre against PYRRHVS, and in his Ciuill Governement, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against DEMETRIVS. PYRRHVS and LYSIMACHVS invade him, his Armes yeelds to PYRRHVS, who spares the Kingdome of Macedon with LYSIMACHVS.

PYRRHVS, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Aetides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preferred, being a sucking Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosters had conueighed him to Glaucias, King of Ibryas; the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that hee reftored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeares of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeares, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went hee to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page; followed him a while in his wars; was with him in the great battaile of Issus, whence hee fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomie. In Egypt he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with morie men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recouered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that businesse betwene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that hee had no desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an halstie agreement, and diuided the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarmania, and much more of the Countrie, as the reward of his paines: leauing the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a fruitiuous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wife course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleued it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was cast and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder. Sculcing the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was builed in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby hee was compelled to secke peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grieuouly stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed, vntill his Father in law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troubletroublefome life. Thus in halte, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoid molestation, were flaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had flaine his owne Maisters children, in a wife course of policie, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was thoroughly fetled.

It might be thought, that such an accesse of Dominion, add'd much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmities; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Gouvernement: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the vfe and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King liked. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those that offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing iustice. He hath more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as fixe yeares raigne is long to him, that knows not how to raigne one yeare) he discoursed so much of his worst condition, as made both the people wearie of his idleness; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost, though more especially by hearing that Ptolemie had with great honor, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and wonne their Citie twice in short space, but vsed his victorie with mercie. Against Lysimachus he would haue done somewhat (the peace betwene them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this journey purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse succent. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon; which hee had indeede as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thessalie; but there needed not any handfome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough to ouer-runne his enemies Countre, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowen raw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he mist that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which he ouertrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, shewed in single combat against Pan-suchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of bodie, challenged this yong Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the liuely figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in weering Princely vestures: but (saie they) none, haue Pyrrhus, is like him indeed, in performing the office of a Captaine.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King; whom they began to disesteeme, no so much in regard of his vnprofitable journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countre, and brought home his Armie in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intollerable. His apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new fangled, but very vnmanly; and seruing chiefly, to be a daily witness, how much hee contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers lues hee was rechelesse: and suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of iustice; and (as it were, to publish vnto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) hauing by a shew of popularitie invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, hee led the poore suters after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, he threw all their writings into the Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courtes he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and invading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed: who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he beganne to haue some feeling of the generall hate, which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by letting them on worke in such an action, wherein his beitt qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to invade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, hee first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mightie Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse: with a Nauie of fise hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had bene scene before; yet so swift and veltull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyne against this ambitious sonne of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euet was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no securitie for his friends in Europe; what league soeuer were of old concluded. Therefore they resolued to beginne with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berberaa. The matter was not ouer-great: were it not, that mindes prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in vp-rore: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to vter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning in deede to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their owne Countreman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victorie against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that hee might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisedom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hallic as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armor, and other tokens whereby he might be knowne; as particularly, by a pair of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crett. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ranne ouer into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get light of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bare-headed in view of the camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arriual found a generall applausse, and every one began to looke out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their seruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and thist for himselfe.

himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attiring him selfe poorly, did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe: deseruing well this calamitie, whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behaviour deprivied him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessitie trumpet.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entrie, into the Kingdome of Macedonia; Lyfimachus came vpon him, very vnseasonably, and would needs haue halfe saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaines. The bargaine was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole, as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better oportunitie.

§. VIII.

How DEMETRIUS gathering forces, enterprised many things with all successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driuen vpon SELEVCVS, and compelled to yeeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

THE Athenians, were as vnthankfull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie, as they had beene in former times. For they presently forooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedonia to be their Patron. Demetrius, when hee went against Lyfimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie; though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Ladie) did poison her selfe, vpon desperate grieffe of his misfortune. The first, vpon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deserued it. Hee beganne to lay siege to their Towne: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they made their spokeman; and taking faire words instead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with eleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lyfimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines, that fell from Lyfimachus to him, with their companies, and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles, the sonne of Lyfimachus, came vpon him, with an Armie so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it. Wherefore, he resolved, to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuouly impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driuing him to take which waies he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes, Demetrius vanquished this troublefome enemy: neuertheless, hee could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore tributarie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the Riuier Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driuen to trauaile with such speede, as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrey; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his sonne in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pitie him in his great miserie. These letters, at the first wrought wel with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recovered strength after the battaile at Issus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore, mere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, rannto the enemie. T his notwithstanding hee still held out; and once had like to haue takn Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming beene discovered by fugitiues, that gaue the alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had forsaken him, and left him, with a few of his friends, to shift for himselfe: hee was compelled, by the last of those adherents (for euen some of those few forooke him) to yeeld vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence though otherwise hee would haue done as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a demie island, wherein were goodly walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his libertie was referred vnto the coming of yong Antiochus and Stratonice, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three yeares, liuing merrily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and blood-shed, hee had sought in vaine) and then died, leauing to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Cerinth; his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

The death of PTOLOMIE, of LYSIMACHVS, and of SELECVS, that was last of ALEXANDERS Captaines: with other occurrences.

About the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolemie King of Egypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee had, by many Wives and Concubines, many children: out of whom he selected Ptolemie Philadelphus, and caused him to raigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before hee died, that so hee might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolemie Ceramus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolemie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now onely two of Alexanders Captaines left; Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needes would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neare equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was, the murders which Lysimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathocles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons, after seven Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heat of admiration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countie man, that they forooke Pyrhus, vpon none other ground than because hee was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, what they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had reigned about about five yeares alone, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by euents, to haue foretiewed the fall of his house. His owne insolouie, and the intligation of a mother in law, caused him to poison his Sonne Agathetes, which drew vpon him that warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fiftene children, that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountered by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within feuen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellowes, by a bloudie death: being treacherously slaine by Ptolemie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had bene. Seuentie and feuen yeare old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had sene the daies, as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them, in the Art of warre: euen Pyrrhus the Epirus, of whom we spake before; that is now readie to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of TULLVS HOSTILIVS, vnto such time as they were assailed by PYRRHVS.

40 O Rome was founded by Romulus; setled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the raigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath bene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse, beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue bene deliuered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullius Hostilius (who when hee had reigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchild to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the Citie about, enlarged it with the hill Aventine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tyberis, and the Citie of Ostia vpon the Sea, sixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twentie yeares, he died, and by his last will hee left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who auoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinijs, by the name of which Towne hee was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tauaquilis prophetic, he grew a fauourite of Ancus Martius; by his Gracian wit humoring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his deceale, he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he preuailed often against the Tuscanes, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall.

When this Lucius Tarchinius had reigned eight and thirtie yeares, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had beene left Guardian. But Tauaquilis his wife, perceiuing what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sickness, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophecied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculenus and Oerisia, a well defended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supplie her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recouerie: which gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good sort, as if it had bene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Prisons, Sextus and Aruns, which had bene committed to his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it happened; the two milde ones being made away, the furious matuers were readily joynd in marriage: who soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, beganne to lay claime to the Kingdom. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius halting to the Senate, (where he thought by authoritie to haue bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home fore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had reigned fortie and foure yeares. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquinius, exercising crueltie without iustice, and tyrannic without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vied the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Ostium, Suessa Pometia, and the Gabij. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heate of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarchinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatinus wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne blood; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinas, her husband Collatine, and Junius Brutus) she she killed her selfe: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depofed and banished; and fled to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the hue and twentieth yeare of his raigue, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie: in which space Rome had scarce gotten full poffeffion of fittene miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his countrey from that heauie yoke of bondage, intorced the people by folemne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ranked their Kings goods, conſecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But becauſe the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a ſingle gouernour to a double; left perpetuall or ſole dominion might be ſome motiue to vſurpation; and in ſtead of Kings they called them Conſuls, ſignifying, as it may be interpreted, Prouiders: that their titles might remembre them of their place, which was to be alwayes mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it ſo hard ſellina of troubled waters, that the people after this innouation of State, ſcarce daring to aſſure themſelues of their owne ſecuritie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reſigne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie would be hereditarie, and ſuppoſing that the very name and affinity with the houſe of Tarquins, fauoured alreadie of their condition. In his room was ſubſtituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gaue libertie, in matters of controuerie, to appeale from the Conſuls to the people: and that he might as well in goods as in perſon, auoyde occaſion of ſuſpicion, cauſed his owne houſe to be pulled downe, becauſe it was built in a place defendible, as if it had bene a Citadell. Neyther was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment, which concerned as well the peoples ſaſtete, as their fauour: for hauing got intelligence, that ſome greener wits, and in the firſt ranke his owne ſonnes, were citching after innouations, hoping to reſtore the banished Kings; he cauſed them, publickly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romanes, hauing by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, well appeared all in bred quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their militarie deſignements, againſt Forainers; firſt, for their libertie; ſecondly, for enlarging of their poſſeſſions, and laſtly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome ſituated as it were in the mid-way betweene Latium and the Tuſcans, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, cannot but giue occaſion of offence to her neighbours; vntill by maine oppoſition, hauing preuailed againſt her borders, ſhee vſed them as inſtruments, whereby to obtaine the reſt.

Their firſt warre in the firſt yeare of Conſuls, was againſt Porfenna King of Hetruria, who being ouer-perſwaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to ſeate him againe in his Kingdome.
