THE PREFACE.

How unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to undertake a worke of this mixture; mine owne reason, though exceeding weake, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it bene begotten then with my first dawne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my younger yeares: and before any wound receiued, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well haue doubted, that the darkenesse of Age and Death would haue couered ouer both It and Mee, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation: I haue proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few allies excepted) to confine my discourse, within this our renowned Island of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are runne out in other trauailes; to haue set together (as I could) the vnioyned, and scattered frame of our English affaires, than of the vniuersall: in whome had there bene no other defect, (who am all defect) then the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawne on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soule-peircing wounds, which are euuering while vncured, with the desire of satisfie those few friends, which I haue tried by the fire of aduersitie; the former enforcing, the latter perswading; haue caused mee to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the Subiect of euery opinion wise or weake.

To the world I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) spied much better in any age. For, Prosperity and Aduersity haue euermore tied and vntied vulgar affections. And as we see it in experience, That dogs doe alwaies barked at those they know not; and that it is in their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so is it with the inconsiderate multitude. Who, wanting th' virtue which we call Honesty in all men, and that special gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne, without hearing, and wound, without offence giuen: led there-vnto by vncertaine report only; which his Maiesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou haue inquired the matter: vnderstand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, fine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witness, without iudge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave Sr. Augustine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the euill. And herein no man hath given a better rule, then this of Seneca; Conscientia: satisfaciemus: nihil in famam laboremus; sequatur vèl mala, dum bene merearis. Let vs satisfie our owne consciences, and not trouble our selues with fame: be it neuer so ill, it is to be despised so we deserue well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prized it before my priuate: the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time, than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack; and the contrary no other harme than an outrageous tempest after the port attained. I know that I lost the loue of many, for my fidelity to wardes Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further than the defence of Her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it: He that is the Supream Iudge of all the world, hath taken the account; so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath bene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne misshap in that kind; but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars.

To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauaile the world without a passeport. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensue vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giuing life which GOD hath cast vpon Slime and Dust: as that among those that were, of whom we reade and heare, and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; euery one hath receiued a severall picture of face, and euery one a diuers picture of minde: euery one a forme apere, euery one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing where-in Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diuersity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall and unnatural; wise, foolish; manly, and childish affections, and passions in Mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased GOD, to reserue the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe: yet, as the fruit tels the name of the Tree; so doe the ourward workes of men (so farre as their cogitations are acted) give vs whereof to guesse at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, every neare the life: did not craft in many, feare in the most, and the worlds loue in all, reach euery capacity, according to the compassse it hath, so qualifie and make ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam recidunt, quibus veritas non subest. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeite behauiour: the things that are forced for pretences, hauing no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their owne natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may be sometime seene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus, The common people are euill Iudges of honest things, and whose iudgeme (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised; if to the better sort; euery vnderstanding hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both censurcth other men, and valueth it selfe. And therefore vnto mee it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worthy lesse papers torne with Rats: seeing the stouishfull Censurers of all ages, haue not spared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with ruaine-glorie. But of these nature. Eccle. 11. quæ sunt facilius, quæque reperitur de re alium. quæ sunt facilius, quæque reperitur de re alium. Salomon complained long since: and that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malicious; I must leave the professors to their easie waies of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility. Et aliorum non in fine sunt, nisi in fine tantum. 65

To me it belongs in the first part of this praeface, following the common and approved custome of those who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens wordes; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath bene honored; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world it selfe had life and beginning euen to this day: yet it hath triumphed ouer time, which besides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast & deuouring space of so many thousands of yeares, and giuen so faire and piercing eyes to our minde; that we plainly behold living now, as if we had liued then, that great World, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wife worke (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it I say it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and againe repeopled: How Kings and Kingdomes haue flourish'd and fallen; and for what vertue and piety GOD made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity be made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkenesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-past miseries, with our owne like errors and ill deseruings. 608

But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instructions, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of GOD doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of GOD doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalities, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that Heathen wisdom confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true GOD. If any (saith Eurypides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the euertlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with his mercies; would require a volume a part: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome. The markes, set on priuate men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS iudgements vpon the greater and greatest, haue bene left to posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to poynt farre off, and to speake of the conuersion of Angells in a Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gnawne the graspe of the earth with beasts, for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharao, when he slue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in couering the Murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse prooffe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloodshed, and cruelty 612 cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make them-selves and their issues maisters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, no fruit, flower, grasse, nor lease, springing vpon the face of the Earth, of those seedes: No; their very roots and ruines doe hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel stando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturnd by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes and States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and forraine force, or by inward negligence and dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest haue sunck downe vnder their owne weight; of which Liuie hath a touch: eo creuit, vt magnitudine labore sua: Others, That the diuine providence (which Craippus obiected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to reioiue.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, haue undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take far-off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath bene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the successe of infidelitie, iniustice, and crueltye; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patternne.

True it is that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred copp a-like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne priuate; Or otherwise best sueth with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vouchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long processe of time, and wou to giue his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will bee able to discern the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident proofe, than by asseueration, That ill doing hath alwaies bene attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

The Preface.

2b Among our Kings of the Norman race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods iustice, upon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft, and cruelty, hee had dispossest, over-reacht, and lastly made blind and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sommes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with a boue a hundred and sistie others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearely beloved.

14 1038 22 That after the Murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out; and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more then suspitions; yet in that hee afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whome the Earle as then supposed to beeliuing; (the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeede treason in him-selfe, had his Vncles intelligence beene true) this I say made it manifest, that hee was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

23 This cruelly the secret and vnssearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged, on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, even to the last of that Line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsailours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwaies tooke him-selfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought them-selues as great politicians in those daies, as others haue done in these; hoping to please the King, and to secure them-selues, by the Murder of Gloucester, died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King him-selfe (who in regard of many decedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot bee excused, as the dissauiuing him-selfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons, and Patents) He was in the Prime of his youth deposed; and murdered by his Cosen-germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster; afterwards Henry the fourth.

This

The Preface.

This King, whose Title was weake, and his obtaining the Crowne traitorous: who brake Faith with the Lordes at his landing, protesting to intend only the recouerie of his proper Inheritance; brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake Faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should liue. After that he had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set upon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies and rebellions: he saw (if Soules immortal see and discern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-childe Henrie the sixt, and his Sonne the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crowne (for which he had caused so much blood to be powred out) transferred from his race; and by the Issues of his Enemies worne and enioyed: Enemies, whom by his owne practise hee supposed, that he had left no lesse powerlesse, than the succession of the Kingdome questionlesse; by entailing the same upon his owne Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no otherwise, but that these cautious prouisions of the Father, seconded by the valour and signall victories of his Sonne Henry the fift, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the despaire of al reconquest and recouery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Calaubon also true; Dies, hora, momentum, euetendū dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatā; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henrie the sixt, vpon whom the great storme of his Grand-fathers greuous faults fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-childe of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince; yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom hee was affianced (by which match hee might haue defended his Inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that hee had in France) so as in condescending to the unworthy death of his Vnckle of Glocester, the maine and strong pillar of the house of Lancaster; Hee drew on himselfe and this kingdome the greatest ioynt-losse & dishonor, that euer it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his owne spake of Henrie the Third of France, Quil estoit vn fort gentil Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vn fort mauuois temps, That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reign happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolke were the practisers and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolke, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queen had bin absolute; the Queen, in respect of her personall wound, spreteque in iuria formā; forma, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the successe to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up so fast, as hee dared to dispute his right, both by arguments and armes; in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke; yet his sonne the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoyled Henry the Father, and Edward, the sonne, both of their liues and Kingdomes. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other then this, That shee liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that shee liued to looke on, while her Husband the King, and her onely sonne the Prince, were heuen in sunder, while the Crowne was set on his head that did it. Shee liued to see her selfe despoiled of her Estate, and of her moueables: and lastly, her Father, by rendring up to the Crowne of France the Earledome of Prouence and other places, for the payment of Fifty thousand crownes for her ransome, to become a starke beggar. And this was the end of that subtritive, which Siraicides calleth fine, but vnrighteous: for other fruit hath it neuer yielded since the world was.

And now came it to Edward the fourth his turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For alle the Plants of Lancaster were rooted vpp; One onely Earle of Richmond excepted: whome also hee had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a plankaton, as could any way promise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragical Actors, there was not one that escaped the iudgement of GOD in the same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother of Clarence, for none other offence then hee him-selfe had formed in his owne imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his predecessour; taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sonnes and Successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings, which haue sold the blood of others at a low rate; haue but made the Market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Maister in mischeife of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedie, hee had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, then all the rest; yet hee so well fitted euery affection that playd with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For hee wrought so cunningly vpon the affections of Hastings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred: as hee easily erciſe that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on euery poſt, namely, To depreſſe thoſe whom they had grieued, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſſed; Hee urged that argument ſo farre and ſo forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young king himſelfe, and of his brother, could ſuſhion the concluſion. For hee cauſed it to be hammered into Buckinghamſ head, That, whenſoeuer the king, or his brother, ſhould haue ab'e yeares to exerciſe

*But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his Maſters ſommes was without ſuſpect; and yet the Diuell, who neuer hee found by Caſesby, who ſounded him, that he was not for dable; He firſt becauſe nothing elſe could moue his appetize; He cauſed his head to be ſtricken vpon Haſtings; I haue neuer obſerued in any ſtorie. For the ſelfe ſame daie that the Earle Riuet, Grey, and others, were (without triall of Law, or offence giuen) by Haſtings aduice executed at Pomfret: I ſay Haſtings himſelfe in the ſame daie, and (as I take it) in the ſame boure, in the ſame law leſſe manner had his head ſtricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham liued a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perſwaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king.

 And hauing received the Earldome of Hereford for reward, beſides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely ſonne; after many grie-uous vexations of minde, and vnfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and deliuered vpon by his trueſt ſeruants; Hee had his head ſeuered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what ſucceſſe had Richard himſelfe after all theſe miſchiefes and Murders, policies, and counter-policies to Chriſtian religion; and after ſuch time, as with a moſt mercileſſe hand hee had preſſed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the proſperity of ſo ſhort a life, as it tooke end, ere him-

The Preface.

if euer there were any, and who by the ingine of his wisdom, beat downe and overturned as many strong oppositions both before and after hee ware the crowne as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he euer left the raines of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies wayed his vndertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. Hee had well obserued the proceedings of Loys the eleuenth, whome hee followed in all that was royall or royal-like, but hee was farre more iust, and began not their processs whome hee hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

Hee could neuer indure any mediation in rewarding his seruants, and therein exceeding wise, for what so euer him-selfe gaue, hee him-selfe receiued backe the thanks and the loue, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so reddely as by benefitts) were traynes that better became great Kings, than great subiects. On the contrary, in what so euer hee greued his subiects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How-so-euer, the taking off, of Stanles head, who set the Crowne on his, and the death of the young Earle of Warwick, sonne to George D. of Clarence, shews, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancesters, for his possession in the first line ended in his grand children, as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and Patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did hee aduance in hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gaue hee abundant flowres from whence to gather hony, and in the end of Harvest burnt them in the Hie? How many viues did hee cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whome our common Chronicles haue kept the accompt) did he execute? Yea, in his very death-bed, and when hee was at the point to haue given his accompt to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father, and executed the Earle of Surrey the sonne, the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, hauing neuer omitted any thing that concerned his owne honour, and the Kings seruice; the other, neuer hauing committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised; the other, no lesse valiant than learned; and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which hee heaped vpon the Fatherlesse, and widowes at home: and besides the vaine enterprises abroade, wherein it is thought that hee consumed more Treasure, than all our victorious Kings

The Preface.

Kings did in their severall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell warres did he make upon his owne Nephew King James the first? What Lawes and Wills did he devise, to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same roote that him-selfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased GOD to take away all his owne, without increase; though, for themselves in their severall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these wordes of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, haue bene verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse: so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen vpon in the North, GOD hath diffused by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discern in His life, euen to this daie, any one of those foule parts, by which the Consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-went him, haue stayned both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England; it may truly be avowed, That he hath received it euen from the hand of GOD, and hath stayed the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: That Hee neuer tooke reuenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That Hee refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Princeesse did, That His Maiesty entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open; and into which, by a generall loue and Obedience, Hee was received. And howsoever His Maiesties preceding title to this Kingdome, was preferred by many Princes (witnesseth the Treaty at Cambrai in the yeare, 1559) yet he neuer pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady, his Pradecessor; no, notwithstanding the iniury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long reigne.

Neither ought wee to forget, or neglect our thankfulnessse to GOD for the remitting of the Northerne parts of Brittain to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were severed but by small brookes and banks, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiesty hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty grieuances together, and heap them vpon their height, they will appeare but as a Mole-hil, compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since to acknowledge the coming of the Red-Rose, and the White, & the happiness, (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from GOD, certainly the peace betwixt the two Lyons of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our british blood, heretofore and during the difference so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdom more enabled to recover her antient honor and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies and conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588, ioyned the army which bee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; and had his Maiesty at the same time declared himselfe against vs in the north: it is eafse to divine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue bought this vnion at a farre greater price than it hath since cost vs.

It is true, that there was neuer any Common-wealth or Kingdome in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings liue in the world and not about it. They are not infinite to examine euery mans cause, or to re-leiuie euery mans wants. And yet in the latter, (though to his owne preiudice) His Maiesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his owne Cooffers. Of whom it may be said, as of Salomon; Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem Cordis: Which if other men doe not vnderstand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it bee better spoken of His Maiesty, than of any King that euer England had; who as well in Diuine, as Humane vnderstanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Maiesty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption, and will suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters; which by her owne Commandement, were knockt in peece and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the externall; and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; doe often leaue to posterity, of well-formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and Princely minds, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needes no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I haue inserted this breife discourse) with His Maiesties temperate, reuengelesse, and liberall disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them iustly, and with an euen hand: and will but bestow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He shall finde, that there is no man which hath so iust cause to complaine, as the King him selfe hath.

The Preface.

Now as we haue told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that GOD is euery where the same GOD. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation, and unnatural cruelty of Henry the first, and of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt He with the sonnes of Loys Debonaire, the sonne of Charles the great, or Charlemain. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the sonne of Pepin, the eldest sonne of Charlemain, and heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his elder brother: there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poysonings, imprisonments, and ciuill warre: till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished.

And though Debonaire, after he had rid himselfe of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his Bastard Brothers by a ciuill death (hauing inclosed them with sure guard, all the daies of their liues, within a Monastery) held himselfe secure from all opposition: Yet GOD raised up against him (which hee suspected not) his owne sonnes, to reuenge him, to inuade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his owne sonnes, with whome (to satysfie their ambition) hee had shared his estate, and giuen them Crownes to weare, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Te is his eldest sonne Lothaire (for hee had foure, three by his first wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, That he had vsed violence towards his Brothers and Kinsmen, and that he had suffered his Nephew (whome hee might haue deliuered) to be slaine, eo quod, saith the Text, fratricibus et propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permiserit. Because hee vsed violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, and suffered his Nephew to be slaine whom he might haue deliuered.

Yet did hee that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his crueltie. For among many other things, which hee performed in the Generall Assemblies of the States, it follows, Post hæc autem palam le eraticæ confellus, et imitatus Imperatoris Theodosij exemplum, penitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this hee did openly confesse him-selfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius: hee vnderwent voluntary penance as, well for his other offences, as for that which hee had done against Bernard his owne Nephew.

787 This hee did: and it was praise-worthy. But the blood that is vniustly spilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead; haue but dead rewards.

The Preface.

This King, as I have said, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the Kingdome of Italy; as Charlemain, his Father, had done to Pepin the Father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second sonne he gave the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bauier: and to Charles, whome hee had by a second wife, called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this second wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his sonne Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles: which, after the death of his sonne Pepin, he prosecuted to effect, against his Grandchild, bearing the same name. In the meane while, being invaded by his sonne Loys of Bauier, he dies for greife.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bauier, and Charles afterwards called the bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioyne in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight neare to Auxerre the most bloody battaile that ever was stroken in France: in which, the maruelous losse of Nobility, and men of warre, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italie; to the Hunnes, to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes, to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster, Carloman rebels against his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eyes of his sonne Carloman; Bauire invades the Emperour Lothaire his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is assailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conscience, for his rebellion against his Father and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monestrie. Charles the Bald the Vncle oppresseth his Nephewes the Sonnes of Lothaire, hee surpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loys of Bauire his elder Brother, Bauiers armies and his sonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of greife, and the Usurper Charles is poisoned by Zedechias a Iew his Physitian, his sonne Loys le Beque dies of the same drinke. Beque had Charles the simple, and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breakes his Neck, the younger is slaine by a wild Bore; the sonne of Bauiere had the same ill destiny and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grolle becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie, wherewith not contented, hee invades Charles the simple, but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding, hee dies a distracted begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the prison of Peron: Loys the sonne of Charles the simple breakes his Neck in Chasing a Wolfe, and of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poison, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whome Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French, makes him-selfe King.

The Preface.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after hee had once apparelled iustice with authority, his somes and successors tooke vpon the fashjon; and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torne from their shoulders, euery man despised them as miserable and naked beggers. The wretched successe they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, que en ceste mort il y auoir plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iustice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit of Bernard the sonne of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling, than either GOD, or Iustice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fact) that euer the French-men had, did neuer enjoy him selfe; after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were there vpon burnt, and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true, that the said King Francis repented him selfe of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his sonne, to doe iustice vpon the Murderers; threatening his sonne with GODS iudgments, if he neglected it. But this vnreasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry him selfe was slaine in sport by Montgomerie; we all may remember what became of his foure somes, Francis Châres, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres, vpon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood; the Crowne was set on his head, whome they all laboured to dissolue; the Protestants remaine more in number than euer they were; and hold to this day more strong cities than euer they had.

Let vs now see if GOD be not the same GOD in Spaine, as in England and France. Towards whome we wil looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicill, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowich of Moscouia, were but pettie ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, hauing bene the most mercifesse. For besides those of his owne blood and Nobility which hee caused to be slaine in his owne Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Maister of Calatraua, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whome hee cutt in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: If say besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great commander of Castile; Hee made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousen-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuges de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, de Toledo, Guttiere his great Treasurer, and all his Kinred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whome after hee had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had liued sixteene yeares, and the other foure: ent; hee murdered them there. Nay hee spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly as hee caused the Arch-bishop of Toledo, and the Deane, to be killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did hee put to death Mahomer Aben Alhamar King of Barbatie, with seauen and thirty of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of mony, to leuy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne with him: Tea he would needs assist the Hangm, in with his wne hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declared him an enemy both to GOD and Mm. But what was his end? Having beene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Altramara, who dispossess all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer beene in danger of any such thing.

If we can paralllel any man with this King, it must be Duk: Iohn of Bur. oigne: who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Prè He got of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accomps, Treasury, and Request, (with sixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while hee hoped to gouerne, and to haue maistr'd France: Hee was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie found them out.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten therevnto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre; and, contrary to faith, and the promise that hee made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted therest, as there was no means left for any army to invade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick

The Preface.

Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tied vnto him; sold them to the French; and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonfaluco, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whome afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heaven and his owne Honour, to make his sonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world: saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with child, with her vtimately birth, at once and together buried. His eldest daughter married vnto Don Alphonso Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his neck in her presence; and being with child by her second, died with it. A iust iudgement of GOD vpon the race of Iohn, father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine, with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comforte of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Duchesse of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned foole; and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eighth, hee saw cast off by the King; the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a Daughter, that in her vnhappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood; lost Callice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maisters of a new name; and, by a strange familie are governed and possesst.

Charles the fifth, sonne to the Arch-duke Philip, in whose vaine enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Alman, and other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Captaines, were consumed: who gaue the while a most perilous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes the Key of Christendome, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Metz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire; stole away from Insprug; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to swallow vp all those dominions, wherein hee conckted nothing saue his owne disgraces. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in either: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Prisoner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip; from whom he very slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

His Sonne againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zeland (wrested by his Ancestors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princess) and to possesse in peace manie other Provinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischeiuous Cardinal of Granuile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobility of those countries; nor only forgot the present, made him upon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor only forgot, that hee had twice most solemnly sworne to the Generall states, to maintaine and preserve their aucient rights, priuiledges, and customes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and five Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of those Prouin-ces: but beginning first to constraime them, and entr'all them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new deuised and intollerable Impositions; He lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make him-selfe not onely an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, to tread vnder his foete all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a dispensation of his former Oathes (which dispensation was the true cause of all the ware and bloodshed since then) and after he had tried what hee could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobility, vnder the government of his basefester Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinal Granuile; Hee employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations:

 by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gaure; and Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, and the Marquis of Bergues; and cut off in those sixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen and others, eigheteene thousand and sixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders and massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished endes, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: Hee sent for govern-our his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, and every gracious to those people. But hee, vsing the same papall aduantage that his predecessors had done: made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the generall states; and to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other strangers, therein garrisoned. Towards whose Pay and Passport, the Netherlands strained them-selves to make payment of sixe hundred thousand pounds. Which monies received, He suddenly surpris'd the Citadells of Antwerp and Nemeures: not doubting (being vn suspected by the States) to haue possess'd him-selfe of all the maijstring places of those Prouinces. For whatsoeuer hee ouerly pretended: Hez held in secret a contrary councill with the Secretary Escouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others; Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practised, and now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect and end of this perurie, and of all other the Dukes cruelties. First for him-selfe; after hee had murdered so many of the Nobilitie; executed (as a foresaid) eigheteene thousand sixe hundred in sixe yeares; and most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Childe, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after hee had consumed fixe and thirtie millions of treasure in sixe yeares: notwithstanding his Spanisb want, That hee would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter, barrels, and milke-tubbs: Hee departed the country no other wise accompnied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation; leaving his Masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at his first arrivall. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceits of him selfe over-came the greatest difficulties; though his indignities were over-weak to manage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers ielousie and distrust; with the untimely death that seized him, even in the flowre of his youth. And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Maister both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine upon some new project, He was at the first arrivall, and before any access to the King, by certaine Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if wee consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, and success in this busynesse; there is nothing left to the memorie of man more remarkable. For hee hath paid about an hundred Millions, and the lives of about foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countreys; which, for beauty, gave place to none; and for reuenuē, did equal his West Indies: for the losse of a Nation, which most willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despite of all his forces become free Estates, and farre more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first began to impouerish and oppresse them.

Ob by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisoninges and under what reasons of State, and politique subteltie, have these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seene an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties; as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselves; and the other neuer haue succeeded: if no such opposition had euer bene made. GOD hath said it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead; seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wises of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer, or at least we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for.

The Preface.

For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or persuade our selues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so wee neither looke behind vs what hath bene, nor before vs what shall bee. It is true, that the quantitie which wee haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and wee inhabit it. The Heauens are high, far off and vnsearchable: wee haue sense and feeling of corporal things, and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to bee wondered at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost rouchsafed to inhabit, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Esai cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleueed our reports? And out of doubt, as Esai complained then for him selfe and others: so are they lesse beleueed, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, bee in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idolls of vanitie: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? Wee professe that wee know GOD: but by wordes we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Deuills know them better than men. Beatitudo non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to bee admired, and more to bee lamented, than the priuat contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall warre, massacres and murders, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well neare driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not some resolute, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestiall habitation: when on the contrary, besides the discourse & outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. Wee are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voice, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues wee renounce our Persons, and the parts wee play. For Charitie, Iustice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defined to be the Schoole-mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that wee giue it our good word, but the same which is altogether exercised in the seruice of the World, as the gathering of riches & ebeisty, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it.

The Preface.

Fortune from the Man; a base groome beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall libertie.

The second, is the greating of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whome wee leaue behind vs. Certainly, of those which conceiue that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re sulta. For when our spirits immortall shalbe once seperate from our mortall bodies, and disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their puerie, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vp a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui etiam eorum filij quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuientium non interfut: The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the foules of those departed, are not conuerfant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Augustine, wee cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shalbe honorable: neither shall wee vnderstand concerning them, whether they shalbe of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confermeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth him-himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (saith hee) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all. for who can shew vnto man, what shalbe after him vnder the Sunne? Hee therefore accompted it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and trauaile in the world; not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise mansould enioy the fruits thereof: which made mee (saith hee) endeauour euen to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death GOD hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope; seeing the Prophet Esai confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Israel knowes vs not. But hereof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death: (of whose following day we shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall cover vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when wee shall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy nor any returne of foregone and mortall affection, towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whome whether wee shall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; If a diuine life retaine any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; wee shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No; but their estates greater than ever the World gave, wee shall (by the difference knowne unto vs) even detest their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charitie, which we exercised living: and in that Pietie, Justice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of GOD to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnnecessarie and ruaine? certaintie no. For that infinite wisdomme of GOD, which hath distinguished his Angells by degrees: which hath given greater and lesse light, and beautie, to Heavenly bodies: which hath made differences betweene beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the flie, the Cedar and the Shrub: and among stones, given the fairest tincture to the Rubie, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrats, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posteritie, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Begerie: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pittie; I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Provided, that worldly goods bee well gotten, and that wee raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodilie health; secondly, the forme and beautie; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quaxitas: so Hieremie cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equitie: and Esai the same, Woe to those that spoyle and were not spoyled. And it was out of the true wisdomme of Salomon, that hee commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for bloud; and not to swallow them vp aliue, whose riches wee couet: for such are the wages (saith hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if wee could afford our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that hee which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past when wee were not, or by that time which is to come in which wee shall abide for euer: I say, if both, to wit our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that wee so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdomme, as hee pleaseth. Let the rich-

The Preface.

Rich man thinke all fooles, that cannot equal his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not troden downe their opposites; the Politician, all grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when wee once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds driue vs; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Navigation of this life takes end: Then it is I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad and seuerer cogitations, formerly beaten from vs by our Health and Felicitie) returne againe, and pay vs to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that wee crye out to GOD for mercie; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty towards others: and it is onely then, that wee are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That GOD will not be mockt. For if according to Saint Peter, The righteous scarcely bee saued; and that GOD spared not his Angells: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuerer commandments of the All-powerfull GOD were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which wee draw when death presseth vs, if wee can but feign it to the sound of Mercy (without any kinde of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reuerend Father, Cum hac spe ad eternos labores & bella descendunt: I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended well: for wee all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall wee call a disesteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of GOD; if those men doe not appoynt him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for GOD, to aske him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they other-wise, that die this kinde of well-dying, but say vnto GOD as followeth? Wee beseech thee O GOD, that all the fallhoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to doe any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to bee a just GOD; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall prauidice my sonne (which I am resolved not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue bene vniust (which I am too proud to doe) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new GOD; or haue made One: and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth wore in his Cappe, which, when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, hee would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) hee did; when by the practise of a Cardinall and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be used towards a Leaden, but not towards the ever-living GOD. But of this composition are all the devout lovers of the world, that they feare all that is drelesse and ridiculous: they feare the pious and practises of their opposites, and their very whisperings. they feare the opinions of men which beat but upon shadows: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they dine under water, like Ducks, at every pebble stone, that's but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour, against the terrible iudgements of the All-powerfull GOD: yea they shew themselves gods against GOD, and slaves towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If wee truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit of the rich and mighty, whome wee call fortunate; and of the poore and oppressed, whome wee account wretched: wee shall finde the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by GOD to the very instant, and both so subiect to interchange (witness the suddaine downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy rising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that hee may be deprived of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vespere, in certum est, What the evening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet wee cannot tell (saith Saint Iames) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set vp, and to morrow hee shall not be found: for hee is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersitie, be very obscure: yet therein wee better discern GOD, than in that shining light which environeth worldly glorie; through which, for the clearnesse thereof, there is no vnicie which escapeth our sight. And let aduersitie seeme what it will; to happie men, ridiculous, who make themselves marrie at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the crosse, greivous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For bee it that wee haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all wee haue reioyced; or bee it that wee haue measured the same length of daies, and therein haue ever more sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, we find both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the woe, sayled out of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs and bold vs in chase, from our infancie, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro est, mors tenet: What-so-euer of our age is past, death holds it. So as who-so-euer hee bee, to whome Fortune hath bene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for wee haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truely examine what it hath reuered, either of beauty and youth, or foregone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of what euer else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then vnualueable; and hee shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heauienesse, secret, and sad sighes. Hee shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow vp after our fast-springing youth; ouer-take it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it utterly, when it beginnes to wither: in so much as looking backe from the very instant time, and from our now being; the poore, diseased, and captiue creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and paines; as hee, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures and delights. For what-so-euer is cast behind vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, deceiuefull hope hath it. Omnia quæ euentura sunt, incerto iacent. Onely those few black Swames I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memorie of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glorie.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first wee complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu iustus es in omnibus quæ uenit super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if hee had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs, hauing had them; forgetting that humble and iust acknowledgment of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt hee is either a foole or vngeneratfull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane so-euer his estate bee, that the same is yet farre greater, than that which GOD oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe so-euer his afflictions bee, that the same are yet farre lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi; the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, and beare them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them man-like, and resolutely; as not as those whining souldiours doe, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorē.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, and appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not in their distribution, benee partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger, a begger begging water of an Enemy, marrailed at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seing Aristotle hath sayled in this maine poynt, and taughte liie other than termes in the rest) have so retrenche their mindes from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected them-selues to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to bee such? certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in every question of Nature, and finite power, may bee approued for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his Booke of Wisdoms, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'authorite que l'autre, si la raison n'on fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equall authoritie, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the upright and vnpartiall iudgment of man give a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Laetantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine vllio iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any iudgment approue the inuention of those that fore-went them; and suffer them-selues, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which sloth and dullnesse, ignorance is now become so powerful a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophie, Phisick, and Diuinity, in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Vertus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer bee perswaded, that GOD hath shut vp all light of Learning within the lastborne of Aristotles braines; or that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendam in Cordetuo Lucernam intellectus: that GOD hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen; and that they onely haue intruded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these bee the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sowre Runnet doth coagulate her milke into a curde. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to bee found in vulgar Philosophie, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man, to couer his ignorance in the least things, who cannot giue a true reason for the Grasse vnder his feete, why it should bee greener, rather than of any other colour; that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heavens them selves: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs;

 that hath so short a time in the world, as hee no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnder-standing nothing trulie; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle bee hee) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action and effect, telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as hee) but not what it is, which neither hee, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all the actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not; and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man-kind had a beginning of being. Hee will disable GODS power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the moethes of the Aire for a cause; cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternall: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make it im-^{selfe} the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectaours haue maintained it; parati ac coniuati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after, Moses, Zoroaster, Mufeus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melitius, Pherecydes, Thales, Cle-^{all} anthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessitie of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall.
 Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidentiam vnam esse consentiant: siue enim Natura, siue Æ-ther, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex, idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Laetantius) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence, whether the same bee Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or delitie, or diuine ordinance; that it is the same which we call G.O.D. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they some times bide them selves for a while vnder ground, and seeme to be lost in Sea-like

The Preface.

Lakes; doe at last sinde, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacite hath; and after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiositie; in the necessitie of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolues it selfe.

As for others; and first touching those, which conceiue the matter of the World to haue been eternall, and that God did not create the world ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente: the Supposition is so weake, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi uidentur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere, They seeme vnto me, which affirm this, to giue part of the work to God, and part to Fortune: in-E of b 1 de 1917.
Kuang, 1, 7, 4, 8. somuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternall: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did sit: it selfe to God; or God, accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workmans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artificer he applied himselfe, according to the proportion of Matter which he lighted vpon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter had been made by any Power; nor Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no lesse, than serued to receiue the forme of the Vniuersall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as serued to finish the worke of the World: Or had there been a more of this matter, then sufficed; then did God dissolve & annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, bee againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this, of all other, were the greatest idiosime. For, if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceiue, that it could neither produce it selfe; nor anything else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neq; seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth precede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that saine this matter to be eternall, must of necessitie confesse, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternitie. And then had infinite

nite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it received proues it. For conclusion of this part; who-so-euer will make choyce, rather to beleue in eternall deformitie, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madnessse of that kind, as wanteth reames to expresse it. For what reason of man (whome the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which wee can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath anything wanting in it selfe, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if such had bene GODS will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation; the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea Reason it selfe findes it more easie for infinite power, to deliuer from it selfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Diuynus his words, Deus in vna existentia omnia præhabet: and againe Esse omnium est ipsa Diuinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, causalliter, or in better termes, non tamquam forma, sed tanquam causa vniuersalis. Neither hath the world vniuersall closed cup all of GOD. For the most parts of his workes (saith Stracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened by the glorious work of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldom e entitle GOD the all-lhewing, or the all-willing; but the all-mighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so saluage therein, as those are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, imposed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctour Aristotle him selfe confesseth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsum infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to bee infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia completi ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choise out of fallshood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truely. For if wee compare the world Priuerfall, and all the vnumeasurable Orbes of Heauen, and those meruelous bodies of the Sunne, Moone, and Starres, with ipsum infinitum: it may truely bee said of them all, which him selfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in GODS power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the world vniuersall, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcel of that which is the vniuersalitie and the infinitie it selfe; and Plato, but a shadow of GOD. But the other, to proue the worlds eternitie, vtgerh this Maxime. That, A sufficient and effectuall cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring, that GOD being for euer a sufficient and effectuall cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bene for euer; to wit, the world vniuersall. But what a strang mockerie is this in so great a Maister, to confesse a sufficient and effectuall cause of the world, (to wit an almighty GOD) in his Antecedent; and the same GOD to be a GOD restrained in his conclusion; to make GOD free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choyce of the time when? For this were impiouly to resolue of GOD, as of naturall necessitie; which hath neither choyce, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but work matter being present; as fire, to burne things combustible.

Againe he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can worke, and doth not worke: if it after-ward worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by some-what else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But GOD (saith he) is immouable, and is neither moued by him-selfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwaies worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by GOD, that hee was for euer the cause thereof, and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie, For that GODS performing in due time that, which hee euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancie in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be said to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, spiritualm mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idea, and Creation in time. Spiritu. alis ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita aquali est Architecto; fuit semper cum illo, eritque sumper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, cecidit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the sampler of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was aqually ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer shalbe. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for euer to come.

The Preface.

The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confesse: The other they understand no other-wise, than that after the consummation of this World, there shall be a new Heaven and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissoluble) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individuall and inseparable power, flowing from divine unity; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of GOD sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a goodness and understanding divine; and that this creature, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith hee) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporall Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole Materiall World is not altogether: but the abolisht parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, doe by the same small degrees succeed; as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, will deny that ever it shall have any end; and to this purpose affirme, That it was never heard, never read, never seene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the Elder by continuance; or in any sort other-wise than they were; which had they bene subject to finall corruption, some change would have bene discerned in so long a time: To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they have not continued so long; than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjecturall arguments may receive answer by conjectures: it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Summes heat; neither were the Seas, under the Equinoctiall, navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we Navigue, is passable enough. Wee read also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the world were burnt up, by the Summes violent heat.

But in a word, this obseruation is exceeding feable. For we know it for certaine, That stone-walls, of matter molaring and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged up out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure, yea it is beleiued, and it is eery probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementarie, and compounded, the eldest times haue not insued and corrupted: what great alteration should wee looke for in Celestiall and quintessenciall bodies? And yet wee haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these later Ages assist Nature, as here to fore. We haue neither Gyants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, wee might easily fetch store of prooffe; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can bee made to this objection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had bene a-like eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, prouided for his eternall beeing in the World? For if all were equal: why not equal conditions to all? why should heauenly bodies liue for euer; and the bodies of Men rotte and die?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gaue Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betwene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those boundes, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in every yeare: the Moone to liue by borrowed light: the first starres (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Nails in a Carr-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Loue, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited, giuen light vnto, and releiued all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternitie; He may iustly be called eternall charity, and everlasting Loue. The same may be saide of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountains of vertue and operation, may also bee called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience, the Moone, an eternall borrow-er and begger; and Man of all other the most miserabell, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleive againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than euer Hesiodus dreamt of. But in steed of this mad jollie, wee see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason descerne it better; That the Sunne, Moone, Starres, and the Earth, are limited, bounde'd, and constrain'd: themselves they have not constrain'd, nor cou'd. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit, Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought alioth-erly to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World: so if the best definition bee taken out of the second of Aristotles phisicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphisicks; I say that the best is but minimal, and serving onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion, from Artificial: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providential (by which they understand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodens; Natura postremum. But bee it what bee will, or bee it any of these (GOD excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath allowed. For this is vniuerserale of Laërtius: Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam; Hee onely can bee said to bee the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly express'd by Ficinus: Potest vbiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere: sublatâ vero mediõrum materialiumque diuersitate, vel vnicum vel similitimum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter beeing present. Now if Nature made choyce of diuersity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth; it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne; reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish; and power to gouerne: without which, all things had bene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius, quā Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to Divine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnemq; summum locum diuino cuidam numini assignant.

And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philologia, est ascensus ab and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

Word of nature

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in termes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will; and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good vnto all, knowing and loving the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the earth, that beasty things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the salt Sea? Shall we terme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and knowledge it is, that Nature worketh.
And therefore seeing all things work as they do, (call it by form, by Nature, or by what you please) yet because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder, & to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, & such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their last and vntermost perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinit, and eternall, (which also necessity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith; and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things doe as easily follow which haue bene deliuered by diuine letters; as the waters of a running Riuer doe successively pursue each other from the first fountaines.

This

The Preface.

This much I say it is, that Reason it selfe hath taught vs: and this is ^{Lat. La. a. a. de vera Sapientia.} the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapientia goes before, Religion follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapientia Plato calleth, absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another, scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith I sidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples persuaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, That to inquire further, as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world. Or of his secret iudgment, and the causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione insaniant, but they grow mad wth reason, that inquire after it. For as it is no shame nor dishonor (saith a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on n'asceu surpasser, For a man to rest himselfe there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, It acknowledgeth it to be so; as understanding it selfe not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason and Necessity teach vs (Reason, which is pars diuini spiritus in corpus humanū mersi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make vs know, that the same infinite power is every where in the world; and yet how every where, it cannot informe vs: our beleefe hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance; because it is the same Reason that tels vs, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conuected by man.

I haue beene already ouer long to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the greatest, the vnsutable diuision of the booke, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the deuiding euery of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For therest, it suites well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which speake to much, and yet say little; Ipsi nobis tuto subducimur, We are stollen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I beleefe as he doth; that who so thinkes himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, doe alwayes keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves, from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

The Preface

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take vpon the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of time; and preserved it selfe, from the very cradle and beginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shew vpon here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil.

Apparent raritates in gurgite vasto;
They appear here and there floating in the great gulfe of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inuentions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though most of the Authors Names, haue perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government; they had Kingly rule, Nobilitie, Pollicie in warre; Navigation; and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speake therefore of these (seeing in a generall Historie we should haue left a great deale of Nakednesse, by their omission) it cannot properly bee called a digression. True it is that I haue also made many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing wee digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better bee excused, in writing their liues and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of Historie, vnd of the Kindes.

The same hath bene taught by many; but by no man better, and with greater breuitie, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preached vnto vs. But wee still make large digressions: yea the teachers themselves do not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchie, producing Actions of more importance than were else-where to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire, whilest it so florished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obseruance was to bee vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of Rome

The Preface.

For I protest before the Maiesty of GOD, That I malice no man vnder the Sunne. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subiection to their priuate passions; but that they seeme diuerse persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so doe I: Vnus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi, or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the seruice of that estimable Prince Henry, the successiue hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I vnderooke this Worke. It pleased him to perse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which all that is presented, hath receiued both blows & thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicij, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduersitie hath disarmed mee. I am on the ground already; and therefore haue not farre to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall priuation their is no recession to habit; so is it seldome seene in the priuation politique. I doe therefore for-bear to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases; yet shall we euer more be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion; all the hope I haue lies in this, That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall doe againe. For had it bene other wise, I should hardly haue had this leisure, to haue made my selfe a foole in priue.

CHAPTER. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

¶ I.

That the invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

¶ II.

That the wisest of the Heavens, whose authoritie is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have beene created by God.

¶ III.

Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. I. I.

¶ IIII.

Of the meaning of the words [Heaven and Earth] Gen. I. I.

¶ V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the bovie of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Unformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heavens.

¶ VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

¶ VII.

Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

¶ VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any crystalline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

That Nature is no Principium per se, nor Forme, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any preporion with their effect.

¶ XI.

Of Fate; and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be prevented or furthered.

¶ XII.

Of Providence.

¶ XIII.

Of Providence.

¶ XIIIII.

Of Prædestination.

¶ XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

The Contents

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first creation: and of Gods rest.

¶ I.
OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

¶ II.
Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

¶ III.
Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortal Soule.

¶ IIII.
Of the Spirit of life which God breathed into Man in his creation.

¶ V.
That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

¶ VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first creation to dispose of himself.

¶ VII.
Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Vniuersall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

¶ I.
THat the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no mercuall that men should erre.

¶ II.
A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

¶ III.
That there was a true locall Paradise, Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

¶ IIII.
Why it should bee needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

¶ V.
That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused hills in the Earth.

¶ VI.
That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought, making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Rivers.

¶ VII.
Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher then the middle Region of the aere.

¶ VIII.
Of their opinion that seat Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelestria, there is a Countrie in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Eley 37. and Ezech 27.

¶ X.
Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

¶ XI.
Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one stream.

¶ XII.
Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

¶ XIII.
Of the River Pison, and the Land of Haruilah.

¶ XIIIII.
Of the River Gehon, & the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush. 2.Chron. 2. 1. 16.

¶ XV.
A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

of the first Booke.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

¶ I.

That the Tree of Life was a materiall Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

¶ II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

¶ III.

Of Becanus his not vnitie allegorizing of the storie of his Ficus Indica.

¶ IIII.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euil: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the flood of Noah.

¶ I.

Of the cause, and the reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

¶ II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

¶ III.

Of Moses his omitting sardarie things concerning Cains generation.

¶ IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children.

¶ V.

Of the long lines of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

¶ VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the flood.

¶ VII.

Of the men of renouue before the flood.

¶ VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

¶ I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

¶ II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Familie of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

¶ III.

That in proesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse superstitions of the Egyptians.

¶ IIII.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idolls and Fables were inuented: and that the first Iupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

¶ V.

Of the three chiefest Iupiters; and the strange storie of the third.

¶ VI.

§. VI.
That there was no neede of any new Creaon of matter to make the vniuersall floud: and what are Cataractæ Cœli, Gen. 7. v. II.

§. VII.
Of some remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.
Of sundrie particulars touching the Arke:
as the place where it was made; the matter;
fashion; and name.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitee.

§. X.
That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill
Taurus (or Caucasus) betwene the East Indies and Scythia.

†. I.
A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the eye of this question, to find out the Metropolis of nations.

†. II.
A proposal of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hills of Armenia,

†. III.
The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neare a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.
The second Argument; That the Easterne people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glorie.

†. V.
The third Argument; From the wonder-full resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

†. VI.
The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.
Of the senselesse opinion of Annius the Commenter vpon Berosus, that the Arke rested vpon Montes Caspij in Armenia; and yet vpon Gordiaz, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.
The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally neare the place where the Arke rested.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text. The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole earth.

An answer to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

†. XI.
Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher Hills than the Armenian.

†. XII.
Of diuers incongruities, if in this storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

of the first Booke.

†. XIII.

Of the contrarie situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no meruile, that the same ledge of hills running from Armenia to India should keepe the same name all a-long, and euen in India, bee called Ararat.

Of the plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

The Contents

† I.

That Mizraim the chief planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

† II.

Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lmariæ years, which made their antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

† III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the antiquities of the Egyptians.

† IIII.

Against Pererius; That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred years after the Creation; at least that both it, and the most parts of the World, were peopled before the Flood.

† V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

† VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. vlt. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

† VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian antiquities: with somewhat of Phut, another sonne of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

† XII.

miramis : and of the Pyramids of AE-GYPT.*

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphes, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the

CHAPTER I.

Of the Time of the birth of Abraham : and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the storie of the Assyrian Empire.

¶ I.
OF some of the successors of Semiramis : with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham,

¶ II.
A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was borne in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

¶ III.
*The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamias Canaan ;
and th, after his Fathers death.*

¶ IIII.
The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

¶ V.
The answer to two more of the objections, shewing that we may have certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest sonne : and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

¶ VI.
That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen 11. v. 26. doth not prove that hee was the eldest : together with diuers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

¶ VII.
A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides : with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

¶ VIII.

of the first Booke.

¶ VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

¶ X.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, wherof bee is said to have bene King, lies betwene Coele Syria, and Arabia Petra.

¶ XI.

Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

¶ XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

¶ XIII.

That it is not unprobable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewheere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivrie of the Israelites from thence.

¶ I.

A Briefe of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

¶ II.

That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, & otherwise, it appears that Chams rainge in Ægypt beganne in the year after the Flood 191.

¶ III.

That these Dynasties were not divers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oftentimes many under one King.

¶ X.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered; with a touch of the five first.

¶ XI.

Of the sixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

¶ XII.

Of the rest of the points propos'd.

¶ XIII.

Of the severall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

¶ XIIIII.

If there were not any Religion, nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessarie to be obseru'd.

¶ XV.

Of humane Law, written and unwritten.

¶ XVI.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.

That the invisible God is scene in his Creatures.

OD, whome the wisest men acknowledge to be a power ineffable, and vertue infinite, a light by abundant claritie inuisible, an vnderstanding which it selfe can onely comprehend, an essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicitie, was and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which he imbraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the image of that glorie, which cannot bee measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious lights of heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine countenance, in his mercifull prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the world vniuersall by the absolute art of his owne word, his power and almightinesse, which power, light, vertue, wisdom, and goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple essence, and one God, wee in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of celestiall and terrestriall bodies: terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuersities; celestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary of the vniuer fall: to whom he giueth also the attributs: of Mens, natura, actus, necessitas, finis, & renouatio. And wherein he truly, with St. Paul, calleth vpon God all power; conf:ring also, that the world was made by Gods almighty word, and not by hands: verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundus. ZOROASTER (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) took the word fire to expresse God by (asin Deuteronomy Deut. 4. 24. and in St. Paul it is vled) Omnia ex vno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the will of the most high God; whose remarkable wordes are thus conuerted. Cum abscon-
 10 ditet omnia IVPITER, summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans
cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great IVPITER had hidden all things in himselfe, working out of the loue of his sacred heart, he sent thence or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable workes which he had forethought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most high, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Vnus Deus Pater Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuerfall, totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But her of more at large hereafter.

Now although the curiolity of some men had found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinity: (it being true that the Scripture hath not want of any foraine testimony) yet as the Fathers with others excellently learned are my examples herein; so St. Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull, and profitable, to remember whatsoeuer he found agreeable to the word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape by way of ignorance, God rendering vengeance to them, that know him not: as in his Epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Alexandri, and in the seuenteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith St. Ambrose) by whomsoever vttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunq; ducatur, à spiritu sancto est: and lastly let those kinde of men learne this rule, Quæ sunt seruaui, prophana non sunt, Nothing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio.
Genf. 1. 1.

40 THis visible world of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertallian) things beganne to bee. This word beginning (in which the Hebrewes seeke some hidden mystery, and which in the Lower Targum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequent. but only to creation then. For before that beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the eternall. Nature was not, nor the next parent of time begotten, time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of matter already in being, then as the word beginning could not be referred to all things, so mult it follow, that the institution of matter proceeded from a greater power then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such a one (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made: whereupon it may be concluded, that matter could not be before this beginning: except we haue a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite, the impossibility whereof seemeth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam alter non esset in altero finitum, There cannot be more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth.

Genes. i. 1.

He vniuersall matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuerly vnderstood: for there are that conceiue, that by those wordes, was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderstand it, to which St. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (saith St. Augustine) de materia informi, quam fecisti de nulla re, penè nullam rem: (that is) Thou hast made the world of a matter without forme: which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

Apoc. 1. 23.

cap. 7. 00. 17.*

But this potentiall and imaginary materia prima cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the School-men, Beda, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus and others, affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heauen: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) hee filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heauen Stenchius Engubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and increased: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place and the seate of Angels, and iust Soules, then in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liueth in eternal light, it is written; My soule praise thou the Lord, that covereth himselfe with light: and in the Reuelation. And the City hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also Iohn Mercur vpon Genesis differeth not in opinion from Engubinus: for as by heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuisible or supercelestiall, so in his iudgement, because it was in all eternity the glorious seate of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercaelestem meo iudicio creari (saith Mercur) non erat necesse.

But as Moses forbore to speake of Angels, and of things inuisible, and incorporate, for the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things, which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Aegypti, according to his promise made to their forefathers: but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable Vniuersal, so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heauen, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heauen, before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seate of infinite power, no more then infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can containe: How great is the house of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possessions; it is so great, and hath no end, it is high and vnumesurable.

Caluinus in Gen.

But leauing multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the wordes, Heauen and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heavens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilitatis, suae possesseri: Which matter (saith Caluin) was so called, quòd totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seede of the Vniuersall, an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

ϕ. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

10 MOSSES first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth, but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his spirit beganne to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aque ad fixandam vitam, so prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulnessse.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures exprest: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatfoeuer is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt feedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heauens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. They shall per- Psal. 104. 26.
Esa. 11.

20 were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written. Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appeare: which proueth that the dry land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. Initio tu Domine terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was covered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith Dauid. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire; aire, fire; and so on the contrary, Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Caelum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum super adita esset. And the word which the Hebrewes call Maim, is not to be vnderstood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specificall water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est aqua A. Maim, de motu, Maim liquor geminus. & hinc nomen propter eorum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (with he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name or word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plurall, Aguas, Waters.

40 This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was void: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth budde forth the beaue, which seedeth seede, & the fruitfull tree according to his kinde, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused, nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adorning. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera, The workes of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: HESIODVS and ANAXAGORAS the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Onid:

After the creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters. The Seuenty Interpreters vie the word super-ferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil, and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor, *Egredium which wordes incubare or fovere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a special liking. Verbum translatum est ab auiibus pullitice sue incubantibus, quæ inuis (spiritu-alis) & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a spirituall and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat, The Spirit of God did fluster: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, uentus à conspectu Dei sufflabat, or as other vnderstand the Chaldean, subat, peltebat, remouebat: the winde from the face of God did blow vnder, diuise, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalm.

CHAP. §. 6. of the Historie of the World.

10 But to efchew curiofity: this is true, that the Englifh word (moued) is moft proper and fignificant: for of motion proceeded all production, and all what foucer is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeede bee truly called Principium motus, and with Mirandala, vis caufa efficiens, The force of the efficient caufe, St. Auguftine fometimes taketh for the holy Ghoft; fometime for a winde or breath, sub nomine fpiritus, vnder the name of a fpirit, which is fometimes fo taken: or for virtualis creatura, for a created virtuality: Tertallian and Theodoret call it alfo a breath or winde: Mercurius nameth it Spiritus tenuem intelligibilem, a pure or thine intelligible fpirit: ANAXAGORAS, mentem: TOSTATVS, voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and minde of Gods; which Mens, Plato in Timoe, maketh animam mundi, The foule of the world; and in his fixt Booke de Republica he calleth it the law of Heauen; in his Epiftles, the leader of things to come, and the prefence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Chrift our Sauour, Mens deficit, vox filet, & non mea tantum, fed etiam Angelorum: My minde faileth, my voice is filent, and not mine only, but even the voice of Angels: fo may all men fele fay in the vnderftanding and vtterance of the wayes and workes of the Creation; for to him (faith Alexandrienus) there is not one fubftance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed confubftantiale illi est quicquid eius est, & quicquid est, what's euer attribute of him there is, and what's euer he is, it is the very fame fubftance that himfelfe is.

30 But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or winde, nor for any other creature, feparate from the infinite a true power of God, which then formed and diftinguifhed, and which now fuftaineth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuerfall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the fame is it, which maintaineth all things, faith SALOMON. If thou fend forth thy Spirit (faith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORIE, Deus suo praefentia effe, dat omnibus rebus effe, ita quid, fe rebus fubtraheret, ficut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, fic in nihilum defuerent vniuerfa, God giueth being to all things, by being prefent with all things, fo as, if he fhould withdraw himfelfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away, and vanifh into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expreft excellently.

then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their spirituallity, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit, (which gaue heat and motion, and thereby, operation to cucry nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigelled lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten aire: an element, superior, as lighter then the waters, through whose vast, open, subtle, diaphanicke, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easly transpierce: light, for the excellency thereof, being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysolome calleth a vital Operation, quisi ad Deo insitam, ex qua aqua non solum motionem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it a vitall Operation given by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not only motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth liuing creatures.

Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficultly of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

THese waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnited, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these wordes, Let there be lights in the firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunns creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the first verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the seas, and creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, plants, minerals, and mans body: so may light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, and other lights of heauen. Howbeit neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, isthat light it selfe, que causa est lucidorum, which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe and all things else viiuble) but a body most illighted, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greekes call Aether, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressionum: the conductor, and preseruer, or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heauenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light, a quality, inherent, or cleaung to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano; but this may be better touched of the heat, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (say the Platonicks) abente lumine resedit in subiecto, the light being departed doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academics make incorporeall, and so doth MON-TANVS, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium: which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaueth.

Aristotle findeth corporalitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus, Democritus, Lucippus, and Epicurus, guc gine materiality to light it selfe; but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the heaven to the earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Crisalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by violence and vnpure earthy substances, lesse hard and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quod obstaculum naturæ terræ atq; sordidum, non capit candidam lumen puritatem: Because an obstacle, by nature, earthy and foule, doth not receiue the pure clearnesse of light: alluding to that most diuine light, which onely shineth on those mindes, which are purged from all worldly dross, and humane vnchannesse.

- But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion: neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or latter Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselues therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hercof, but there is no man that hath bene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in-wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Tyrannus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtle in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosphic or Diuinity: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientie odiosius acumine nimio: Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, then too acute her passe. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought forth and deouored) resolued vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet euery day we see the aire illuminated: incorporall it cannot be, because it is sensible: sensible it is, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed: others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more: the
- 30 Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, Lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darkenesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darkenesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be Lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtayne their so being of the light, and therefore, if we deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore he concludeth that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all Lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

- 40 But in my vnderstanding, lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of heauen, or from any other light, is an image, or intentionall Species thereof; and an intentionall Species may be vnderstood by the example of a redde, or Greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sunne through redde or Greene glasse: for then wee perceiue the same colour cast vpon any thing opposit; which rednesse or other colour we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created be the same, which the Sunne inholdeth and calteth forth, or whether it had continuance
- 50 any longer, then till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wise and vnchanged order, which God obserued in the worke of Gen. 1. the world, I gather, that the light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: for Moses repeateth twice the maine parts of the vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused, and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry land, and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncouered, and before it was called, Aridis, or dry land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vertuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vnitied and set in the firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day God gaue no proper place or fixation, and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdome of God finde cause why it should moue (by which motion dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from waters) beganne to budde forth the budde of the hearbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite euery part of the inferior world; by his heate to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue actiuitie to the seedes of all natures: For as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to bee erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordaind; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the light to be, which by his all-powerfull word he approued, and approving it disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Iob, by what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth; we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith ESDRAS) And those which inhabite the heavens, doo only know the essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra, Nothing unknowne in heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res vera sunt in mundo inuisibili, in mundo visibili umbra rerum: Things themselues are in the inuisible world, in the world visible but their shadowes; Surely it this light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth near vt into spirituality; and if it haue any corporality, then of all other the most subtle and pure; for howsoeuer, it is of all things seen, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministreth to men and other creatures all celestiaall influences; it dissipateth those sadde thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintaineth; it discouereth vnto vs the glorious workes of God, and carrieth vp with an Angeliell swiftnesse our eyes vnto heauen, that by the light thereof, our mindes being informed of his visible meruilles, may continually trauaile to surmount these perceuied heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent cause and Creatour. *Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet, It is the light, (saith St. AMBROSE) that maketh the other part of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:*

Quid, Met. l. 1.

*Ille ego sum, qui longam metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus;
Amandi oculis.*

The world discernes it selfe, while I the world behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye,

Lastly,

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any faire-off-dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beauty, motion, and vertue of this light may be perceiued. Therefore was God called lux ipsa, and the light by Hermes named lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to bee that light which lighteth euery man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimitie, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits, nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profectio non mens est, at verò ut si mens causa est, non spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat, nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith HERMES in PŒMANDRO) certainly is not a minde, but the cause, that the minde hath ha being; nor spirit, but the cause by which euery spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and informed, was by the operative Spirit of God pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, resolued their thinner parts into aire, which God illuminated the Earth also by being contigant, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought forth the budde of the herbe that seedeth f cde, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the light to be vinted, and gaue it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those feuerall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begett the time, and times succeeding.

Of the firmament, and of the waters above the firmament: and whether there be any crystalline heauen, or any primum mobile.

30 After that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine translation calleth firmamentum, for expansum (for spatialis, Yagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the crystalline Heauen, created in the imaginations of men, which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the fame place many learned arguments against this fancie. For the waters about the firmament, are the waters in the aire aboue vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the wordes Raqia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamaym, being indifferently taken for the heauen and for aire, and more properly for the aire and ether then for the Heauen, as the best Hebricians vnderstand them, quo suprema ac tenuis ab infimis crassis diducta intersectaq; distarent, for that whereby the supreme and thinnest bodies were placed in distance being severed and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters about the firmament exprest in the word Maym, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters about the aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the aire, the Scriptures eury where witness, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalm. * By these springs shall the fowle of the heauen dwell; and vpon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the heauen; and in Isaacs blessing to JACOB, God give thee therefore of the dew of heauen; and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land, whither you goe to possess it is a land, that drinketh water of the raine of heauen; and in ION, who hath ingendred the frowls of heauen; and in St. MATTHEW, Behold the fowles of heauen, for they sow not.

So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose topple may reach to heauen, &c. and in this very place Basil auoucheth that this appellation of heauen for the firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne wordes be these, *Et vocauit Deus firmamentum celum. Hec appellatio alij quidem proprie accommodatur, hinc autem vniuers ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this (that is, to the Firmament deuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other proofe, that by the firmament was meant the aire, and not the Heauen, the wordes of MOSES 10 in the eighth Verse conferr'd with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse makes it manifest: for in the eight Verse it is written, that God called the firmament, which deuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse hee calleth the firmament of Heauen, aire, in these wordes: And let the fowle flie upon the earth in the open firmament of heauen: and what vsf there should be of this icye, or crystalline, or waterie heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of beleefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia, but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and faith 20 it selfe (which firmoumeth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conducer the word of truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis, & intellectus, the light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable turneth it selfe to many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleeu mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I can not: but of these many heauens, let the Reader, that desireth satisfaction, search Oronius, and of this waterie Heauen, Basilus Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus his second Booke and sixt Chapter. For my selfe I am perswaded, that the waters called the waters above the heauens, are but the clowdes and waters ingendred in the vppermost aire. 30*

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, 40 that this was the order of the most wise GOD in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, he created the matter of all things: and in the first three daies he distilled and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, deuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the firmament into one place. In the last three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the world: he set in the firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all, that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to creatures vegetatiue and growing, their feedes 50 in themselves; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preferred.

X That nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giuer of being; and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

And for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into euery creature, hauing no other selfe-ability, then a Cloeke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the sterne of a shippe, and finding it guided by the helme and rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand, that guides it, or of the iudgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoeuer they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agenti omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choise by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde only, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by severall organs, seuerall effects; all second causes whatsoeuer being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they haue receiued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euery-where-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to contayne raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertuelesse, and dead: of which excellently ORPHEVS; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues, which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. For all his workes in their vertues praise him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolishly by selfe-flattery) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdome of the Philosophers) si facultas inueniende veritatis huic suauo subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenijs in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam. If in this suauis (saith he) were meanes to finde out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdome there to be had. Nam si de vna re precisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur, si precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in nature, and the wayes of their working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take euer a science, it hath not bene taught; neither are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimentur potentia;

Natura enim, remota productiva & potentia diuina, prout in se habet, non est illa fall. Sed potentia, 1.3.c.28;

cyriac. dicitur. et. 13.

potentia, que nihil est. Againe, how this first matter should be subiectum formarum, and passive, which is vnderstood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceiue: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, diuine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betwene matter and forme, then betwene heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of ratiocall consideration. Leaving therefore these riddles to their louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions writ and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to proue a false eternitie of the world, I thinke it fare safer to affirme with S. AUGUSTINE, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, whatsoever is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seeds of all formes, and the formes of all seeds and their motions: A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; estimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerroes is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith he) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

Of Fate; and that the Starrs haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be prevented or furthered.

ND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Inuened.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscilianists, the Bardianists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obscured: but, that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Ptolemy our of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferior bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a ratiocall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolonie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessity, and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starrs are instruments of firre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sinne set: it being manifest, that the diuersity of seasons, the Winters, and Sommers, more hot and cold, are not so vncreated by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keep one and the same course, but that the Starrs haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath giuen vertues to springs, and fountains, taines, to cold earth, to plants and stones, Minerals, and to the excremental parts of the basest living creatures, why should wee robbe the beautifull Starrs of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treasury of his wisdome who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euery flarre) a peculiar vertue and operation, as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower, adorning the face of the Earth hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer and shadow her duty face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beast, to feede them and cure them: so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the firmament, to no other end

10 then to adorne it, but for instruments and organs of his diuine prouidence, so farr as it hath pleased his iust will to determine. Origen vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the firmament, &c. affirmeth that the Starrs are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes) but are as open bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoeuer to come; and not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdome, which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syracides withall. That there are hidde yet greater things then these be, and we haue seene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacite of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and vttermost vertues of hearbs and plants, which our senses sowe and set, and which grow vnder our feete, we are in effect ignorant, much more in the powers and working of cele-

30 But that the Starrs and other celestiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitiue appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion: it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith DAMASCENE) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexionis, & dispositionis. The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in vs habits, complexionis, and dispositionis: for the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humor, and mindes weak in vertues: for those of cholericke complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer their senses to be transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her vassalles, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse minde I am refused: For all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celestiall bodies (as instruments and executioners of Gods prouidence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whoeuer shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power 40 of his sensuall appetite, Vincitur satum si resistit, vincit si cunctis miseru: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Starrs or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as afore said, as the flame by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilitium corporum confert, & Aug. de ciuit. Dei. li. 1.

ad vitam ipsam monet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The lights of the Sunne (saith Saint AUGVSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith St. Ambrose.) And St. AUGVSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above, but he auoucheth not that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens minds, which are incorporeall.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in nature and art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferior bodies, no more then the signes of raine and wind doe alwaies come to passe. And it diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in laucens patrum virtus; In the young offspring the fathers vertue is, and so the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an entchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Egregia est soboles, scelerato nata parente.

A worthy some is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods referu'd pow'r) that so much letteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the world so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion anew, and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the raine being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiarie, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer remaine a fauour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet fauour of vertue first receiu'd, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a fauourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arrive, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding vertuous or vicious, heauen and earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the strength of selfe nature and kinde could haue yeelded them; so the plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weedes, by being set in a soile futable, and like themselves, are made more vsuoury and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientis adiuuabit opus astrorum, quem admodum agricola terra naturam. A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the husbandman helpeth the nature of the soile. And Ptolomie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapientis, & omnia sapientia medici dominantur astris, A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall preuaile against the starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the starres, as he did the rest of the Vniuersall, whose influences may be called his referu'd and vnwritten lawes. But lets consider how they binde: euen as the lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the world haue by their lawes decreed, that a theefe and a murderer shall suffer death; and though their ordinances be dailye by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogatiue, to such a fower execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberie to iudgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and liberie from God himselfe, which which his Substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodnesse, and charitie it selfe. Otherwise that example of prayer by our Saviour taught. And let vs not be leade vnto temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had bene no other but an expence of wordes and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation fo forcible, which our humble prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternal power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependence, that God himselfe should in a kinde haue that vp himselfe thereto.

10 How miserable then were the condition of men (saith Sr. AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope.

And if this strength of the Starrs were fo transfer'd, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so beleeueth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginarie Gods of the other would thereby be depouled of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised vs the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father (I haue finished the works which thou gauest me to doe.) And the same God, who hath threatned vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be fo vnwill, as to bind 20 vs inuitably to the destinies, or influences of the Starrs, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessitie. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Starrs were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I doe not consent with those, who would make those glorious creatures of God verticelle: so I thinke that we derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Starrs is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis. Light is the shadow of Gods brightness, who is the light of light. But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Providence, Precedence, and Predestination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue.

§. XII.
Of Precedence.

40 Precedence, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines praecognitio, or praesentia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Precedence is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatfoeuer our selues fore-know, except the same be to succede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Precedence of God (as it is Precedence only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the world shall die againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Sommer and Harvest, and that according to the seuerall feedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in vs binde or constraime the Sunne to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith BERTIUS) beholdeth those things subiect to

And againe out of the ſame Authour. Diuina prouidentia rebus generandis non imponit neceſſitatem, quia ſi omnia euenirent ex neceſſitate, premia bonorum, & poena malorum periret. Diuine prouidence (ſaith he) imponeth no neceſſity vpon things that are to exiſt, for if all came to paſſe of neceſſity, there ſhould neither be reward of good, nor puniſhment of euill.

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence. It ſeemeth euenly for 19 is Now Prouidence (which the Greekes call Pronoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-ſeeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all paſt, all preſent, and all to come, but is the cauſe of their ſo being, which Preſcience (ſimply taken) is not: and therefore Prouidence by the Philoſophers (ſaith St. Auguſtine) is deuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the paſt, Knowledge of the preſent, and Care of the future; and we our ſelues account ſuch a man for prouident, as, remembering things paſt, and obſeruing things preſent, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times ſucceeding. That ſuch a thing there is as Prouidence, the Scriptures euerywhere teach vs, Mofes in many places, the Prophets in their prædictions: Chriſt himſelfe and his Apoſtles aſſure vs hereof; and, beſides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Prouidence of God: yea the Turks themſelves are ſo confident therein, as they reſuſe not to accompanie and viſit each other, in the moſt peſtilent diſeaſes, nor ſhonne any perill whatſoever, though death therein doe manifeſtly preſent it ſelfe.

The places of Scripture prouing Prouidence, are ſo many, both in generall and particular, as I ſhall neede to reapeate but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (ſaith DAVID) which couereth the heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the graſſe to grow vpon the mountaines, which giueth to beaſts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: all theſe waite vpon thee, that thou maielt giue them food in due ſeaſon. And thou ſhalt drinke of the riuer Cheareth (ſaith God to ELIAH) and I haue commanded the Ravens to feede thee there. Behold the Fowles of the aire, they ſow not, nor reape, and yet your heauenly Father feedeth them: againe, are not two Sparrowes ſold for a ſarthing? and one of them ſhall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haire of your head are numbred. And St. PETER, Caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you; And his iudgements are written (ſaith DAVID).

God therefore, who is euery where preſent, who filleth the heauens and the earth, whoſe eyes are vpon the righteous, and his countenance againſt them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be eſteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne word. Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not giue my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings preſence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euery where preſent, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuerſall prouidence is ſene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beaſts and birds and all liuing creatures for their young ones. If prouidence be found in ſecond Fathers, much more in the firſt and Vniuerſall: and if there be a natural louing care in men, and beaſts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whoſe diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuerſall. Amor diuini reum omnium eſt principium, & vinculum vniuerſi (ſaith PLATO). Amor Dei eſt modus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; eius immobilitate ſuſtentaculum, ac vniuerſe

ow for Predestination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Preience, then in this, that Preience only fore-seeth: Providence fore-seeth and catch for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the brightest Angels of heauen, to the unworthiest wormes of the earth, and Predestination (as it is vsed specially by Diuines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vsed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thom. Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely somtimes; among whom St. Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two societies, vseth these wordes, Quarum est vna, que predestinata est in eternum regnare cum Deo, altera eternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo, Where of one is it, which is predestinated to raigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe euerslasting torment with the Deuill: for according to Nonius Marcellus, destinare est preparare, and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Danens, and such like: and why hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregorie, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt: He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmitie perceiueh the reason of his blindness. And againe with St. AVGVSTINE, Occulta esse causa potest, iniusta esse non potest: Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, vnjust it cannot be.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and against reason and Providence.

Asly, seeing Destinie or Necessitie is subseqent to Gods prouidence, and seeing that the Starrs haue no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum, The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CVSANUS Diuini precepti instrumentum, The instrument of the diuine precept, we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatry, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reuerenced, and the most consulted of all others, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messiniack. The Greekes call her tyche signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard off; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit Gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward she grew so great and omnipotent, as from

From wisdom Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginative, to which the successe of humane actions and endeoures were for their vancie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be²⁰ giuen, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non præcesserit, Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aguinus hath herein answered in one distinction, what fouer may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen besides the intention of the inferior, but not besides the intention of the superior: Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit) the ordinance of God; and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Poete fortunam, nos Deum appellamus, Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God, and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the law of murder. He that 30 smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death, and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now where the Scripture hath these wordes, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance, and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby an other is slain, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casuall and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosphers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academikes to this effect, That the same power which they called animus mundi, the soule of the world, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdom; which we expresse by the name of God, governing euery being afield in heauen as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gaue the title of necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the title of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certaine causes. To this effect speaketh St. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which seest hee was: For what fouer (saith hee) 50 thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he useth, and exercesth his power diuersly.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe, how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend vpon so many unworthy and and emptic-headed fooles; that riches and honour are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men wear out their lines in poore and dejected estates. In a word there is no other inferiour, or apparent cause, beside the partialtie of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue, for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth, if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourte then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euenmore hang vnder the wheele, which kinde 10 of deseruing well and receiuing ill, wee alwaies fallily charge Fortune withall. For whosoever shall tell any great man or Magistrate, that he is not iust, the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire, shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such an one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the successour, if he be of contrary qualities, faile with the tide of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an obseruant flauith course? These men ha-

 20 uing nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondering at other men, and by making them beleue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dulle actions criticalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogancia & plausibus capitur, Every foole is wonne with his owne pride and others flattering applause: so as whosoever will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obserue them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warr or contend 30 in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the author of his owne miserie, but best it were to follow the aduise, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Quid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori;

Quid. rom. ant. lib. 1.

While furie gallops on the way,
 Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world bogat not aman of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTVS, Potuisse (saith Petrarch) in lectulo suo mori, potuisse integro caduere sepeliri, He might then haue died the death of nature, and bene with an vniuerso and vnassured body buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid, saltius quam desperantem (presertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari, what more foolish then for him that despatres, especially of the effect, to be entangled with endless contentions? Whosoever therefore will set before him *Machiavel*s two markes to shooote at (to wit) riches, and glorie, must fet on and take off a backe of yron to a weak wooden bow, that it may hit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first deuised to adde sailes to rowing vessels, did either by proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all winds and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne in-50 uention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sailes, as the diuers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sailes, and his cloth, of meane length and breadth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) in a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the thereof, or of whatsoeuer Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolue with S. Paul, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diuersities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

So man beganne to be.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose conyeth to the woman in these wordes, Et sicut Deus vnus, ab eo fieret homo vnus, & quomodo ex Deo vno omnia, ita ex vno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terrae: Vnus igitur vnus fecit, qui unitatis eius haberet imaginem, That as Gods one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one made one, that should haue the Image of his vnitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following wordes of the same Verse, that man was after the image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominumini in the plural number, and let them rule over the fish of the Seas, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortal soule only, because as God is invisible, so the soule of man is invisible, as God is immortal and incorporall, so is the soule of man immortal and incorporall; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, so but one soule which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in every part of the body: Animæ est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte, The soule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Jewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betwene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Mind or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betwene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinnie into small threds, with subtilie distinctions, many times the plainnesse, and incertie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that catcheth through and dissolueth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the image of God to be substantiall, but not the similitude: sed in substantia uocem qualitatis declaratationem, A word-declaring qualitye in the substance. Out of which wordes, and that which followeth, it is infer'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinfull soule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God; but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. St. Augustine also against Arimæus the Manichee affirmeth, that by Sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that St. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we beare the image of the heauenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the word's image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoever Lambard hath said to the contrary. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as St. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so St. James vseth the word (similitude) for both in these wordes. Therewith blesse wee God euen the Father, and therewith curse wee Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore St. Augustine seemeth, out of a kinde of elegancie in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Consecramur imaginem in æternitate, similitudo: non in moribus inuenitur, We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spirituall dispositions and qualities of the minde, yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly. Quæsi uerò possit esse imago aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similitudo non est, præcui dubio nec imago est, As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The vaine wordes of the Text make this most manifest, as Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) only, as thus. God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguitye, in the first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, in the day that God created A D A M, in the likenesse of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Colof. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Sirachides it is written, he made them according to his image. Now if we may beleue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the words directly in one sent. For they surued the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and minde: Nulla pars in homine que non fuerit huiusce imaginis participans, No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of body and soule. The body of man (saith he) is the Image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body only: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, hee meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. AUGUSTINE,) Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans body. Deus enim non est humane forme participes, neque corpus humanum diuine (saith PHILLO,) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor human: body of the forme diuine: The Hebrew word for image is Tselem, which significeth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo, Man passeth away in a shadow: Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his nature and his word, an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the very essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Heretikes: ad similitudinem Dei propius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura, The vertue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is mercifull: God is charitie it selfe, and (in a word) goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexogitable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is said to be the Prince of this world, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thercof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortal soule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called Demonies, because scientes of Knowledge, and subtilty; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea euen of shamefull parts of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of St. Chrysolome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to bee, that is, accompanied with iustice and pietie: for God did not only make man a ruler and Governour ouer the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointe Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude reason, as it is the abilitie of vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Irenaeus did therefore call man, the image of God, because hee was Est autem mens nostra (saith CYSANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole; that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompanie his wordes) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith

*Mercurius) est Deus in hominibus, Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created, so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; or the lumen animae rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call *animam animam, The soule of the soule, or with St. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, quae amore sapientiae tanquam ducem sequitur, which followeth after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) between which and reason, between which and the minde, called anima, betweene which and that power which the Latines call animas, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which we iudge and discourse; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, viuificat, anima, or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth it life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great directour hath in the world, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, *perfectissimam animae partem, the perfectest part of the minde, or the light, by which the Soule discerneth: discernitum mens, non anima, opitatur, & in suis iugis mens extinguitur, anima mouet, in men that sleepe is in this (mens) or vnderstanding, and not the minde or soule, which relecth, during which time it is but habitual in wife men, and in madde men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the Soule; for made men doe liue, though distract.

40

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abusively to made men, when we say that they are of a distract minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (mind) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this mind, or that minde: and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honest minde, or, a man of a iust minde: sometimes for affection, as I doe this for my mindes sake; and Aristotle sometimes vseth this word (mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels, and Intelligences: but as it is vsed in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that, which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be disscuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently Mercurius, Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti preest, mens anima, anima corpori, The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the image of this vnderstanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the image of God. Gods Present or ruler ouer this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the body. This diuision and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leaue to the Reader to iudgeof. That Mens humana hath no neede of any organ, Marcellus Ficinus in his ninth booke of the Soules immortalitie laboureth to proue.

Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (saith he) ad facultatem intelligentem excedendam non eget Mens organo, tanquam medicus, per quod intelligat, quamquam eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasmata prolata, To exercise the facultie of vnderstanding, the minde of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderstand: but it needeth an object, whereon to looke, and whence to conceiue the act of vnderstanding. This object are the phantasies, or the resemblances of things receiued from the sense, and carried to be phantasie: But in effect his conclusion cometh to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the vnderstanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderstood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the vnderstanding. And hee addeth that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his vnderstanding and minde, as colours are to the sight: whence it fo followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it selfe is to the facultie of vnderstanding, as the eye is to the facultie of seeing, and as this is an Organum: so that. Of this question, How the Minde in all her actions maketh vse of the body, and hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most graue and learned discourse in the last R eplie of Mr. Dr. Bilson, now Bishop of Winchester, vnto Henric Iacob. How soeuer the truth bee determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the minde it selfe, by which we liue, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selues to God in mente, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all.

Reg. 185. & se.

For St. Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (that was also the opinion of S. AUGUSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the image of God, because it remembereth, vnderstandeth, and loneth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And, that this image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiis afflictiōibus immerisit, Man was made after the image and similitude of God, but Sinne hath deformed the beautie of this image, and made is unprovable by drawing our mindes into corrupt conuersion.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall right-coulesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberalitie, that wee were printed with the seale of Gods image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the Soule is a part of the essentiall constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into earth, and contriued within the trunkes of dust and clay, the inimitable habitie of his owne iustice, pietie, and right-coulesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retain the image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office of Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the waies of God, which in the Scriptures is called making with God; and all other men so long retain this image, as they feare, loue, and serue God, truly, (that is) for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruite and deface his seale by the waight of manifold and voluntarie offences, and obstinate finnes. For the vniust minde cannot see after the image of God, seeing God is iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is charitie, and mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practise, and ambition, are properties of Satban; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with God; and to be short, there is no likelihood betwene pure light and blacke darkenesse, betwene beautie and deformitie, or betwene right-coulesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this image of Gods goodnesse, which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and durelesse pleasures of this stage-play world, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of Gods wisdom, and the liberalitie of his mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the highest heauens, and thence bring knowledge and Obiect to the minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during glorie, and termelesse ioy, prepared for those, which retain the image and similitude of their Creatour, preferring vndefiled and vrent the garment of the new man, which, after the image of God, is created in right-coulesse, and true holinesse, as saith St. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by St. Augustine with whom S. Ambrose ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the image is lost, and not the image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the image of God, in man, may betwene two waies; for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely, to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the image of God is no more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost: (for sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts) or, the image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of diuine grace, and heauenly glorie, which is indeede the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall image; and this manner of similitude and image of God, is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

That Man was formed of earth and dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodom. Let not my Lor now be angry, if I speake, I that am but dust and ashes: And in these houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabite, according to Iob; and though our owne eyes doe euerly where behold the sudden and restless assaults of death, and Nature afflicte vs by neuer-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Mindes the Huies of vnumbréd cares, sorrowes, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, 20 against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true vnhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance, which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this vassall and slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither die with the reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-liuing subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great accept? neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: we pleade for titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for riches, while our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that nature it selfe hateth 30 the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must see the day, from whence we shall not returne, and that our bedde is made ready for vs in the darke: And then I say, looking ouer late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues, we behold therein the fearfull images of our actions past, and withall, this terrible inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

§. IIII.

Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man, in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcase: God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing soule: (that is) God gaue to a Bodie of earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spirituall and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodilie instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of life and immortallitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELIY in Ios) hath made me, and 10 33.
the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, nisi forte putemus Deum, vel membris corporeis de limo for masse corpus hominis, vel sanctibus aut labijs suis in spirasse in faciem formati, et viuer posuit, & spiraculum vite habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tua fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinem, qua solent hominis operari, loquutus est. In which sentence (saith he) the begetter himselfe of carnall sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might linc, and haue the spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands haue made me, spake this tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi hujus qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt: In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnall sense. By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que vincificat corpus, & animam, which doth animate, and giue life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith Job; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the body returneth vnto the earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine suscipe spiritum meum, Lord Iesus receiue my spirit: and in S. ION. And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue up the Ghost, or spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead.
And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the soules of beaſts, the manner of the creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the best of the earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face breath of life. Wherefore, as from the water and earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence receiued life: so shall they againe be disloued into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath euertlasting, which God breathed into man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it. 6m. 1. 24. 26. 6m. 27. Eccl. 12. 7.

p. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortallitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the creation, and worke of the world, and whom he madeth the last and most excellent of his creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which he might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the world, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of lining natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, he vouchsafed vnto man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proportionall belonging vnto man; and therefore (saith GREGORIE NAZIANZENE) Homo est vtriusq; nature vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tieth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts thereof, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little world. Deus igitur hominem factum, sicut alterum quendam mundum, in breui magnum, atque exiguo totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the earth the man whom he had made, as it were another world, the great and large world in the small and little world: for out of earth and dust was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heauie and lumpy; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard rockes and stones, and therefore strong and durable: of which Ouid:

His bloud, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the bodie, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by brookes and riuers our all the earth; his breath to the aire; his natural heate to the inclosed warmth, which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radical moisture, oile, or Balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertile of the earth; the haire of mans body, which adorns or ouerhadowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering, and vnsable cloudes, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our eyes, to the light of the Sunne and Moone, and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat drie vp, & wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our minde, to the motion of Angels, and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwaies looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his own image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: (for in Angelis depruata est stultitia, Behold, he found folly in his Angels, (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betwene the substance, and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteousness.

In

In this also is the little world of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle di. 1. 10. Metaph. 1. 1.) and Pythagoras) that the foure complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the foure Ages of man the foure Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which we see me onely to liue and growe, as Plants; the second age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third age to Venus, the dayes of loue, desire, and vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the frong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seeke honour and victorie; and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, iudge of our felues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and sixenth to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which wee finde by deere and lamentable experience, and by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow onely abideth: Our attendants are sicknes, and variable infirmities; and by how much the more we are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whome when Time hath made vnlocable to others, we become a burthen to our felues: being of no other vse, then to hold the riches we haue, from our succellours. In this time it is, when (as afore said) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many sighes, groanes, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which we alwayes trauaile both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honour and riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the promises of glorious entertainments; but by what crooked path so euer wee walke, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose doores lie open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tide of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall ebbe and falling streame, but neuer floweth againe: our leafe once fallen, springeth no more, neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new leaues and flowers.

Of the free power, which man had in his first creation, to dispose of himselfe.

Iacob. 1. 1. 4.

Here be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all mankind, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to trie his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortal life, a nature celestially and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to be his owne guide, his owne workeman, and his owne painter, that he might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith S. IERACIDES) and left him in the hands of his own counsaile. Such was the liberality of God, and mans felicitie; whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse brought with them into the world (saith Lucretius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dammes, the nature, which they could not change, and the supernall spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kinde of seedes and grafts of life, (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of beastes, the rational of man, and the intellectuall of Angels, whereof which soeuer hee rooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should futuramente grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choyce and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Aclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as hee pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was faigned, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beastes, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from reason to brutallie, from vertue to vice, from meekenesse to crueltie, and from iustice to oppression. For by the liuely image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified deccleiers; by Lions, oppressours, and cruell men; by syning, men giuen ouer to lust and sensuality; by wolues, rauening and greedy men; which also S. Matthew resemblanceth to false Prophets, which come to you in sheepe clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolues, by the images of stones and rockes, foolish and ignorant men, by Vipers, yngratefull men: of which S. IOHN BAPTIST, Oyce generation of vipers, &c.

Neither did God lo rest, that hee left the world made, and the creatures therein to themselves, for my father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I worke, but God

God rested, (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and flowers their seedes in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the earth, and the earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his workes were good; nor that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were, for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the earth, but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceede no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberall choyce, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first age destroyed: but the righteous man Nob, and his familie, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvaile that men should erre.

ONCERNING the first habitation of man wereade, that the Lord God planted a garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6.
 Of this seat and place of Paradise, all ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgements have been in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without any regard of the worlds Geographic, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the hea-uens) the way how to finde out and iudge, in what region of the world this garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one error is so fruitfull, as it begeth a thousand children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obsequiuous sectatours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleueed in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnder-standing, then to examine theirs. For (saith Radianus in his Epistle of Paradise)

magnos errores (magnorum virorum auctoritate persuasi) transmisiimus, ve passè ouer many grosse errors, by the autoritie of great men leade and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for irreuerence both their learning and their pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth; for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakness. Nullo vnguarum dedit omnia Deo, God neuer gave the knowledge of althings to any one. St. Paul confesse that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to St. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi innuitur? (saith I o s) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of vnderstanding? 10

Therefore seeing God cannot follie in his Angels, mens iudgments (which inhabit in houes of clay) cannot be without their mistakings; and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recital of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

Now as touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, whether there were a Paradise or no? or whether Moses description were altogether myrricall, and allegoricall? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riuers, Pison, Gebon, Hiddekel, and Perath, The tree of life, and the tree of knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riuers were meant the foure Cardinal vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oile, Wine, Milke, and Honnie. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius receiued (saith Sextus Senensis) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his first Booke, fol. 338. the last Edition.

St. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third heauen, and in the vertues of the minde, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or minde; by Adam, Mens, or vnderstanding; by Ene, the sense; by the Serpent, delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinthians, c. 6. he in direct wordes alloweth both of a celestiall and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which St. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysaenensis, was of opinion, that a Paradise had bene, but that there was now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion Vadius inclineth, as I conceiue his wordes in two severall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut iam erat) fructibus confitam, sedem & hortum illud Ade & posteritatis future fuisse. These wordes (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruits and multiplie, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule ouer euer creature, doe clearly shew, that the Vniuersall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and lease of Adam, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts the 17. Apostolus ex vno sanguine quæ omne genus humanum ad id factum docet, ut habitarent super uniuersam faciem terra: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat. The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Geropius because differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Geropius findeth neare the Riuer of Acesines, in the confines of India.

Tertulian, Bon-suenture, and Duranus, make Paradise vnder the Aequinoctiall, and Postellus, quite contrarie vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Eabanus, were both sick of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins saies of Philo Iudeus, that he wondered, quæ malo genio afflatus, By what cull Angel he was blowne vp into this error: so can I not but greatly meruaile at these lealearn'd men, who so grossly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdomes and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuers which watered it, and by the points of the compass vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudæa, or Canaan.

Quomagus also, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleueeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith hee) hath the same beautie ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that fountaine, from whence the foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Ægypt, and the other two through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one fountaine, were it not out of the fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

O the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written. And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And howeouer the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the frequent Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Nowne appellatiue; which Region, in respect of the fertilitie of the soile, of the many beautifull riuers, and goodly woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keep their leuues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasure, or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof, so was Eden a Region, called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure, or delicacie, and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, and yet both are the proper names names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Seuentie; to the ancient Greece Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodore, Gregorie; and to the Rabbines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Senecius, Damasceus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damasceus owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confusus; Paradise is a place, mercifulously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward 10
the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words. After this I will beginne to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which that God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Posthac incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo constitum in regione terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus CHAM habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; Fer Moses (saith he) doth shew moit clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, 20 it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERRIVS endeouoreth to qualifie this translation: for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ, that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slaier from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better judgement) the Deuill was from the infant of his fall a man-slaier in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduise 30 th himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (a principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden, Collocauit Deus ante Paradisum voluptratus Cherubin; and Perrivus himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; licet set on the East side of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BECANY affirmeth that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and fo the T beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end, to finde Paradise vpon the riuer of Accines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to bee 40

the tree of knowledge, of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Mose toward the East, thence came the custome of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damasceus): affirming, that we alwaies pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwaies toward the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Aegyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudea, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, fo our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray 50 turning

turning our felues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on earth : so by Christs death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestiall, and the Kingdom of heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myserie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Iudea and Canaan : for the Scriptures alwaies called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia : of which Ouid :

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabateam, regna recessit, Persicam, & raris uaga subditamutatis.

The East winde with Aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabian, and the Persian hills, Whom Phebus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodanorsor, and of whom the greatest part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stode North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East toward the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comesor giueth best satisfaction : for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the world, (à principio) id est (saith he) à prima oris parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that (à principio and ad Orientem) haue the same signification; From the beginning and Eastward is all one, à principio idem est quoad Orientem.

But to returne to the proofe of this place, and that this Storie of mankind was not allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the second Chapter and ninth Verse, in these words. For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the world at large, and then, put him into the garden: and the end why, is exprest that he might dreesse it and keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kindes, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestrial garden, garnished with fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer; expressing also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrey nere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

To all these Caballists, which draw the truth and Storie of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these wordes: Si Paradisus non est sensibilibus, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non salix, non comedat Eua de arbore, non est Adama, non sunt homines, sed ueritatem iam fabulosa est, & omnia ad Allegoria reuocantur. If Paradise be not sensible, then there is no fountain, and then no riuer, if no riuer, then no such foure head, or branches, and then not any such riuer, as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such figtree, or fruit, or leauer, Eua then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things seemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon Daniel. Contiescaut eorum delramenta, qui umbram & imagines in ueritate sequentes, ipsam conantur euertere ueritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores pntent Allegoria legibus debere subuere. Let the dotages of them be silent, who following shadowes and images in the truth, endeavour to subuert the truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the rivers and the trees under the rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gave Adam free libertie to eat of every tree of the Garden, (the tree of knowledge excepted) which trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat, meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beastes to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beastes were neither in the third heauen, nor nere the circle of the Moone, nor beastes in imagination: for if all these things were enigmaticall or myflicall, the same might also bee said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Affryan Kings veth this speech. All the trees of Eden, which were in the garden of God, enuied him, which 10 proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to bee terrestriall: for the Prophets made no imaginarie comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if hee had not described both the region and the riuers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbelceeing Israelites, and others after them, would haue misconstrued this storie of mankind. And is it likely, there would haue bene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we finde that the valley, wherin Sodome and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the fiue principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnatural sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians waisted it: which proueth plainly; that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a feat and foyle of farrre exceeding excellencie.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gene. 2. and whence are their praises of the Elisian fieldes, but out of the Storie of Paradise: to which also appertaine 30 those verses of the golden age in Ouid.

Ouid. Metam. 1.

*Ver erat aeternum, placidus, tepentibus auris
Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.*

The ioyfull Spring did euer last,
And Zephyrus did breede
Without the helpe of seede
Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pyndarus, Hesiodus and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their sectatours, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stollen treasures of diuine letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poeticall conuerfions, as if they had bene conceined out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the riuier that ranne out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cash, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the delarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote, I then conueie, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith S. Augustine)
Tree

Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententia: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroq; modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corparall: a second of those which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion St. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas August. de civit. Tric. 13. c. 21. Suidas in verbo Paradiso. voucheth this allowable judgement. Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nemus, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was his holie groue or garden to be taken both waies, and endued with a double forme.

§. IIII.

Why it should be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradise.

BVt it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kinde of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scriptures, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the storie be necessarie, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne world, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to haue come into India, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the world, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pylus should be Ganges, which watech the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two 30 Riuers so farre distant, as (except all the world were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly, if the birth, and workes, and death of our Sauour, were said to haue bene in some such Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his miracles had bene performed in the aire, or no place certainly knowne, I assure my selfe, that the Christian religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the minds of men: for times and places are approoued witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relie, or giue place to the iudgements of some writers vpon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in generall, they are worthy of honour and reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Gracians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleue that there were a pece of the world so set by it selfe and separated, as to hang in the aire vnder the circle of the Moone? or who so foolish to conceive, that from thence the foure riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall downe, and runne vnder all the Ocean, and rise vp againe in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found. Which left any man thinke, that I enforce or frame to the world, these are Peter Comestors owne wordes. Est autem locus amantissimus longo terra & maris tractu à nostra habitabili zona secretus, add' eleuatus, ut vsque ad Lunarem globum attingat. &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, seuered from our habitable zone by a long tract of land and Sea, eleuated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the Moone.

30 And Moses Barceph as vpon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hac nostra extra terra, cog' fieri, ut illinc per precipitium delabantur flumij tanto cum impetu, quantum verbes exprimere non possit; cog' impetu impulsu pressiq; sub Oceani vada rapiuntur, unde cursus profusant ebulliantq; in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which which sense: Further more Here counteruerted by Masius.

(saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these riuers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe arise and boile vp in this our habitable world: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Luna orbis Lunam cingit, (which is) This Paradise doth compass the whole earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the earth on euery side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discouer the true place of Paradise, which God and his wisdom appointed in the very Nauell of this our world, and (as Melancthon saies) in parte terre meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Vniuersall might be filled with people, and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, and of the worlds inhabitation: for neare vnto this did the Sonnes of Noah also disperse themselues after the flood, into all o- ther remote Regions and Countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, and out of what Regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Auncelster, from whence all the streames and branches of mankind haue followed and bene deduced. If then it doe appere by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine the severall opinions before remembred, by the Truth it selfe, and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightful Garden.

§. V.

That the flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused hills in the earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the flood the cause of those high mountaines, which are found on all the earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for my owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had bene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and scate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeares after the flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the very garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the riuers still remaine the same riuers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these riuers, which afterward both diuide it selfe into foure branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a riuer to water the garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision and branching of those riuers must be in the North or South side of the very garden (if the riuers runne as they doe, North and South) and therefore these riuers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly knowne, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that either these riuers were turned out of their courses, or new riuers created by the flood which were not, or that the flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it beganne to decrease, was the cause of high hills, or deepe vallies. For what descent of waters could there bee in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe vpon the earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, vntill the waters sinke, there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the winde to blow, to drie vp the abundant slime and mudd of the earth, and make the land more firme, and to cleanse the aire of thicke vapours and vnwholesome mists; and this we know by experience, that all downe-right raiues doe euer more discover the violence of outrageous winds, and beate downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floues there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one height ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfes to receive a flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the earth and waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, then that they moued with any raging or ouerbearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the flood made no such destroying alteration, Ioseph. auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his dayes, which pillars were set vp about 1426. years before the flood, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the erection of them, and Ioseph. himselfe, to haue liued some 40. or 50. yeares after Christi: of whom although there be no cause to beleuee all that he wrote, yet that, which he auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen: Now that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Cittie of Enoch built by Cain, about the mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented fragment) saith, were to be seene in his daies, who liued in the raigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile; and if these his wordes be not true, there was he exceeding impudent. For, speaking of this Cittie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort. Civitas maxima & ingenio molis fundamenta visantur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, et nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt, The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that region the Cittie of Cain, as both our strangers and merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Cittie of Ioppa was built before the flood, ouer which Cepha was King: whose name with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their religion, was found grauen vpon certain Altars of stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Cittie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seene, though founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first Cittie of the world, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it.

And to proue directly, that the flood was not the cause of mountaines, but that there were mountaines from the creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood ouerflowed by fiftene cubits the highest mountaines. And Masius Damascenus speaking of the the flood, writeth in this manner. Et supra Minyadam excelsum mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, And vpon Minyada there is an high mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fledde in the time of the deluge, and that they saued themselves thereon. Now although it is contrarie to Gods word, that any more were saued then eight persons (which Mafus doth not auow, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such mountaines were before the flood, which were afterwards, and cuer since, knowne by the same names; and on which mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntuly, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Syon (though by another name) was knowne before the flood: on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saued themselves also; but (as Annius saith) without all authoritie, either diuine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the flood did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that when Noah sent out the Doue the second time, shee returned with an Oliue leafe in her mouth, which shee had pluckt, and which (vntill the trees were discouered) shee found not: for otherwise these might haue found them floating on the water; a manifest proofe, that the trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written, folium Oliue, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a tree, or to teare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrarie) that the flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be scene to succeeding ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the worlds creation, and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this discouerie.

That Paradise was not the whole earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountaine of those sware Riuers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chrysostomus being answered, who only giueth his opinion for reason, I will in a few wordes examine that of the Adaniches, of Neuionagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that vnderstand, that by Paradise was meant the whole earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many wordes, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageth, bring forth fruit and multiple, fill the earth and subdue it, rule ouer euery creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the world was made for man, of which he was Lord and Gouernour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of blood originally; and Adams posteritie inhabited in prospect of time ouer all the face of the earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular garden, assigned to Adam to dresse and cultiue, in which he liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had bene no other choyce, but that Adam had bene left to the Vniuersall; Moses would not then haue said Eastward in Eden, seeing the world hath nor East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had the Angell of God bene set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Vniuersall had bene Paradise? for then must Adam haue been chased also out of the world. For if All the earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driuen out of the world into the world, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleue with Aetrodorus, that there were infinite worlds. Which to denie; he thinks all one, as to affirm, firmē, that in so large a field, as the vniuersall, there should grow but one thistle. NOVIOMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riuer, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates, (which water three portions of the world to farre distant) to rise out of one fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the world for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four riuers, being so vnder flood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Geban falsly for Nilus, although Ganges be a riuier by Haulah in Indus, and Nilus runne through Ethiopia. The Senetic write Chius for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Nonimus, Goropius, and Psidianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture farre more probable, then that of Ephraim, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Countrey, in which hee was created, and was buried at Mount Caluarie, in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the flood, yet Adams shine-bones must haue contained a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disproue it.

Of their opinion, which make Paradise as high as the Moone, and of others, which make it higher than the midale Region of the air.

Hardly, where as Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradise to be a place, altogether remoued from the knowledge of men (locus a cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Berephas conceived, that Paradise was faire in the East, but mounted about the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the

Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Pterius laies it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his M^r. Rabanus: and whereas Rupertus in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or neare it heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neither of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for heauen it selfe, into which the soules of the blessed were carried after death. True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Aetopagites, (in this Diog. Laert. in and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleued in plaine termes, especially Plato: who Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one only powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and St. Augustine gaue this judgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place afore said, meant the celestiaall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothous) which being about all clouds of raine, or other inconuenience, the people (by reason of their many yeares) are called Macroboi (that is) Long-lived. A further argument is vsed, for prooffe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preferred from the violence of the flood: approved by Hilare, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued, that the blessed soules were preferred till the last judgement; which Irenaeus, and Iustine Martyr also beleued. But this opinion was of all Catholike Diuines reprobated, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which St. Augustine more modestly gaue this judgement.

where it have it 5. 25

Judgement. Sicut certum est ENOCH & ELIAS nunc vivere : ita vobis nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est. (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now live: so where they now live, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is uncertaine. But Bercephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves vnder the great Ocean, and afterwards have forced their passage through the earth, and have risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

The strange fancies and dreames have beene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins and Peregrin writing vpon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferiour to that of the Inuentour.

It is first therefore alleged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so neare the Moone, it had bene too neare the Sunne, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have bene too joynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the aire in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betwene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolomie and Alfraganus) is seuentene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes by a grosse account about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole earth for a Basis & foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing, it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeeth this, that those people which dwell neare those falls of waters, are deafe from their infancie, like those which dwell neare the Catadupa, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I have seene in the Indies, farre greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neare them, are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which PEREGRINVS, Sed ego hoc apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis quae nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things, either in Basil or Ambrose.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heauen, and the seede mult rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not die (saith St. PAUL) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest that by the flood all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus his own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised about the middle Region of the aire, and twentie cubits above all mountains, that the flood did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also believed; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouerwhelme it: this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, & without admitting any distinction teacheth vs, that the waters ouerflowed all the mountains vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Masius Damascenus, and the Thalmutists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselves on the mountaine Baris, and on Syon. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoole-men are) full of distinctions, saith; that the waters flood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the flood was not naturall, so was Paradise saued by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifyeth this high conceit with this supposition; That it was not belceued, that Paradise was so seated as Beda and others seeme to ascribe in wordes, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacie and beautie fo resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to list, then to resolute, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tegastus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Olympus, Atlas, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all windes and cloudes, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the hilles both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, doe not finde the althes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence walte off by raines, when they retume: yet experience hath resolved vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet on the height of these mountaines is farre vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe hilles the aire is so thinnie (saith S. Auguſtine whom herein I mitruitt) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of aire to mount her selfe by.

. VIII .

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall; and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

THose which come neare vnto reason finde Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonaeuſure, and Durandus; judging, that there vnder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertilitie of soile; but against Thomas Aquinas obieſteth the distemperate heate, which he suppoſeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is 30 (non causa pro causa) for although Paradise could not be vnder the line, because Eden is situate from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppoſe) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntreue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that euery Countrie, as it lay by degrees nearer the Tropick, and so toward the Equinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heate, it was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countries which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vnihabitabile: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceiued better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought 40 them habitabile enough; and though (perchance) in those dayes it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now finde, that if there be any place vpon the earth that stature, beautie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vnihabitabile burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and nearest to the line it selfe. For hereof experience hath informed reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden, and could not by any contemplation be discouered. Indeede it hath so pleased God to provide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witness of mens traualles, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or 50 as a fruitlesse lump to fillion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith Isa) that formed the earth and made it, he first prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest regions of the world, seated vnder the Equinoctiall line, or neare it, are so refreshed with a daylie gale of Easterly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize, that doth euermore blow from it in the heate

of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sunne can not so much matter it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heate found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seene, neere the Line and vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper, Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest, and such difference of foyles wee finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those regions haue so many goodly riuers, fountains and little brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruities, cuer bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit, both Greene and ripe; as it may of all other parts bec best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclouched and left naked, their sappe creepeth not vnder ground into the roote, fearing the iniurie of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered husband Pertumnus, in his Winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitifera, Vitis Countries: for nature being liberal to all without labour; necessity imposing no industrie or trauell, Idleness bringeth forth no other fruities then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures: So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceiued in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoole-men were grosse in this particular.

IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calesyria, there is a Country in Babylon, one of this name as is proued out of Ezech. 37. and Ezech. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of those imaginarie worlds, nor vnder Torrída Zona; it followeth that now we discouer and finde out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we finde that the Affrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians, (Cyrus onely and few other excepted) sought to extinguisht the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised once to remember so did they transforme the names of all those principall places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what hee could) to extinguisht all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which hee hath subiected and intrahled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates & Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that was of all other the most beautifull and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea, Eastward was Arabia Petrea; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when hee wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertilitie could not be Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such riuers, as are exprest to runne out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petrea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertilitie, and the riuers onely described, we must seeke seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isai I finde it coupled and accompanied with other adiacent Countries, in these wordes spoken in the person of Senscherib by Rabjakeb. Have the Gods of the Nations delivred them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telsassar: and in Ezechiel, where he prophecieth against the Tyrians: They of HARAN and CANNEH, and EDEN, the Merchants of SHEBA, ASHYR, and CHILMAD, were thy Merchants, &c.

- But to avoide confusion, we must vnderstand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that Valley called Aemim, otherwise Comallie, or the Tract of Chamath, where Affyr is ioyned to Arabia the Desart, and where Ptolomis placeth the Citty of Aneria: and the third is knowne by the name of Donus Edenis, or Calestria, or otherwise Callis caua, or the hollow Valley, because the Mountaines of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greeke is Cana in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lie East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citty therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleeued this Calestria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his T reatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise: though to giue Beroaldus his right, I conceiue that he ledde the way to Hopkins, and to all other latter writers, sauing, that he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that hee altogether misvnderstood two of the foure Riuers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where hee wrote after hee had passed the redde Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isai and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAIAN) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telsassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Abour, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citty of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer bene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their merchandise to Babylon, and to those CITIES vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the Citty of Tyre, afterward to Tripolie, and now to Alappo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Siscus, now Liaazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euery COUNTRY yielded: and hauing counted the severall people and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised. They were Merchants (saith the Prophet) *in all sorts of things, in rayments of blew silke, and of breidred workes, fine linnen, corall and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamsah, and what kindes they traded, he hath these wordes. The Merchants of Sheba and Raamsah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Fairies, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all pretious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yeeld: and because Sheba and Raama are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such spice, sweet gummes, and pearles, as their owne Countries yeelded, and (withall) hauing trade with their neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plentie of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citty of Teredon (built or enlarged by Nabuthodonozor, now called Balsaras)* thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boate to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies journey of Aleppo, and then ouer land they paist to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripolie (formerly Hieropolis;) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vpon the riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which the melting had, and which they recciued out of Persia, which bordered them. St. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneh Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Cittie. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I meane on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Sebenite vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be fourdable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Sebenite) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Cittie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as farre as the Cittie of Thapsacus, where Ptolomie appointed the Forods of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Sebenite by Strabo, whose wordes are these, Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam cursum iter est per Sebenitas, The Merchants which traualle from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Sebenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abrams came from Fr in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the riuer of Chaboras, which filleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Harar, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Assur, and Chilmad were by Merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charr, and Harar, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran; then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran sinuorum, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Countrie betwene Riuer: for Mesos in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, sinus; and when it is written Harar or Aran, it is then taken for the Cittie it selfe, to which Abrams came from Fr (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that Tract of land from the borders of Calesyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Sebenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates; and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Natanea, and the North part of the Desart, stretching themselves toward the vnhabited Solitade of Palmirena, which lyeth betwene Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, they of Harar, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But St. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesseth Appian;) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalae or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Citties, standing in T riangle with Seleucia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelhe-canne, and Mann-canne; the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite vnto it, where the riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to ioine. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the Valley shinar) it is vncertaine; but it is a noteawfull of the importance of the place, as of the certaine fate thereof, that so many other Citties did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnkely, that these additions of Thelhe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betwene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betwene Canne the old, and the new; which additions to distinguish Citties by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the world.
- thence

Now of the other Cittie joyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, St. Hierome on the Idages speak thereof in these words: Cumq; reuertentur, percurrunt ad Jul. 7. Charran, que est in medio itinere contra Ninive, undecimo die, when they returned, they came to Charran, (which is the mid-way against Ninive) the eleventh day.

This Cittie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest: Ye men, brethren, and fathers hearken: The God of glorie appeared to our father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this Cittie is not doubted of: for it is not only remembred in many Scriptures, but, with-10 all, exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Cressus the Roman, who for his insatiable greedinesse was called Gargis auarities, the guife of auarities. Whereof Lucan:

- But this Cittie Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of NIMROD. And the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Gen. 10. 10 20 Acad, and Chalne, in the land of Sinar, or Shinar: where Moses leweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Citties and people were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldee; into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldae, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Countrie: which Region of Babylonia tookename of the Tower Babel; and the Tower, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plaine Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)
- 30 Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Cannob, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or farre-off nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Cannob ioyne-
 40 to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel completh with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: and Esaie in the threats of Senacharib against Hierusalem (with other Nations that Senacharib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telasar. But before I conclude where Eden it selfe lieth; it is necessarie to describe those other Countries, which Ezechiel ioyneeth therewith in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Rasmah. It is written in Genesis the tenth. Moreover 100. 70
 40 *the sonnes of HAM were Cush, &c. And the sonnes of CUSH were Seba; and Hauilah, and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. And the sonnes of RAAMAH were Sheba, &c. and anon after CUSH heget NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Rasmah or Regma took that part adjoining to Shinar, toward the Sea-side and Persian Gulfe (called afterward RASNA and Sheba, by the Father and his Sonnes, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the Merchants of Rasmah and Sheba were they Merchants, they occupy in the Cities with the chief
 50 of all spices, and all pretious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrie, which parteth Arabia deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneeth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render them felues to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrie Strabo calleth Catharia, where the best Myrre and Frankin-
 100. 12. 6. sense is gathered; which people haue an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the*

the East side of the Persian Gulfe. By this it appeareth who were the Shebas, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue bene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not only plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromaticques and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES. In Persia ora initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi vniuersi gemmarum: in alijs vero, clari & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith STRABO) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian Gulfe there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearls bred: and in other, very cleare and shining stones. Now the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, 10 That Seba is writteth with the Hebrew (Samech) and Sheba with (Sehin;) but whatfoeuer the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographic, their Countries and habitations are diuers. For Seba is that part which bordreth the Persian Sea; and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the redde Sea; and so that place of the 72. Psalm, expounded. Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebas Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same riuier, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and thofe of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast and vpon it, pass vpon the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine frame, and so through the Region of Eden which 20 Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charvan, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphraist, which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coropitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrewes also often vse.

Thus much of those Countreys which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telasar: for these Senacharib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telasar lay most conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also 30 conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacharib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly dissolued.

For it appeareth both in Esaie the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabsheche, the while the Armie of Assyria lay before Hierusalem, that the Cities of Gosan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telasar, had resisted the Assyrians, though by them (in a fort) mastered and recouered. Haue the Gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, as Gosan, and Haran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. But it appeared manifestly after Senacharib's death, 40 that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Ejar-Haddon held Assyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Arme of Senacharib, commanded by Rabsheche, which lay before Hierusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacharib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouerie of his health, and his victorie obtained ouer the Assyrians. After which ouerthrow Senacharib himselfe was slaine by his owne sonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Ejar-Haddon succeeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Embassadors sent by Merodach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which inuited the Kings of 50 Babylon afterward to vndertake their conquest and subuerfion. So as, the suspition of warr encreasing betweene Babylon and Assyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Assyria, were employed to beare off the incursions of the Assyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telasar: and the very word (Telasar) saith Iunius, signifying as much, as a Bulwarke against the Assyrians.

rians. This place Hierosolymitanus takes for Resem, others for Sciencia: but this Telasar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the Historie of Iulian (whom he followeth in the enterprise of Persia) calleth Thalatha in stead of Telasar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Booke: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates vpon a steep and vnaffaultable Rock, in so much as the Emperour Iulian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuention place for a Garrison against the Assyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edemites of the Countrie adioyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Præmie calleth Teridata, hauing Reseph (which he calleth Resepha) on the left hand, and Canneh, Asie Tab. 4. (which he calleth Thelc-canne) on the right hand, not far from whence is also found the Cittie of Mann-canne vpon Tigris; and all these seated together, as Esoy and Ezechiel haue sorted them. But the vnderstanding of these places is the more difficult, because Assyria (which the Chaldeans call Aturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Assyria & Mesopotamia in Babylonian nouen transferunt (saith NIGER) Assyria and Mesopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the world Eden is seated, as, by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these wordes translareth this place. Plantauit autem Iehouah Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (saith he in his Annotations) Iusserat naves arboris in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabie & Mesopotamie, He commanded trees to grow in Eden, an Easterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

30  Nd for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the ycare 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine: By these Epistles (I say) it seemes we may haue some farther light for the prooffe of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the Riuer Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the Riuer of Eden. This Island as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminance) It hath (saith he) tenne miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called this name be swallowed vp, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath vp the Riuer, and not farre beyond it, the Cittie of Husan-Cepha, otherwile Fortis Petra: below it, hath Mosal or Mosel, from which (asin that which followeth it) shall appeare out of Masius it is not about twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mosal or Mosel by Marius Niger is remembred among the Citties higher vp Tigris, in these wordes. Intra autem Tigrim, Ciuitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, que nunc Mosel dicitur, in uena lani, &c. (that is), By Tigris are these Citties, Dorbeta neare vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needes not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimonie of Masius informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mosal (or Mosel) is in the confines of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, and in the neighbourhood hood of Niniue; and that it is the famous Selucia Parthorum. The Nellorian Christians in their former epistle call it Assur in these words: Ex omnibus Civitatibus et pagis qua sunt erunt Civitate Mozal (hoc est) Assur in vicinia Ninives; Of all the Cities and towne which are about the Citie of Mozal (that is) Assur in the neighbourboos of Ninive. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur (which is the same as Assur, alter the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sb into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon (which is not faire off Selucia) for Selucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mozal, and that ancient Citie, which Plolomic and Tacitus call Ninus, 10 and the Scriptures Niniue, Philostratus, and Simcon Sethi, Mozala, and Iohn Leon Mozal, others Mosse, (though it be not the same with Mozal) is set but a little higher vpon the same riuer of Tigris, neere Mozal: so that we are like to finde this Ile of Eden heere-about. For the same Antraus Masius which placeth it about Mozal, makes it to be belowe Hasan-chespa, which is vpon the same riuer of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Religious in both their epistles speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a riuer of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprouable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we haue a testimony from the leamed of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was 20 a riuer of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath bene subiect to the same change, that all other kingdomes of the world haue bene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after the flood called Shinar, and then of the tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris, betwene Mount Taurus, and Selucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient AETHICVS maketh mention, (not that latter AETHICVS disciple of CALINICVS, otherwise by PLUTARCH and ATHENAEVS called ISTRIS, who liued in Egypt in the raigne of PHILADELPHVS, but another of a faire higher and remote time) the same being made Latine 30 out of Greece by S. HIEROME. And though by corruption of the ancient copie it be written in AETHICVS Adana, for Edenu, yet Adonis being a riuer of Phoenicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the region named by AETHICVS. For AETHICVS makes it a Countie, and not a riuer, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of CHVS Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the riuer which watereth the Regions (sayth AETHICVS) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which riuer he calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a riuer, or riuers, to water the garden, 40 both which riuers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates come out of Armenia, and both of them traueise Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitie thereof in diuers places is not wortheie the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (sayth STRABO) the leaues are alwayes greene, and therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANVS de urbibus mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Cassia. But to the end I may not burden the readers patience with too long a discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and 50 afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these riuers which are sayd to water the garden of Paradis, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are sayd to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Haddel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates it is agreed by all: for the Seentic and all others others conuert Perath by Euphrates, & Hiddekel Tigris omnes exponunt: and all men vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (sayth Vatable). And because that which I haue here vnder set downe the words out of the two generall epistles of the Nestorians, as Majus (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those letters and supplications to the Pope were, that the Nestorian Christians which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, and Babylonia, and haue to this day (at least in Quene Maries time they had) fiftene Churches in one Citie, called Selenia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the riuer of Tigris, hauing no sufficient authoritie to choosethemselues a Patriarch (which cannot be done without fouer or three Metropolitan Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome in the year of Chrit 1552 (as aforesaid) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an election as themselues had made: hauing three hundred year before that vpon the like defect, sent one Marans thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they make knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couctous desire to enrich himself had forborne to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselues together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because at the Patriarchs for 100 years had been of one house and familie to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same stock and kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie, which his Predecessours had held, the rest of the Protestours refused to allow him. Vpon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselues. The words of the generall epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the sayd epistle. Perim nos non acceptimus neque proclamauimus ipsum, sed subitò conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & Pagis que sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attar, in vicinia Ninues, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Insula que est in medio Tigris, fluminis, Eden, ex Tauris Persie, ex Nisibi, &c. which is, But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attar) neighbouring Ninie, and out of Babylon, Carria, Arbela, and out of the Iland which lyeth in the middle of Tigris, a riuer of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the riuer Tigris. And in a second epistle at the same time sent, they vse these words: Neque super sunt apud nos Metropolitae, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasi, Episcopus Adarbeigan; et vicitigie conuenimus in Insulam, que est intra Tigrim flumen, Eden, scilicet, compellam inter nos &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Bishops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as, the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasi, and the Bishop of Adarbeigan: but we assembled speedily in the Iland Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betwene our selues &c.

Now this Iland of Eden Majus describeth with other places, which being well conceiued, the Nestorian epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (sayth he) the better vnderstood. And after he hath distinguished the fouer sorts of Christians in those parts of the world, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorians, Sacobites, Maronite, and Cophi, he goeth on in these words: *Mos, auidit illius morte, conuulsi se aicham tumultuario in illam quam modo dixi Tigris insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem se de millia passuum suo ambitu continet, maris vndiq. cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now bearing of the death of the Patriarch (as those that came to Rome) reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Iland of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which Iland is situated about 12 miles aboue Mosel, containing very nere ten miles in conpanse, and euery where inuironed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men than Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: sive Geserta.*

Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hofan-cephas, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it (supra) præditiâ Tigris Insulam rupi aspera impostam, above the foresaid land of Tigris, being seated on a sleepe rock. Of this land of Geserta Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riviere du Tigre, & penso que cest une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie. Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the soile the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden lieth, and of that Eden, which lieth Eastward from Arabia Petras, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneth, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Affrya and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Affryans, whose diplantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne rivers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradis.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure rivers to rise from one streame.

BVt it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers, in the Plurall, which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation (sayth he) hath these words: *Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluvij procedebant ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomarium, & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into foure heads: which words (sayth Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a river was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard, and from thence it was divided, and they became foure heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it converteth thus: Et fluvius egrediebatur de delicijs. And a River went out of pleasure in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis. And a River went out of the place of pleasure, and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was divided, hath reference to the Countrie of Eden, and not to the garden it selfe.*

And for the word (river) for rivers, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written. Let the earth bud forth the bud of the herbe, that seedeth seeds, the fruitfull tree, &c. Heere the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, herbe and tree for herbs and trees; and againe, we eat of the fruit of the tree, in stead of (trees:). And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God. In medio ligni Paradisi, in the middle of the tree of the garden, for (trees). And of this opinion is David Kimbis, and Varatius, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum, and he giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as A river (for rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of diuers of the learned, may, not without good reason, be giuen to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one river, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable passages into famous amous Countries. And so we may take the word (riuier) verse the tenth for one riuier (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuier, after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bene, diuides it selfe, and ere long yeeldeth fouer notable passages into fucrall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the riuier downeward, there is conycaunce into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria, were vp Tigris.

- To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuier of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or walneth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vsed this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malech, (by interpretation) Basillus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia, whence ariseth the name of Pasitigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the land of Hauila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nahar-fares, or Nar-rag-is; for Nahar-rag-is: both which names signifie flumen deriuatum (a riuier deriued) also Aeracusius, quasi Rarusus, by reason of the froggie fenues which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldaea and Arabia, and it is lost length in the Lakes of Chaldaea. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper frame of Pison, or Basillus, which runneth into Hiddekel properly so called (that is, into Tigris) about Selencis, where it leweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigris, hauing before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the Bodie of the Riuier Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a riuier, or riuiers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not farr from these Riuers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we finde, that Tigris is the Riuier of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chief Citie was Nimue, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nimue, which was the chief Citie of Assyria.

And as for the kinde of speech here vsed in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuers be (properly) their fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aque (saith VLPIANVS) illud est, unde aqua nascitur, si ex fonte nascatur fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a fountain, then is the fountain taken for the head: if out of a lake, then the lake; and if from a maine riuier any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new banks, there is that part of the riuier, where the branch first seeketh the maine streame, called the head of the riuier.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

- 150 T may also be demanded, whether this region of Eden, by vs described, be of such fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the seate of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulnessse to any part of the earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before

before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First in Heraclitus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe, for the Iste of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Ninive, and so from Musal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat, Hac regio, omnium quas nos uisibimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward. Cereus autem fructu procreando odori ferax est, ut nunquam non ferre ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corn, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaues of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are euen in length like unto trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme-trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both meates, and wine, and hommie, ordering them as the Fig-trees. Thus saith Heraclitus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & md. & uinum, & actum conficiunt, of which these people make bread, wine, hommie, and vineger. But Antonius the Eremitic findeth a fifth commoditie, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine flaxe, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true Athansius in the life of Antonius the Eremitic confesseth, saying: That he received a garment made thereof from the Eremitic himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeede the Earth yeeldeth no plant comparable to this) those trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any trees of the field. Santian (saith STRABO) paphim per omnem regionem Palmæ sua sponte nascentes, There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report. Euntibus à parte leua Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis, regia campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam uere & pingui solo, ut à pastore repellit pecora dicantur, ne sattet. as perimat, (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plentie of sweet odours) there heeth a champaigne Countrey placed betwene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are said to drue their cattell from the pasture, lest they should perishe by satietie. Bis in anno segetes Babylonij fecant, The Babylonians cut their corne twice a year (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northern parts; so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of Armenia, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his wordes be these in the Latine, Tota enim hac regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq. semper uirentibus, This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and trees alwaies greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found else where but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life and firrer vp of nature in a perpetuall actiuitie. In briefe so great is the fertilitie of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their cornfields, and a third time to eate them vp with sheep: which husbandrie the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first foure yeares, could not make our kinde of Wheate beare seede, but it grew vp as high as the trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weedes (saith Phinio) who addeth this singularity to that soile, That the second yeare the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the seedes againe) yeeldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his wordes are these: Proteritis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitubilis suis seges.

Plin. nat. h. §. 1. 1. 17.

§. XIII.

of the River Pijon, and the Land of Hauilah.

FTER the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pijon and Gebon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certainty of these two riuers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for 10 Euphrates or Tigris, or both be that riuers of Eden, which water Paradise, which riuers or riuers Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pijon, the other Gebon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, then when we find both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two riuers as farre distant, as any of fame knowne or discouered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plaine, that these riuers were diuided into foure branches; and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability resembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds to finde some partakers or sectarous, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherishe such weake babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the riuers of Pijon) seemeth to haue growne out of the not distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush; and Hauilah in India from Hauilah the sonne of Iofan, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah and his sonnes after the flood.

30 For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the sonnes of Iofan were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which later (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Iofan, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous riuers of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pijon, which riuers is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure riuers, named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous riuers after Tigris and Euphrates, they choie out this riuers to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is an other riuers,

40 whome in these respects they should rather haue chosen then Ganges; for the riuers Indus on this side India, for beautie, for nearnesse, and for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads: seeing Indus commeth betweene it and Tigris; and betweene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther toward the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betweene those two proud riuers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse then 50 fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely whosoever readeth the Stone of Alexander shall finde, that there is no riuers in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Alexander was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe and the greatest part of his armie, and in sailing downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was readie to be swallowed vp therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, hauing besides this, the Riues of Coxus, of Smellus, Acesines, Adrius, (otherwise Hirotkis) Hispalus, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed vp with all their children and companions, which being all incorporate and made one streame, it crosseth atwarth Asia, and then at Cambata vilteth the Ocean Sea.

GEO. 2. 15.

But because Pison, which compasseth Hauilab, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, mult somewhere beioyned with the rest in one bodie, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Countrie of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceed, out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the vttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the Riuer Ganges riseth out of the mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucasus, which diuides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the same Armenia, by the Gordian mountaines, so as Ganges: who onely traueleth in her owne India, and Nilus through Aethiopia and Aegypt, neuer leaue the land of Eden, or ioyned themselves in one Channell, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or diuided into lower heads or branches, according to Moses.

GEO. 2. 13.

Therefore the Riuer Pison, which enrictheth Hauilab, is the same which by ioyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Piso-tigris, or Piso-tigris, of Pison and Tigris, which riuer watereth that Hauilab, which Hauilab the sonne of Cush gaue name vnto, and not Hauilab of India, so called of Havilah the sonne of Iocatan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Hauilab of the Cushites hath also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a tree, of the bignesse of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plentie, which yeeldeth a certaine gumme, sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Beronius affirmeth, that Bala in Hebrew signifieth Pearle: so doth Enguburnus, and Mierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing gumme, or pearle: Hauilab, or Susiana hath plentie of both. Now this Countrie of Susiana or Hauilab stretcheth itselfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules; and from thence embraceth all that Tract of land Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the Cittie of Tyre, according to Ezechiel) their great plentie of gold, which Strabon saith witnesseth, as was shewed before.

Struch.
Moyse de Per.

The Greeces had a conceipt, that Pison was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (Elyth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia translataeth Pison into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibilitie that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellepont and all Asia the lesse, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pison which runneth through Hauilab or Susiana, doth to this day retain some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embrace each other vnder the Cittie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioyned and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange vnto me, that from so great antiquitie there should be found remaining any resembling found of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these riuers, is by some writers knowne by the name of Banbas, as by Positellus, by Calladus, of Baldus: by Barius, of Bagdad, and of Bongedor, by Andrew Thevet; and yet all those that haue lately seene it, call it Bagdet. To this riuer of Pison, Ptolomee indeed with many others giue the name of Basilus, or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-sarec and Marsias, and Badsares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and fountain, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Iunius Puckperath, out of the Hebrews, (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: wher it breaketh through the mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the da: the Hebrewes Parab, (sayth Ar. Montanus;) Pagruus, Perath: Iosephus, Phorab; Eusebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalybeus: Gillolanus and Colutus terme it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar, but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affryans know it by the name of Armalchar or Naber Malcha: but now commonly it is called Fras.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as, Diqla, and Diqlath, Scilax, and Solax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mereer vpon Cenesis conceiveth rightly of these rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (sayth he) streame into fower branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gebon. Thereason, why these two rivers ioyned in one (below Spania) looke their names, and are called Fis-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gebon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea, not farr from V, the Cittie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pison doth.

This error that Pison was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, whose filds though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes; and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For 20 Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followeth, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilab: so was Gebon drawne into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Hauilab, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsely interpreted Ethiopia) fastned to it on the other side, wee shall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of nuers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cush the sonne of Ham first sate downe with his sonnes, Sheba, Hauilab, Sabitab, Rasonab, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilab, the sonnes of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gebon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Ischan, Ophir, and Hauilab, seated themselves as neare together as they could in India, so did the sonnes of Cush and Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilab or Chauilab was first Chuseta of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Hauilab vnto the Desarts of Sur, did the Israeletes and Amalechites possess all the interiacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalechites from Hauilab to Sur: which Sur the Chaldean Paraphrasist conceureth Hegra, and Hegra bordereth the redde Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the redde Sea, to Hauilab in the East India, for Saul was no such traualer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilab must 30 be found nearer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which Countrie Saul waiked: for Amalek and the Amalechites possess that necke of Countrie, between the Persian Sea, and the redde Sea; Hauilab being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South; and they sprede themselves with the Madianites and Emmons, from the East part, or backe-side of the Holie Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best parts of Arabia Petraea, and Deserta.

Of the River Gehon and the land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Æthiopia for Cush. 2. Chron. 21. 16.

NOW, as Hauilah in the East India drew Pislon so farre out of this way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seuentie translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Æthiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latins followed, Gehon consequently was citemed for Nilus. But Æthiopiens are, as much as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countie is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Ægypt. And although there be many other regions of Æthiopiens, and far South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Ægyptian Stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Ægypt: all which Æthiopiens are very neare, or else directly vnder the Æquinoctiall line, which is very farre from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any fort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this Translation of the Septuagint. Pererius doth qualifie in this manner. There are (saith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now becaufe there is no colour to make Cush Æthiopian Africa, Pererius will make Cush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petras, and a part of Arabia the happie, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Æthiopia.

Gen. 35. 18.

Now if it be graunted, that Cush and the land of the Chusites, be that Tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitauit Ismael ab Hauilah usque Sur, qua respicit Ægyptum introeuntibus Assyrias, Ismael dwelt from Hauilah vnto Sur, that is towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Assyria; The same sufficeth to proue that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a river which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture Habitauit Ismael, &c. hath this sense. Ismael dwelt from Hauilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Countie bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those regions betwene the border of Ægypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zearab the Chusite, which others call Tharantus, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had beene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Ægypt, betwene Palaestina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King

Zearab round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Cittie of the Æthiopiens, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disprouing it: And Abraham departed thence toward the South Countie, and dwelt betwene Cadets and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar; Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feete after they passed the redde Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had bene weary, and vnable to resist. Againe, in the Storie of Isaac it is written. Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech, and the Philistines vnto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Æthiopiens. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these wordes: Then the border of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeede, howeouer Pererius doth with an honest excuse salue his Translation of Cush for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint, and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they

they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his first Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Author, of these two Ethiopia's. But the East Ethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssinies, vnder Prester Iohn, And the West Ethiopia is that, which joyneth it selfe with the riuier Niger, which we call Senega and Gambria: for thereabouts are these Ethiopians, called Perousi, Daraites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Deserts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lie due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Ethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moses when he serued Pharao, in the warres against the Ethiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Ethiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Ethiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the worlds plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and laeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet IEREMIE. And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Aegypti, et bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith Pererius, professing Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sicbar, quae significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith PERRIUS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sicbar, which significeth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Ethiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latin call a Medianite, and not Ethiopijsan, as (with Iosephus) the Genea conuers it, though it helpe it a little with a marginal note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrie of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from Pharao into the land of Madian, and sate downe by a Well, &c. and againe, in the third of Exodus, When Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro V. his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, these four nations are euery where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Medianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chinites, which were all in one general word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27 & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Medianites sold Ioseph to Putiphari, Pharao's steward. The Geneans, in a marginnall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Medianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, and so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Cammels were laden with spicerie, and Balm, & Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia Felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the world is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chapter it is said: That Putiphari bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrase in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the 6. of Isaies. That when Israel had sowed, then came vpon the Medianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Medianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Medianites and Amalekites, are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the storie of Geleon, the Medianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites.

and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedon desired, that every man would give him the golden ear-rings, which they had taken, after the victorie against Zebah and Zalmanna, Kings of Aravia, amounting to 1700 lighthels of gold; is written: For they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and cur in action of warre. Manus eius contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Sehemita. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Deserts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vlc poison vpon their arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Deserts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Ethiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made most apparent, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Iehoram, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Ethiopia; so Hierome reads it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Ethiopsians. Now, how farre it is off betwene the Philistines, and the Negro's, or the Ethiopsians, every man that looketh in a Map, may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians, doe mixe and joyne with the land of the Chusites, and are distant from Ethiopia about two and thirtie, or three and thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next Neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Deserts of Sur and Pharan, are betwene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue beene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Iehoram, the spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Ethiopia in sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Stevchiv) but Ethiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia.

Now may we thinke it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so wel, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon he would haue called the Riuer (into which he was cast vpon reeds, and preferred by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharao) a Riuer of Egypt, wherein hee was borne and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides the riuer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had bene a Riuer of Paradise, they might iustly haue thought, that he had denied them: for they had liued there all daies of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memorie, or speech thereof; except we shall beleue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wild Oliues in stead of golden apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichon, once in Egypt, and once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a riuer of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any cōmunion or affaires with the Ethiopsians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies, which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and Heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Calesyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalimcs, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many 50 others: yea, Hiersalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the daies of Moses euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stonie, which the Chusites inhabit red in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Berolus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my understanding) to create two riuers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I finde none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Riuer hee also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus: so where to finde them else where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginarie: for the Current by Gaza is but a small stream, rising betweene it and the red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twentie English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere neighbours, and neuer looked back to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the flood, Chus and his children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shtinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. Hauilah took the riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hauilah, (now Susiana): Raamah and Sheba farther downe the riuer, in the entrance of Arabia Felix. Nimrod located himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in proccesse of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westlerly towards the red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Aegypt, in which Traet the Chusites remained for many yeares after. Now because there could be no such riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Aethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that Bryte, or who soeuer else that first peopled this Island, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and calling the Island after his name Britannia, it might be layd that Thames or Tems was a riuer, that watered Britannia; and when afterwards in proccesse of time, the same Bryte had also discoouered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that Europa, the daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoouers thereof arriued in the mouth of some riuer in Crete, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discoouered, shall we in like sort resolute, that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it layd by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole land of Chus; but not the whole land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue bene Maisters in time, (as the Saracens which came of them were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of fower Citties, (to witt) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalbe, yet we finde, that his Successours within a few yeares after commanded all the whole world in effect: and the fame of Babel confumed the memorie of Chusca. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Chus in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fitted to the Soile and Territory by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that CHVS or any of his could in hast creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130 yeares after the flood had (as it were) fortified with thickets, and permitted euery bush and brier, reede and tree to ioyne themselues (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the worlds plantation, we shall finde, that euery familie feared themselves as nere together as possible they could; and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselues, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they with this aduise, as that they might at a times resort, and succour one another by riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So NIMROD, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion ouer the rest, late downe in the very confluence of all those riuers, which watered Paradise; for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of NOAHs children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankinde had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of men ADAM, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankinde NOAH, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as NIMROD the yongest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleaned and enriched; so did HAVILAH place himselfe vpon Peso-tigris: RAAMAH and his sonne SHEBA further downe vpon the same riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: CHVS himselfe vpon Gebon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselues farther off, yet they alwaies fastned themselues to the riuers sides: for Ninive, Chartan, Reseph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded vpon these nauigable riuers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembered.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

BVt now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our earth and habitable world, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Armenianorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35 degrees from the Aequinoctiall, and 55 from the North pole: in which Climate the most excellent wines, fruites, oyle, graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellencie of this sayd soile and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein foucer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: this tree alone giueth into man what foucer his life begetteth at Natures hand. And though it may be sayd, that these trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer, yet lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous thunders and lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous beasts and wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will be found no comparison betweene the one and the other.

What other excellencies this garden of Paradise had before God, (for mans ingratitude and crueltie, cursed the earth) we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular garden exceede all parts of the vniuersall world, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow grow the trees, of Life, of Knowledge; Plants only proper, and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne world: some, about the middle Region of the aire: some, elevated neare the Moone: others, as farre South as the Line, or as farre North, as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Cuttles in the aire, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of India, that God planted this garden, which Eden we finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we finde that both Tigris and Euphrates Swimming through Eden doe ioine in one, and afterward taking wayes apart doe water Chus and Hauilah, according to Moses: the true seats of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nemrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrarie: for that which was neuer ioined cannot be diuided. Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Riuers of Eden; That Gebon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossible, and this Riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betwene Tigris and Ganges about foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the world; but Nilus is begotten in the mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauaileth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, three score and three degrees the one from the other. In this lease following I haue added a Chorographical description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceeding discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labours may but recieue an allowance suspended vntill such time as this description of mine

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

p. I.

That the tree of Life was a material tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

Or eating the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradise, in exilium vita temporalis, into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That the trees of Life and Knowledge were material trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slipperie, as nothing can fasten them, haue in this also deliuered to the world an imaginarie doctrine.

The tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plural construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum vitarum, The tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a property, to preferue both the growing, sensitiue, and ratiollall life of man; and not only (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also giuen adurefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a bodie compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perih and rot, by the vnchanged law of God imposed on his creatures, Man (notwithstan ding) should haue enjoyed thereby a long, health full, and vngriued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the flood, the daies of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeares; and soon after the flood of two hundred yeares and vpwards euen to fiue hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandment, the liues of men on earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue concuded. Chryssostome, Rupertus, Toletus, and others were of beliefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his posteritie had bene immortal. But such is the infinite wisdome of God, as he foresaw that the Earth could not haue contained mankind; or else, that Millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chryssostome must be vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kinde or Species this tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue concuded, that the same was not material; but a mere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisdome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercometh, to eat of the Tree of life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place S. Augustines answerc may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a ter-

terrestrial Paradise, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sars were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the maide and wife of Abraham, were more foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth every tree faire to sight, and sweet to taste; the tree also of life in the midst of the garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandment produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others steale the invention of the created world, so from the Garden of Paradise, they took the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the tree of Lill, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitye; and therefore said to be the meate and drinke of the Gods.

§. II.

OF BECANUS his opinion that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

20 NOW for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could cuer ghesse at, whereat Goropius much maruaileth. But as he had an inuentiue braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely howfoeuer his opinion may be valued, yet he vsurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention bear that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-cephas fastened on this come thre about fise hundred yeares before Becanus was borne: and Bar-cephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Authour Philozenus 30 Aburgensis, and others, whose very wordes Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that beliefe. For Moses Bar-cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 49.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, the Indian Fig-tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the banks of Acelines, one of the Riues which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies in, or neare the Kingdome of Parus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree se temper serens, auias planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troupe of horsemen may hide themselves vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downward, and leaues no lesse than a shield. Aristobolus affirmeth that fiftie horsemen may shadde themselves vnder one of these trees. Oncersitus raisth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie and Oncersitus confirme: to the trunk of which these Authours giue such a magnitude as I thinke to repeat. But it may be, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a Plant, as Becanus conceiue, who because he found it no where else, would needs draw the garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the riue Acelines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Vallie, not farre from Puwin America. They 50 grow in moist grounds, and in this manner. After they are first thrt vp some twentie or thirtie foote in length, (some more, some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large toppes, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme: for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummiu iuyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or finnew, and within a few Moneths reacheth the ground;

ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the toppe boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this corde maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding battily. From the vmoth boughes of these young trees there fall againe the like cordes, which in one yeare and lesse (in that world of a perpetuall spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the nether part of a launce, and as it straight, as art or nature can make any thing, causing such a shade, and making such a kinde of groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now one of these trees considered with all his young ones may (indeede) throwe foure hundred or foure thousand horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breed, intangled in their beddes, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene siue hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauailed a dozen miles together vnder them; but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This tree (saith he) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the tree of Knowledge of good and euill is described to be.

Secondly, this tree hauing so huge a trunk (as the former Authours report, and Becanus beleue) it was in this tree that Adam and Eue hidde themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could containe them. But first it is certaine, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the wordes of Moses translated in medio ligni, are by all the interpreters vnderstood in the plural number, (that is) in the midst of the trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Eucyphus, word for word) is, that when Adam and Eue found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeede) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being possit with shame did not runne vp and downe the garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinie auoweth in these wordes; Latitudo foliorum petas effigiem Amazonia habet, The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets

Here Becanus desireth to be beleued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed discouerie, vling this confident (or rather cholericke) speech. Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hac à nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum MOSES narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, quæcum illa magis quadret, Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of MOSES, as to daro to auow, that any other tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith. But for my selfe, because I neither finde this tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beleefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: only thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quin ad commendandum para. ad Augst de ciuit. simplici Obedientia bonum, Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodnesse of pure and simple Obedience. Da. l. 13. cae.

§. III.

BVt in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few wordes. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man, grow straight and vpright towards God, vntill such time as hee had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creatour; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he beganne to bend downward, and stouped towards the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbraiousnesse of this tree he compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, we haue all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to finde among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith he) to the little vertue, and vnpercieued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate, so are the delights and pleasures of the world, most pleasing while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choller and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to be their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodnesse, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, bodie, and boughes of this tree, by so much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of powr and worldly abilitie surpass the meane: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becoming the vnworthiest shrubbe, and humblest bryar, or the poorest and basest man, then such a flourishing statelinesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobayed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintaine which wee vse so many vncharitable and cruell practises in this world.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill; with some other notes touching the Storie of ADAMS sinne.

NOw, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propriety of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-cephas an ancient Syrian Doctour (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had beene ignorant before; but as Janus also noteth, Arbor scientie boni & mali (id est) experientie boni & mali ab euen- tu, The Tree of Knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the e- uent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created plant, out of whose seede all men liuing haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortali- ty from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobaying of Gods commandment was the fearfulllest euill, and the obser- uation of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health doe (not- withstanding) conceiue, that sicknesse is grieuous, and yet in no such degree of tor- ment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe thereof in himselfe another terror then he had forethought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the honour of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in bodie and minde; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and there- fore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect; for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this tree was called the tree of Know- ledge, by cause of the euent (as is aforesaid) so was the Well of contention therefore called Eskel, and the Well of hatred Sitnah, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of stones, called the heape of witness, betwene Jacob and Laban, not that the stones bare witness, but for a memorie of the couenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel: and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Vincents, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceived in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his illues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the sup- posed glorie which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transpor- ted and blowne forward by the gentle winde of pleasing persuasions vnwares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very roote, which he moistned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

But what meanes did the Deuill finde out, or what instruments did his owne sub- tletie present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; so as by Adams hearkening to the voice of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandment of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subiect of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a Counsellour. But because she had obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (saied God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sor- row shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beastes, into whom the Deuill entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her disobedience: euen a desire to know what was most vntingher knowledge, an affection which hath euer since remained in all the posteritie of her Sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her persuasions? euen the same cause which hath moulded all men since to the like consent, namely an vnwillingnesse to grieue her and make her sadde, least she should pine and be ouercome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Sa- lomon the sonne of Dauid Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest

This word Nod or Naid Sr. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandering, or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Seuentie conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrie, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a vagabond or wanderer in his cogitations, then any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the murder committed justly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And who soeuer findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding; and we call those people wanderers and vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his first borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ and of the Iewes; and that as Cain, after that he had slaine Abel vnjustly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the world: so the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes haue neuer since any certaine Estate, Commonweale, or Prince of their owne vpon the earth. Now this land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular people or Nation. For all these, in what part of the world soeuer, which in old time liued by pastorage, and fedde (as we call it in Ireland) vpon white meate without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes Nomades, and by the Latines Pastores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Nymidiains in Africa, the ancient Brittains, and the Northern Irish: yea such were the inhabitants of Italie it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the husbandrie of tillage vsed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Affryna, called by Ptolomie, Calens, which also might be deriued of Caena, the Countrie of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written *Gen. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, Eve, and at the East side of the garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitive, wee can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Enoch, the first of the world, which he inclosed either for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as for mine owne opinion I am resolued with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (vagabond) which Cain vsed of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as traileth in feare of reuengement: for who soeuer findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me; or else (vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.*

And because these Henochians, so called of the Citie Enoch, were the first Societic and ciuill assemblie of all other, it is likely that the same of these people (either for erudite, strength, or other actions) liued in the memorie of Noah and his sonnes; so that

Of MOSES his omitting sundry things concerning CAINS generation.

BVt of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Cittie of Enoch in prophane storie, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some few objections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance then his sonne Enoch) to performe such a worke as the building of a Cittie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious race) Moses vseth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine reason, seeing that he containeth the whole storie of the first race, 20 which wasteth by the least account 1656. yeares, in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakert reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and meanes to build many such Citties as Enoch, be the capacite answering to what other of the world fouer: for in what age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his issues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a Cittie: so was it said of Noah, that his three sonnes peopled all the world; but in both the processe of time required to be vnderstood: which aduise seeing Moses vseth where the spacelisse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the birth of Abel, and oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or a fine dierum (that is) in processe of time it came to passe that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased he built the Cittie of Enoch or Enoch. 30

6. 6. 5.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that he built the Temple of Ierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that he employed in that worke 150000. labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say, The King inuaded; when he caused an inuasion to be made: and he built, 40 when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing we finde, that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains issues, it is not to be maruailed at, why he also passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his wife, who conceiued and bare Enoch, and he built a Cittie, and called the name of the Cittie after the name of his sonne Enoch. And to Enoch was borne Irad, and Irad begat Methuiahel, and Methuiahel begat Methuiahel, and Methuiahel Lamech.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre other wife, and in this manner. And Seth lived 105. yeares, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807. 50 yeares, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: so as all the daies of Seth were 912. yeares, and he died: as for the yeares and times of the wicked they were not numbered in libro uincetium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate generation (as afore said.) Of the line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembereth but eight generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the line of Adam by Setb ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth :

¶ I. ADAM.

- | | |

| 2. Cain . | 2. Setb . |
| 3. Henoch . | 3. Enofh . |
| 4. Irak . | 4. Canaan . |
| 5. Mahisael . | 5. Mahaleel . |
| 6. Mathusalem . | 6. Irad . |
| 7. Lamech , who by Ada had | 7. Henoch . |

| Tubalcain , and Noema . | 9. Lamech , and |
| | 10. Noah . |

These be the generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention : but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech three score and seenteene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two wiues Ada, and Silla: and to these three sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Pastorage, of Mulicke, and the working in metall; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and brought them into herds and droues : Tubal inuented Mulicke, and Tubalcain the working in brasse and yron: the one being addicted to husbandrie, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to idleness and pleasure. In whom be-ganne these three manner degrees of Sheep-herds, handy-crafts-men, and Militians.
And in the issues of Setb beganne the seruices of God, Diuinitie, Prophecie, and Astronomie: the children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

¶ IIII.

Of the diuersities in the ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their children.

Second scruple hath bene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their children at so diuers ages, as Canaan or Cenur at se-centie yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at three score and nine yeares, whereas Irad begat not any of his vntill he was 162. yeares old: Mathusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bene the more enforced, because it cannot be coniectured, that either Irad, Mathusalem, or Lamech obtained from marriage out of the religion of abstinence, seeing that Enoch was translated by God for his singular sanctities, begat children before he was three score and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hercof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the generations before the flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the line of Noah from Setb, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors were they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Irad, nor Lamech the first borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrarie, but that Noah might haue had many sonnes before Shem, Ham, and Iaphet, though these three were only named, and suruiuing, and which by God were referred to be the Fathers of mankind after the flood; and therefore when we finde Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at three score and ten yeares who was the first sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. yeares of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reictheth all the other sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah as afore said.

forefaid. Of this S^t. Augustine hath somewhat else in his 20. and 21. Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the generations of the first age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him, so doth S^t. Matthew recite the Genealogie of Christ, not by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first borne, who haue hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitorie only; and therefore the Euangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esaue the elder; neither is Christ deniued from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simcon, or Leui, but from Juda a fourth brother, and so from Dauid a younger sonne of Iesse; and lastly we finde, that the Kingdome it selfe of Juda was not giuen to the Heire in nature, but to the Heire of grace, namely Salomon.

§. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

He third obiection is, that the great difference of yeares betweene those of the first age, whereof some of them had well neare scene a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-ages, seeing that soone after the flood inliued not a third part of that time, and in succeeding ages and to this day not the tenth.

They that haue hereon resolued that those yeares were but Lunarie yeares, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Aegyptian yeares, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the yeare of his life 105. if those yeares bee taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeares and one Moneth when he begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh haue the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time haue bene but sixe yeares and fortie eight weekes old; and so it may be gathered of the rest; excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kinde, as were the trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and seede. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an abilitie of generation at 6. 7. or 8. yeares, agreeth with the short liues of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the world, had length of daies and abilitie of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunarie yeares, then there would follow this extreme, that those which liued longest, and vpwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of foure score and ten and odde yeares, which were not only lesse by farre then the Patriarchs liued after the flood, but short of many mens liues in this decrepitate of the world, wherein many exceede foure score, and some hundred yeares. Further (if neede bee) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunarie yeares) makes but seenteene and an halfe of our yeares.

And if we seeke for a cause of this long life in nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equall strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seede there must of necessity spring vp the fairest and fruitfulllest Plants. Secondly, the earth it selfe was then much lesse corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and foode for man, without any such mixture of harmefull qualitie, as since that time the curse of God for the crueltie of mans heart brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the flood infused such an impuritie, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Hearbes, and fruits vpon the earth received a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of strength, and another other of weakenesse, a youth and beautie, and then age and deformitie: so Time it selfe (vnder the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worn out that liuely vertue of Nature in Men, and Beasts, and Plants; yea the Heuens them selves being of a most pure and cleauesd matter shall waxe old as a garment, and then much more the poorer generatue in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operative vertue from the superiour.

But besides the old age of the world, how faire doth our education and simplicitie of liuing differ from that old time: the tender bringing vp of children, first fedde, and nourished with the milke of a strange Dugge; an vnnatural curiolitic hauing taught all women (but the begger) to finde out Nurseries, which necessitie only ought to commend vnto them: The hasty marriages in tender yeares, wherein, Nature being but yet greene and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her selfe hath not yet any roote sufficient to maintaine her owne toppe; and such halfe-ripe feedes (for the most part) in their growing vp wither in the buddle, and waxe old euen in their infancie. But aboue all things the exceeding luxuriousnesse of this gluttonous age, wherein we presse nature with ouerweightie burdens, and finding her strength defectiue we take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of strong waters, hot spices, and prouoking sawces, of which Lucan hath these elegant Verles:

O prodigaverum.

*Lucan*us, nunquam paruo contenta paratu:
Et quasterum terra pelagoq; ciborum
Ambitiosa famas, & laus gloria mensa,
Discite quam paruo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura petat.
Non auro myrrhâque bibunt: sed gurgite puro
Vita redit: fatiis eii populus stuuusq; Ceresq;

O wastefull Riot, neuer vvell content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of cares by land and sea farre fetclit and sent;
Vaine glorie of a table sumptuous,
Learne vvith how little life may be preferred.
In Gold and Myrrhe they neede not to carroule;
But vvith the brooke the peoples thirst is ferued:
Who fedde vvith bread and vvater are not ferued,

The Ægyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect bodie vvaxeth and growth to strength liue yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decaith and vvithereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twentie yeares and Berosus to a hundred and fteuent yeares. These opinions Plinie repealeth and reprovveth, producing many examples to the contrarie. In the last taxation, number and reuiew of the eighth Region of Italie, there vvcre found in the roll (saith Plinie) foure and fiftie persons of an hundred yeares of age: seuen and fiftie of an hundred and ten; two, of an hundred and fteue and twentie; foure, of an hundred and thirtie; as many that vvcre hundred and fteue and thirtie; or hundred and seuen and thirtie yeares old: and last of all three men of an hundred and fortie: and thus search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Sonne.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Essians gaue them long account of many yeares: so did it to the Secretaries of Ægyptian ceremonies, to the Persians, Macedonians and Indian Brahmins. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Ægeon liued threeages, and Tiresias sixe, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the lesse Asia little left: Also Mesmissa of Nemidus liued very long, and Dando of Ilyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeares (saith Ephorus) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeares: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous, Iosephus bringeth many witnesses with himselfe, as Marathon, Beolus, Meolus, Ephus, Elicronymus, Egyptius, Hecataus, Ephorus, and others. And Antonius Fane an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indy presented to Solyman, General of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeares. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Meagher in Munster, who liued in the year 1589. and many yeares since, who was married in Edward the fourth time, and held her loynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness. Strozzius Cigogna, out of Torquemada Massian, and the like Authours, telleth of some that have not only farre exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference betwene the abilitie of men in those daies wherein Golden the Phisition liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what needes we are in respect of those Cedars of the first age. For Golden did ordinarily let bloud fixe pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stoppe at fixe ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thinne aire, and temperate vse of diet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on aire we feede alwaies and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heauey loade of abundance, wherewith we oppresse and ouercharge Nature, maketh her to linke vnawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writ before the flood.

Fourth scruple hath beene made. How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storie thereof written; and if any such had beene, yet it is conceiued, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the vniuersall flood.

But if we consider the curiositie and policie of elder ages, we shall find that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, asiewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posteritie equally zealous, Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo, From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiue) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but withall secretiorem & veran legis enarrationem, a more secret and true explanation of the Law, which (saith he out of the same Authours), he deliuered by mouth to Josuah, and Josuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora to the rude multitude were no other quam dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere margaritas, then to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast pearles before swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisdome began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and letters bearing the forme of beastes, birds, note: knowledge would be very hard from v bulgare 273 277 430 but 1 430

birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such, as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jewes was an imitation; the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercennius, Cadmus, and others, but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law receiv'd by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptum in Latine, and a receiving in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids & Bards of our ancient Brittaines, and of latter times by the Irish Chroniclers called Hymer. If then such as would seeme wisest in the use of reason wil not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then used) be deliv'ed vnto him by a more certaine presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successours: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successours, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred fortie and three yeeres, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse then five hundred yeeres: and before Noah died Abraham was fiftie and eight yeeres old; from whence this knowledge by an ealie and ordinarie way might come to Israd, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the use of letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and Bricke by Enoch: of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remained euen in his time, (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba: (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that hee had seen and read some whole pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation and storie of the first age, seeing hee might recite it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before hee wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beza, Procopius, Guzen, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prouoe them unwritten traditions, alleageth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which hee reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was deliv'ed by Tradition from the Jewes. But I rather thinke with Peregrinus that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by heretikes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquity thereof; and out of that place of Michael contending with the deuil about the body of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is that neither Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scriptisae quidem nonnulla diuina ENOCHII: septiman ab ADAM negare non possumus: That ENOCH the seventh from ADAM did write diuers diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, & of fables of Giants supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaeo (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might bee preserved by Noah. Surdy that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Iude no man can denie; denie; how they were deliuered to posteritie I know not, whether by the Iewes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the heauens, and of the naturcs and coniunctions of the Starrs; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zorastier, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had scene and might preferre this booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath bene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age; be it by letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the vndoubted word of God neede of any other proofe then selfe-authoritic.

of the men of renouwe before the flood.

NOw let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men beganne to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publike: For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creatour, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men beganne publicly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publike manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the soine of Seth to the time of Enoch the soine of Iared there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses leath of Noah. NOAH was a iust and vpright man in his time, and NOAH walked with God. The Sequentie conuert it, ENOCH placuit Deo: HENOCII placet God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (tulit eum Deus:) scilicet, mortuus est, God tooke him away (that is) he died, which (indeede) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when hedied; yet the difference which Moses maketh betwene the pietie of Enoch and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which hevfeth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not disfolued as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, And he died; but of Enoch he spake otherwile, saying only, he was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Epistle to the Hebrewes) quis Deus eum transtulit, And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is exprefly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kinde of changing, which S. Paul promiffeth when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all die, but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Diuines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methusalem and Lamech, remembreing (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saying that Lamech prophecied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his familie) preferred, because he was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warre, peace, gouernment, and pollicie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in bodie and wit, there is no memorie remaining: whose Stories if they had bene preserved, and what else was then performed in that new world of the world, there could nothing of more delight haue bene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of bodie and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisdom and vndertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner beginne to know, but we beginne to die according to Hippocrates.

- 10 Vita breuis, ars longa, scopus paucus, (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is briefe. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses, These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renoune. But these men of renoune (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of bodie and crueltie of minde) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the pietie of Seth, and the waies wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, only V. 5 euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersall, when the children and sonnes of God, (or of the godly) were corrupted and mist by their idolatrous wiues, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men louing themselves and the world only.

- 20 That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely Lactantius and Eusebius mislead by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers and very needlesse: the question being vn capable of dispute, especially since St. Chrysostome and St. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that god and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ 30 witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer forsake the glorious presence of their Creatour, and become Inubi, or Suscubi, contrarie both to nature and grace, were more then madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in latter times.

- 40  F these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Gorapius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall then the bodies of Nomrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strained his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (who soeuer desires to loose time) he may finde them in the Treatise before named. It is true that Cyriillus reproues the Græcian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamefully, That the Giants haue in elder times not only cast vp mountains vpon mountains, but removed 50 islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp hills, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nomrod, as before remembred; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the the Earth the daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subject) thus changed into Latine.

*Nomine cadesse illos dixere Gigantes
Orti quod terrâ fuerint & sanguine caeli.*

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heuven, they came,
Whome thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opinators and self-beleeving men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times since? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue straining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to oppressours and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them oppressours because they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppress, then say, That they were called Giants onely, because oppressours. For first Moses himselfe calleth them mightie men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vndertaking and aduenturous action. And if the same stature of body, and abilitie had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly hearkned to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referre to accompanie the Giants of Albion in the Storie of Britaine) the Scriptures doe clearly and without all allegorickal construction auow, That besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosias, and of Dauid; namely the Rephaims in Asterath, the Zuc-ai or Zamsummims in Han, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the land of Maab: whom Moses (for stature) comparcth with the Anakims; likewise where Moses speaketh of the land of Ammon, he vseth these words. That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein sometimes; and, whome the Ammonites call Zamsummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asterath and Karnaim, and the Zuc-ai or Zamsummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouerthrew, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giant-like stature, whome he comparcth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oaks; and the Prophet Beruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Basan, that his bedde of yron was nine cubits long, and foure cubits broad: for onely Og King of Basan remained of the remnants of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, foure hundred years after the expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreouer those discoverers and searchers of the Land of promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarre in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words. All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sonnes of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our sights like grasse-hoppers, and so we were in their sight, (that is) the searchers found in their owne iudgements a mutual difference betwene the Anakims and themselves: in so much that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to returne againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slaueerie, then to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations. Furthermore the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath was a Giant of fixe cubits and a spanne long: the armour which he wore weighed five thousand thickles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a weavers beame, and his speare head waighed sixe hundred ^{libres} ~~stones~~ ^{stones} on. Also in Sammel there is mention of another Goliath surnamed Gethiues, because he was of Gath; and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathas, Danide Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure and twentie.

10 All that Samsou was of surpassing strength no man doubteth, who tore a Lion ^{Ind. 14. 6.} as it had bene a Kidde, and after slew thirtie of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a jawbone of an Ass; And lastly he took the gates of Aschob, and the two posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the toppe of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approued by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of time hath (with it selfe) infeebled and almost worn out the vertue of all things, then I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautifull then it did in after-ages: so also thiese Giants, those mightie men, and men of renouwe as farre exceeded the proportion, nature and strength of those Giants remembered by Moses of his owne time, and after him their successours, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in generall, soone after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne 20 in the withered quarter and Winter of the world: If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in crueltie and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to the iust Noah and his familie. And God repented him that he had made man, which St. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui panites, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tan fixa sententia, quam certa prescientia. Sed si non vitatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat querentes, & alit intelligentes, God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done; (as men use to doe) but if the Scripture did not use those wordes or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stirre up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that vnderstand.

of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in fables and old Legends.

¶ I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

BEFORE we proceede any further, the occasion of fereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a mysticall sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those intermixt discourses of God and Nature for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of the most healthfull hearbs and plants (all things hauing in them selves both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth finde out euery where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Storie of the first Age, with all the workes and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely exprect.

¶ I.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the familie of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BEFORE this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberrall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the generall flood could not so walk out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherit the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chal-deans beganne soone after the flood to ascribe diuine powre and honour to the creature,

ture, which was only due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Ægyptians and Phanicians did not only learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue several Gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Hierodotus saith, duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, cosque prius aras, & imagines, & templa Dijs sibi creasse, The Ægyptians (saith he) first dedicated the names of the twelue Gods, which the Greekes received from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the Gods.

¶ III.

That in proesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the grosse superstitions of the Ægyptians.

BVt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander for euermore in vices vnknowne, and daylie trauaile towards their eternall perdition: so did these grosse and blinde Idolaters eury age after other descend lower and lower, and shrunke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby crie in worshipping mortall men only, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, T rees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the minde; to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie Rhodius Anaxandrides denoteth in this manner.

*Bouem colis, ego Deis maïto bouem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obsoniorum credidisti suauissimum.
Carnea suillas tu caues, at gaudeo
His maximè: canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem ubi deprehendo forte obsonium,*

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.
I broile the Ægyptian Feles, which you (as God) implore
You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.
You worship Dogs, to beate them I thinke meete,
When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner I V E N A L.

*Porrum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctos gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!*

Sat. 15. 2. 9.

The Ægyptians thinke it sinne to roote vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holyrite:
O happie Nations, which of their owne sowing Haue store of Gods in eury garden growing.

¶ IIII.

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and fables were invented: and that the first IUPITER was CAIN, VULCAN, TUBALCAIN, &c.

BVt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certaintie, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed or after what antient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of what fouer was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or mettall remaining after the flood, and partly from Miram the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the fame of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings and date of times cannot be fained. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, Mercuries with the rest which St. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many prophane Historians; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obscured, to wit, the Phenicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greekes, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Iupiter was said to haue invented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the world was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochoy before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protogoras, which also Higinus in his 275. chapter confirmeth. For besides that, many Cities were founded by diuers men, Tamen primam latissimam a primo et antiquissimo Ioue edificatam. yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient IUPITER, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden. &c. where also the Henochoy were found after the flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Poleus, a Founder of Cities, and Hercius, an Incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phornutus and Pausanias) and that to Iupiter Hercius there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the flood. Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third booke of lawes: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great flood.

This first Iupiter, of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne sister (as also Iupiter is said to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de orbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henochoy, Philo indus conceiueeth that Cain built sixe others, as Mach, Iared, Tebe, Jesca, Sek, and Gebah; but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the invention of sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal, and Tubalcain (inventors of pastorage, smiths-craft, and musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane writers Mercurius, Vulcan and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naomath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venus, or beautifull Volutas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter, Eua Rhea, and Noema or Naomath the first Venus: so did the fable of the diuiding of the world betweene the three brethren the sonnes of Saturne arise, so from the true story of the diuiding of the earth betweene the three brethren the sonnes of Noah: so also was the fiction of those golden apples kept by a dragon taken from the Serpent, which tempted Eua: so was Paradyse it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the garden of the Hesperides: the propheties, that Christ should breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hyesperides, and descending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus: so out of the taking vpon of Enoch by God was borrowed the conuention of their Heroes (the Inuentors of Religion and such artes as the life of man had profit by) into fables and heauenly signes, and (withall) that leauing of the world, and ascension of Astræa, of which Ouid,

10 For although thereby the Ethnickes would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue failed, as it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is vsuall among the ancient Poets to describe vertues and vices by the persons of men and women as desire by Cupid, valour by Mars, beautie or lult by Venus, so doe they also the persons of men by like vertues and vices; and therefore by Iustice and Astræa, Enoch: the Iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses for Noah was said to bee a iust man; And NOAH walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

20 From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whome Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renouwe) did they steale those wondrous great actes of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their waie vndertaken against the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as St. Augustine termeth him. Which waie of their Giants Cornelius Senerus thus describeth,

*Tentandæ (nefas) olim detrudere mundo

Imperium, & vltio leges imponere caelo.*

30 The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe
And robbing IOVE of his Imperiall crowne
On conquered Heuens to lay their proude command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the Starres, should burie them vnder the moysture of a second flood, but that by this building (if they had bene herein victorions) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and couenants among Heathen nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, wherof Virgil both in the eight and twelfth of his Æneides hath a touch, was as it seemeth borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. We finde also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Enoch and Noah; for Amenophis, the same King of Ægypti, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men mistaking his time supposed) called his sonne and successour Setho, of Seth, and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue graunted) were the Princes of Thrace called 50 Sethes, wherof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Ægyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whome they called a principall Prouince Sethætica. We also find in Bithynia the Cittie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure from the Ægyptians did the Græcians borrow, this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idoles which the Aegyptians did to theirs.

Of the three chiefest IVPITERS; and the strange storie of the third.

BVt of all those Armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other writers haue also done, who fought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Aether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for Aether is as much as thing or pure fire) the other discouered his naturall vertues, which daies and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to bee the sonne of Coelum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third of whom all the Grecian fables were deuised, was of Creete (now Candi-die) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iouans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strayned.
Bocaccius in his genealogie of the Gods conceiueth, that his name was borrow'd from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was gi-uen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduentu-rous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull (that is) giuing these inclinations.
And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions might be called there after Iupiter; but how focuer they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those titles and surnames:
great Princes affecting as high titles of honour and reputation in the world, (how-focuer deserv'd) as the worthiest, that euer were, acquired by their well deseruings.

Iones omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui. The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERS as Tzetzes in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Iones vocarunt omnes: In old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERS. But where this last and most remem-bred Iupiter was borne it is vnertaine. Some there are that make him of Creete: others, that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Oppis, to be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his vncl: because it was conditioned betwene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a yonger brother, and raigning (for his owne life) by Titans permission, he should put to death all his male children, least the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is faimed that Saturne deuoured his owne children.
Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine.

Haec sit pinguior, Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filij.

SATVRNE to be the fatter is not knowne
By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betwene Titan and Saturne, Syllilla also witnesseth in these,

Conceptis verbis; TITAN iurare coegit SATVRNVM, de se natum ne nutriat vllum, Quo possint regnare senis post fata Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: TITAN made SATVRNE swear
No Sonne to nourish; which by raigning might Vsurpe the right of TITANS lawfull Heire,

But

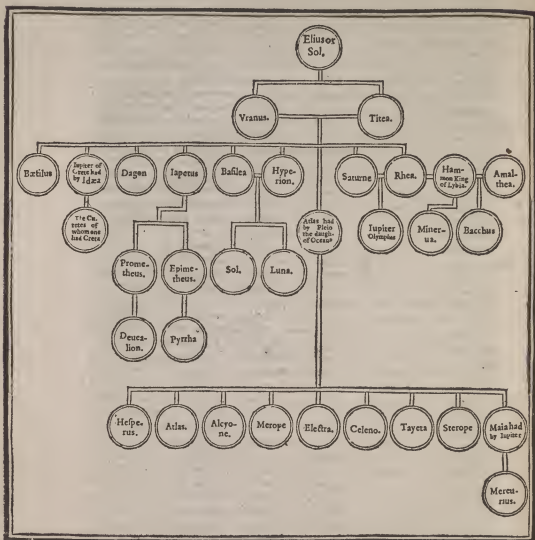

Diod. l. 2. c. 5.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Lybian fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek writers, that the originall of these Gods was from the westerne parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Vranus (which signifieth heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many wiues 45. sonnes; but by his principall wife Tites he had 17. sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of these likewise it is said, that (hee for her goodnesse was canonized as a Goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was tiled Heauen. But of all the children of Tites, her daughter Basilis (which name soundeth as Queene in English, these is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling therin as far in vertues as in yeeres, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being as yet a virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom (hee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sun and Moone. The beautie and towardnesse of these children moued her brethren to enuie, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession; wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne neck; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee died, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that he and his sister by the prouidence of God should become immortal, that also the Sun and Moone should be called by their names, and that their death should be reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and which held her selfe as a Goddesse, and teamed her the great mother, which name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilest they were yong. Hyperion and his race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Vranus diuided the kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chief. Atlas reigned ouer the Countries lying about the mountaines, which after ward bare his name; a iust and wife Prince, deeply skillfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Sphere said to haue supported Heauen. He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Uesperus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue bene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high hill in the midst of his contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue bene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be deified, or registered among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne the brother of Atlas reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italic. Jupiter another of the sonnes of Vranus, reigned in Crete; who had tenne sonnes which he called Curetes; he called that land after his wiues name Idea; in which he he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not haue bene that great one, but vnder to the great Jupiter, if these fables of the Lybians were true. Saturne (as these Lybians tell the tale (was a great tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerua, neere to the riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonis. Hee also begat on Amalthea a sonne called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly for feare of his life to be brought vp at Nysa, an land in the riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certaine Nymphes. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly Countrie, that lay on the Sea coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amaltheas plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, she fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entertained her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon

Hammon

Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom he took to wife, and had with her (women as may seeme being very gracious in those times) the kingdom. Bacchus was growne a proper young man, had found out the making of wine, the art of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had happened, and that Saturne was coming against him with the Titanes; he leited an Armie, to which the Amazons living not farre from 10 Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerva, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they set forward against • Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second expedition. In the second expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that he wanne the loue of all the people by whom he passed; in so much that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturne's rigorous gouernment, he was greatly strenghtened, and the enimie as much enebled by daily reuoltes. Comming to the Cittie of Hammon, he wanne a battaile of Saturne, before the very wals. After which Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called 20 Jupiter. This childe Bacchus tooke with him in a great expedition that he made into the East countries; and comming into Aegypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a boy, gouernour of the Countrie; but appointed vnto him as an Ouerseer, one Olympius, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilest Bacchus traualled through all nations, as far as into India, dooing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found his father Hammon in Crete, and began to ware vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India; with whom Jupiter from Aegypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest that afterwards were held 30 as Gods, joining all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke, and slew them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Jupiter the sonne of Saturne succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left alieue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Lybian Gods, and the Aegyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked images of some one true historic. For the expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the kingdom of Aegypt giuen by Hercules Lybian to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Bastiles, with many pettie circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, how soeuer not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanehoniate (as Eusebius cites him) would haue all these to be Phenicians, and is earnest in saying, that it is a true storie, and no Allegoric. Yet he makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Vranus or Heauen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the genealogie he adds Elius or the Sun, as father of Vranus; and among the children of Vranus, Iapetus, Batilus, and Dagen, (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giuing witchall to Vranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of illus to Saturne, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this.

§. VI.

of CHAAN, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

F Jupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Egyptians, euen after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Jupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizram, Jupiter Chamman, or Hamman. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis, from the sandes, is ridiculous (saith Pencer); neither yet is his owne much better, better, who brings it from Hannath, which signifieth heate; because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Lybia, where the ayre is exceeding hote and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was borne not long before the war of Troyas by many of his sonnes is made manifest; namely, Cassir, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which liued in that age of Prismus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others fought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentis and Flora, which was giuen to Veuius? Seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

20 BVt that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, belieued in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (ouer busily) haue mixed their own inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in Hell, where hee saied that they were perpetually flung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the bookes of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembereth many in that Treatise conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though hee difsembled in some things, for feare of the inquisition of the Arcopagites, yet St. Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirificus delectatus est, que de vno Deo tradita fuerant, And hee was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now how soeuer Lactantius pleaded to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Aegyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Iewes, and the bookes of Moses: Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleeue the contrarie, thinking that from thence hee tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or fauouring of Diuinitie: and the same opinion had St. Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether they were out of the faine vanie, which posselt all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the Arcopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poison, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Platoes feare, whose wordes among many other of the same effect, are these; PLATO MOSIS mentionem facere, ob id, quod vnicuiq; solam, Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putauit, veritus Arcopagum, PLATO fearing the Arcopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenienses to make mention of MOSES, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in TIMAEO, id est, ipsum de Deo differunt quod & MOSES, he discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Iustine Martyr) which MOSES did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answer MOSES, Ego sum exiens (which is) I am, and existens misit me ad vos. I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ then that Moses v'd the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: MOSES enim qui existit (inquit) PLATO quod existit. For MOSES saith, He who is; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same,

Handwritten number: 81283 846

In Timæo. he giueh this testimonie: Genitorem Vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuentum impossibile dignè profari, It is as hard to finde out the Creatour of the Vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were Iouan, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maieitic of Gods nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa, God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum, The loue of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. Apulcius the Platonist. Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione sed etiam naturæ dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfectio bonus, The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. Thales affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient, quia nunquam esse cepit, because hee neuer had any beginning: Zeno, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men: Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to bee carefull in the actions of their life, because God was eury where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the creation, then this opinion and description of the worldes beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

*Cælum terræq; ruius forme fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abinicta complexu mutua,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, fera, quæq; affert mare,
Genusq; mortalium.*

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare?
But when disioyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remaying races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we finde the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who eury where exprest the infinite and sole power of one God, though hee vsed the name of Iupiter, therby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time; but that he could attribute those things to the Sonnes of men and mortall creatures, which he doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

*Nomina Deorum (sæit Mirandula) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum prouenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina, The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Devils, from whom euill comes, and not goodesse; but they are the names of naturall and diuine vertues. Yea that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following teach vs. *Respicens verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum aduerte, intendens cor dis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectè autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse vero in illis reoratur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the world's sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone

All else; in which hee's still, nor could it ere befall

The first of all is God, and the samelast is he.
God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be:
God is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, I shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is God, the Sunne, the Moone, and what is higher,
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For close in holie brest he all did comprehend,
Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did fend.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Aegyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Engubinus, Peucer, Plestin, Danasus, and others. For Cleantes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties. Bonus, iustus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, vitulus, speciosus, optimus, seuerus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himselfe, profitable, beautifull, best, seuer, free, alwayes doing good, safe without feare, glorious, and selfe-charitic. Epicarmus affirmed, that God who beareth all things, and pierced euery nature, was only and euery where powerfull: agreeing with Democritus, Rex omnium ipse solus, He is the only King of all Kings; and with Pindarus the Poet; Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersos secundum merita prabet, One God, the Father, the most high creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHENES) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere knowne, Nisi patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes, Saue only in that euertlasting countrie, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also XEROPHANES COLOPHONIS, *Vnus Deus inter Deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis, There is one God among Gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like to any mortall: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quaerit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus mentis, quod omnibus pater: qualis autem forma sit, nemini pater, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perspirat, God who seeketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme he is, it is manifest to none saue only to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato saith, *Totius rerum natura causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, aeternus animantium inspitator, astidus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore ulla comprehensus, eoq; pauca cogitabilis, nemini effabilis, God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternal preserver of living creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceiue him in thought, none can expresse what he is.

Therefore was it said by St. Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum reuoluas libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem uisorum Dei, ut apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferas & immortalis animas, &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the creatour of the world: in ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Immortal soules, &c. And this is certain, that if we looke into the wisdome of all ages, we shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose minde the art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a peniue inspection aduised; but that he hath found by an vnreliftable necessitie, one true God, and euerslasting being, all for euer causing, and all for euer sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, then that Egyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it failed afterward in his posteritie: all being at length by diuillish pollicie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who inuented new Gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fitted to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§ VIII

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds were at length about the same time vnder IULIAN miraculously confounded.

BVt all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fewell starueth, water quencherh, and want of aire suffocaterh: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielouities; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the bodies and images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the earth; nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phoenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great God Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuils telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfait Egyptians, and couersing Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouerthrowes and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief Manions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it received the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and ornaments therein by the Eubean Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vtterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the Sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Alexces: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phoenesies: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence fise hundred brazen images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoeuer was gathered betwene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remained till such time as Iulian the Apostate sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vtterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

CHAP. VII.
Of NOAH'S Flood.

¶ I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAH'S Flood.

F this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, secedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit,
He departed with his children, and traualled into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berofus writeth in this manner, That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnatural wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religiosis & Deorum, contemptors of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berofus) vnus erat qui Deorum venerator, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerecing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their wiues, and the wife of Noah, (namely Titea the great, Pandora, Noela and Noegia) preferred themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said vnto NOAH, make thee an Arke of pine trees: thou shalt make cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without, with pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell generations were already fashioned in the cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the aire: Noah and his familie excepted.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall deluge hath not bene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: dum obvolata in obscuro veritas latet, whilest the truth byeth wrapped up in obscuritie. Many therefore who haue disputed against the vniuersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this flood of Noah fell but on some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue beene many other floodes (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholaus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his wordes are cired by IOSEPHVS.
Eit super Minyadam excessus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca ducentum in huius veritae huiusmodi, insignium, reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam MOSES Indaeorum Legislator scribit: thus saith this Authour. There is (saith he) about Minyada (or the Countrie of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither were saued in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the toppe of the mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certaine peeces thereof; and this might be the same, of which MOSES the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudists (saith Annus) that many Giants saued themselves so vpon Mount Syon.

But Berofus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, how foucer hee haue haene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall flood, taking from thence the beginning of his Historie in these

these words. Anteaquam cladem famosam, qua universus periit Orbis &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World Universall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three sonnes with their wives (in all eight persons) were onely saved.

§. II

Of the flood in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not NOAH'S flood.

10 BVt from the vanity of the Greekes, the corrupters of all truth (saith Laëtantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to persuade the world, that there was no flood preceded the flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebes in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore saith Rhodoginus Ogygium id appellat. Poëta, tanquam perunctus dixeris, Rho. lib. 15. c. 33: ab Ogyge vetustissimo. The Poëts gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he lived but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time), and was borne 67. years after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth booke of his antiquities remembereth: sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnasse autem hunc: unde sit Cadmus qui in Græcia profectus Thebas condidit, a boue ingulato sic nomen sortus; quoniam Syrum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith hee) who thinke that this Ogyges did raige in Ægypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who traveling into Greece built Thebes, so named of a beefe slaine: because in the Syrian language a beefe is called Thebe.

But this flood of Ogyges fell in the year of the world 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the flood of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. years betweene these floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very year and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among writers, yet whosoever makes it most ancient, findes about 500. years difference betweene that and the generall flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians but 1040. years before Rome built. Buchholzerus saith it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Buchholzerus) in the worlds year 3219: though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the storie of Abraham) it was built in the worlds year 3280. Now the generall flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Buchholzerus) 1563. years: and the flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by ealie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betweene these two floods must be 520. years, to which we (allowing 60. more) finde 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah Ogyges prius, as some doe) it appears by this, that the flood of Ogyges then king of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Ægean Sea. For whereas Nola, Plinie, and Solinus witness, that the Citie of Ioppe in Iudea was founded before the flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of waters) there remained on certaine Altars of stone the tide of the King, and of his brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the scriptures, that euer the flood of Ogyges spread it selfe over any part of Syria, much lesse over all the earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth

Of this flood of Ogyges was inuented the fable of Apollo and Diana. For Lato 19 the daughter of Caeus, the sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with childe, Inno therat enraged permitted her (as they say) no part of the earth to be deliuered on; and withall caused the monstrous serpent Python to follow and affright her, wherefoer the trauailed, till at length arriuing at the Isle of Orygia she was there receiued: in which she was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twinnes; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the deluge (which happened in Ogyges his raigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thicke mists and foggies, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Aegean sea, neither the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by 20 night could pierce the ayer, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayer began to be cleare, and the people of Orygia espied the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Orygia thereof afterwarde called Delos: which signifieth manifi-estation.

Phil. li. 4. c. 11.

And surely it is not improbable, that the flood of Ogyges, being so great, as Hi- storics haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the skies. Varro in his bookes De 30 gente populi Romani (as he is cited by S. Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the flare of Venus, as neuer was scene before, nor in after times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed.
This fell out as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians affirmed in the time of Ogyges.

Aug. de ciuita
li. 2. c. 6. 3.

Now concerning the course of that or any other planet, I do not remember, that I haue any where read, of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greekes, or else where in those daies as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should neede no reformation. Of the colour and mag- 40 nitude. I see no reason why the difference found in the flare of Venus should be held miraculous; considering that lesser mists and foggies, than those which coue-Greece with so long darkness doe familiarly present our senses, with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should vary, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet, would vnto our eyes, destraying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

Galilei

Galileus, Galileus, a worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective 50 glasses hath found in the flares many things vnknown to the ancients, affirmeth so much to haue beene discovered in Venus by his late obseruations. Whether some watried disposition of the aire might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges as Galileus hath scene through his instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discouerie

courie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince man of ignorance, then nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of S. Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the flood of Noah which was generall and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or foretelling, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the flood came sodainely, and tookte them all away.

10

Of DEUCALIONS flood: and that this was not NOAH'S flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any cruiner fall flood.

Second flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia, of which S. Augustine out of Varro. His temporibus (ut Varro scribit) regnante Atheniensibus CRANAO, successore CECROPI (ut autem nostri, EUSEBIUS & HIERONYMVS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum est Deucalionis: (that is) in these times (as Varro reporteth) CRANAYS the successour of CECROPS governing the Athenians, or (as our EUSEBIUS and HIEROME say) CECROPS yet living, that flood (called Deucalions) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleuenth Chapter of the same eightenth Booke, he visiteth these wordes. *Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Aegypto populum Dei nonisimum tempore CECROPI Atheniensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regneret ASCATADES, apud Scythias MARATHVS, apud Argiuos TRIOPAS. TRIOPAS: so as leauing the curiolitic of a few yeares, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this flood of Deucalion was either at the egression of the children of Israel out of Aegypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753. yeares, according to Fanctius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the year of the world 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeares after Noah, and in the year of the world 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the world 2356. according to Codoman; then giuing vnto Deucalion fourtie yeares of age when this flood happened, it fillth within one yeare of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approved Historians is said to haue beene 82. yeares old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaeton's time, by the reaigne of 40

Crotopus King of the Argiues; but Crotopus liued King of the Argiues six yeares after Israel departed Aegypt, which makes twentie yeares difference according to Fanctius, who will haue this flood and burning to haue fallen fourteene yeares before Moses left Aegypt: for hee gaue of the worldes yeares to the flood and burning the yeare 2440. and to Moses his egression the yeare 2454. And yet Cecharius thinks that Moses was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the flood of Deucalion and the burning of Phaeton, preceded the flood of Ogyges, which is denyed by all: for that of Thesalic (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeares or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orasius: Eusebius about the 50. yeares of Moses life, and

Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noah's flood 770. yeares: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus's wordes. Fuit autem in Graecia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHVM, inundata qua fuit tempore Ogygiae, There happened in Greece in the time of PHORONEVS, who liued after INACHVS, the flood of Ogyges. Now if the flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeares before the first Olympiad, according cording to Eusebius and Orosius; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763 out of this number of 1020. it falls out that Ogyges flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. years, or 262. years, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. years more to Abraham after the flood, then the rest) I reckon the times which come between these floods in this sort. The generall flood was in the year of the world 1656. Jacob was borne in the year of the world 2169. so as from the beginning of the flood to Jacobs birth there were consumed 513. years. Ogyges flood happened 100. years after Jacob was borne; and therefore after the generall flood 613. years. Now Deucalion was borne in the year of the world 2356. and had liued 82. years, when his Kingdome of Theffalie was ouerwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438) his flood was after Noahs flood ended 782. years. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. years betweene the generall flood and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. years of his age (as before) and then the flood of Theffalie followed the generall 782. years. The wordes of that Xenophon are these. Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEUCALIONIS, secundo anno Sphari, septingenti supstantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Theffalian vidit inundatam. From the drawing of the world to the birth of DEUCALION, in the second year of Spharus, are numbered 700. years, and when DEUCALION was 82. years old, he saw Theffalia drowned. This flood happened in the winter time about Parnassus: witnesse Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom St. Augustine so often citeth for his excellent learning, especially in antiquities) findeth this flood of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinkes it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Theffalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward; but it covered the greatest part of Italie: and either the same, or some other particular flood then happening oppressed Egypt, saith Eusebius. And therefore did the Greekes either thinke it, or faue it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion, then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the mountaines of Theffalie (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the prefeuer of mankind. That this flood covered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable: who affirme that the people then inhabiting Italie were therefore called subisii: quia ab imbribus diluuij superfluentes; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezennius in his second: which Ymbri these Authours make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to bee the Parents of the Sannites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutij, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterranean Sea. But that these Ymbri were not the inhabters of Italie before the flood of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselves vpon the Appennine mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs: shewing who, and who only then were preferred, 40 which is sufficient. Report hath adu ventured further, telling vs that the first people which after the generall flood inhabited Italie, were the Cameleses; (so named from Camele, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annius his Authours names for a consort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a sauage life; till such time as Saturne arriuing on those coasts, deuised lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose acts in that Region Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos Casius and Varro among the Latines haue preferred; and of whom Virgil:

SATVRNE descending from the heauens high,
 Fearing the Armes of IVPITER his Sonne,
 His Kingdome lost, and banish't thence doth flie.
 Rude people on the Mountaine tops he wonne
 To liue together, and by lawes: which done
 He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Aufones, and after them of the Sicani: Nations, which againe fought to displant the ancient inhabitants:

10 Tum manus Aufonia, & gentes venere Sicani. Virg. l. 8. Æn;

Then came th' Aufonian bands, and the Sicanian tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spain and fate downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue testimony: who were againe expelled by the Ligy, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, descended of the Galles (saith Annius) not of those Galles of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, euen all Hevuria and Campania, as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius, haue assured vs; and therefore this flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossest of Italie againe, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was first called Camsene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Aufonia, then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions flood happened) posselt the same, about 306. yeares before the war of Troy: Lycason then governing Arcadis; who being the Father of two and twentie Sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeares before the fall of Troy. After these came the Pelasgi, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fift Chapter; and Strabo in his fift; Thucydides in his sixth speaks at large; and after them the Lydi vnder Tyrrhenus their Captaine, that gaue name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had posselt and past ouer the Appennine Mountaines) they added diuers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme: hauing respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanius thinks, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

 of some other records testifying the vniuersall flood: and of two ancient deluges in Ægypt: and of some elsewhere.

 73. Saint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the vniuersall flood, because they had nothing of antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the earth were successfullie planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery familie which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of di-

uine letters was not received, finde no parent of more antiquite, then such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, and growing out of the earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by heare-say, that some Gents laued themselves vnder the mountains Baris in Armenia, but speake not thereof as from any authoritie approved: vying the word sermo est, that such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus vsed to preferre himselfe from a flood foretold him by Saturnus, 10 fled to the hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birdes feete were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius wordes out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs flood.

Euseb. de prep. E.

Cyrollus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall flood. And Plato in Timaeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Salon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Africa. For he named the generall flood: for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges, sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44 years before that of Africa, in the 34. year of Belochus King of the Affryrians, though I doe not beleue him as touching the time. But this flood couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Prometheus; and hercof came the fable of the 20

Diod. Sic.

Vulture on Prometheus his liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these wordes: Fluvium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatem, aquarum Aquilon tunc appellatum, HERCVLEM cum consilij magnitudine, tum virtute, voluit & vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Vnde & Graci quidam Poetarem gesiam in fabulam vertentes, HERCVLEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI iocur deprecemem occidisse, This flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCVLES by his great iudgement and vertue did againe compressse and straighten this River, so farre extended and ouerspred, turning it into the old channels: Whence certaine Greeke Poets (conuerting this labour and worke of HERCVLES into a fable) deuised that HERCVLES slew the Eagle, which sed on PROMETHEUS liuer; meaning that he deliuered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his people and Countrie (by the waters destroyed and couered ouer) hee 40 suffered.

A fourth flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiueh out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe foert writeth of all these inundations. Inundationes plures fure: prima nonimestris inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many inundations (saith this same Xenophon) the first which was vniuersall of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance in the time of Hercules and Prometheus Egyptians: a third of two Moneths vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths in Thessalia vnder Deucalion, and a fift of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proetus of Egypt, about the time of Heles 50 rape. Diodorus in his fift booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samos braces for his Authours, remembreth a flood in Asia the lesse and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction then any of the other particular inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion: the Sea of Pontus and Hellefont breaking in ouer the land.

But

Xenop. de asiis.

But there have been many floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembered, Nitaea and Pharonica in Ægypt: as in the year of our redemption 590. when in October of the same year, Gregorie then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruillous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian territorie, and in Lyguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp and left vpon the land, after the waters decreat and returned. And in the year 1446. there perished 100000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kinde I take that flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that and in the year 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an earthquake which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a flood in Friseland, in which there perished 1000000. persons. Strozius Sigog. in his Magna annisaria, telleth of an inundation in Italy, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicile were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth also in the year 1515. Maximilian being Emperour. Here also remembreth a perilous overflowing in Polonia, about Craconia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginia a French Historian speaketh of a great flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the year of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the world, and iudgement day; saying, that by the violent descent of the waters from the mountaines, about Nismes there were removed diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both coyne of silver and gold, diuers peeces of plate, and vessels of other metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Gaths invaded that Prouince, in the year 1156.

§. V.

That the flood of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foretold by the Starres. 17. 15. 202. 5. 64. 123.

30 Now howeuer all these floods and many other, which have covered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the world, but in America also, (as I have learned of some ancient Southfayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall flood (in the time of Noah) was powred over the whole face of the earth by a power aboue nature, and by the speciall commandment of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaines of the deepe: whereby the irruption of waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever vnion could performe, without receiving from the Fountaine of all power, 40 strength, and faculties supernaturall. Hemricus Medicinensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Allu Masar observed, that before the flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the ship of Argos, by which the flood of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a watery signe, and the house of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of moisture, according to the rules of Athenemie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming that although Noah did well know this flood by diuiner reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signes, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further that by * Cataracta a caeli (Englished the windores of properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carried downeward, dasheth and breaketh: of ἀπόρου αἰδα or frange. Hence, because windores doe not only open but also shut, the word hath been expounded (Windores) to be barres or flood gates, heucun)

Allo de Cancer. die 1 thelos. & astralog.

heauen) Moses meant this great and waterie coniunction; the word (Cataracta) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saieth P. de Altijs) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked waies wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercie.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood that the wordes Cataracta a celi, or windores of heauen were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these waterie signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion, and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moonne: which are the forcible causes of the greatest inundations. His owne words are these, Non iam intelligo Prophetam Hebraeorum cataracta a celi vocasse, nisi partes illas celi, quae generatiue sunt pluuiarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, vt Cancer &c. as afore said. As yet (saieth he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrews meaneth by those wordes, (Cataracta a celi, or windores of Heauen) vntlesse he thereby vnderstand those causefull powers, by whose influences are engendered the raine, and inundations of waters, such as are the waterie Signes of Cancer &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable wisdom this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as afore said) adde vigour and facultie, and gaue to euery operation increase of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and fountaines, commanding them to call out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Cloudes, and condensing ayer into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or how soeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

§. VI.

That there was no neede of any new creation of matter to make the vniuersall fund: and what are Cataracta Celi. fund of blood Andri 01
Gen. 7. vers. 11. down

Now if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seuenth day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seeme that then all the earth & ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable world fiftene cubites about the highest mountaines. Of this proposition whether God hath so restrained himselfe or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the world had want of water to ouerouer the highest mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnlerned and foolissh; for it is written, that the fountaines of the great deepe were broken vp (that is) the waters forooke the very bowels of the earth; and all whatsoeuer was disperst therein peirced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider that the Earth had about one and twentie thousand miles: The Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest mountaine of the world, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountaines of Armenia or Seythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenuris, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest stretcheth about thirtie miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the earth one hundred and sixtene times: for the fountaines of the great Deepe were broken vp, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the earth. Secondly if we consider what proportion the earth beareth to the extension of the ayre ouer and about it, we shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased not in 348 miles deep

fed God to condense but so much of this ayre as euery-where compasseth and embraceth the earth, which condensation is a conuersion of ayre into water, a change familiar in those elements, it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with waters without any new Creation.

10 Lastly, for the opinions of Guilielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacenſis, to which I may adde Beofus and others, That such a coniunction there was, foreshewing that destruction by waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractæ a cali, or Windores of heauen, which followed this coniunction; there needs no other answer then that obseruation of Ludouicus Viues, who affirmeth that by the grauet Astrologians it was obserued, that in the yeare 1524. there should happen the like coniunction, as at Nogahs flood, then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seassible yeare: the like destruction was prophecied of the yeare 1588. But Pierre Earle of Arandula proueth that there could not bee any such coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I finde no other myserie in the word Cataractæ a cali, then that the clowdes were meant there by: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that bee the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the raines, and pouring downe of waters. For whosoeuer hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts (where clowdes doe not breake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the windores or flood-gates of heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell, contrarie to custome, and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentiu in the vppermost aire, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith I o s) he which holdeth the waters, and they driue up, or better in Latine, Et omnia fucantur, and all things are dried up; but when hee sendeth them out, they destroy the earth: and in the 26. Chapter. Hee bindeth the waters in the clowdes; but these bonds God loosed at that time of the generall flood, and called vp the waters which slept in the great deep: and these ioyning together couered the earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, hee then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast caues, and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into aire, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remainder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen,

10 NOAH commanded by God, before the fall of those waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne wife, and his sonnes, and his sonnes wiues, taking with them of euerie creature, which tooke life by generation, seuen of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two. Nash, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse; after others, and according to the prophetic of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whome after-times gaue many names answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogges there was also a great flood of Achia: Saturne they called him, because hee was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heauenly things. Others thinke that he was so called for his excellent wife dome and foresight. Hee had also the name of Janus, (id est) vinosus, because rain, signifieth wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian findes him written in libris ritualibus, in the bookes of ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Vranus, and Ioue - which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fained Gods. And this name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrion, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or orany Kingdome by that name knowne. Of the antiquite of Ianus, Fabius Prætor giuch this testimonie. *IANI atate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus peccioribus non sum haerati vlla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & far primus populos docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primus enim aras & Pomaria & sacra docuit, in the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then solied it selfe about the hearts of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: he first set up Altars, instituted gardens and solitarie groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holie rites and ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King or Monarch: Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soveraigne authoritie. Secondly, X'gab after the flood was the first that planted the Vine, and became a husbandman; and therefore offered the first fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, hee was the first that raised an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God, a thanks-giving for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the name of Bifrons (which was giuen to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the flood, quia præterita novit, & futura profæcit, saith Arnobius. Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus shadowed by the name of Chaos, and semen orbis, the seede of the world; because as out of that confused heape was drawne all the kindes of beastes and plants: so from X'gab came all mankind: 23 whereof Osiris in the person of Ianus:*

He was also intituled Caelum and Sol, Heaven and the Sonne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater, not that latter, which Diod. Siculus, and Alex. Aphrodisicus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the flood. For the Greekes called Liber Pater, and his Nurses Hyades, of raine, because X'gab entred the Arke, when the Sonne ioyned with the Starres Hyades, a constellation in the brow or necke of Taurus, and euer after a monument of Noahs flood. He was also by others fumamed Trifon, a Marine God, the Sonne of X'epine: because hee liued in sacrifice on the waters. So was he knowne by the name of Dionysius, quasi divinus, mentem pungens, bite-braine, or wit-stinger, though Diodorus conceue otherwise, and denie that name a pater & loco of his Father, and the place of his birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Nysa a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Tawrophagus; because he first yoked Oxen and tilled the ground, according to that of Moses. And NOAH become an husbandman. Now how soeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certaine that the name was borrowed, and the invention stollen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more anciently Noachus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckins, and out of him Danæus) from X'ochus, (X') being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the flood; and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables devised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Booke, and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah was fumamed Nysus, of the mountaine Nysa in India, where the Græcian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoever them selves fume of his enterprises; and these mountaines of Nysa ioyned with those of P'oponissus. And those other Easterne mountaines, on which the Arke of X'gab rested after the flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second parent of mankind might might the better be preferred, there were founded by his issues many great Cities which bare his name; with many rivers and mountains: which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many names given him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we finde the Citie of Noah vpon the banks of the red Sea and elsewhere: the Riuer of Noah in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolome Danus; diuiding Illyria from Pannonia. Of sundrie particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion and name.

NOW in what part of the world Noah built the Arke, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither doe I finde any approved Authour that hath written thereof: only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiue that Noah built his Arke neare the mountains of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nysi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, hee found all their burials and Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also hee addeth the conueniencie of riuers, to transport the Timber which hee vsed, without troubling any other countries.

Only this wee are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Eastern world; and to my vnderstanding, not farre from the place where it rested after the flood. For Noah did not vse any mast or saile (as in other ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue then the Hulke or body of a ship doth in a calme Sea. Also because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right raines there were any windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together. For it is written: God made a winde to passe vpon the earth, and the waters ceased; and therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the waters, there was not any storme or forcible winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion bee true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottome, and not raised in forme of a ship with a sharpesse forward, to cut the waues for the better speede.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions ship: and some say, that the hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes hee arriued, was first called Larnissus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Steph. d. 17. b. Pausanias thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymphe Cleodora, called Parnassus, the inuentour of Auguration.

Petrus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinks it deriued from the Hebrew word Noahis, which significth Auguration and Divination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the lease before cited.

Epiphys calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame: and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Arav; but herein lieth the difference betweene Arav and Thebet, That Arav significth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and searcht it selfe vpon the waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a couer and roofe, with a crest in the middelt thereof, and the sides declining like the roofe of an house; to the end, both to cast off the waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe himself; and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomnesse of the many beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Arke.

Of what wood the Arke was built it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place only vsed is diuerly vnderstood; and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference ther is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pinetree, the Rabbinie Cedar, the Scauentic square timber, the Latine smooth timber. Others will haue it Cypres trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worn at funerals. But out of doubt it the word Gopher signifie any speciall kinde of timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; if not, hee was not then curious as touching the kinde or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace

and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth that in Egypt it was the vsé to build ships of Cedar, which the worme eates not; and he auoweth that he saw in Vicia, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kinde of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet fauour, lasting also better than any other wood, and because neare the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the mountaines of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood; which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Pererius conceiueth that the Arke had diuers sorts of timber, and that the bottome had of one sort, the decke and partition of another, all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will ferue for all parts of a ship, aswell for the body, as for masts and yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines, thereby to sear the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserve their severall sorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kinde of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, hee cast his confidence wholly on God, who by his Angels steered this ship without a rudder, and directed it without the helpe of a Compass or the North starre. The pitch which Noah vsed, is by some supposed to haue beene a kinde of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea or Asphaltes: and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India, and herein it exceedeth other pitch that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire only, after the manner of hard waxe.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacite.

THe Arke according to Gods commaundement had of length three hundred cubites, thirte of breadth, and thirte deepe or high: by which proportion it had sixe parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath been a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect thefe. The first kinde of cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the palme cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Perjian Cubit, which exceedeth the common cubit three inches. The fourth is the faced cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly there is a fit cubit, called Geometricall, which containeth six common cubits. But of all these sortes, which were commonly measured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies: so is the common cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length then it was in elder times.

St Augustine considering the many sortes of beastes and birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometricall cubit, which containeth almost six of the Common. For measuring the Arke by the vulgar cubit, it did not exceed the capacite of that vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the ship of Prolome Philopater. But St Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgement as touching the Geometricall cubit; and found vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a bodie to preserve all sortes of creatures by God appointed to be referred. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of fishes into the Arke, because they were kept living (saith St Augustine) in their owne element. *Non fuit necesse conseruare in Arca que possent in aquis vivere: non solum mensa sicut pisces, sed etiam super-natantis, sicut multa alites. It was not needfull to conserue these creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the waters, and not onely fishes which can liue vnder water, but also the fowles which sit and swimme on them: and againe, Terra non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam non huius, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit. It was the earth, and not the waters, which God cursed: for of the forbidden fruit of the earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat; so as St Augustine gathereth hereupon, (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.*

And if wee looke with the eyes of iudgement heereunto, wee shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) haue more of mischiefe and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reason finde many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing and of severall kindes, were not then in rerum natura. For those beastes which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them: seeing they might be generated againe by others, as the Mules, the Hyznas and the like: the one begotten by Asses and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolues. And whereas by differing of strange landes, wherein there are found diuers beastes and birdes differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts, it may be supposed by a superficiall consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed skinned, or feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or black: they are much mistaken that so thinke. And for my owne opinion I finde no difference but onely in magnitude, betweene the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and euen those dogges which are become wilde in Hispania, with which the Spaniards vied to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to wolues, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattle, and doe also offend times tear a sunder their owne Children. The common Crowe and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drownd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Blackbird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation: in the North parts of Virginia. The dogfish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Black-mores non animalia rationalia not men, but some kinde of strange beastes: and so the the Giants of the South America should bee of an other kinde, then the people of this part of the World. Wee also see it daily that the natures of fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good fruit by often grafting, and the best Mellons will change in a yeare or two to common Cucumbers by being set in a barren soyle: T herefore taking the kindes precisely of all creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the earth by his ordinance produced: The Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit was sufficiently capacious to containe of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the Common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantic stature (and lesse allowance we cannot giue to the difference betweene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 60. foot deepe.

1. 5. am 17. 4. b

But first of all to make it manifest, that the Geometrical Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the bed of og King of Basan had been nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of 6. Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull, a proportion credible if these Cubites had bene Geometrical, then had bene 54. foot in height and vpwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath bene nine foot long, and farre weightier and bigger then all Dauids bodie, who carried it away.

Exod. 30. 26.

Again if the Geometrical Cubit had been vsed for a measure in the Scripture as many Commenters have obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe five Cubites of length, five of breadth and three of height) have reached the length of 27. foot vp right, and so must their Priests haue ascended by steps or ladders to haue performed their sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandment giuen in these wordes: Thou shalt not goe up with steppes vnto mine altar, but thy frame bee not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three Common Cubites high which make foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their office: W herefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantic stature; which measure (doubtlesse) might giue much the more capacite to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Arke, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot bee preferred in the waters, might according to their present quantities bee contained in a vessell of those dimenions which the Arke, had, allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsual measure: whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large bodie which were in the daies of Noah might haue room sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures, to be saued (that is) seuen of the cleane, two of the vncleane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, But as hath very learnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie cubits, sheweth the whole capacitie to haue bene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walles, and other partitions of lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the roote which (the perpendicular being one cubit) contained 7500. cubicall cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a ship of such greatnesse wee seeke room for 80. distinct Species of beasts, or (least any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily finde place both for them, and for the birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meate to sustaine them all. For there are three fortes forts of beasts, whose bodies are of a quantie best knowne; the Beefe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeces, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of beafts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, only three are cleane, according to the law of Moses, whereof seuen of a kinde entred into the Arke, namely three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kinde were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great beafts cleane, and fixe and fiftie vn cleane, estimable for largesse as 91. Beeces; yet for a supplement (least perhaps any Species be committed) let them be valued, as 120. Beeces. Of the lesfer sort, feeding on vegetables were in the Arke fixe and twentie kinde, estimable with good allowance for supplie, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which deuour flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to three score and foure Wolves. All these 280. beafts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke in their severall Cablines; their meate in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his familie, and all their necessaries.

§. X.

That the Arke rested upon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betwene the East Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A praterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

30

That time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leave to others to dispute; but he receiued the Commandment from God 100. years before the waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of flocks & partitions, which Origen deuides into foure, St. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the land, other times in the waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartus) the Sea-cowes or Sea-horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a fish-pool might bee made aswell within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had windores of Cristall to receiue in light, and keepe out water, were but to reuiewe the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is in what part of the world the Arke rested after the flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe only and truly teach the worlds plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the flood; and all storie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

50

†. II

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the flood, and from what part of the world the children of Noah traualled to their first settlement and

and plantation, I am resolv'd (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were vterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularitie; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke stayed vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldaean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordisi in Armenia the greater: (as the wordes Gordai and Kardu seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it relied on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldaean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocala; and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocala. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocala; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontorie in Arabia felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Ptolomie calls Ocalis, Pinetus Aeyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocala of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Beyfus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Cordai, and Curtius Cordai: Ptolomie Gordai and Gordisi: of which the Countrey next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Nimyada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Nilyada or rather Minni: which word is vied for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Carydes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated a part from all other to the North of that Ledge of mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neare the Lake Tibostitis: whence the Riuier of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordisi (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Iunius) was of the euent, because of Noahs comming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed euent; seeing any hill, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus Kubaris (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4. saies, the place is called αὐκαθίζων (as it were the descent or comming downe) and Epiph. l. 1. c. 11. Herel. calls it αλας: which word in the Armenian and Aegyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubar is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to be deriued; and Alf. G. 6. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Aegyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age: receiuing a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

† III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come Joener, had they come from so neare a place as Armenia.

BVt there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

For

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeare, or in the year 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chusli, and Chaldaea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent fo many years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interuagant, which might by ealie iourneies haue been past ouer in 20. daies; and to hasten and help which passage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered it selfe, which is euerie where transpassible by boats of great burden: so as where the Defart on the one side relisted their expedition, the riuer on the contrarie side serued to aduance it; the riuer rising out of the same Ledge of mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surpith of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the care of reason, that they would haue spent many years in that low and ouerflown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riueres which imbroder or compass it: for the effects witnessed their afflictions, and the workes, which they vnderooke, their vnbeliefe; being no sooner arriued in Shinar, but they beganne to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod beganne his Kingdome, the 20 first knowne Cittie of the world founded after the flood, about 131. yeares, or (as others suppose) ten yeares later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get vs a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

†. IIII.

The second argument, That the Easterne people were most ancient in populostie, and in all humane glorie.

30 For a second Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more waight then any thing which hath beene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vsf of Printing and Arillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easilie perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordinance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philostratus in uita Apollonij Tiansis, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous wordes: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betwene Hyphasis and Granges, vsf not themselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter. By which means there it is said, that Hercules Aegyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and sauage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient then Sethor Henoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. 70 172
But from the Easterne world it was that Iohn Cuttenberg a Germane, brought the deuise of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practise thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gersone a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this mysterie was then supposed to bee but newly borne, the Chinians had letters long before either the Aegyptians or Phenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeares since discovered those Kingdomes, and doe now enjoy their rich trades therein : for the Chinnoes account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and florie of Alex. Macedon may iustly bee called to witness, who found more Citties and sumptuositie in that little kingdom of Perus, which lay side to the East India, then in all his other traualles and undertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not trauielled so farre to the West as Rome : Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus who her reporteth of the vttermoost Angle and Island thereof, we shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not receiued, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more salvage. And of the Isle of Iapan (now Zippingari) Venetus maketh this report. Incoler religioni, literis, & sapientia sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi, nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) scriptis in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant. The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they vse in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuillitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who haue beene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and diuers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

¶ V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMIRAMIS found in the East Indies.

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader : who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three Millions to inuade India, to which he adioyneth also 500000. Horse, and 100000. Waggones : whereof if we beleue but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrie after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued : All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Nimus ; and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came into Shinar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Cittie and Tower of Babel may appeare ; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents call betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whome shee encountered in that warre with this her powerfull Armie : euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Stauobates King of India beyond Indus ; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus. STAVOBATES, autis maioribus quam que erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAVOBATES gathering together greater troups then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had beene encreased but by a Colonie lent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance) this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Stauobates must haue beene made of stone, or som what else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might conceiue, what it was to traualle farre in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the floud the same lay wast and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeares, and wherein there could hardly be found either path or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bulhes and bryars that in those yeares were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italic or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authoritie, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue vndertaken that vnbelaueing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preualet perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authoritie which he receiued euens from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoever they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobayd the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regal authoritie ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Calestinus take the testimonie of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Saphene, and Iofan: of which Nimrod commaunded the issues of Cham, Iofan of Sem, and Saphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sonnes of Sem: Iofan Hauilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till hee was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Iofan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moues me to beleue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawn himselfe, and rested a part with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their desired portions. For hee landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thanks-giuing to God by sacrifice, hee is not remembered in the Scriptures, because hee was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

of the senseless opinion of ANNIVS the Commentor upon BEROSVS: that the Arke rested vpon Mountes Caspij in Armenia, and yet vpon Gordai, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

- I T remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annus, who in his Commentaries vpon Berofus and others, laboureth manfully to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caspij; which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordai, hee hath no other shift to vnite these opinions, but by vniting those farro-distant mountaines together. To effect which he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with error which haue carefully ouersene, printed, and published Ptolemies Geographic, in which they are altogether disuenered: for that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills siue degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villouanous and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annus withall: for in those the mountaines Caspij stand seuen degrees to the East of the Gordai, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Annus strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this iudgement vpon them in the like dispute. Aberrant vero omnes, non negligentia, sed regorum situs ignorantia, They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquitie of the Scythians: and to proueth the same hee citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeares before Ninus; the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia Saga the stocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembered (who were so called, because saued from Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galls, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his vniuersis FANNVS DRYM & Galls progenitoribus Vmborum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANVS came with DRYM and with the Galls the progenitors of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythia tribuitur, Certainly, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annus, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie calleth the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italia, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annus laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabitate that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he saith a nation of Scythians called Araxes, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neare the Riuer of Araxes: And because his Authour Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankinde was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part venterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, in Scythia Saga mankinde was restored, hee therefore in the Proeme of his Commentarie vpon Berofus, leaueth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his wordes, and writes homines in Scythia saluatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is vnderstoodly vnder the mountaines of Paropamisus, on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground; and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

But now the best authoritie which Annus hath is out of Diodorus: where he hath read, read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scythia Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his fullhood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approved and diligent Author beginneth in that place with these wordes. Fabulantur Scythæ, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this tide to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula, The Originall and success of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Saca, or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saca, which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleueeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxes in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Countrie about Araxes Ptolomie calleth Colchene and Sodacene and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians, either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100. severall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

Tab. A. 16. 7. c. 8

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some haue written, others haue scene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these mountains is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria huc tempore dicitur: ab Oceaſu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, vsq; ad Oxam in Hyrcanum mare excurrit; & parte ipsius maris hinc vsq; ad Rha fluminis ostium terminatur, Scythia uero in monte Imaus: is that part of the world, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaum mountains: on the North by vnknowne lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are the Saccæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sive regio est, & quæ innumerabiles nationes complectitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations, (saith Niger, much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he disfigureth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which hee leauech on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian, or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier Iohn Planarpis (cited by Vincencius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia, neither doth Haytonus an Armenian borne, of the blood of those Kings, (though afterward a Monk) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races descended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salicini, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeare 1307. published.

Neither doth Mathias a Michou (a Canon of Craconis in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that traualled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose traualles are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disproving many things; heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others hee beareth that ancient and receiued opinion. That out of the mountains Riphei, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Riuers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouing by vnswearable experience, that there are no such mountains in rerum natura; and (indeede) the heads and fountains of those famous Riuers, are now by the trade of Muscovia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and and marsh grounds. The Riuer of Tanais or Don, riseth to the South of the Cittie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Ivanowefrow in the great wood Okenitzkies or Lepphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call E-del, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great wood Voskonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Riuers flow of Borysthenes (now Zyger) and Dziuns or Diuidna. And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Rufians, Lithonians, Majscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Visla, the name perchance misprinted Vissa for Vistula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the East border he nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to withhold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem, Scythia within the mountaine Imaus. And the same Mathius Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Ammius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe aboute three hundred and a few odde yeares before his owne time: these be his wordes. Constat eum esse gentem nouam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis, (mutatis scilicet) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam, it is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and gat new seates a little more then three hundred yeares since. For (indeede) before that time the Gathes or Pouloes inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Mathius liued in the yeare 1511. and this his discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augustin in the yeare 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested; and the Scythians were those people which liued at the North foote of those mountaines of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or beginne to mixe themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the generall description of the earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betwene all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colechis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeede) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariaces) betwene Taxarus and Tactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariaces, or Scythia Araxes which Ammius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

†. VIII.

The fifth argument, The Vine must grow naturally neare the place where the Arke rested.

40 TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That No A N planted a Vineyard, we shall finde that the fruit of the Vine or Rayfin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither. For Tyrthenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such time as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remembred betwene the Pyrenais and the Alpes, neare vnto the Scenones, where they continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they halted to inhabite that Countrie, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from elsewhere into Italie.

Gen. 9. 20.

Servius Eusebii, Histropus.

Now it is manifest that Noah trauided not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the world among his children: and the first thing he did was to till the ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after his sacrifice and thanks-giuing to God; and wherefoeuer the Arke rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare that he trauided farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that he was a Husbandman, and not a Wanderer.

Answere to an obiection out of the wordes of the Text. The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinar, it doth not appeare, sauing that it may be inferred out of these wordes (from thence) because it is written: So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these wordes of Sybill (as they are conuerted) it cometh that all came not together into Shinar, for they haue this limitation. 10

Quidam eorum turrem edificauerunt altissimam, quasi per eam caelum essent ascensuri, Certane of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to haue scaled the heavens.

†. X.

Answere to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the hills there.

BEFORE I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these wordes. The Arke rested on (or vpon) the mountaines of Ararat or Armenia (saith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldaean Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, that the Arke first fate thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Avarat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those mountaines of equall stature to many other mountaines of the world; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the bookes of the Sybil it is written, that the mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the flood. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these mountaines, and to proue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the Cittie of Calenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description thee maketh mention of Marsyas, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Meander, which is farre from the Gordian mountaines in Armenia. Wee may also finde a great mistaking in Iosephus, (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the funder of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat betwene Armenia and Parthia toward Adiabene, and affirmeth affirmeth withall, that in the Prouince of Caron by others Karos or Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vvaunt that they had in those dayes rescued some peeces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Assyria: so that all Medias and a part of Assyria is betwene Parthias and Armenia. Now whereas the discouerie of the mountaines Cordisai was first borrowed out of Berosus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berosus, differs farre from the wordes of that Berosus, which wandereth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Annus. For Berosus cited by Iosephus hath these wordes.

- 10 *Fertur & nauis huius pars in Armenia, apud montem Cordisorum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde aborsum secum reportare, quo vice annulei loci huius homines uti solent, (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenias vpon the Cordisain mountaines; and that diuers doe scrape from it the bitumen or pitch, and carrying it with them, they vse it in steade of an annulet. But Annus his Edition of the fragment of Berosus vseth these wordes. Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordisai montis vertice quicui, cuius adunc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa bitumen tollere quo maxime vntur ad expiationem, For the whole Arke being lifted vp by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordisain mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence the bitumen to purge by sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts*
- 20 (besides the difference of wordes) the name is duerly written. The ancient Berosus writes Cordisai with a (C) and the Fragment Cordisai with a (G): the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preseruatiue against poyson or incantment; the other in sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them vseth the word (fortur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is said, and both by heare say, and therefore of no authoritie nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receiue from it.

- Furthermore, these mountaines which Ptolomie calls Gordisai, are not those mountaines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne wordes: *Montes Armenie nominantur ij, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protendantur vsq; ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadociam; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur, The mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, which stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians; also the hill which is called Paryardes; which mountaines Plinie calleth Paryardes, and both which lye to the North of Gordisai or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordisain mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordaisans and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the mountaines of Gordisai, otherwise Baris Kardour Lubar, (which Ptolomie calleth Togordisain) are the highest of the world, the same is absolutely false.*

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills then the Armenian.

- FOR the best Cosmographers with other, that haue seene the mountaines of Armenia, finde them farre inferior, and vnder-set to diuers other mountaines euen in that part of the world, and elswhere: as the mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie calls Olympus, now called Lacus, (saith Cassiodorus) is farre surmounting any mountaine that euer hath bene seene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vppwards: of which Platarch. Athos adumbrat latera Lemnie bonis, Athos shades with the Cow of Lemnos.

Aristot. Met. sec.

nos. Also the mount of Olympus in Theſſalie, is ſaid to be of that height, as neither the windes, cloudes, or raine ouertop it. Againe, the mountaine of Antandrus in Myſia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may be ſcene from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania neare the Sea, the famous mountaines of Atlas, of which Herodotus. Extat in hoc mari Monts, cui nomen Atlas, ita ſublimis eſte dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium peruenire non poſint, Upon this coaſt there is a mountaine called Atlas, whose height is ſaid to be ſuch, as the eye of no mortall man can diſcerne the top thereof. And if we may belecue Aristotle, then are all theſe inferior to Caucasus, which hee maketh the moſt notorious both for breadth 10 and height. Caucasus mons omnium maximus, qui aſtium ad ortum ſunt, acrimie atq; latitude, cuius iuga à Sole radiatur uſq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occaſu, Caucasus (ſaith Aristotle) is the greateſt mountaine both for breadth and height of all thoſe in the North-eaſt, whose tops are lightned by the Sunne beames, uſq; ad conticinium (which is ſaith Macrobius) betwene the ſiſt crowing after midnighr and the breake of day: Others affirme that the top of this mountaine holds the Sunne beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot belecue either: for the highest mountaine of the world knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Weſtward of it for 1000. leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes companie at any ſuch late houres. Beſides, theſe mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasi, are thoſe which ſeparate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riſeth in the ſame mountaine, which himſelfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis ſpringeth from thoſe hilles which ſunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is manifeſt) yeeldeth it ſelfe to the Sea two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howſoever Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this ſtorie we ſhould take Ararat for Armenia.

30

SO as it doth firſt appeare, that there is no certaintie what mountaine Ararat was: for the bookes of the Sybil let it in Phrygia: and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, thoſe men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Bari is the highest hill, and therefore moſt likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the aſſertion and ſuppoſition haue equall credit: for there are many hils which exceede all thoſe of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke ſhould fit on the highest. 40

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any ſuch Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Bari: for Bari (ſaith Literome) ſignifieth high TOWERS: and ſo may all high hils be called indifferently; and therefore wee may better giue the name of Bari to the hils of Caucasus (out of which Indus riſeth) then to any hils of Armenia. For thoſe of Caucasus in the Eaſt, are vndoubtedly the highest of Aſia.

Fourthly, the Authours themſelues doe not agree in what Region the mountaines Gordian ſtand: for Ptolomie diſtinguiſheth the mountaines of Armenia from the Gordian, and calleth thoſe of Armenia Mofchici and Paryardes, as aforeſaid. Now Paryardes is ſeated neare the middle of Armenia, out of which on the Weſt ſide riſeth Euphrates, and out of the Eaſt ſide Araxis: and the mountaines Mofchici are thoſe hils which diſioyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Countrie of the Georgians) from Armenia. 50

Of the contrarie situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text : and that it is no materiall that the same ledge of hills running from Armenia to India should keepe the same name all along : and even in India be called Ararat.

L Astly, we must blow up this mountaine Ararat it selfe; or else wee must digge it downe, and carrie it out of Armenia; or finde it elsewhere, and in a warme coun-trie, and (withall) set it East from Shinar: or else wee shall wound the truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to eury eye, wee must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one hill, so called, no more then any one hill among those mountaines which diuide Italy from France is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of many hills keepe one name in diuers Countries: so all that long ledge of mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Plinie in his description of Lycia 2. 5. a. 27.

Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the moun-taines of Ararat or Armenia, becaule from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise.
 So all these mountaines of Ibercia, Armenia, Coraxis, Cassij, Moschici, Amazonic, Heniochi, Seythui, (thus diuersly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caspium and Euxinum: as all those mountaines which cut a funder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these mountaines of Ararat runne East and West: so doe those maruailous mountaines of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well nere are called by the name of I- maus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of severall names giuen by Ptolomie was thereby the better to distinguish the 30 great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disseuer; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Affrya, Media, Suliana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: hauing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they feuer and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which funder Chilia from the rest of Asia the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her passage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her West banke;

40 and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name of Taurus,
 (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopota- mia: and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them afunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Affrya and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though betwene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not ap-peare, but altogether discontinue. For at Macada in Media they are not found, but call themselves Orentes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne

50 part whereof the Riuer of Bagradas riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Ibercians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now neare their waies end

end, they first make them selves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the title of Paropamisus; and lastly of Caucasi, euen where the famous Riuer of Indus with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these mountaines build them selves exceeding high, to equall the strong hills called Imaus of Seythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of latitude, and in 140. of longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delaguer, and the rest Negracet; and these mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Platonicus) that is, betweene Paropamisus and Imaus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Cassium and Pontus.

Now in this part of the world it is, where the mountaine and Riuer Imus, and the mountaine Nysus (so called of Bacchus Nysus or Nysa) are found: and on these highest mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Ake of Nash grounded after the flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indosythicus hee hath many good arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrional latitude are the most delicate Wines of the world, namely, in Judea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these mountaines, Strabo affirmeth that the most excellent Vines of the world are found: the clusters of grapes containing two cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in climate with that part of Palesina, where the searchers of 30 the land by Moses direction found bunches of equall bignesse at Esoel.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neare the mountaine of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate wine of all other.

L. 5. c. 27.

And therefore to concludethis opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those mountaines doe also trauerse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high hills, euen from Cilicia to Paropamisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betweene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gaue them; the diueritie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entrench by Gibraltar, the 50 Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it walseth the coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betweene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo Adriaticum: betweene Athens and Asia Egeum: betweene Scitus and Abydus Hellepont: and after ward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as these, these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedonyem: and on this side, the Brittan Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick; and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, even to the word of truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the wordes beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely where the sense is plaine, (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selves any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolute our selves, that euerie word (as aforesaid) hath his waight in Gods Booke. And therefore wee must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as St. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of Christ Iesus (which is) Nequis alter accipiat, quod narratum est discipulis Christi in Euangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gessit abut, confixerit. That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which hee readeth in the Gospell, (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had seene the vnto hand of the Lord, which hee bare in his owne bodie, setting it downe.

- 20 The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute are these. And as they went from the East they found a Plaine in the land of Shinar, and there they abode, which proeth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the Eastward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places whereof Moses maketh a difference of Countries, hee alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Iocizar, he nameth Sephar, a mount in the East: where hee remembereth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth. And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he vsed these wordes. Afterwardes remoouing thence into a mountaine Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tentes: hauing Bethel on the West side, and Hai on the East: and afterwarde in the ninth verse of the same chapter it is written. And Abraham went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophesied of Gog and Magog, hee liethweth that the nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that shee came from the South to visite SALOMON: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the COMPASSE and quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Palatims, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Aegypt directly South, and the Calefryans, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palatims: and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the East, nor to come vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose handes the holy Ghost directed) that hee erred toto caelo, and that hee knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in fortie five; and those Gordian mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the valley of Shinar are situated in thirtie five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betwene East and West) the Gordian mountaines stand in 75 degrees, and the valley of Shinar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinar North-west, ninetie six degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the COMPASSE. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, In scripturis ne

minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, et puncta in diuina scriptura plena sunt sensibus, in the scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleeue Writers (of little authoritie) who also speake by hearefay and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all aduenture. But this is infallibly true, that Shinar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, 10 which had Noah himselfe for an instructor: and directly East from Shinar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also, which ouertopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the mountaines of Ararat, and not on those mountaines of the North-west, as Berosus first faimed, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, 20 where he planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground and liued thereon. *Placuit vero NOACHO agricultura studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eam rem sua ipsius lingua ISH-ADAMATH (hoc est) telluris uir appellatur celebratusq; est, The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that hee was no wanderer: and that hee troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of the prison of the Arke, 30 whereinto God had committed him to preserve him and mankind.*

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

These Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. St. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moser, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeares, but in vertue, as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Iacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes, this is the ground of the controuersie? The Latine translation, and so the Geneva, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 16. c. 3.

10. v. 21. in these wordes. Vnto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Ianius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner. To SHEM also the Father of all the 30 Sonnes of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in blood, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly vnderstood without any danger or inconuenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth yeare of his life, begat the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet:
 40 and in the sixe hundredth yeare (to wit) the hundredth yeare following, came the generall flood; two yeares after which Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the yeare 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeare of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeares old, two yeares after the flood: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeares old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then bene a hundred yeares old at the flood, and in the sixe hundredth yeare of Noahs life, and not two yeares after. Which seeing the Scripture before remembred hath denyed him, and that it is also written. Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done vnto him (to wit) HAM; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Geneva, Ianius turnes it filius minimus, his youngest sonne; but St. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father, (whose nakednesse hee derided) was disinherited, and lost the preheminiencie of his birth, as Esau and Reuben did. Per-150 rurs conceiuet that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Schem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth chapter of Genesis, Schem is accounted before Japhet: in the second Verse Moses leauech to beginne with the issue by Schem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was giuen to Schem for his election and benediction, and for this waightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether wee shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Genens, who agree in this conuersion, SHEM frater IAPHET maior; or with Pererius, SHEM frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Schem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue scene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former argument, That Schem's age at the time of the flood did not agree with his elderhip (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that SHEM was an hundred yeeres old, and begat ARPHAXAD two yeeres after the flood; and againe in the 12. Verse. So SHELA lived after he begat EBARA, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of five yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwaies 10 precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world, as that all Histories must yeeld to MOSES: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the knowne great Lordes of the first ages were of the issue of HAM.

BVt let vs go vnto the worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall finde that many Nations haue supposed or fained themselves those Anceltors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures howe the Sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Authour may recieue allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution. That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, wee must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, eicher in age or authoritic. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatlocuer, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath bene borrowed thence, and therefore later then it, as all careful obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Proeme of his Chronologic. MOSES is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Trojan warre, and farre before HERCULES, MYSAEVS, LINVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVS, ASCVLAPVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the Gods of the Nations, their ceremonies, or holy rites, or Prophets: and before all the deedes of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue seated in the toppes and highest Towers of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Jupiters remembered by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Aether, whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Aegypt. Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex AEGYPTO nauissimo tempore poro CECROPI Atheniensis Regis, MOSES brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last dayes of CECROPI King of the Athenians saith S^r. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Cittie it selfe, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is directly proved, and by many learned Authours, I will not cut a funder the purpose in hand by alleading many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

First, we are to consider that the world after the floud was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinar to the vitermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia in halfe, but that these children were directed by a wise Father, who knew those parts of the world before the floud, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as discoverers, or at all-adventure, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authours, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Aeneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build herein vpon the Scriptures themselves, and after them vpon reason and nature. First, therefore wee must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery where had in the 130. year after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfull valleys with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our felues thereby, what wonderful desarts, what impassible fastnesse of woods, reedes, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what marshes, Fens and bogges, all the face of the earth (excepting the mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our climate (where the dead and destroying winter depretheth all vegetaunc and growing nature, for one halfe of the year in effect) yet in twentie or thirtie yeares the earth would all ouergrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods or with other offensue thickets and bushments: much more did all sorts of plants, reedes, and trees, prosper in the most fruitful Vallies, and in the climate of a long and warme Sommer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeares, to raise themselves without controlement.

This being considered it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinar, and ouer whome Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the dominion, did after the confusion of languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mightie people disperse themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said vally of Shinar, which contained the belt part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first posselt; yet could hee not enjoy the lot of his inheritance on the suddaine, but by time and degrees. For we find, that Abraham the true successor of Shem dwelt in Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he refted to Chorran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he trauielled to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betwene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seuen descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea: where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded inhabited for many yeares, and whence Nimrod went out into Affyria, and founded Ninuiie. Indeed deed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can knowe were, in that age of the illness of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking Iesse effect, vntill diuers yeeres were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisdome of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan came the people and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Aegypt for many descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in JAPHETS portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie sailing GOMER the sonne of JAPHET in Italy; and an other of JAPHETS sonnes T V B A L in Spain: and of the antiquitie of Longinque Navigation. 10

TO beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Japheth, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Japhets sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinar, was (if the diuision were made at Phalegs birth) in the year of the world 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the year after the flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere. 20

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Japhet were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Lands adioyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellepont and Aegeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, fauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southwst, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North Northeast, and Northwest. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Isles lying betwene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creet or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of 30 Brittaine and Zeland, with their yong ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah. Dilatez Deus JAPHETH, Let God spread abroad (or increase the posteritie of) JAPHETH, and let him dwell in the tents of SETEM. For though Iunius here vseth the word (aliciat) and not dilatez: and the Genes perfruadent; yet the Septuagim haue dilatez or amplificet, and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the posteritie of Japheth: noting not onely an enlargement of territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. 40

But to come to Japhets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may beleue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late writers haue followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods raigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also Funfius confirmeth in these words. Anno decimo NIMRODI, Gre. in the tenth year of NIMRODS raigne, COMERVS GALVS planted a Colonie in that land afterwar called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the same NIMRODS raigne T V B A L seated himselfe in Aituria in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeeres after the flood, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of tongues the children of Noah did not separate them selves, at least to many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Cittie and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had crected (and as Funfius himselfe out of his Authour Berosus witnesseth), ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium, 50

the height and magnitude of the mountaines. Sure that both this Cittie and Tower were almost builded the Scriptures witnesseth. But the Lord came downe to see the Cittie and Tower, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time sufficient for the making of bricke to such a worke, of the great height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vnuersall flood covered the highest mountaines fiftene cubits, Let vs build vs a Cittie and a Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach vnto the heauen: meaning, that they would raise their worke about fiftene cubits higher then the highest mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the worke. They also beganne this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly ouerbearing and ouerflowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Jeremie, speaking of Babylon in these wordes. Thou that dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which Glycas vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeares. For it seemeth, that the Tower was nere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth, and they left to build the Cittie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very nere had performed the worke of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the Cittie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the tower was throwne downe) these nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the earth, (that was) when they perceived one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this worke in the newnesse of the world (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeare could crepe through 3000. miles of Desert, with women, children, and cattel: let those light beleeuers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but nere such a time; (and then) when the world had stood - 1556. yeares; it were more then foolishnes and madnes it selfe, to thinke that such a worke as this could be performed in ten; when the world (from the flood to the arrivall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had spent some part in traouailing from the East. Againe, if all Assa set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that worke 400. yeares (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an age as when the world flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials and carriages: This worke of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeares remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or familie of men, with their wiues and children, and cattel, to trauaile 3000. miles through woods, bogges, and deserts, without any guide or conductor; and we shall finde it rather a worke of 100. yeares then of 100. dayes. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor guide, they haue not entred the Countrie ten miles in ten yeares. And if Americals people spent many yeares by the account before remembered in passing from the East-Indies or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. degrees of longitude, vntill they came into Shimmar which lyeth in 79. degrees (the distance betwene those places containing 36. degrees, which make 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betwene Babylon and Bisgay is much more: for the bodie of Bisgay lyeth in ten degrees, and Babylon or Shimmar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shimmar to Affrica or Bisgay is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers yeares to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little above 400 miles: there is no caule to the contrary, but to allow as many yeares to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000 miles to countries lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradyse was knowne to Noah before the flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what hee vnderstood of most part of the world else it is vnknowne. And therefore did Annus ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods raigne: Shall the earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a nation be borne at once? But it may be obiected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so faue this great trauaile through Deserts by land. But we neuer read of any nauigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarque so greata people as we may iustly suppose those conducters carried with them, will not easily beleue, that there were any vessels in those daies to transport Armies, and (withall) their cattle, by whose milke they liued and fed their children: for milke and fruit were the banquetting dishes of our forefathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of nations valued themselves by the heards and numbers of their Cattle: who had flocks of sheepe, and great droues and herds of their owne, and their owne sheep-herds and heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palästina, Syria, or Cilicia, hee might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouergone Granado, Valentia, and other Prouinces in that Trade: past the Streights of Gibraltar, distained all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and countries; and haue sought out the yron, wooddie, and barren Conntrie of the world (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous nauigation. But before the iourney of the Argonautes there were scarce any vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Iason had (if the tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fiftie passengers, yet was it farre greater then any of the former times: Erat enim antea paruarum nauicularum vsus, For in former times they vsed very small Vessells. I denie not but that the Tyrrians gaue themselves of old to farre-off nauigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of ships vnto them.

And for those boates called longa naues or Gallies, Plinie saith that Aegestus ascribed them the deuise to Paralus; and Philosopheus to Iason; Ctesias to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis; Archonachus to Aegon: to which inuention the Erythraei are said to haue added certain numbers of Oares: and then Aminodes the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure banks: the Quing, Remi first to haue beene vied by Nesichton the Salaminian, with which vessels in those parts of the world, the Romans serued themselves in the Panick war. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuiling of these Gallies on Sesostrius, though Semiramis vied them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the inuention; and yet Tertullian (on the contrary) giues it to Mimerus; others to Neopteme; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those ages, as the Aegyptians vied to coast the shores of the red Sea vpon rafts, deuised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittains had a kinde of Boat (with which they crosse the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with leather:

leather: of which kinde I have seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Ægus ex corio carum iuxta in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor): of which Lucas the Poet:

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning navigation were first revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference betwene the Arke of Noah, and such ships as were for any long navigation. Ye ancient stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long voyages to Sea: at least with multitudes of women, and children, and cattle: as also common reason can tell vs, that euen now when this Art is come to her perfection, such voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that age of Nimrod any ship, or vic of ships, fit for any long navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of navigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred 30 years after. Leauing therefore the fabulous to their fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countries farre off, I know not how, I will follow herein the relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which truth there is ioynd both nature, reason, policie, and necessitie: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibilitie.

§. IIII.

Of GOG and MAGOG, TYBAL and MESECH, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of EZECHIEL.

Cap. 38. 39.

- 40 NOW although many learned and reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a plantation of the world, which also hath bene and is receiued: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great learned man of this latter age, Arias Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Isophus, as he hath many good things, and is a guide to many errors withall, so was he in this plantation of the world very grosse and fabulous, whereby both 50 Enselmus, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his testimonies for currant, haue bene by him farre misled. But the better to conceive what Regions of the world Gomer the first sonne of Iaphet possit, as also Tubal, it is needfull to beginne with Magog; because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I finde most molt iudicious in the examination of this plantation. He takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations of the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of all which Gog was Prince or chiefe Conduer in their attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iapheths issues possidet, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the issue of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel speaketh of) were seated hereabout, it may best appear if wee consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie upon the former prophetic in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the vining of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Juda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

c. 37. v. 19.

By which prophetic of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my seruants shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one sheepe-herd, (that is) they shall bee vinited as they were in Dauids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seeke to impeach this Vnion, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receiue to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and fought to subiect them: all which were the subiects or Allies of Gog,²⁰ Prince of the Magogians, or Calefyrians, next bordering Palestina or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Juda.

c. 38. v. 2.

The wordes of Ezechiel are these: Some of man set thy face against Gog, and against the land of MAGOG, the chiefe Princes of MESSECH (or MOSCH) and TUBAL: and afterward. Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of MESSECH and TUBAL: and in the sixth Verse; GOMER and all his bands, and the house of TOGORMA of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the purpose of his prophetic, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vaine assaile Israel. He ioyneth them together vnder their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and ioyned together. Gog signifieth³⁰ in the Hebrew (saith St. Hierome) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith hee) Antichristus erit Diaboli regnumentum sub specie humana, That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Denill vnder humane forme. Hee addeth that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the letter (M) being an Hebrew Praposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this nor amisse, that he expounerth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation, with which agreeth this obseruation of Beraaldus. Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Hem-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the letter (He) which is vsed but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Heliaicidia) is neuer added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or according to others the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 39. Chapter is made manifest. Behold, I come against thee Gog the chiefe Prince of MESSECH and TUBAL.

In Ezech.

This mult needs be meant by the successours of Selencus Nicator, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Iewes their Tributaries onely, but endeoured by all means, and by all kind of violence to extinguish the religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes profess) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serue the mortall and rotten Gods of the Heathen: of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead images. St. Ambrose and Sidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Citties thereabout. Hermolus Barbarus our of Pomp. Mela deriues the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation⁴⁰ inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who saies that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeke stories call Gyges: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydean, gaue his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) forty furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Hierodotus and Niander set it about the Riuer of Hyllus, and Maender; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after hee had subdued the Countrie about the Riuer Rhedius which runneth into the Hellepontus, called the Promontory Trapeze after his owne name Gyges. These opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog saith hee that part of Asia the lesse, which Helyattes obtained, and after him his Sonne Craesus; who (as Junius further notes) having maistr'd all those Regions as farre South as Labanus in that border built the Citie Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Calesyria, whose people were the ancient enemies of the Jews.

Now that Magog is found in Calesyria, Plinie affirmeth saying; Calesyria habet Bambycen, quae alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syria uero Magog. Calesyria habet in Bambyce, quibus by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrian Magog. He further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Derecto, was here worshipped, Lucian makes mention here of, saying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yet he expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleue Strabo, then was Edesain Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis; where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authours did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enoughe bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the race of Seleucus. Now I doe not condemne the opinion of Hemolus Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the Seythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the nations of Calesyria and the North partes adioyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter plantation from the se partes they might bee propagated into Seythia. Yet it is not to bee denied, that the Seythians in olde times comming out of the North-east waded the better part of Asia the lesse, and possit Calesyria, where they built both Seythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Iudea, according to the wordes of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelities were the Ptolomies Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the successors of Alexander, the successor of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrinus thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the stone of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to haue bene called Bambyce, as we haue said, but also Edesain: not that by Euphrates; but inioineth of the same name; now the known name is Allope; for so Belonius exposeth this Hierapolis for Magog. This Citie had the title of sacred as the sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatrie; and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermaide Atergatis, or Atergatis, according as Plinie, which the Greekes call Derecto.

If then we compare the words of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirty eighth chapter, wherein he ioyneth together Gog, Mesoch, and Tubal with instruments of Iudea: with whom also Ezechiel completh Gomer; and all the trades of the North quarters; we may (as I conceiue) safely conclude, that these Edesains and Magogians of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Iudea) were not the ans of France, nor the Tubalines of Spaine, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Caleſſia: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whoſoever elſe hath followed them therein are to be reiected. But if Josephus referre himſelfe to later times, and thinke that ſome Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia paſſe into Spaine (to wit from that peece of land betwene Colchis (or Mengrelis) and Albania: (moſt part poſſeſt by the Georgians) then is his iudgement of better allowance. For without any repugnance of opinions, it may granted, that in proceſſe of time theſe people might from their firſt habitation paſſe into the Countries neare the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after Ages into Spaine.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, ſaying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tuball, from whence (ſayth Iuſtine) they paſſed into Spaine to ſearch out the mines of that Region: hauing belike vnderſtood that it was a Southerlie Countrie and mountainous. For it ſemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of iron, and other metalls, as Apollonius witneſſeth in theſe following verſes, telling how the Argonautes did viſit them.

*Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas ſcindit ſub montibus altis:
Mercedibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta miniftrant.*

The Chalybes plough not their barren ſoile,
But vndermine high hilles for iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endleſſe toile
For merchandize, which their poore liues ſuſtaines.

But it is more probable, that Spaine was firſt peopled by the Africans, who had euer ſince an affection to returne thither, and to repeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were eaſily drawne to paſſe ouer the Streights into that Countrie; and after by the Mooris who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred years, till the time of Ferdinand and Iſabel. And either of theſe opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth year of Nimrods raigne, Tubal paſt into Spaine, and therein built St. Vud: a poore Towne, and a poore deuice, God knows. Certaine it is that we muſt finde Mojoch or Mefech, and Tubal neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not farre off, or elſe we ſhall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mefech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their aſſiſtants. And that Mefech inhabited Asia, Funiſius (though he followed Berosus) confeſſeth, for theſe be his wordes. MESACVS, qui à MOSE MEFECH, præſcos Meſus ab Adula monte viſſi, ad Ponticam regionem poſuit: hæc regio poſted Cappadocia dicta eſt, in qua vrbs Mazica, &c. hæc eſt terra MAGOO principalis. MESACVS, whom MOSES calleth MEFECH, placed the ancient Meſians from the mount Adulas, vnto the coaſt of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Countrie of MAGOO. And this doth Amnius alſo auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mefech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly Weſt, and not North from Iudaæa. Alſo Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth of the deſtruction of Tyre, nameth Mefech and Tubal ioyntlic. And for a ſmall prooff, that theſe Nations were of a Northerne neighbour land (how farre ſoever ſtretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all horſemen. Thou, and much people with thee; all ſhall ride vpon horſes, euen a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any man belecue that theſe troupes came out of Spaine ouer the Pyrenes, and firſt paſſed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Helleſpont, or elſe compaſſed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the leſſer Asia, which is halfe the length or compaſſe of the then knowne world, he may be called a ſtrong beleuer, but he ſhall neuer be iuſtified thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Seleucus was a Province neighbouring Palestina or Judea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned vnto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely the Seleucide) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the great: after which they yet posselt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mesetch be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First hee seated himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward hee proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant issue filled all 10 Germanie, rested long in France and Brittaine, and possessed the vtmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancton well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Primos bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherinto they might exonerate their swelling multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon was (as the worthy restorer of our antiquities, M. William Cambden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old language doth signifie robbers; necessitie enforcing them to spoile their neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neare joyned, as after wardes in 20 the seates which they possessed. For that the warlike Nations of Germanie were in elder ages accustomed to be beaten by the Galles, the authoritie of Cesar affirming it is prooue sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises nor here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupied those partes, which had formerly bene held by their progenitours. I say not that they claimed those lands as theirs by descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late ages they returned thither; vnlesse hee will thinke, that all those Nations which from farre partes haue invaded and conquered 30 the land of Shinar, may by that argument bee proued not to haue issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothes for his excellent wisdoms surnamed Diu, whome Annius makes the brother of Gomer and Tubal (which brother Moses neuer heard of, who spake his knowledge of Iaphets sonnes) they must finde him in some old Poet: for Funçius a great Berosian confesseth. Quis hic Samothes fuerit incertum est, Who this Samothes was it is vncertaine; neither is their any prooue that he was that same Diu, whome Cesar sayth the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestour; yea and Vignier confesseth with Funçius. Mais on ne sçayt quil e'estoit. no man knowes who he was.

 §. V.
 Against the fabulous Berosus his fiction. That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BVt before I goe on with Noah his sonnes, I thinke it necessarie to disproue the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himselfe: an intution (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wrested) by those Authours of whom himselfe hath commented: as the fragmen of Berosus, Eubius Pictor, Cato, Lauinius and others.
 50 For Annius seeks to perswade vs, that Noah (surnamed Ianus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italia, wherein he liued 92. yeares. This to disproue, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disproue it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Gall, Chalme

Chaine and Nimie by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the actes he did in 92. yeares. But it were needlesse labour for me to disprove the authoritie of that Berofus, on whom Annus groundeth, seeing so many learned men haue so demonstratiuely proved that fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Affirian in his oration against the Greekes aduoweth, that the ancient and true Berofus wrote onely 3. Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successour of Selenus Nicator; but Annus hath deuised 5. Bookes, wherewith hee honoureth Berofus. And whereas Berofus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Affirians, Annus hath filled this fragment with the businesse of all the world. And if we may beleue Eufebius better then Annus, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Aeneas) consumed but 150. yeares: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Aeneas arrivall into Italie there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codomen) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the worldes yeare (as some reckon) 2717. after the flood 1064. and Noah died 350. yeares after the flood: and so there past betwene Ianus of Italie and Noah surnamed Ianus 704. yeares. For Saturnus succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinius followed Faunus: which Latinius lived at once with Tautenes the 27. King of Affiria: with Pelasgus of Peeloponnesus: with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Iudge of Israel. Now all these five Kings of the Latines hauing consumed but one hundred and fifty yeares; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: therefore reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fifty yeares, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus lived.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they too the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Isuecalion, from whom they drawe the Iones, who were indeede the children of Iaan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Iaan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the sonne of Medea, whom they make the parent of the Medes; though they were defended of a farre more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third sonne of Iapheth.

Lastly we see by a true experience, that the Brittish language hath remained among vs aboute 2000. yeares; and the English speech cuer since the inuasion of the Angles: and the same continuance haue all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus, had left in Italie his grandchild Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plain resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue beene found in the languages of those Countreies. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the same Graecian Ianus, which commaunded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeares, (saith Eufebius) which was in the time of Latinius the fifth King: which also St. Augustine and Iustine confirme; and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Veſta (others Camsens) the wife of this Ianus; who instituted the holie Fire of the Veſta Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their idolatrous and heathenish ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleue that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, to be a iust man, and whom God of all mankind made choise of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God; or so wicked and vngratefull, to set vp or deuise any Heathen saluage; or idolatrous adoration; or haue instituted any ceremony, contrarie to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his Sonne TOGORMA of the posteritie of IAPHETH were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

10 TO turne now to the Sonnes of Noab, and the worlds plantation after the flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and needfullie taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next countries bordering to their first habitations, 64 and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keepe intelligence by River: because the land was yet Desart and overprest with woods, bogges, and rotten marshes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus the South part of Chaldaea, downe the River of Gebon, by which he might passe tooe and fro from Babylon to his owne plantation: thofe also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Per or Orebas near the Lakes of Chaldaea, might by the same River get vp to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of land vpon Gebon Southward, 20 20 Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the land of Chus: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while oppressed, till God afterward by the seede of Abraham made them his owne nation and victorious. Hamilah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Cush, tooke both banks of Tigris, especially on the East side of the River: by which river his people might also passe tooe and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Hamilah or Sufian, was anciently called Chusian, or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himselfe tooke the banks of Gebon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-westward towards Arabia the fertile, and the Desart, where Ptolomee placeth the Cittie of Chusida, first Chusia.

30 Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tigris to convey them into the Persian Gulf, which walseth the banks of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sonnes of Cush might take land downe the River as they pleased. Also the Cittie of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tigris; and from thence a Colony past to Chorran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seats in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, late 40

40 downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Sarmatians spread themselves into Iberia: and the Scythians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first planters in Asia the lesse, held the Countrey of the Cymmerians (witnesseth Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom St. Paul wrote his Epistle so intitled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first plantations) gave names to diuers places; as to the mountaines about Albania (called Cymmerus) and to the Cittie of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius tooke appellation from this nation, in the outlet whereof was also a Cittie of that name called Cymmerus. which Plinie kith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Cappadocia, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, fluouring of brimstone: which Augustus caused to be cleaned by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

The

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Moschi (which Ptolemy calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the mountaines Moschici, in the Valley betweene the mountaines Moschicia, and the mountaines Paryarades: out of whose North part springeth the Riuer Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Moscovians (saith Melancthon), and it may bee, that in proceesse of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melancthon) signifieth extending, enlarging or stretching forth. Togormas also at first did inhabit amongst his parents and kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydanians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phenicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gabeb: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Ierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Citties Tigranokarte: of which Citties Tigranes subdued by Nucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the Prophecie of Ezechiel against the Tyrrians. They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Favres horses, and horsemen, and mules, which could not well be driuen ouer the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosiphus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians, which I doe not deny, but they might bee in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalms be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the twelfth of Nimrod aidge. The Iewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperour is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Asusconia. But for these subdivisions it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet spirit, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations can bee hardly knowne: only reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were couered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the conduction and dominion ouer the rest.

From Madai the third Sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Græcians bring them (as before) from Medus the Sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of IAVAN the fourth Sonne of IAPHETH: and of MESCH, of ARAM, and MESHECH of IAPHETH.

If Iauan the fourth Sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Efus; Et mittam ex ijs qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, & Graciam. And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italic and in Greece. The Geneua here vsith the word (Tarsisch) for Tarsus, a Cittie in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places bee taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneua vsf the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italic and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew wordes. Of these Iones were the Athenians, though themselves drame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancestours, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abouting in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts.

parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion; but the antiquitie of Iunon marres the falthion of that supposition, who so many yeares preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Thebes with all his Fathers treasure, and his brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was gratioously receiued by Erichonius, who gaue him his daughter in marriage; of whom hereceived two sonnes, Ion, and Acheus, the supposed Ancestours of the Athenians. For Attica was called Ionica (saith Plutarch in the life of Themiscus) who, when he had ioyned Allegora to Attica, erected a piller in that Isthmus or Strait, which listeneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these wordes. Hæc non sunt Peloponnesus, sicut Ionica. These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionica; and on the other side which looked towards the South and into Peloponnesus, this. Hæc pars est Peloponnesus, and not Ionica.

Strabo out of Heecæus affirmeth, that the Ionics came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrarie to the former opinion: That the Ionics of Greece transporting certaine companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Ionics was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof then he leamed of the Greekes themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Heecæus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnkowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Iunon did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the nearest way, leaving his owne name to some maritimate Prouince on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleued, that Ionica tooke the name from Ion the sonne of Xuthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite vnto them, which they held for diuers yeares. And how soeuer the Greekes vaunt themselves to be the Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disproue their pride, and vanitie therein. For this dispute of Antiquitie (among prophaned Writers) rested betwene the Scythians and the Egyptians, as in the out of Trogus; in the warre betwene Pecaris of Egypt, and Tamas of Scythia, witnessed which preceded for the raigine of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cæcrops time the Greekes were all saluages without law or religion, liuing like brute beasts in all respects: and Cæcrops (saith St. Augustine) liued together with Atafes.

The sixth sonne of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosoch: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betwene Meshech the sonne of Arax, and Meshech (or Mosoch) the sonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers interpreters diuersly written. Montanus with the Pulgar writeth Meshech, the sonne of Arax Mes; the Genes Mash; Iunius Meshe. But it may be gathered out of the 120 Psalme, that either Meshech the sonne of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gaue name to that Prouince wheren Darius hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Meshech the sonne of Arax. For Darius bewailing his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious people) vnto these wordes. Woe is me that I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius conuerteth thus. Heri mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenita Kedareni: The Septuagint giues it this sense. Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth. Heri mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitans cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldeans otherwise, and in these wordes. O memserum, quia peregrinatus sum Assiris, habitans cum tabernaculis Arabum. O wretch, that I am, for I haue irauelled among those of Asia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacle of the Arabians. But howsoeuer or which soeuer conuerſion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Prouince

of Arabia petraea; and the Chaldaean putteth Ara in stead of Mefech; but the Hebrew it selfe hath Mefech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mefi the sonne of Arani, 1. Chron. 17. is called Mefier, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Mefech or Mefi, both bordering Judaea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Mefech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mefech out of the word Mofech (given by the Septuagint.) to be the Musconian: sure they presume much vpon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that David neuer trauailed so farre North; (for to him Musconia was viterly vnknowne) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a Cittie on the mountaines of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arius Montanus makes Mofech the Father of the Musconians: and herein also Melancthon runnes with the tide of common opinion, and sets Mefech in Musconia, though with some better aduise of judgement; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence trauailing Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalmes, (Uti mihi quida exulo in Mefech) to signifie, gentis eius feritatem insignem esse; that the feritie of that nation exceeded: which fiercenesse or brutallitie of the Musconians, David neuer proued, or (perchance) neuer heard of. But the same feritie or crueltie which those Northerne Musconians had, may awell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Countrie tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equal feritencesse to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, euen to this day, (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being forehewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wild man: his hand shall be against euery man, and euery mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Plinie) confronteth the Arabians Cochis on the East, and the Cedraei Southward, both which ioyne together vpon the Nabathai. So it appeareth (as before) that Mefech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did ioyne to Mefech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the successours of Seleucus, enemies of the reestablishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I haue already said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Mefech (or Mofech) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Syrcania, and giuenames, both to Mazegesi in the one, and to the mountaines Mefchicis in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Musconia: and so all opinions faued. But all language Nations ouergrowne and vncultiuated, doe (for the most part) shew a faire plantation, euen as ciuillitie, letters, and magnificent buildings, witness antiquitie.

Tiras, the seventh sonne of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the sonnes of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authours (worthie the examination) affirme. Iosephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras people, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the Sonnes of Gomer, which were three:

{ Ascanes, { Ripath,
{ and { Togorma.

§. VIII.

of ASCANEZ and RIPHATH, the two elder Sonnes of GOMER.

ASCANEZ was the Father of those which the Greekes call Regini, (saith Iosephus) but he giues no reason why.

Eusebius makes Asconez the Father of the Goths. The Iewes in their

- 10 Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation, but their expolitions are commonly very idle. Plinie findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neare the Riuer of Hylas and Cius: Nelanchon being of the same opinion, that the Tuissones were defended of the Ascanes, (for Tuiscones, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanes, proposito articulo die Ascanes), and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the tombs of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the Lake Ascanis, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Ascanus (Deo similis, saith Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautiful and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil call Aeneas, Os humerofq; Deo similis, in face and body like one of the Gods. Virgil also remembereth such a Riuer together with the hills Gargara: as, Illo ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; fontem Ascanium. Appetite leads them both ouer the mountaines Gargara, and the riuing Ascanium. But this Plinie maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the Cittie of Brillon vpon the Riuer Ascanius, which is adioyning to Naliss, and is neare the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Ascanes he direct's vs to finde by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth farr within the Countreys of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nices are accounted fiftie and twentie miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, euen betwene Prusia and Nices. And so Ionius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Ascanes, to be the inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Vrbius 30 makes it a Cittie of Troas, built by Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolomie witnesseth: and Strabo giueth Ascania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Myfia, neare vnto Cio; which also agreeth with Plinie. For Plinie findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neare Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy Ascanes.

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanes the sonne of Gomer, or of Ascanus the sonne of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanus which brought succour to the Troians, could not take his name from Aeneas sonne, who was then either exceeding young, or rather vnborne: and it seemeth that the countreys whence those succours came were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myfia, but 40 farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Iheremie is called Ascanes, by the figure Synchiloche, as Ianuis thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which decerne not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Iheremie we shall learne of what Nation the Ascanes were, whose wordes are these. See: up a Standard in the land, Blow the trumpet among the Nations against ber, call 651. 2. 27. up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanes against ber, &c. meaning, against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most interpreters consent, so called of the mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesse: Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (saith Ianuis and others before him) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which continued all that Tract from Emphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phoenicia and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Prouince of Syria: the Scriptures difference it in the storie of Isaac and Esau, and call it Aram-padam. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians and Ascanes ioyned with them (who altogether vnto 50 vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoile of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much much to call Askenaz, Germanie or Amaine, for we heare of no Swart Battiers at that sieg. But the Askenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the disperſion of Nations was in aſertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Abeginis, or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphab the ſecond ſonne of Gomer there is mention in the firſt of Chronicles. Berodains and Pererims thinke that hee wandered farre off from the reſt of his brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I ſee nothing to the contrary, but that he might feare himſelfe with the reſt of his familie: for there wanted no roome or ſoile in thoſe dayes for all the ſonnes and grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to bee well vnderſtood, that the Riphei were of Riphab, which the Greekes afterward (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (ſaith Melancthon) ſignifieth Giants. Theſe people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the moſt of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greater number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who ſpake the ancient Palae: which being firſt called Riphei (for the loue of ſome of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a cuſtome exceeding common in thoſe times) and dwelt firſt in Paphlagonia, as Homer witneſſeth, and ſo doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when theſe Riphei (afterward Heneti) fought new Regions, they came along the ſhores of Euſximus, and filled the North part of Europe, containing Ruſſia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they croſt thwart the Land, and peopled Alſia, delirous (ſaith Melancthon) of a warmer ſoile of fruit and Wine. Theſe Heneti or Veneti, whom Melancthon taketh to be one people, filled all that land betweene the Baltick and Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedens is found in Ruſſia. This Nation, after they were poſſeſt of Lituania and Polonia, diſturbed the plantation of the Boj and Hermondurj. Therefore, it ſeemeth to me, that of Riphab came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and ſo thinketh Arius Montanus, firſt ſeated in Paphlagonia, but in courſe of time Lordes of Sarmatia, and thoſe other parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Riueres of Viſſula and Albia. The name (ſaith Melancthon) ſignifieth wandering or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by white meates and fruits, as (indeede) all Nations did in the firſt Ages.

Of the third Sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue ſpoken already; now therefore of Iauans children, which were foure:

{ Elifa, { Tharſis, { Cethim, { Dodanim, }

Of the foure Sonnes of IAVAN: and of the double ſignification of Tharſis, either for a proper name or for the Sea.

TH Elifa or Elipha, came the Aoles: and of this Elifa all the Greekes were called Hellenes, ſaith Montanus. Melancthon makes Elifa the Father ſo of the Aoles in Aſia ſide: others of Elis in Peloponneſus, or of both. And ſeeing the Greekes were deſcended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Aoles and the Elei, tooke name of Elifa, his eldeſt Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. ſpeaking of Tyre, nameth the Iſſes of Elifa. Hyacinthus &

Et purpura de insulis Elifa facta sunt operimentum tuum, blew silke and purple, brought from the Isles of Elifa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Elifa write Tidra: but the Pulgar, the Tigarine, the Geneva, and innus, keepe the word Elifa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such purple Dye in Italia in those dayes, nor linée, that I can reade of: but those Isles of Elifa, were by a better coniecture the Isles of Greece; and the best purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Getulia.

Tharxis, the second Sonne of Ianan inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharxis is the Metropolis. Mantanus for Tharxis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldaean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharxis, but it hath no authoritie, nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Shups of Salomon went euerie three yeares to Tharxis, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldaean Paraphrast translates Tharxis (Africa). But Salomon's Shups were prepared in the Red Sea at Ezion Gaber, in the Bay of Elent, neare vnto Madian, where Iethro (Moses Father in law) inhabited; a Prouince of Arabia Petrea, Idumea, or of the Chusites; and they sailed to the higher part of the East India. For it had bene a strange nauigation to haue spent three yeares in the passage betwene India and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue bene sailed in fixe or ten daies.

20 And if so great riches might haue bene found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all other neighbouring Princes would soone haue enterdaynted that trade also. But this enterprife of Salomon is in this fort written of in the first of Kings. Asa King Salomon made a Nauie of Shups in Ezion Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinks of the Red Sea in the lands of Edom: and Iyyan sent with the Nauie his seruants, that were mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and set from thence 420. talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that only: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in general) so, because the Israellites and the Phoenicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharxis had the greatest shups, and were the first nauigators in those parts with such vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharxis vsed often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the shups of Salomon went euerie three yeares to Tharxis, that phrase is not strange at all: for we vse it ordinarily where soeuer we nauigate, (namely) that the Kings shups are gone to the Sea, or that they are let out euerie yeare, or euerie three yeares to the Sea; and therefore Tharxis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharxis is truly taken for Tharxis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia; founded by Tharxis the second sonne of Ianan, or by his successours in memorie of their first parent. To this Citie armed Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and calling himselfe into the Riuer to bathe and wash his bodie, he fell into an extreme feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharxis was St. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of SYRIA adjoining) Ianan who was to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gaue the Islands betwene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elifa, and left Tharxis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third sonne of Ianan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, so with Berwaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (saith he) and significth percussores though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Elfa 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians. Itac caluminiis ab Esa i praedictis est, qui capite vicefimo tercio inquit, venturos centuros esse everfos Tyri ex terra Cettim, This calamitie (saith MELANCHTON) was foretold by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cettim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came vnto them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and lo also Cettim might be taken for Itale, saith Hieronimus) yet we must take the first performance of the former prophetic, which tooke effect with the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander: who after seven Moneths siege entred that proude Citie, and cut in peeces 7000. principall Cittizens; slaugtered 2000. and changed the freedome of 13000. others into bondage and flauerie. Now, that Macedonia was taken for Cettim, it appeareth plainly in the first of the Maccabees, in these wordes. After that ALEXANDER the Macedonian, the Sonne of PHILIP, went forth of the land of Cettim, and slue DARIUS King of the Persians and Medes. IOSEPHVS sets Cettim in the Ile of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the Citie Gittium, the Countrie of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth LAERTIUS) which Citie Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in St. Iheromes time. So it may be that all the Ilandes in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Ilandes of Cettim: and in that sense might Cyprus bee so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cettim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Iland too freight for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, was inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies ouer the Aegean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) came downe to Rhodes, as neare Cettim, Tharsis, and Elifas, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodan are vied indifferently by many translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily bee taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirme. There is also found in Epirus the Citie of Dodana, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cettim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (saied in a firtle lesse Iland) did of necessitie find his people further off; and keeping alongh the coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elifas, he passed a little farther on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Citie of Dodana was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his posteritie might giue it that name in memorie of their first parent, as it hapned all the world ouer. For names were giuen to Citties, Mountaines, Riuers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successours many yeares after: every of their families being desirous to retaine among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafed elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greatest Citties often sired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their owne names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) free from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Ilands, and neighbour Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesse Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldæa, and the borders thereof towards the West and Southwest: and the sonnes of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) trauided Southward in Arabia Felix, and Southwestward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner tooke the way of Aegypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the enemies both to the Hebrewes, and to those of the sonnes of Shem, which spred themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were four:

‡. X.

That the state of CHUS the eldest sonne of HAM was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange fables, and ill translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

20 Of IOSEPHVS his tale of an Ethiopesse wife to MOSES, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of CHUS.

That Ham was the Father of the Aegyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 109. Psalm v. 51. Then ISRAEL came to Egypt, and JACOB was a stranger in the land of HAM: and in the 78. Psalm. He sate all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of HAM. There is also found a great Cittie in Thebaida, called Cheramis; (as it were the Cittie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther proofe to the former. For the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very eroked constructions, and senselesse interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Iosephus haue here failed, yet it is manifest that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petras, and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desart: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Nom. 12. v. 1. where Moses his wife is called a Chusite, together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place; Nom. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chus for Ethiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grossly mistaken; or vainely led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chus was Ethiopia, and therefore that the wife of Moses (which in Scripture Nom. 12. v. 1. is called a woman of Chus) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, saith that Tharbis the daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers Cittie; and to the end to obaine Moses for her husband, shee practised to betray both her parents. Countrie, and friends, with the Cittie it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The tale (if it bee worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he had described the strength of the Ethiopian Cittie Atarot, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these wordes. Hic cum MOSES de- fidere exercitum otiosum agrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopiæ regi filia, nomine THARBI S, &c. which tale hath this sense in English. When MOSES was grieved that his Arme lay idle, because the enemy besieged, durit not sallie and come to handie strokes, there hapned this accident in the meane while. The Æthiopian King had a daughter called THARBI S, who at some assaults given beheld the person of MOSES, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that MOSES had not only up-held and restored the falling estate of the Ægyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brincke of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daylie encreas'd, shee made meanes to send unto him by one of her trustiest seruants to offer her selfe unto him, and become his Wife; 19 which MOSES on this condition entertained, that shee should first deliuer the Citie into his possession: whereunto shee condescending, and MOSES hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the tale of IOSEPHVS..

THIS tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also vtterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citie of Arabia, for a Citie of Æthiopia: as he names Æthiopia it selfe to haue beene the Countrie of Moses his Wife, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabaens are Arabians, and not Æthiopians; except Iosephus can persuade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Black-Moore. And though Damianus a Goes speake of certain letters to the King of Portugall from Prefter Iohn, of the Abissines: wherein that Æthiopian King would persuade the Portugals that hee was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princeesse; which had it beene true, it is likely that when Sihac King of Ægypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Ierusalem, his brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Ægypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his wife, to haue beene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the body of Ægypt, and neare Eston Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edom is ioyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if we marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Ægypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that hee was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, hee had formerly liued fortie yeares; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing vp in Ægypt, hee was instructed by Iethro in the Ægyptian learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and S. Stephen confirmeth, that hee was learned in all the wisdome of the Ægyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second. Therefore MOSES fled from PHARAO, and dwelt in the land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as wordes can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written. When MOSES kept the flocks of IETHRO his Father in law, Priest of Madian, and draue the flocks to the Desert, and came to the mountaine of GOD in Horeb. Now that mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if we may beleuee Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of

Moses

Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countie and friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianissh. And as God worteth the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a sheepheard to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reghel from the other sheepheards, and drew them water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordained) hee was entertained by Iethro, whose daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

- 10 From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, hee aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Governour and Judges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had beene an Aethiopian, it had beene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts: in which the second time he wandered fortie yeares, and did by these late trauiels of his seeke to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before hee brought them to the land of plenty and rest. For hee found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatry, and obdurate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by persuasion or by miracle, hee ware them out in the deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those hee might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chriamenis, whoe also reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne wordes haue this beginning. Menatur etiam APOLLINARIS duas uxores habuisse MOSEN, &c. APOLLINARIS also lyeth in affirming that MOSES had two wives: and who doth not perceiue these things faued by them? for it is manifest that the wife of MOSES was ZEPHORA, daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Aethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so saith Chriamenis.

†. III.

CHVSII ill expounded for Aethiopia, Ezech. 29. 10.

- 40 NOW as Chusis is by the Septuagint conuerted Aethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Aethiopijsa: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Aethiopia written for Arabia. For by the wordes of Ezechiel it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Aethiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come vpon thee and vpon thy Rivers, and I will make the land of Egypt utterly wast and desolate, from the Tower of Senenck, even to the borders of the Black-moares: which last wordes should haue beene thus conuerted: From the Tower of Senenck to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: betweene which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Senenck to the Aethiopians, hath no sense at all. Senenck it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Aethiopia, or the land of the Black-Moores. So as if Nabuchodonosor conquest had beene but betweene Senenck and the border of Aethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victorie then the conquest of all that land and Countrey lying betweene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreys ioyned together, or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Seotland: for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the conquest of England.

England: Barryck being the North border of England, as Senenb or Syene is the South bound of Aegypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entred into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Yulgar, the Genes, and all other (in effect) haue written Ethiopia for Chus.

† IIII.

An other place of EZECHIEL c. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this fort concurred. In die illa egredientur nuncij a facie mea in trivertibus ad conterendum Ethiopia confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneuans. In that day shall there messengers goe forth from mee in ships to make the careless Moors afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word trivertes which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the translation should haue bene (as in the former) amended by vling the word Chus, or Arabia for Ethiopia or the black Moors, euery man may see which meanly vnderstandeth the Geography of the world, knowing, that to passe out of Aegypt into Ethiopia there neede no gallies nor ships, no more then to passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Ethiopia being the continerminat Region with Aegypt, and not diuided fo much as by a riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Aegypt Nabuchodonosor should send gallies alongt the coast of the Red sea by which an Army might bee transported into Arabia the happy and the stony (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Aegypt and the desarts of Pharan) which Army might thereby surprize them vnawares in their security and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Senenb within a mile of Ethiopia, hee needed neither Galley nor Shippe to passe into it: being all one large and firme land with Aegypt, and no otherwise parted from it, then one Inland thire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancy to haue rowed vp the riuer but for pleasure, hee could not haue done it: for the fall of Nylus (tumbling ouer high and steepy mountaines) called Catadupa Nilus were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue already obserued, the sonnes of euery father seated themselves as neere together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse; Iauan and his sonnes in Greece and the Islands adioyning; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the sonnes and Grand-children of Chus from the riuer of Gehon (their fathers first feat) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other continuat vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrewes had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any warre, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian blacke moores, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradise.

† V.

A PLACE ESAY 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chus for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembred, so in diuers other is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chus, which puts the story (where it is so vnderstood) quite out of square, one kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of Scripture Esay 18. Va terra Cymbalorum alarum que est trans flumina Ethiopie, or according to the Septuagint in these words. Va terra nauium alarum que est trans flumina Ethiopie? Wo to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the riuers of Ethiopie, sending Ambassadors by sea, quen in vessels of reeds vpon the waters. Va terra Cymbrosa emlof a ora: Wee to the land of the fadie coast, with Iunius. The former translators vnderstand it in this fenfe. That the waters are fladowed with the failcs, which are figuratiuely called the wings of the fhips, the other, that the Coat of the Sea was fladowed by the height of the land.

But to the purpofe: That this land heere fpooken of by the Prophet Efy is Egypt no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that fent this meffage to the Ifacites which Efy repeateth, and by the former tranflation euery man may fee the tranfpofition of Kingdomes: for heereby Egypt is tranfpofed vnto the other fide of Ethiopia, and Ethiopia fet next vnto Iudaa, when it is the land of Chuff and Arabia: in deede that lieth between Iudaa and Egypt, and not Ethiopia, which is feated vnder the Aequinoctiall line. And of this Beroldus asketh a materiall queftion, (to wit) what Region that fhould be, of which the Prophet fpeaketh, and placeth it beyond the riuers of Ethiopia: Quam de ignota agi regione dici nequit. Forti cannot bee faid that heere treath of an vnkowne region. Now if Ethiopia it felfe be vnder the Aequinoctiall line, with whom the Iewes had neuer any acquaintance, why fhould any man dreame that they had knowledge of Nations farre beyond it again, and beyond the riuers of Ethiopia except wee fhall impiofly thinke that the Prophet fpake hee knew not what, or vfed an impertinent difcourfe of thofe nations, which were not difcovered in 2000. yeares after, inhabiting as farre fouth as the 20 Cape of good hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bana efferan.a.

†. VI.

That upon the like miftaking, both TERRIACA in the ftory of SENA-CHERIB, and ZERA in the ftory of ASA are vndoubtedly made Ethiopianes.

AND by this tranflation is the ftory of Senacherib vtterly miltaken in the caufe of his retreat. For Senacherib was firft repulſed at Pelufium, at the very entrance 30 of Egypt from Iudaa: when hauing certaine knowledge that Thirrhak, (which all the interpreters call King of Ethiopia) was on the way to fet on him, he beganne to withdraw himfelfe, and fearing to leaue his Army in two parts, he ſent threatening meffengers to Ezechia King of Iuda perfwading him to ſubmit himfelfe: the tenour whereof is fet downe in the ſecond of King: in theſe words. Haue any of the Gods of the Nations deliuered his land out of the hands of the King of Affur? Where is the God of Hamath? &c. By which proud Ambaſſage, if he had obtained entrance into Hieruſalem, hee then meant to haue vnted that great Army before Hieruſalem commanded by Rabſakeb with the other which lay before Pelufium, a great City vpon the branch of Abius next Arabia. For Senacherib had already maſtered the moſt part of all thofe 40 Cities in Iudaa and Beniamin with a third Army, (which himfelfe commanded) being then at the ſiege of Lebna. But vpon the rumour of that Arabian Armie led by their King Thirrhak (whom Iofephus calls Thurſices) Rabſakeb halted from the ſiege of Hieruſalem, and found Senacherib departed from Laabis and ſet downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthereopolis as ſome haue ſuppoſed. But while hee had ill ſucceſſe at Pelufium and feared Thirrhak, God himfelfe whom he leaſt feared ſtrooke his Army before Hieruſalem by the Angell of his power, ſo as 185000. were found dead in the place as in the life of Ezechias is heereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Tirrahak was from Arabia, Iofephus himfelfe makes it plaine. For he confeſſeth in the tenth booke the firſt Chapter of the Iewes antiquities, that it was come to Senacheribs knowledge, that the Army which was a foote (both to relieue the Egyptians and the Iewes) marched towards him by the way of the Deſert: Now the Deſert which lay indifferent betweene Hieruſalem and Pelufium, was that of Pharan or Sar which alſo toucheth on the three Arabies, to wit the ftory, of which it is a part: the Deſert, and the Happy; and by no other way in 50 deede

deede could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelufium or Ierusalem. But, that there is any Desert betwene Pelufium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet bene heard of; or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, verſe the ninth, hath the ſame miſtaking as the reſt. For herethe word (Chufib) is alſo tranſlated Ethiopia, and in this ſenſe haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expreſſed the beginning of the ninth verſe. He heard alſo men ſay of Thirrhakeh King of Ethiopia, &c. whereas it ſhould haue bene thus conuerted with Iunius. Audienti autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chufite, He heard alſo of Thirrhakeh King of the Chufites. For they were the Chufites and Arabians, whoſe houſes and Citties were next the fire, and vpon whom the very ſmoke of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their neareſt neighbours: and ſo were not the Ethiopian Black-Moores vnder the Aequinoctiall, whom neither warre nor peace (which diſcouereth all Regions) euer found out, ſaith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Ethiopia then Zerah was, who invaded Aſa King of Iuda, with an Armie of a Million and 3000. Chariots. Indeede, how ſuch an Armie and thoſe Chariots ſhould paſſe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mightie Kings) let all men that know how theſe Regions are ſeated, and how farre diſtant, iudge. For Princes doe not eaſily permit Armies of a Million to runne through them; neither was there euer any ſuch ſtrength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the world, or elſewhere. Neither are theſe Ethiopians ſuch traui-20 lers or conquerours; and yet is this King Zerah alſo called King of Ethiopia. But the word Chufib being firſt ſo conuerted for Ethiopia, the reſt of the Interpreters (not looking into the ſeates of Kingdomes, or the poſſibilities of attempts, or inuaſions) followed one another in the former miſtakings.

Psal. 5. 9.

†. VII.

A farther expoſition of the place. ESAI. 18. 1.

Concerning theſe wordes in that eighteenth Chapter of Eſai, Naninum alarum, 30 winged ſhips, (ſo the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalorum alarum (according to the Latine) ſails whiſting in the windes, or terra umbrae ora (after Iunius) the land of a ſhadowed coaſt, or the land ſhadowing with wings, as our Engliſh Geneſis hath it. The two firſt interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome haue one ſenſe in effect. For the ſails are commonly called the wings of a ſhip; and we uſe to ſay ordinarily when our ſhips ſaile ſlowly, that they wanteth wings; (that is) when her ſails are either
 153 worne or too narrow; and we alſo uſe the ſame phraſe of the windes whiſling in the ſails. And it may be that the Egyptians employed ſo many of thoſe ſmall ſhips, as their ſails were ſaid to giue a ſhadow ouer the Red Sea. Furto make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Eſai) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth ſignifie both to ſhadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline ſound: ſo 40 as the meaning of this place (ſaith Pintus) is this. Woe to thee, O Egypt, which doeſt promiſe to others ſafegard, vnder the ſhadow of thy wings, which (indeede) ſeemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Eſai: and this phraſe is often elſewhere uſed, as in the ſixteenth Plaſime, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me, Deſend me vnder the ſhadow of thy wings. The Boats of reede ſpoken of are of two kinds; either of basket, willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittaine or a tree made hollow in the bottoome, and built vpon both ſides with Canes. Of the one fort I 50 haue ſene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI. of the Plantation and Antiquities of Aegypt

¶. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Aegypt, and the rest of the Sonnes of HAM, were seated in order, one by another.

He second Sonne of Han was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat further off to inhabit. For Chus first possit Chaldea on the West side of Gebon chiefly: and from thence, as hee increased in people, so hee entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the Southeast-side of Inde.
Mizraim his brother (with Phut) pass'd over into Africa. Mizraim held Aegypt:
 and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust further off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palastina: and these four brothers possit all that Tract of land, from Gebon in Chaldea, as farre to the West as the Mediterran Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petraea, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samarita, and Judea; with the two Aegypti, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterran Sea on the North: and Thebada (called the vpper Aegypt) stretcheth it selfe toward the South as farre as Syene, the border of the *Ethiopi*ans or *Black-Moore*s. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other nation or familie that dwelt betweene them. And in the same manner did all their Sonnes againe, and all the sonnes of the rest of Nachs children, fort themselves.

¶. II.

Of the time about which the name of Aegypt beganne to be knowne: and of the Aegyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their antiquities 76. 255 seeme the more fabulous.

30

This flourishing Kingdome possit by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Aegypt, at such time as Aegyptus (otherwise Rameses, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus chased thence his elder brother Danau, shunting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Dana, abandon-ning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the flood, in the time 40 of Iofua, as S. Augustine coniectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysses it ap-peareth that the Aegyptians were so called at the time of the Troian warre. And before this, Aegypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oecana, Asia, Osiriana, &c.
 And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Apion) numbred all the Kings of Aegypt after Moses departure, who consumed 392. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Aegyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Iofua, and about 1000. yeeres after the flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israell to be those Hypso, which he also calleth Pastores or Sheep-herds, which are said to haue reigned in Aegypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancesters, (meaning the Ancesters of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grossly decei-50 ved, or that he vainely boasted: for the Israellites had no such Dominion as Manethon fainteth: nor abode in Aegypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Aegyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Dionysius, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Aegypt 330. Kings before Sinosis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus;
 and

and that they had memorie and florie of 13000. yeares; and that the starres had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirme that they are more ancient then Jupiter and the Moone, whereof Ouid:

De Fall. 1.

Ante Iouem genitum terras habuisse feruntur Arcades: & Lunâ gens prior illâ fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Ioue was bred.

But for those 13000. yeares it may well bee true: seeing it is certaine that the Aegyptians reckon their yeares by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. yeares, whether wee take their Moneths or Lunarie yeares to haue bene of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those five diuerities of their Lunarie yeares.

† III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the

GERARDVS MERCATOR in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Aegyptians antiquitie in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Aegyptians times) had beginning with the generall flood: and that therefore the first of the other fiftene reached the creation, or soone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer. That therein Mercator was first deceiued, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie was at once with the generall flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeares after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the 30. heerep-heards Dynastie (being in number the 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to haue bene in the yeare of the world 1846. which Eusebius findeth in the worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastie was begunne but in the 292. yeare after the flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeares. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynastie to endure 115. yeares, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse then 100. yeares: for the 28. had but 6. yeares; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeares.

Now Annus in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeares: and that the first of the 15. beganne but in the 131. yeare after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to haue bene then in being at the time of the flood, Annus makes them all after it. But the contrarie of fallhood cannot bee hidden, though disguised. For Annus had forgotten his former opinion and assertion, that it was in the 131. yeare that Nimrod with the sonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinar: so hee forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of speech there was no dispersion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Gomer into Italie, and Tubal into Spaine, in the 10. yeare of Nimrods raigne: (which was ten yeares after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnaduised. For he makes Aegypt possesse, and a gouernement established in the very first yeare of the arrivall of Nimrod into Shinar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neare in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

† IIII.

† IIII

Against PERERIVS : that it is not unlikely, but that Ægypt was peopled within 200. yeares after the creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the flood.

10 BVt whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquitie of the Ægyptians, touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not finde any great strength in this opinion of Pererius, (to wit) that it was either vnlkely or impossible that Ægypt should bee peopled within 100. or 200. yeares after Adam, in the first age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall flood, I doe verily beleue the contrarie; and that not only of Ægypt, but the better part of all the world was then peopled: Pererius his wordes are these. Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos ADAMI proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Ægyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of ADAM be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeares of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Ægypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then 20 both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving belief, it is lawfull for every man to bee guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or caulling humour: for I thinke it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of vniou, then out of forward subtletie, and preiudicate resolute-ness, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First, therefore to this opinion, that Ægypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, not at all before the flood, I say that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life which exceeded those which came after the flood double, and (after a few yeares) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many children: and at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue beene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the land of Abad, and there by the helpe of his owne issues built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the Citie and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeares by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one yeare: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancie of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, euen within 130. yeares, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeares after (that is, by such time as the world had flood 200. yeares) as well Assyria, Syria, and Ægypt might be possest before the flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance, or true storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeares after the flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie proueth, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Againe, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and the left not all her Kingdomes empty) doe well proue, that if the world had such plentie of people in so few years after the flood, it might also bee as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 92. years after the flood of Noah. And these troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the flood to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more then 360. years: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be giuen. And if but the one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. footmen, and 500000. horsemen, it must needs bee, that long before Semiramis raigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in league with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomis'd by Iustine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these be his owne wordes, speaking of Ninus. Fière quidem temporibus antiquioribus VEXORIS Rex Aegypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient VEXORIS King of Egypt, and TANAI King of the Scythians: of which the one inuaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the world was, the conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbeth the Armie, wherewith Ninus inuaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. footmen, and 200000. horsemen: and the stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster's Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the world euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for forraine authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was possit by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Citties in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultivate a desolate and ouergrowne ground, to beautifie it with many Citties, Lawes, and pollicies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time then 200. years after the flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. years after the generall flood; so as not only Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those nations be compress, which 1656. years brought forth before the flood? euen necessitie, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne world; especially, where Death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.
p all

§. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of PERERUS.

FOR what a strange increase did the long liues of the first age make, when they continued 800. or 900. years. Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the world could not containe them, rather then that they were not spread ouer the world. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this age of the world: wherein if one exceede 50. years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of people;

people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken of by many thousands, the earth with all the industrie of man could not giue them foode. What strange heapes then of soules had the first ages, who enoyed 800. or 900. yeares, as aforesaid. These numbers, I say, cannot bee counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeares before the Norman Conquest (sauiug such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliu; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygome might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mightie ones of the first age obserued no law of matrimonie) it is to be thought that those louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flee from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better persuasion to make men carelesse of life, and carelesse of death, then the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and discaises, which this enuious old age of the world minglcth together, and loweth with the feedes of mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Annus may be alleaged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Cittie of Enoch was scated neare Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palesina (which is also a Prouince of Syria) and Egypt (which neighbourth it) could bee left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betwene his death and the flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeares. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annus his Comment bee very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Coppies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be reiected. Therefore St. Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule. Bona eorum elegamus, vitemus contraria, Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the general flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mightie Men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall world: and though that phrase (of all the world) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts. That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Iewes, men that feared God of euery Nation vnder heauen: yet by wordes which follow in Berosus, it is plaine that his wordes and sense were the same: for hee addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Againe, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the world among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which hee formerly knew had bene inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to trauiell ouer before the flood, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Atties (by reason of mudd and slime which the water left vpon the earth) was uninhabited 200. yeares after Ogyges flood, whereby wee may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries after the general deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopied for 100. or 130. ycares together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first age then after the general ouerflowing.

¶ VI.

Of the wordes of MOSES, GEN. IO. V. ultima, whereupon PERERIUS grounded his opinion.

LAstly, whereas Pererius draws this argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis. And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluuium, By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the flood; which he also seeketh to confirme out of the eleuenth of Genesis, because the diuision of tongues was cause of the disperion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: the text it selfe rather teaching the contrarie; for out of these (saith MOSES) were the Nations divided in the earth after the flood; inferring, that before the flood the Nations were diuided out of others, though after the flood out of these only. But whatsoeuer sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the flood, or to any plantation or diuision in that age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be diuided after the flood, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessarie diuision controle the planting of the world before it? And whereas it is alleaged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this disperion, it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had neuer beene built, nor any confusion of languages at all, yet increase of people and time would haue enforced a farther-off and generall plantation: as Berosus saies well, that when mankind were exceedingly multiplied, ad comparandum nasus sedes necessitas complebat, They were driven by necessitie to seeke new habitations. For wee finde (as is before said) that within 300. yeares after the flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the valley about Babylon could not haue sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Seythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Aegypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia being also at that time fully peopled. And if we beleue Berosus, then not only those parts of the world, but (within 140. yeares after the flood) Spaine, Italie, 30 and France were also planted: much more then may wee thinke, that within 1656. yeares before the flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the world was ouerflowne, there were people in all the world which offended.

¶ VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Aegyptian antiquities: with some what of ΡΗΥΤ (another Some of ΗΑΜ) which peopled Lybia.

THerefore, for the Antiquite of the Aegyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which giue too much credit to the Aegyptian antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the flood, and 200. or 300. yeares, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Misraim some monuments (in Pillers or Altars of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Aegyptians hauing added to the list and rolle of their Kings after the flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glorie, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memorie of antiquite was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeare before Alexanders conquest: all this report Annius findeth to agree agreed and reach to the time of Enosh, who was borne 1034. years before the flood, and wrote of the worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in judgement, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this plantation of Ægypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Ægypt from Ægyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterran Sea, was called the inferiour Ægypt; surnamed also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ranne toward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next vnto the Deserts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Cittie of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsd: The other branch, which yeelded it selfe to the salt water towards the North-west, is beautified by that famous Cittie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Ægypt is bounde betwene Memphis and Syene neare Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Cittie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greekes Diospolis; in the Scriptures Nophon, which signifieth multitudes of inhabitants, exceeding belife. Isaiphus calls Ægypt Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had

It also appeareth in the thirtieth chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chub and Lud were conterrimi and associates with the Ægyptians.

¶. XII.

Of the eleven sonnes of CANAAN, the fourth sonne of HAM.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of the land of CANAAN: with the names of his eleven sonnes.

40

ANAAH (the fourth sonne of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romanes Palestina, in the Scriptures Galilea, Samaris, and Iudaea; in the latter times knowne by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are preciselie set downe by Moses, Genes the tenth. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Azubah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorib, and Admah, and Zebaim, euen vnto Lafis. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorib the East, and the other Cities named stood on the frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Ægypt, the vttermost territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the land of Canaan.

Now the sonnes of Canaan which posselt this Countrey, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Iebusi or Iebusaus.
4. Emari or Emareus, or Amoreus.
5. Gergesji or Gergesew.
6. Henu or Chiuens.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Seni or Sinus.
9. Arasdi or Aruadeus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus
11. Hamathi or Hamatheus, or Chamathaus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amoritcs, Henuites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of his.

† II.

Of the portions of ZIDON and HETH.

ZIDON the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Aser: for Aser, Zabulon, and Nephtali had a great part of the ancient Phenicia distributed among them; but the Aserites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus; of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seuen principall Nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amoritcs, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and Henuites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hethron nere the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vttermoost limit of Canaan, hauing the Desert of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his posteritie, as fare to the Northeast as Hethron, and Namre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buie the field of Sarahs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That shee was wearie of her life for the daughters of HETH. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

† III.

Of the Iebusites and Amoritcs.

IEBUSUS, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their Citie and the Countrie nere it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to S. Adonim.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amoritcs tooke name, who inhabited that land to the East of Iordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Iordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amoritcs had also many other habitations dispersed within the boundes of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Calesyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their their being in the mountaines of Juda, and in Idumea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Dunus. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesist the fifteenth, for the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we finde in the Prophet Amos; Yet destroyed ^{Deut. 1. Num. 13.} the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oake.

† IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Henites and Harkites.

10 The fifth sonne of Canaan was Gergesew or Gergeson, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the lake of Tiberias; or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolome sets the Cittie Gersafa, which Iosephus calles Gesera in the territoric of Deapolis. Here it was that Christi dispossessed the possessed with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their coates: because their swine filled with the euill spirits drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesew also built Beryus (sometime Geris) afterward Felix Julia, three miles from the riuer Adonis in Phenicia; in which the Romanes held a garnison: and to which Augustus gaue manie large priuelidges.

20 Hencus the sixth sonne; and Father of the Henites; inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. These Henites, howfoeuer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosus, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased viterly to roote out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times frued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to assist them: for as it is written Judges the third; They remained to proue ISRAEL by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

30 The seventh sonne was Araceus or Harki, who betwene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the Cittie of Archeus, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

† V.

Of Sini and Aruadi.

40 SINEUS the eighth Sonne Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparorfa, which Ptolome finds in Juda not farr from Iebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolome Smyra: MeLa and Plinie Smyrus: Brochard Sycan, (called Synoehis) neere Arca. Peterius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Deserts of Sinai or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming that Sineus built Synoehis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Kenai) who descended of Hobab the Sonne of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the wildernesse of Pharan. But these Cinai were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinai Balaam prophced, that they should be destroyed by the Asyrians. ^{1udg. 4. 109a. 193j.}

50 The ninth Sonne was Aradeus or Aruadeus, who in the Isle of Aradus built the Cittie Arados: opposite against which Island on the maine of Phenicia, they founded another Cittie of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Aradus. To this Cittie came S. Peter (saith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel: and founded a Church in honour of our Ladie: but wee finde no such worke of of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous: and places of skillfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembereth in his prophecies against the Tyrrians. The inhabitants of Zidon and Arad were they Marriners.

¶ VI.

OF ZEMARI.

OF Samaricus, or Zemari, the tenth Sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some thinke that he first inhabited in Calesyria at Edessa, and founded Samaraim, 10 which in Iosias is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samaraim (of the same Orthographic) vpon the mountaines of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuerteth amisse (saith hee) by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samaricus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emisiani, which Plinie callt the Hemiseni, in Calesyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographic, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproueth. 20 And he bought the mountaine Samaria or Shemeron of one SHEMER, for two talents of silver, and built in the mountaine: and called the name of the Citie which he built, after the name of SHEMER, Lord of the mountaine Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israell. Of whomsoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Iewes stood vp, they alwaies called themselves Iewes: when it suffered or sanke, they then vtterly denyed to be of that Nation or Familie; for at such time as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colemies of the Assyrians; and partly of the naturals.

¶ VII.

OF HAMATHI.

THE last of Canans Sonnes was Hamathus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hanath: (saith Beroaldus) of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathus was parent. Iosephus and St. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which standeth on the Riuer Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, betweene the mountaine Castus and the Province of Pieria, and Selucis, of which S. Peter was Bishop, and in which S. Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betweene Apamea and Emesa in Cabotia. Yet, indeede, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canan, then euer any of those Nations stragled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which hee confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea, betweene it and any part of the land diuided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Provinces Laodicea and Libania, are betweene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath (so taken could not be a part of Nephtali; in the thirteenth of Iosias is directly proued. 30 For Iosias counting the lands that remained vpon selfe, reckoneth all mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Basagad vnder mount Herman, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vifed, that Emath was not in Nephtali, or any way belonging to the children of Israell: because Dauid accepted the presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not have done, if that Terrotic had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua: for Emath is indeede situated on the other side of the mountaine of Hermon, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Zoroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the mountaines, and the Citie in Nephthalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Xephthalims, seated on the fourth side of Libanus, to the East of Affedim: which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath, Iosephus Hamath, others Emathin, or Amathous, and the people Amathin; of which (as I take it) Rabakeh vaunteth in the second of Kings. Where is the God of Hamath.

Tolu

That the moit of the Sonnes of CHUSIM were seated in Arabia the Happie: and of the Sabaans that robbed ION: and of the Queen that came to SALOMON.

40 S EBA or Saba was the eldest Sonne of Chus, the eldest Sonne of Ham, to make a difference betwene him and his Nephew Sheba, the Sonne of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus) his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the Sonne of Regma with an (S) aspirate, which is the Hebrew Sehin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chus, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma posselt both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooketh that part toward the Red Sea, as nearest his Father Chus, and the land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Plinie. *Saba*i Arabum populi propter thuraclearissima utrag, maria porrectis gentibus habitant, The Sabaans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrie was afterwards called Arabia, à populi mixtione, saith Vossellus. To this agreeth Plotomus, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the Citie Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leaue Saba: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Plotomus, because he remembreth a Nation (called Stabai) near the Persian Sea; and Massabatha which defended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him Rabms) into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who only attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba: or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But

But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabai, which stole away Iobs Cattle, should runne through all Agypt and all Arabia Petraea, and finde out Iob in Tracoonis betweene Palaestina and Calesyria 1200. miles off. Now as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, so doe I thinke, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Perfian Sea, could by any means execute the sleath vpon Iob, which locuer Beroaldus shall take for nearest. But these were the Sabai of Arabia the Desert, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Sabai is seated: the same which Ptolomee calls Saua, now Semisefacae: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desert, came those Magi or Wise-men which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose wordes are these. The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysofome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happie, as many wise men doe beleue, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desert: which Citie when my selfe was there was (as I iudged it) called Semisefacae. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus it appeareth that these Sabai were neighbours to Iob, and lay hit to inuade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Perfian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so diuoynd with large Deserts, as theris no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattle, both in respect of the mountains, of the sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts. Pbi nec homines nec bestiae uidentur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperissimi, Where there are found neither men nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but only sharpe, and high stonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Petrus conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visite Salomon, was of the Sabai on the East side of Aravia Felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that there was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Madian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trouble enter his Territories, free from all danger of surpris by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auide tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Rasna, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the posselours of Arabia the Happie and the Desert: only Hauilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Cush, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomee; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the wals whereof there were sometimes found sixtie Temples. Ezechel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together; The Merchants of Sheba and Rasna were they Merchants. And that they were the Eastern Arabians their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Ethiopiens about Aferoe, and Saba of the Ethiopiens Afarawi; they be not worthe any farther answer then hath already bene giuen: especially seeing these Citties preserving the memorie of the names of Saba and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomees time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Cush, with little alterations are preferred. In Arabia the Desert is found the Citie Saba or Saua, (now Semisefacae) with the Citie of Rhegma for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomee himselfe called Rasbeni or Rasnah. In Arabia the Happie is found the Citie of Rhegma, and Rabana, which also keepeth the sound of Rhegma; the Citie of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the East coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe citie, in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabbatha; and to the West of Sabbatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabai: and to the fourth thereof againe toward the straight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hauilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might passe by boate

IOSEPHVS his opinion of DEDAN, one of the iſſue of CHVSH to haue bene ſeated in the Weſt Ethiopia, diſprooued out of EZECHIEL and HIEREMIE.

- 10 AND whereas Iosephus (whom in this S^t Hierome followeth, as not curious heretofore) ſent Dedan the ſonne of Raamah into Weſt Ethiopia, it is ſtrange that Ezechiel ſhould couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. verſe, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22. verſe to be the merchants of Tyre; if Dedan had dwelt in Weſt Ethiopia, which is diſtant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) about 4000. miles. Beſides which the Marchandiſe that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-mores. For they of Dedan (ſaith Ezechiel) were thy merchants in pretious clothes for thy charriots; and theſe Weſterne Ethiopians neuer ſaw cloth, till the Portugals ſeeking thoſe Coales traded with them: the merchandiſe of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, ſome Gold and Amber, Ciuet eates, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all theſe they exchanged for linnen, or iron cheſty.

But in thoſe daies the Weſt part of Africa within the body of the land was known onely by imagination: and being vnder the burnt Zone was held vnhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the Weſt Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra Lions, or Niger, could either paſſe by Sea or Land to Tyre in the bottome of the Mediterran Sea, were a ſtrange, or rather a fooliſh ſancie. Now to put it out of diſpute that Dedan alſo dwelt by the reſt of the children of Chuſh, which ſeates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet lets here Hieremie his own words. Flie yee inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the deſtruction of Esau upon him.

- 30 Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a neighbour to the Idumans: and Idumans is a Prouince of Arabia Petraea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, ioyned in that part to Petraea, the ſeat of his Grand-father Chuſh, which neighborhood and fellowſhip of Dedan and the Idumans is alſo confirmed by Ezechiel. Ezechiel. 25. I will ſtrech out mine hand vpon Edom, and deſtroy Man and Beſt out of it, and I will make it deſolate from Teman: and they of Dedan ſhall fall by the ſword.

Of the iſſue of MIZRAIM: and of the place of HIEREMIE Chap.

- 40 9. Verſ. 7.

AFter Chuſh it followeth to ſpeake of Mizraims ſonnes, whose names (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) were plurall, to ſignifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim the eldeſt ſonne of Mizraim was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the reſt of his brothers diſperſed themſelues into all Regions adioyning. Among the ſonnes of Shem there is alſo Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the ſonne of Mizraim by the ſingular number: the ſonne of Shem being written Lud, the ſonne of Mizraim Ludin: and yet theſe names and nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of names and nations. For that Ludin the ſonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that hee was ſeated not faire from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneth them in this ſort together. Come vnto ye Hurfes, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moores, and the Lybians which beare the ſhield: for thoſe Nations aliſted the Egyptians being of one

one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are ioyned together. Ethiopia (or Chusi) saith Ezechiel c. 30. v. 3. And Puuy and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sonnes of Chusi; (which were the Chusites) the Sonnes of Misraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians, (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa shall fall together. Etiopius finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleue it: because Hierome ioyneth the Lybians and Lydians together in the place before remembered. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrew called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubei, a name somewhat nearer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing is, not Lybes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a Cittie (saith he) betwene Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Cittie of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Cittie which was afterward Diopsalis, in which S. Peter cured Aeneas of the palsey) standeth neare the Torrent Gaa, not farre from Ioppe the Port of Ierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this Cittie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Citties of one name founded in all the Regions of the world, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Citties called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to bee the Father of Lybia who was the third sonne of Misraim: and so doth Positellus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Misraims Sonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, sining Casubim and Caphorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Pelset.

The Casubim inhabited Casiotis, a region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis and the mountaine Casius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphorim seated neare Casubim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethroitis, not farre from Pelusion. Strabo calls it Sethroitis; Stephanus and Plinie Sethroites, of the Cittie Sethron: which Orelius takes to bee the same which Ptolomie calls Hercules para. Of the Casubim and Caphorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophylis (which is Asenigena, strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) doe not vse the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph.) Their principall Citties were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotij, Gethai, and Accaronite: and the people of them called Gasei, Ascalonite, Azotij, Gethai, and Accaronite. Isidore affirms that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that Cittie the Countrey adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeede at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these words. Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims vnto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancient Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successours called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Cattle of Philgrims (otherwise Cæsarea Palestina or Tarris Stratonius) which was the fourth border of Phoenicia, to Gaza or to the River of Egypt. The Anaksim or strong Giants were of these Philistims: and Goliath was of Geth one of the five Citties aboue named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Livianus. They mastered the Israelites at severall times aboue 150. yeares, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by DAVID, and layed on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoining were held by the sonnes of Mizoram, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizoram, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Philistines or Phisistims held it in the time of Iosua, yet at the time of the promise it was possesst by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Hebrues dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what meaneth if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphor, and so of Mizoram and not of Canaan, besides Moses the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth. The Lord will destroy the Philistims, Hierem. 47. 4. the remnant of the issue of Caphor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphorim; haue not I brought up ISRAEL out of the land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphor, and ARAM from Kir? So I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palestina de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroldus condemneth; where Caphor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Cittie directly West from Egypt, betweene Ptolomis or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Africa vnder the Assyrians: Iunius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneus. But Pererius calls Caphorim Cappadocia according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sesbettes, or Cappadocia of Palestina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner here may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglephal King of the Assyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

are barely spoken of byrehearfall of their names, saying that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was suppoed to found Niniveh) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the world were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (saying India) which I beleuee Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Ioifar afterward repaired. Hij filij Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Asia vsque ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt, These sonnes of SEM (saith *S. Joseph. ant. l. 1. c. 7 Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred Acts the 2. v. the 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then beganne to bee out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylon: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witnesseth Daniel). And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it I was in the Pallace of SUSAN, which is in the Prorince of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the River Eulans (according to Ptolomie) in Daniel, Ylai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

 Psal. 136. l. 6. v. 5.
 Dan. 5. 5.

Assur (as most Historians beleuee) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninne, of equal beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Euery mans hand hath bene in this Storie, and therefore I shall not neede herein to speake much: for the Assyrians too often invaded and spoiled the Israeletes, destroyed their Citties, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this nation.

535

But how soeuer Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this nation with ample Dominion: yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfullst Princes among them, had yet the mountaine Taurus for the vtmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding those vaunts of Senacherib in Ezay the 37. *Haue the Gods of the Nations deliuered them whom my Fathers haue destroyed? as GOZAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the Children of EDEN which were at Telassar. Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arpad, and the King of the Cittie Sepharuam, Hena and Inab? All these were indeede but petty Kings of Citties, and small Countries; as ELAR in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Itur as vnder Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sopher, and others of this sort. Yea Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Egypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Phoenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because hee established the first Empire: from whom the most memorabile storie of the world taketh beginning.*

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith S. Hierome, and Josephus, but it must bee those Chaldeans about Pr: for the sonnes of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that hee was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud the fourth Sonne of Sem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Josephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.

of ARAM, and his Sonnes.

ARAM the fifth and last Sonne of Shem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith Iosephus out of Iosephus) which Syrus lived before Moses was borne; the name which others call the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Prouince of Syria had the name of Aram Naharajm, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum fluminum, Syria compassed with two Rivers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the ancient name of Aram or Arames, as these his owne wordes conuerred witnesseth. Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramensis & Arameos vocant, Those which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Aramenians and Arameans.

Against this opinion that Aram the sonne of Shem, was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not only of those in Syria Inter-annis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade Gen. 2. 2. 1. Kemuel, the father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall reade Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; therather, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel posteritic could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Naharajm, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunior thinks in his note vpon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be refrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomee calls Anchoritis (so called from the River Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajm (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Rivers (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Citties in Ptolomee, called Apfadana: (as Iunior hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

Vz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that Citie, saith Iosephus and Saint Hieremie. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt nere unto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same adioyning to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea or Tracantia: whereof the Prophet Hieremie.

50 Reioyce and be glad O daughter of Edom that dwellest in the land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Tracantia, adioyning to Bafan, hauing Batanea Gaulanitis, and the mountaine Scir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: hauing in it many Citties and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the land of Hus.

In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nabor, the brother of Abraham (with S. Hierome) and married Dina the daughter of Isaac, saith Philo.

¶ The second Sonne of Aram, S. Nitome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third Sonne, parent to the Armenians or Carians: which opinion, (becaus I finde not where to set him) I doe not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the lesse. Innius giues Hul (whom hee writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Ptoleme setteth the Cittie of Cholle.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Arabs children feathers; to carry them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwaies 10
64. keepe the rule of neighbourhood, and thinke with Innius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neare his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Prouince of Euphrates, and Seleucus, where Ptoleme placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Innius also giueth to Alex or Alexib the North part of Syria, betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neare the mountaine Mafius. The certainty of those plantations can no otherwise be knowen then by this probabilitie, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himselfe and them; neither then when the world was newly planted, nor in many hundred yeares after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them into the desert parts of the world, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and pollicie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children let them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sonnes of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also fought a Prouince part, and to themselves; giuing to the Citties therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their memorie to their posteritie: the vse of letters being then rare, and knowen to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdayning the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Noua Hispania and Pers excepted, becaus those Countries are vnaccessable to strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

¶ The fourth Sonne is made the parent of the Moanians: of whom something hath bene spoken already. Arphesad the third Sonne of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phalegh and Ischan: and in Phaleghs time was the earth diuided.

¶ III.

Of the diuision of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THE many people which at the diuision (at Phaleghs birth) were then liuing, and the through plantation of all the East part of the world (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the earth were diuided at either. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of Sedar Holan, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeare after the flood 101. and liued in all 239. yeares, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeares after the flood, ere the children of Noah leuered themselves. But 50 to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeares as 101. (the time of Phaleghs birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, that if 70. persons of the familie of Isaac increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeares, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more more is it likely, that so soone after the flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God. Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others judge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeares time; and the finnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceit that Phaleg took that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and S. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the yeare, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham), but was by more likely computation 12. yeares before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeares after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeares: in the 43. yeare of whose raigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus beganne to rule the Assyrians 80. yeares before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not beene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arius King of Arabia, a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis præstabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Babylon into grace; then invaded Medis, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his wife and seuen children; vanquished all those Regions betweene Ninus and Tanis, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdomes of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Euxycanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Cleulus) against Zoroaster and others; and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with foure hundred thousand, proue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill fastidied with their partitions, as they fought to be Masters of all; and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had beene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled every where at the instant, but by times and degrees: And surely whatsoever mens opinions haue beene heren, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprife of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeare 101. after the flood, which was the yeare that Nimrod came into Shinar, or 10. yeares after hee arruied, saith Berosus.

Now if it bee objected that Phaleg (the Etymologic of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had beene given him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this obiection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the angell; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esau; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly whereas the Hebrewes S. Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, he foretold the diuision which followed: to this I say, I do not finde that Heber deferred any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this prophetic (if any such had beene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwarde fell among the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, by which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue proofe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (where-

ALL those sonnes of Iocfan (according to S^r Hierome) dwelled in the East partes of the world, or India, euen from the riuer Cophe or Chous, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sonnes cannot bee gathered out of the Scriptures, the wordes of Moses being general. And their dwelling was from Mesia as thou goest vnto Sepher a mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sonnes, there were only three memorab, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whose names to auoide confusion it is to bee obserued, that among the Sonnes of Chusfi, two of them had also the names of Seba and Hauilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chusfi, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, wee haue left in Arabia Felix: and Hauilah the sonne of Chusfi vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some haue thought) the Father of the Sabaens in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ maketh mention. Primum Sabæi; post hoc sunt Passagarda, prope verò hæc sunt Tasci. The first are Sabaens: after these be Passagarda, and neare these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which ABRAHAM had, ABRAHAM gaue gifts, and sent them away from ISAAC his sonne (while he yet liued) Eastward to the East Countrie: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthest East Countrie in respect of Iudea; which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sunne-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams Sonnes seated themselves on the borders of Iudea, I rather choose to leaue Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Ptolome setteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the sonne of Iocfan, the sonne of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the world) which he wrote in Greeke verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilus hoc intermedios habitatur, Sabæus, in the midst of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, saith this Dionysius.

... of OPHIR one of IOCTANS Sonnes and of PERU and of that voyage of SALOMON

OPHIR also was an inhabitant of the East India, and as (St. Hierome vnderstands it) in one of the Ilandes plentifull of gold, which are now known by the name of Molacca. Iosephus vnderstands Opbir to bee one of those great head-landes in India, which by a generall name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut, and Malacca. Ptolemy takes it rightly for an Island, as St. Hierome doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Opbir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third chapter and sixt verse, gathers that Opbir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The wordes in the second of the Chronicles are these, And hee overlaid the house with precious stones for beautie; and the gold was gold of Paruaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradyse: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a towne in Characene a Prouince of Susiana Gen. 11. 6. & Psa. 16. 6. 8. called Barbasus, so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Paruaim: from whence those Kinges subiected by Dauid brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which Dauid preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this Finic of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also tooke Opbir for Peru. And that this question may be a subiect of no farther dispute; it is very true, that there is no Region in the world of that name: sure I am that at least America hath none, no not any Citie, Village, or mountaine so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those landes to the South of Panama, arriuing in that Region which Atabalpa commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Countrey, and pointing with their hand atwar a ruer, or torrent, or brooke that ran by, the Indians answered Peru which was either the name of that brooke, or of water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderstood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprise, and in the first description made, and sent ouer to Charles the Emperour, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer since as diuers Spaniards of the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Seiuite in his naturall and morall Historie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Iolitan, who as hee supposeth navigated from the vtmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Iucatan, is nothing else in the language of that Countrey, but [What is that] or [What say you] For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) What aske you, or what say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a montanous Countrey on the South side of Trinidad and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hilles asfarre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as high hilles or mountaines. For as Paria begins that meruillous ledge of mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from 8. degrees of North latitude to 52. of South; and so hath that Countrey euer since retained the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent vnder Sir Richard Greeneile to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Countrey, one of the Saluages answered Wingandason, which is as much to say, as, you were good good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Island Trinitate: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that selfe place which the Sea incompasseth, they answered Caeri, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner haue many places newly discovered bene intituled: of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leaue Ophir among the Moluccas whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Hamilah, now Sufiana, and all along that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plentie is taken vp at the Philippines, certaine Islands planted by the Spaniards from the West India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the Red Sea, (which was three yeares in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the vttermost East, as the Maluccas or Philippines. Indeeed these that now goe from Portingall, or from hence, finish that nauigation in two yeare, and sometimes lesse: and Salomons ships went not aboue a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they euermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vse of the Compass was knowne, it was impossible to nauigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bene for the plentie of gold in the East India Islands, farre aboue the mines of any one place of America) to faile euery yeare from the West part of America thither, and there to haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manila. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone further off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worke: neither could hee nauigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to haue guided him:

Toitatus also gathereth a fantasticall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrie, whose mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which mountaines Solinus affirmeth to be in Sythia Asiatice, in these wordes. Nam cum auro & gemmis effluent, Griffes tenent uniuersa, alics ferocissima, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue bene men with one eye only, like into the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes Herodotus and Aristleus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus in the storie of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed was first giuen them by reason that they vsed to weare a vizard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gislatron, or the Caue of the Northeast winde. For there, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this Morall. That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this world, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be faised in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the world, where wild beasts or Serpents defend mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable mountaines which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited only with Tigers, Lyons, and other rauinous and cruell beasts: into which if any man ascend (except his strength bee very great) hee shall bee sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of gold, gold, of Steele to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of the mellures or their young ones, they grow irraged and aduenturous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegaros; (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearls which lye in the Lakes of the Inland; for many times the poore Indians are water-vp by them, when they dive for the pearle. And though the Alegaros know not the pearle, yet they finde favour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

OF HAVILAH the sonne of IOCTAN, who also passed into the East Indies:
 and of MISHA and SEPIER named in the bordering of the families of IOCTAN: with a conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Havilah the sonne of ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generrall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir pass into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East India, which tooke name of Havilah the sonne of ioctan: but Havilah, which Pison compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the sonne of Chus, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture. SAVL smote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul euer made warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of ioctan, these three Saba, Havilah, and Ophir, though at the first seated by their brethren about the Hill Mafius or Mesb, Gen. 10.
30. (to wit) betweene Chus and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their illiues remoued into East India, leauing the other families of ioctan, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue beene from Mesb vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesb to bee a Region of the East India, and Sephar a mountaine of the same (which mountaine Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judas, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mesb is that part of the mountaines of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuer Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charan: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses) Siphara by Ptolome, standing to the East of the mountaine Mafius; from whence ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beautie and riches thereof. But this was in processe of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens 40 imaginations, contrarie to reason and possibilitie. And that this mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 23. BALAAM the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountaine of the East, which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaam brought Balaam out of Mes- sopotamia. (witness this place of Deuteronomie.) Because they hired Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharayim, to curse Ise: for Aram Naharayim was Syria Mesopotamum, which is Mesopotamia, as afore said.

This plantation of the world after the flood both best agree, (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compar'd together. And these bee the reports of 50 reason and probable coniecture; the guides which I haue followed herein, and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies: be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, private, or publique, other then the discouerie of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of the latter times) haue by their many volumes of vntre reports left Honour without a Monument, and Vertue without Memorie: and (in steade thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulness ought to haue buried, and couered ouer for euermore. And although the length and disloing nature of time hath worne out or changed the names and memorie of the worlds first planters after the flood (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of Antiquitie (as appears by that which hath bene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouergrowne: for Babylon hath to this day the fount of Babel; Phoenicia hath Zidon, to which Cittie the eldest Sonne of Canaan gaue name; so hath Citicia Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hibernians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumians, Libyans, Moores, and other Nations, haue preferred from the death of forgetfulness some signes of their first Founders and trae Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Gouernement.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Gouernement vnder the eldest of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

I followeth now to entreate how the world beganne to receiue Rule and Gouernement, which (while it had scarcitie of people) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitie and Elderthip. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwaies vsed both for the Magistrate, and for those of age and grauitie: the same bearing in significatioun almost in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouernours ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the same sens, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleued them, as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the people. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Gracians. Cicero in Ca giueth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedaemonios qui amplissimum magistratum gerunt, et sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes. Among the Lacedaemonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they are, so are they called Eldermen: and againe, Ratio et prudentia nisi essent in senibus non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellarent Senatum. If reason and aduisement were not in oldmen, our Ancesters had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate. But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernours or Counsaillers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernours were the Fathers of families; and vnder them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signar) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietic, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potesias aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium, Proprietie or mastership: the correlative of the one is the subiect, of the other the slave. Ad Casorem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietatis, Cesar hath power over all, and every man proprietie in his owne; and againe, Cesar omnia imperio possidet, singulis dominio, Cesar holdeth all in his power, and every man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice beganne abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reverence, which but from excellent seede seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly overshadowed with pride, and ill examples vterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall persuasions (after mankind beganne to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habituall) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were only guided and steered by their owne fancies, and toft too and fo on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdom was sundered from power, and strength from charitie; Necessitie (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the Wise and Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become farre more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time overflow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion prevent it. For the Mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mightie then themselves; the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better triall, no lesse perillous then an vniurable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and conuulsiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approued soueraigne power, bethought themselves of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and weighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings: so the will of Kings fore-went the inuentions of lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenetur: arbitria principum prolegibus erant, The people were not governed by any other lawes then the wiles of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to bee good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt, Love sees one while too much, another while seerke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeares (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that gouernment which had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an euen ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues only: so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religiosi, de dictis, iure habiti Deorum scilicet, Dei & dicti, Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. And

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to reason and necessity; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and bee preferred without a Ruler and Conductor: God himselfe by his eternall providence having ordained Kings; and the law of Nature leaders, and Rulers over others. For the verie Bees haue their Prince, the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safety. The most High beareth rule over the Kingdomes of men; and appointeth over it whom hee will by his Spirit. By me (saith Wisdome, spoken by the Son of God) Kings raigne; by me Princes rule; and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings; and that this power is giuen from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate. Thou couldest haue no power at all against mee, except it were giuen thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold iustice that the world hath bene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a iustice naturall; by which the Parents and Elders of families gouerned their children, and nephewes, and families, in which gouernment the obedience was called naturall pietie: againe, by a iustice diuine, drawne from the lawes and ordinances of God: and the obedience herunto was called conscience; and lastly by a iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the obedience to this we call dutie. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in general was paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creatour; as wee reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had bene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankinde.

¶ I. I.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane Societie.

Hat other policie was exercised, or state founded after such time as mankinde was greatly multiplied before the flood, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Aegyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall flood; and very likely, that the cruell oppressions in that age proceeded from some tyrannic in Government, or from some rougher forme of rule, then the paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the world in those dayes to the Giants of Libanus, who maltred (saith he) all Nations from the Sunne-rising to the Sunne-set. But in the second age of the world, and after such time as the rule of Elderhood failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of places and people.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by iust lawes, called Monarchie; to which Tyrannie is opposed; being also a sole and absolute rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the keeper of right and equitie: and of this condition ought euery Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word. Judges and Officers shall thou make thee in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

The second Government is of diuers principall persons established by order, and ruling by lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great ones) is opposed; as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembered) many households ioyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established laws by consent, associating themselves vnder one Governour and government, they so ioyned were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrats; sometimes by the people themselves.

§ III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the families became strong, and dispersed into feuerall parts of the world, was by ancient Historians called Golden:
 Ambition and Couetousness being as then but green, and newly growne vp, the seedes and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blow and budde. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Critorie then themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fire, or curiositie of dyet, then to maintayne life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if we vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our forefathers, this name may then truly be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and golden Kings make good and golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancie of Empire, (when Princes played their prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called

called the golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times bee truly called golden. For be it that men affect honour it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good desertings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberalitie ouerflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not only harden and shrinke the openest and most toutal hearts, But the experience which it bringeth with it layeth Princes some estates before their eyes, and (withall) perwadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there bee no Kings vnder the Sunne whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times ininuous and yron. And as this falleth out in the raigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes bee many: for our younger yeares are our golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeede) the grieuous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make the times seeme so differing and displeasing: especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust foucer. Fit humane malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, presentia in fastidio sint. It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward age. Quod sint laudatores temporis acti. That they are praisers of forepast times, forgetting this aduise of Salomon. Say not then why is it that the former dayes were better then these? for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca. Mores nostri quiesci sunt, & nos querimus, posteri querentur, cursum esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum, & in omnes us labi, Our Ancieiters haue complained, we doe complain, our children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth raigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vsuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius. Nouares quandoq; vetus shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made golden, this wee may let downe for certain, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crownes: so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of subiects to Princes: so (relatiuely) he gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subiects; hauing respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but euen to the meannest of his Creatures. Nunquam particulari bono seruit omne bonum. The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the small and the great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For Potestas humana radicitur in voluntatibus hominum, All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie: and of the cause vnto thereof without vertue.

And with this supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie beganne also other degrees and differences among subiects. For Princes made election of others by the same rule, by which themselves were chosen; vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which employments and offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which 10 have continued from age to age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the succession of blood, but to succession of vertue, as hereafter may be proued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and fo there needed then no endeaourof well-doing at all, or any contentation for them to excell, vpon whom glorie or worldly Nobilitie necessarily depended. Yet hereof had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue were so called. Hinc dicitur Nobilitas, quasi virtute pre alijs nobilitatis. But after such time as the desired Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his posteritie, S. Hierame iudged of the succession in this manner. Nihil 20 aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate confringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent, I see no other thing to be affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessitie bound not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobilitie be verus & antiqua dignitas, Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glorie, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animus) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witnessse of vertue and well-doing: and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a race or lineage: then are those in whom vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed papers, which ignorant men worship in steade of Christi, 30 our Ladie, and other Saints: men, in whom there remaine but the dregges and vices of ancient vertue: Flowers, and heerebes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they runne foule, filthy, and deliled? Ex terra fertilis produciuntur aliqquando cinere venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum, Out of fruitfull ground ariseeth sometimes poisoning herbes: and out of barren soile pretious gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the race and lineage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be vertue, and qualitie profitable to the Commonweale. For here is truly and enpire 40

Vint. in Reges.

Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike vertue, leauing his Prince and Countrey, and being defended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the fame which our felues acquire by our vertue and well deseruings) cannot bee ballanced with that which is both naturall by descent, and also personall: yet if vertue bee wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith this Charron) this Honour (to wit) by descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which he calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with siluer or fauour: and these be indeede but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of 50 their fauours which they knew well how to wipe off againe. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our felues of such and such Parents, wee should rather know such Nobilitie (without vertue) to be shame and dishonour, then Nobleness, and glorie to vaunt thereof.

it nobilitas it is, said to be better than most men's, it is not their name, therefore men most depending of their countrey are to be st. before by best men, who by difference, will saye to be p. will to vulgar part. & this is the best opinion, honeste degenere. For thus it would be best if some few not conditionate

But it seemeth to mee that Melancthon conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirmeth that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or severe Governour, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authoritie. And therefore is he in this respect also called a mightie hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both beaſts and theeeves. But S. Augustine vnderstands it otherwiſe, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie hunter againſt God. Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, venator contra Dominum, so is that Giant to be vnderſtood a hunter againſt the Lord. But howfoerer this word (a mightie hunter) be vnderſtood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all thoſe, which went with him from the Eaſt into Shinar: ſo, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vſurped. For it is no where found that Noah himſelfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylonia: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeares of his life excepted) in the ſucceeding Storie of the Hebrewes: nor that Sem was in this diſobedient troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The ſame is alſo confirmed by diuers ancient Hiſtorians, that Nimrod, Sapbne, and Iocan were the Captaines and leaders of all thoſe which came from the Eaſt. And though Sem came not himſelfe ſo farre Weſt as Shinar (his lot being caſt on the Eaſt parts) yet from his ſonnes Nephew Heber, the name and nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermoſt parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Pr; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And becauſe thoſe of the race of Sem which came into Chaldea were no partners in the vbelcaining worke of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they reſtore the firſt and moſt ancient language, which the Fathers of the firſt Age had left to Noah, and Noah to Sem and his iſſues. In familia HEBER remanſit haec lingua, In the family of HEBER this language remained (ſaith S. Augustine out of Epphanius); and this language Abraham vſed: yea it was anciently and before the flood the generall ſpeech: and therefore firſt called (ſaith Caeſtinius) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moſes, Egyptius, Vergerius, and others, is of another opinion; but howfoerer we determine of this point, we may with good probability reſolve, that none of the godly ſeede of Sem were the chiefe leaders of this preſumptuous multitude. And ſeeing it is not likely but that ſome one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by juſt authoritie, then by violence of vſurpation.

§. II.

That NIMROD, BELUS, and NINUS were three diſtinct perſons.

BENZO, and out of him Nauderus with others make many Nimrods, Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and ſo doth S. Hierome vpon Oſe: and theſe words of S. Augustine ſeeme to make him of the ſame opinion. Ibi autem NINUS regnabat poſt mortem patris ſui BELLI, qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos. There did NINUS reigne after the death of his father BELUS, who firſt governed in Babylon ſixtie ſiue yeares. But it could not be vnknewnto S. Augustine, that Nimrod was the eſtablisher of that Empire: Moſes being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of NIMRODS Kingdome (ſaith he) was BABEL, ERECH, ACCAD, and CHALNE, in the land of Shinar: Wherefore Nimrod was the firſt King of Babel. And certainly it beſt agreeth with reaſon, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) ſuppoſed: for in NINUS time the world was marueiloſly replenished. And if S. Augustine had had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus ille regnauerat, Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words doe not disprove that Nimrod was the founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Caesar ouerthrew the libertie of the Romane Commonwealth, making himselfe a perpetual Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperour: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraine authoritie ouer the Romans, as an Emperour. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraine rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Peterius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. years after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one dyed; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is farre more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plain that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning; but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Cittie of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Sienlus affirmeth that Ninus ouercame and suppresseth the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrary, then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seate of his Empire at Ninive in Affyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered againe by strong hand; which was easie, Babylon being not walld till Semiramis time.

Dicitur aliam
Castellibus muris cinxisse SEMIRAMIS Vrben.

SEMIRAMIS with wals of bricke the Cittie did inclose.

Further where it is alleged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the fame of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue bene giuen to many other Kings as well. For if we may beleue Iustine, then were Vexoris King of Aegypt, and Tanis of Scythia mightie Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the wordes of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them. For whereas Mercator conceiteth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue invaded and mastered those Citties so farre removed from Babel, namely Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue bene long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true. That euer Nimrod invaded any of these Citties; but that hee founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Citties in many mens opinions are found to stand farre away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beleefe. The Cittie of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archard, and Epiphanius Arphal, Iunius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Acacene for Accadene. Others vnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Cittie: so doe doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charras; but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charras are distinct places. Though I cannot denie Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Achad: and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Cittie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech, S. Augustine Orech, and Pageninus Erec, this place Iunius vnderstands for Arace in Sustana: but there is also a Cittie in Comagena called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third Cittie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Marcellanus. S. Hierome takes it for Scelucia; Hierosolymitanus for Citiphom: others ^{Lib. 23.} doe thinke it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Citties are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his wordes. And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinar: so as in this Valley of Shinar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Citties faire removed, and in severall Prouinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalneh from Babylon. Goe you (lieth Amos) to Chalneh, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneustranlation ^{c. 6. v. 31.} fauouring the former opinion, to set these Citties out of Shinar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinar was here named: not that all these Citties were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt; but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Cittie at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great Cittie of Cairo, which was built long after, not farr from the place where stood Memphis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalneh is situate in the Valley of Shinar, it hath bene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Citties from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, that Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

§. III.

That NIMROD, not ASSUR, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of ESAY 23. 13. that ASSUR built Fr of the Chaldees.

NOW as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and ⁴⁹ Assyria: a controuersie wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certaintie. But to me (of whome, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text. Erat enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaariz; & terra hac proecessit in Assyriam ubi edificauit Ninuen: (which is) For the beginning of this Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinar: and hee went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly the other construction, (where the word (Assur) is taken for Assur the Sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrarie vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth tenth Chapter he setteth downe the Sonnes of Nobah in these words. Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Nobah: SEM, HAM, and IAPHETH, unto whom Sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately. The Sonnes of IAPHETH were GOMER, &c. so as Iapheth is last named among Nobah's sonnes, bee he eldest or youngest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) hee proceeds and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Iapheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Jaxan and his sonnes: for of the rest of that familie hee is silent. Anon after hee numbred the Sonnes of Ham, of which Cush was the eldest: and then the sonnes of Cush and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the Storie of the Hebrewes. But after hee beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto Abraham; and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Han, had beene against order; neither would Moses have past over so lightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sonnes which he most attended. For hee nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sonnes of Cush, because hee founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returns to speake of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinar. And as hee did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then hee beginneth with the issue of Shem, which hee continueth to Abraham and Isaac. And of Iunius opinion touching Assur, was Caluin: to which I conceiue that P. Comenius or in historia Scholastica gaue an entrance, who after he had deliuered this place in some other sense, he vseth these words. vel intelligendum non est de Assyr. filio SEM, &c. sed ASSUR (id est) Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore SARVO proavi ABRAHAMIS factum est, (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of ASSUR the Sonne of SEM, &c. but ASSUR (that is the Kingdome of the Assyrians) came from thence (scilicet from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of SARVO the great grand-father of ABRAHAM. After which he reconcileth the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true quantum ad initium, respecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Nimur, which is also true quantum ad regni ampliationem, regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and of doth Methodius, and Viterbiensis, S. Hierome and Cyryllus, and now lastly Tornilius: who saith hee tooke vpon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Sapio did of Africans after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalme 81. Esay 10. Ose 5. &c. but to helpe the matter he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the sonne of Irati. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-Bishop of Mentz in the year of Christi 854. an ancient and learned writer, vnderstands this place with Comenius, or Comenius or with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: to which wordes of Moses hee gueth this sense. De hac terra Assyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine NINI, BELUSI, Nimur condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of NINVS the sonne of BELVS. On the contrary Caluin obiecteth this place of Esay. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, ASSUR founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness, then which there is no one place in the Scriptures that hath a greater diuerfity in the translation and vnderstanding; in so much as Michaë de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it ouer. But Caluin seemeth hereby to inferre, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather ther then Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninine: contrarie to the former translation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Fulgur, (called Therames translation) it may bee gathered that Assur both fouged and ruined this estate or Citie of the Chaldeans, by Eisy remembered: vnto which Citie, people or state, hee plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that estate, an example vnto those Phanicians, whom in this place hee fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians vterly waisted and destroyed: where-by he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre, 10 (in uincible, as themselves thought) should also soone after bee ouerturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome. Ecce terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assyrus fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robustos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is) Behold the land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or this was no people, after the Geneca) Assyrus (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captiue, they vndermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these wordes. Et in terra Chaldaeorum, & hac desolata est ab Assyris, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus vnderstood. If thou goe ouer 20 to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt haue no rest, (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walles fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus conuert it thus. Ecce terra Chaldaim, iste populus non erat illic olim, nam Assyrus fundauit eam nauibus, crexerunt arces illius, contrinuerunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may bee thus Englished. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assyrus built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruined it. Iunius in the place of ships sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneca, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Eisy (as may be gathered by all the sense of the chapter) 30 did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) hee maketh choice to note the calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Cuttim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the world most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Fr or Yrehoa in Chaldea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euen that streame which runneth through Babylon and Orris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East bankes of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Fr or Yrehoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by Ruer and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Fr of the Chaldeaes was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had intelligence, trade, and exchange with the Tyrians: for it flood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ranne, which passage is now stopt vp. Eius cursum ueteritas aboleuit (saith NIGER). And Plinie, locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum, 50 Time hath worn away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) wee may expound the Citie of the Chaldeaes, whose calamities Eisy here noteth for terrour of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Fr; and (by Hecataeus)

CHAP. 10. §. 3. of the Historie of the World.

Camerius; by Protonie Pychoa: and by the Greeks Chaldeoapolis, The Citie of Chaldæa: which the Sonnes of Shem vntill Abrahams time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Affur both founded it and ruined it: it may bee vnderstood, that Affur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Affur the destroyers were the Affyrans, by whom those that inhabited Tyre of Chaldæa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approved; because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer so farre vp as this Citie of Tyre was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldæa is now called Arabidolus, which signifieth desert lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Ithurians) addeth that they are of all other people the most salvage; calling them hemines omnium maxime barbaras.

So as this place of Efsay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluissin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Irenus, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceiued (for any thing that I haue read) that Affur is in this place directly taken (as for the sonne of Sem, when he is spoken of as a builder of Tyre; and when as a destroyer thereof, then for the Affyrans Nation) yet certainly the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this founding of the Citie of the Chaldæes by Affur (into which the most of the posteritie of Sem that came into Shinar, and were separate for the Idolatry of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to proue that the same Affur built Ninive, or that the same Affur was all one with Ninus; except wee will make Affur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; & the first that set vp a statue to be honoured as God. Now if Affur must be of that race, and not of the familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Ninive, then all those which seek to giue him the honour thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Affur whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very vnworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authours, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses, and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinar, hee looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neare vnto the fame streame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which thence only finished: so also Ninus of Ninive. Quam quidem Babylonem potuit inuadare, hęc might repare or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall ouerborne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon he vaunted thus. Is not this great Babel which I haue built?

p. IIII.

Of the aits of NIMROD and BELVS, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transjugium; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those foure Citties before remembred, Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chabne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria; and in Assyria built foure more Citties (to wit) Nimue, Rehoboth, Celab, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Citties, and the large foundation of Nimue, and the other Citties of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his successours in many yeares after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycae) all these Nations were called Meopes, & fermanis linguarum terrarū, diuisione, by reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeares; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fenies and ouerflowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his warres or conquests there is no report, other then of his beguine enterprife against Sabatim King of Armenia, and those parts of Sythis which Berosus calls Sythis Sages, whose Sonne and Successour Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Nimue, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus beguine.

p. V.

That wee are not to meruaile how so many Kingdomes could bee erected about the times: and of VEXORIS of AEGYPT, and TANALIS of Sythis.

THat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the world so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Nimue is made manifest) the causes were threefold; (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princesse liberrall and powerfull bestoweth on her first entertrainers many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisdom ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding minds of men receiue all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as euery leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of people) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they posselt, and gouerned by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be concieued, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankind straggled abroade like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselues, and vndertooke to inhabit all the knowne parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwife those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Nimue time, would not haue beene posselt in many hundreds of yeares after, as then they were;

were; neither did those that were sent, and trauielled farre off (order being the true parent of prosperous success) vndertake fo difficult enterprises without a Conduiter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened euery humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolued all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their owne traualles: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of greatnesse, either possesse the fame in quiet, or rule and order their owne ministers and attendants.

10 That these causes had wrought these effects, the vndertakings and conquests of Ninus (the sonne of Belus) made it apparent: for he found euery where Kings and Monarches, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the warres.

But Nimrod (his grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him soueraignetic and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and successour) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Seythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Iustine calls Tanis; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had bene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me rightly accounted by the iudicious and learned Reuecaius all one with the great Sesivris, that liued certaine ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. years, according to the common account.

See more of this, in the first Part. c. 5. §. 6.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affine vnto it.

30 Hence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath bene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Ninus, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrius against Iulian calls the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a God: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many learned writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Sennaramis giue that name to their Father, that hec might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a God. And as this title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satrapes: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinitie) those voices of Bad, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphegor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that are learned in the Iebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Bad by the Latine Princeps militiæ, Chiefe in the warre, though Daniel was so called (saith SVIDAS) ob honorum explicationem arcamaram rerum, in honour of his expounding secrets. S. Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification: and saith, that the idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memorie of his Father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lycranus) came Idolatric, and the first vs^e of Images into the world. Isidore 1. 2. in Originibus doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient, adding, that as among the Affryens it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punick or Carthaginian language it signifieth erth God. Glycus makes it an Affyrick name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. Hea-fo affirmeth that the Idoll which the Assobites worshipped (by them erected on the mountaine Ibegor, or Peor, and called Bad) is the same which the Latines call Prispus, the God of Gardens; which was also the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Ascoron. For Bel, or Beel boundeth (God) and Sebab (Flies or Hornets;) by which name (notwithstanding) the Iewes expresse the Prince of Devils. But the Propheet Osé teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Israhel, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Bad, or Behai, be iustly to be vsed towards God; yet in respect that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it and forbad it. And the vling of the word Bel among the Chaldaens for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifi-fieth the Sunne, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tanquam Solis particula. As for the wordes compounded (before remembered) as Belphegor, and Belphegon; Belphegon is expounded out of FAGIVS, Dominus specula vel castelle, The Lord of the watch-tower or of the guard: the other word notth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpoor, or Badpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Demi-dauit; and therefore the word ioyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the sonne of Sa-turne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the Sonne Iupiter, and the grand-child Hercules. SATVRNI dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui cybes condiderunt sensifimi; primogeniti eorum IOVES & IVNOSES; HER-CVLES vero nepotes eorum fortissimi; The ancientst of Noble families, and Kings which founded Cities, are called SATVRNES, their first borne IVPITER and IVNOSES; their valliant Nephewes HERCVLES. But this Belus (saith LIVINE) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter Babylonius, whom the Aegyptians (transported by the dreames of their antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was Father to Aegyptus. They adde that this Belus vnder a Colonia to the Riuer of Euphrates there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Aegyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebins) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apus married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athen) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Aegyptians so much vaunted.

Of the worshipping of Images begonne from BELVS in Babel.

40

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inuentour of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Aegyptians might borrow both the name and the doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it remained in his time.

Strabo. l. 3. c. 3.

Of the Sepulcher of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Over the Riuer (saith he) there are gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Temple, which XERXES brake vp, as yet remaining. It was a square Pyramis made of bricke, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appeares by Cyral against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet liuing: for so hee writes of him (calling him Arbelus) ARBELVS, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deita-tis nomen accepisse: persequerantur igitur Assyri, & finitima illis gentes sacrificantes ei.

ARBELVS.

1.4. cont. Italian.

504

ARBELEVS, a man very proud and arrogant, was accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their Subjects with the Deities; (For with the name of God) The Assyrians therefore and the neighbouring Nations have persecuted, sacrificing to him. Euen Arims also, whom Suidas calls Thouras, who succeeded next after Ninus, was made an Idoll-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninus) Thouras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Cancafus of the flocke of Iapheth-luc him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus erre Suidas. Neither is it vnlikely but that many among idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without diuine worship, only in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Gylisus rightly conceiueeth; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those woddan and brazen carcases, when postertie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner. Quos autem Pagani Deos esse homines fuerunt, & pro vniuersisq. vita meritis vel magnificentia, colant: post mortem operunt: sed (demonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honorauerunt, minores Deos existimant: ad ista verò magis excolenda accurrunt Poetarum segmenta, They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be Gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence beganne after his death to be honoured of his owne. But at length (the Deuils perswading) they accounted them lesser Gods, whose memories they honoured: and the fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honours of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorius: Gentilium (saith hee) inuentrix & caput est imaginum, Gentilisme is the inuentresse and ground of images: and Ambrose, Gentis lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei, The Gentils adore wood, as it were the image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath S. Augustine against Adimantus. Et venient (saith LACTANTIUS) ne religio vana sit, si nihil viderent quod adorerent, They feare their religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen thinke this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian be so fatigued with the distinction of Deities and Hyperdoulas, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not only nowhere warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practicers thereof.

Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any graven image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remove, weede it, or by feare, or by any perswasions leade the hearts of men from it. For where shall we finde words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heed to your selues (for yee saw no image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that yee corrupt not your selues, and make you a graven image, or representation of any figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no graven image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the booke of Wisdom. That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of wickednesse: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the worshipping shipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, for you saw no image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil, Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscriptas eum mente tua, Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a patterne of the infinite God to our owne thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the greazie penill of a painter, or the rustie axe or other instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and speede this inuention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romanes for a while relict the creation of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. yeares, obseruing therein the Law of Numa: who thought it impietie to resemble things most beautifull .by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanitie of the Graeci (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Sathan) set vp the images of their Gods; which (as St. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and vtterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth. *Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicat, gens postea illa adorant, & cum hoc suspiciant, fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt, The images of the Gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto with bended knees; those they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the handi-craftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffeth at.*

*Heu miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religiosa sibi sculptunt simulachra, suumq;
Factorem iugunt, & qua fecere venerant.
Quis furor est? quae iusta animos demeritaludis?
Vt volucrum, iurpennis bouem, toruamq;
Semi-hominemq; canem supplex homo prenis adoret.*

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should vgly shapes adore,
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuise was barbarous, and first, and many yeares practised by Heathen Nations onely, till the Temes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembereth how the Sibyls vniueighed against Images: and Hosius, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those bables, Strabo and Herodotus witnesseth, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus neuer taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortal natures by mortall figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixt booke de preparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The fimele Tacitus and Crinus report of the ancient Germanes. Many other Authors might be remembered that witnesseth the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hosius hath written at large in his Tract de origine imaginum.

magnum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exemplis bonis mixta orta sunt. All ill examples have sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their countries and commonwealths: Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solum exprimitis diuina illisjuri causa perpetuam merentium: Men were not wont to make pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papistes, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Symblicra are proleuentis litterarum, ut per ea disceret homines Deum inuisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they) are, so before them

10 the Heathen said) are in stead of letters, whereby men might learne to know the invisible God: in which vnderstanding (perhaps) they no otherwise esteemed them then pictures indeed; yet as that of Esai or Bel set vp in memorie of Belus the Babylonian became afterwards the most reuerenced Idoll of the world, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and call away: so those very stocks and stones, and painted canvases (called the pictures of Christ, our Ladie, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not only adored, but esteemed to haue life, motion, and vnderstanding. On these stocks we cut (saith the booke of Wisdom) when we passe through the raging waves, on these stocks more rotten then the ship that carrieth vs.

20 This the Heathen invention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of Gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dij Consentes, sen maiorum gentium; selecti, Patritij, inferiores, dij melij: Counseling Gods, or Gods of the mightie Nobilitie, selecti Gods, Patrician Gods of marks, and common Gods (which the Romanes called Medioximi) dij infimi, and terrestrial Heroes, and multitudes of other Gods: of which S. Augustine hath made large mention in his booke de Ciuitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable soules and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their idolls, did Epinonides Cretensis (by what good Angell moued I know not) erect in the Athenian fields, Altars to the vnknowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of S. Paul: who made them first knowe to whom those

30 Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth euery man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so many yeares led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these Gods was so great in generall, or that euery Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular care of them; as Iupiter in Creece, Isis in Egypt, in Athens Minerua, in Samos Iuno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but euery Citie, and almost euery familie had a God a-part. For as it was written in the second of kings: the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashim, and the Anis made Nibhaz and Tarrak, and the Sopheraim burnt their children in the fire to Achramelch. All

40 which how plainly hath the Prophet Esai derided? Men cut downe trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make ready their meate, and warme themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue hee maketh a God, an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heartes from vnderstanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to beleue the commandments of God so direct against Idolatry, to beleue the Prophets, and to beleue Saint Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly. My beloved sife from Idolatry, I speake as vnto them which haue vnderstanding, image yee what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of NINVS: and lastly of his warre against ZOROASTER.

VNto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commaunded the exercise of Idolatrye, the first that iniuriously invaded his neighbour Princes; and the first that without shame or feare committed adultery in publique. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of 10 prophane Authours) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that peece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Annus hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Chytrius noteth) to the vnderstanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Helicarnassus, and others: yet Lodouicus Vives, B. Rhennanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the fragmant; prouing directly that cannot be the same Berosus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenians and Iosephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eightenth King Asestades, and to the times of Iosua. 20 For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine papers, or some fewe lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchie: but hee afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errors.

Ctesias of Ennius (a Cittie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the yonger, and with Artaxerxes Mucemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vpwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Story of Cyrus the yonger Xenophon approoueth him in some things, and Athenens Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparant are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whome hee liued, and so incredible are the numbers which hee findes in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reportes were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very fewe excerpti- 30 ons lately published.

20 649. And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as fewe wordes as I can expresse them. S. Augustine affirmeth that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that hee wanne it all, saue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For hee made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his conquests, with whom hee entred into a straight league of amitie; because hee commaunded many people and was his kinsman, and a Chusite, and the nearest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprise was vpon Syria, which hee might easily subdue, both because hee invaded it on the soldaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, hee forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia hee bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that euer hee commaunded the lesse Asia, I doe not beleue, for none of his successours had any possession therein.

His third warre was against Phraomus, King of the Medes, whom it is said that hee ouerthrew, and cruelly murdered with his leuen children, though others affirme that they all dyed in one battaile against him. Whether hee invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that hee made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first hee returned, and set the worke of Ninive forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. foote, and 200000. horse, and 10000. sixe hundred Cha- 50 riots:

Magick

riots: being encountered by Zoroaster with 400000. But Nimus prevailing, and Zoroaster slain, he entred farther into the Countrey, and belieged the chiefe Cittie thereof, called Baltra or Baltrian (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and an assault given by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) hee entred and possessit. Upon this occasion Nimus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and externall beautie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatned to thrust out if hee refused to consent. He therefore yeelding to the passion of love in Nimus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong persuasions of shame and dishonour, cast himselfe head-long into the water and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magick arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

That ZOROASTER was not CHAM, nor the first inventor of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

ZOROASTER King of the Bactrians, Vincenius supposed to be Cham, the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitie. For Cham was the paternall Ancestor of Nimus; the father of Chus; the grandfather of Ximrod, whose sonne was Delus, the father of Nimus. It may be that Vincenius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deified by some wicked knaue, and so intituled: of which Sicinius Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the invention of Magick to Cham, the sonne of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie: which Art (saith he) with the seuen liberall sciences he writ in fourteen pillars: seuen of which were made of brass, to resist the defacing by the waters of the flood; and seuen of bricke against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deified discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like vnto this of Comestor. These be Cassianus wordes. CHAM (filius NOAH) qui superstitionibus istis et sacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super his memorialem librum in Arcan profus inferre, in qua erat cum patre iuncto, &c. CHAM (the sonne of NOAH) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriale of that nature into the Arc, wherein hee was to remaine with his godly Father, caused the precepts and rules thereof to be engraven in metall and hard stone.

Cassian. in Olla. Col. c. 21.

S. Angustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to haue laugh at his birth, when all other children weep; which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained vnto: being taken for the inuentor of naturall Magick and other arts; for the corrupter, corrupter, saith Plinie and Iuliane. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities; or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minerals, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which I know not what King of Chaldaea, is also made the Inuentour. I rather thinke that these knowledges were farre more ancient, and left by Noah to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (Josephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein then any other in that age, if hee exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisdome of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to nature and all naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and attributed proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdome, which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things and reneweth all.

wisd. c. 7.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouerthrowne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Cicelius calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Scalig. in Euseb.

Joseph. l. x. ant. c. 4

Again Josephus and Cedrenus affirme that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandring Stars, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this art had bene inuented by Zoroaster, hee could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, hee might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse jangling about the word and art of Magike. Arnobius remembereth foure to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hieromedorus and Dionus seemeth to bee but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldaean and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who liued in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hottianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: betwene whom and Cyrus there past 78. yeares. Suidas remembereth a fifth, called Perseus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oronasdes, which Picinus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthus or Plebo, Ficinus and Steuchius make him a Chaldaean. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picinus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldaean by Nation, though the word (Chaldaean) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinction of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldae and Magi diuers; Picinus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldaean both by nation and profession, it appeareth by his bookes, which (saith Picinus) were written in the Chaldaean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris EXE ZOROASTRIS & MELCHIOR magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diners from coniuuring, and Witchcraft.

Ow for Magick it selfe; which Art (saith Astrandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt, Few vnderstand, and many reprehend: Et sicut canes ignatos semper allatrant, As dogges barke at those they know not: so they condemne and hate the things they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse (leaving Nonus for a while) to speake somewhat thereof.

10 It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magus) because of Simon Magus: who being indeede, not Magus, but Goes, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vsurped that title. For Magick, Coniuuring, and Witchene are farre differing arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant iscofeteth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the art after long studie and labour altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitiuelly, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conuersant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the art of Magick is the art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the 20 word (μαγία) saith, that the Persians called their Gods μαγεία: whence he addeth that Magus is either μαγία or μαγιστρία (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken Matt. c. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kinde: which Pico de Mirabilibus calleth diuine Magick: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or wise men: For the feare and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wise men the Greekes call Philosophers: the Indians Drachmans: which name they somewhat nearely retaine to this day, calling their Priests Drachmans; among the Egyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalites, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differentiated by 30 the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hosianes, one of the ancient Magicians) vseth these wordes. Et verum Deum merita mensurate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed eorum, eius uenerationi non assistere, idem demonis pradii terranos, uagos, humanitati inimicos. SOSTHENES (for so M. Felix calleth him, not Hosianes) ascribeth the due maiestie to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath deliuered that there are Demons earthly and a wandering, and enemies to mankind.

His Metaphisic also in his first booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contempler of diuine 40 and heauenly sciences; but vniuilly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is also taught which His Metaphisic enoweth, that vnder the name of Magick all other unlawfull arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Metaphisic distinguish it from Necromantie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which hee hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Metaphisic condemneth is of that kinde whereof the Deuill is a partie. Daniel in his second Chapter nameth foure kinds of those Wise men: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, & Chaldei. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophistes; Vatubus and Paganus Gentilissimos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatubius) Naturalists: Nempes sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Gracos (saith) diuinarum humanarumq; verum scientiarum profites, For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Gracians (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the English call them Inchanters; Iuuenis Magicians; Callation Coniurers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis, The Wise men of Babel.

Demonologie. 1. 2. c. 1.

The second sort Vatablus, Paganus, Iunius, and our English call Astrologers, Hierome and the Septuagint Magicians.

The third kinde are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierome, Paganus, and the Septuagint Witches, or Posioners: in Iunius Praefiguratores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Posioners; and that indeede there is such a kinde of Malefici, which without any art of Magicke or Necromantie vñe the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischief, Hic Malefice confirmeth in the first chapter of his second booke: speaking also in the fifth chapter of their practise, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of waxe, or clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translatours call Chaldaans: who tooke vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euents: and this they vauited to performe by the influences of the Starrs by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magicke, hauing chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impoures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet for as they haue also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magicke was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starrs into those lower elements.

Philo Iudaeus goeth farther, affirming that by this part of Magicke or Astrologie, together with the motions of the starrs and other heauenly bodies Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldea: Qui coetemplatione creaturam cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. DAMASCEN.) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetike and Astronomie, who before *ABRAHAM*s coming vnto them knew none of these sciences.

And doth Archangelus de Burgo in defence of Mirandula against Garfias, ALEXANDER & EVPOLEMON dicunt, quod ABRAHAM sanctitate & sapientia omnium prestantissimus Chaldaeos primum, deinde Pharuaes, demum Egyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & diuina docerunt, ALEXANDER (saith hee, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and EVPOLEMON affirme that ABRAHAM the holiest and wisest of men did first teach the Chaldaans, then the Pharuaicians, lastly the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magicke containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brablings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of naturcs hidden bosome to humane vñe, Virutes in centro centri latentes, Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa noua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of nature, and how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Thyracens remembered by St. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romanes: among the Indians Thebesius: among the Egyptians Hermes: among the Babyloniens Budda: the Thracians had Zamelxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abarris: and the Italians Petrus Aponensis. The Magicke which these men professe is thus defined. Magice est connectio à viro sapientie agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, et inde opera procedant non sine eorum admittione qui causam ignorant, Magicke is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroastro was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles hee confesseth God to be the Creator of the Vniuersal: he beleeueth of the Trinitie, which he could not intelligate

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phariſians vsing Zoroasters owne wordes. Hac ad verbum scribit: (saith EUSEBIUS) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, simplicis similium, benorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina inuitiam perdoctus; natura perfectus, sapiens, sacra natura vnicus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster

De prop. euzar. 12. c. 7.

10 STER word for word. God the first incorruptible, euertlasting, vnbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the wisest, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inventor thereof.

L. 2. fol. 6.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisdome of the Chaldaens, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders, (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldaens: Apham, or Magicians: Chartanum; (which hee translates Arabi, or Sophisti) Ancosphim, or Malesici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poysoners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruspices, or Diuiners.

20 Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldaens, which were Astronomers, His celorum motus diligentissime spectant, These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Apham were in the old Latine translation called Philosophes: of the Septuagint and of Iherome Magicians, qui de omnium rerum diuinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt, Who discourse of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Lactius ascribeth the invention of this art to Zoroaster the Persian.

Lact. 11.

Chartanum, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith S. Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdome of the Magi, which hee receiued from his Ancesters.

30 Ancosphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken already out of His Manichees booke of Demonologie.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Iherome) which diuine from the entrailles of beaſts slaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction wee may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Peuce truly obserueth, praeter religionem Persice, ut in populo Dei Leuitici, iudicij, vera Philosophia dediti erant: nec quicquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamque perciperet. The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuities among Gods people, and they were giuen to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first be en exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senensis in defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus hath two kinds of Magick, his owne wordes are these. *Et ne quem moueat praemissa Polychronij & Theophilistimonias, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram vrbicam, ab Origine damnatam, qua per fœdera cum demonibus inita aut vrbicam aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, qua ad practicam naturalem philosophiam pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium. Commentaries vpon Daniel; where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these lower kinds of wife men formerly remembered, he vseth this distinction; Quos nos barolos; ceteri vniuersi (id est) mentatates interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi qui de singulis philosophantur malefici, videntur vniuersi & vltimis, & sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldaeis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consecutio autem communis Magos pro Maleficos accipit, quos aliter habentur apud gentem suam eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum & adartus huius scientiam Reges quoq; & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini saluatoris ipsi primum ortum eius intellexerunt, & venientes in sanctam Bethlehem adorauerunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente. They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret inchanters, seeme to mee such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle euery thing philosophically; Witches, that vse blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead; further, among the Chaldaeans I take them to be signified by the name of Coniecturers vpon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own nation: for they are the philosophers of the Chaldaeans: yea Kings and Princes of that nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this art: whence at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour they first of all vnderstood his birth, and coming vnto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the starre from above shewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference betwene the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some writers affirme that Magus hebreice dicitur, qui ex facere facto virtutis diaboli opera ad rem quamcumq; ; that he is called a Magician now adies, who hauing entred league with the deuill vseth his helpe to any matter; yet (as our Saviour said of Diuinae) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magie is of the wisdom of nature; other artes which vndergoe that title were inuented by the fallhood, subtletie and enuie of the Deuill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, then the vse of certaine ceremonies per malam fidem: by an euill faith: in the former no other ill, then the inuigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fitly to applie things that worke to things that suffer. And though by the times, those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Diuines which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecaphim; yet had they no other reason, then common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficos accipit, Common custome (saith S. Hierome) vnderstandeth Witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expone sis Magi nomen, formidolose nomen euangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O ibon scarsfullone (saith Ficinus) why doubtst thou to vse the name of Magus, a name gratious in the Gospell, which doth not signifie a Witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that studie and profession but only idle ignorance, the parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit inuiscentia quorundam operum, quae re vera opera naturalis sunt: verumtamen quia procurement demonum naturas ipsas vel coniungentium, vel committentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus haec. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprie vocant. The maruelousnesse of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath bene the cause of this slander: but because these workes haue bene done by procurement of Devils ioyning the naturas together or mingling them, or how soeuer sitting the naturas to their working, they were thought the workes of the Devils by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magie, which men call very improperly Necromantia.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: for by vnderstanding (saith he) the extremest acuitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Diuinity of Christ: for otherwise (to vse his owne words) ignorantis terminis potentia & virtutis rerum naturalium stat nos dubitare illis eadem opera, quae fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia. The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether these very

very works which Christ did, may not bee done by natural means: after which he goeth on in this sort. Idco non hereticæ, non superstitiosæ dixi, sed verissimæ & Catholicæ per istos Magos adiuvari nos in cognoscenda dimittite Christi. Then of course I say not heretically, nor superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically, that by such Magicks we are in the end in knowing the divinitie of Christ. And seeing the Tenets and others the enemies of Christian religion, doe impudently and impiously object, that those miracles which Christ wrought were not about nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Astrandula a man for his yeares fuller of knowledge then any that this latter age hath brought forth, might with good reason auow, that the vttermost of natures works being knowne, the works which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held nature therein but as a pencil, and by a power infinitely supreme and diuine: and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.

d. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Deuill here as in other kinds hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

Being therefore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other then divinorum cultor & interpres, a studious observer and expounder of diuine things: and the art it selfe (I mean the Art of naturall Magick) no other, quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummatio. Then the absolute perfection of naturall Philosophie: Certainly then it proceedeth from common ignorance, and no way forth with wise and learned men promissè, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawfull and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to vse S. Pauls wordes) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Deuill hath shuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and beseeleth gracelesse men. For if we condemne naturall Magick, or the wisdom of nature, because the Deuill (who knoweth more then any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmefull parts of herbs, drugges, minerals, and excrements: then may wee by the same rule condemne the Physition, and the Art of healing. For the Deuill also in the Oracles of Amphiaraxs, Amphilochus, Trophonus, and the like, taught men in dreames what herbs and drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Deuill from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same employment among the ministers and seruants of God, changing himselfe for that purpose into an Angell of light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a doctrine of religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starrs teaching men to esteeme them as Gods, and not as instruments. And (as Blaunt obserueth) it is true, that iudiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions; but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; considering that heavenly bodies (as euery generall experience sheweth) haue and exercise their operation vpon the inferior. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie, the Moone doth moisten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they haue seuerall and proper names, so haue they seuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beautie and in magnitude; and to all the Starrs hath God giuen also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) neede not: He countereth the number of the Starrs, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestiall influences, the Deuill catcheth not so fluffe in his superstitions; and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of nature hath he fastened fastened his doctrine of Characters, numbers, and incantations; and taught men to beleue in the strength of wordes and letters: (which without faith in God are but inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his owne with the all-powerfull word of God, or to diminish the glorie of Gods creating word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, hee was neuer ignorant, that both the wife and the simple obiecte when the Sea-birds forsake the thiores and flie into the land, that commonly some great forme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crows and bathing of Ducks foretewh raine: for they feele the aire moistened in their quilles. And it is written in Iheremie the Prophet, Even the Stork in the aire knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemie of mankind, working vpon these as vpon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill successe in the warre: and (as Abraham) to looke into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of vnsearchable providence in the livers and bowels of birds and beasts. Againe, because it pleased God sometimes by dreames, not only to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Ioseph, and by dreame informed Isaac, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Iob: in dreames and visions of the night when sleepe falleth vpon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause men to returne from his entrapse, therefore, I say, doth the Deuill also practise his diuinations by dreames, or (after Parisienus) diuinitatis imitationes, his mocks-diuinitie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne dreames: Mathridato of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romans finding the inconuenience hereof, because all dreames (without distinction of causes) were nauarr to diuination, forbad the same by a law; as by the wordes of prohibition (aut narrandis somnijs; occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewise by the law of God in Deuteronomie cap. 13. seducing dreamers were ordered to bee slaine. Yet it is not to be condemned that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his dreame for two grieuous diseases that oppressed him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemies poisoned wound; nor that which S. Augustine reporteth of a Milanoise; whose sonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the acquaintance lay to discharge it; nor that of Asthyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, for asmuch as the cause is not in our selues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That DANIELS mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians doth not iustifie all their practises.

BVt it may be objected, that if such diuination as the Heathens commonly vsed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange reuelations: how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the basse sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldea, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kinde of people God himselfe commanded to bee slaine. To this diuers answers may be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the dreame of the King, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any art, either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confesse the power of the ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise their faculties in any cuill or vnlawfull arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hault judgement, which proceeded with hurry without examination. And that some of those men, studies and Professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had bene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters; 10 of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wisemen: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that judgement, because it was vniuit. For howeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practise of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Deuill himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practise and profession.

p. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right use of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with cuill, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleannesse and purity: The good, The truth, The pure in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by sacrifice; there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Deuill in the image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemosh, Ishtar, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeue the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wife and learned men in these daies from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Stars and other lights of heaven, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

The sympathetical and antipathetical working of herbes, plants, Stones, minerals, with their other vntoost vertues sometimes taught by the Deuill, and applied by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable endes can neuer, terrifie the honest and leamed Physicians or Magicians from the vying of them to the helpe and comfort of mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Deuill betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of dreams, so farr as with a good faith and a religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lastly the prohibition to marke flying of foules (as signes of good or euill success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be giuen. For if we confound artes with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemne all honest trades and enterchange among men (for there are that excell in all professions) 50 but we shall in a short time burie in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and couer it ouer with a most scornefull and beggerly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we should shew our felues in gratos erga eos, qui laboro curas, lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce, Vnthankfull we should shew our felues towards those, who with paines and care haue discovered vnto vs light in this light.

Indeed not only these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort. In seculo mathematico Versatilibus, quod in omni scibili quaritur velucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate. In the glasse of the Mathematickes that truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obscure image, but in a neere and manifest representation.

¶. VI.

Of the diuers kinde of vnlawfull Magick

It is true that there are many artes, if we may so call them, which are couered with the name of Magick: and esteemed abusively to bee as branches of that tree, on whose root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Inuocation at the graues of the dead, to whom the Deuill himselfe giues answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortal soules of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing; death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the graues.

A second practise of those men, who pay tribute or are in league with Sathan, is that of coniuiring or of raising up Deuils, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distract, as they beleuee that by terrible words they make the Deuill to tremble; that being once impaled in a circle (a circle which cannot keepe out a Moufe) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great monster. Doublelesse they forget that the Deuil is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearefull word of the Almighty: and that he feareth not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet resolute himselfe, that he can draw the Deuill out of Hell, and terrifie him with a phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Deuils seeme to vse; is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which raise them vp; as His Matestie in his Booke aforesaid hath excellently taught, That the Devils obedience is only secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectiue, that is, upon bargaine.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon those simple and ignorant Deuils, which inhabite Iamblicus imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassals, do no way neede any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale altogether with Cardans mortall Deuils, following the opinion of Rabbi Auonathan and of Porphyrus, who taught that these kind of Deuils liued not about a thousand yeares: which Platareb in his Treatise de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Poth. For were it true that the Deuils were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when he had lifted him vp in the ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when he was sure he should perill with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S^r Peters prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prankt at other times vpon his own accord the Deuill plaied with Theodotus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue bene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Budae, a principall pillet of the Manichean heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth: and for a manifest prooofe hereof wee see it euery day, that the Deuill leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the gallowes, for whom at other times hee maketh

7. 11. 29. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals: of whom Cusanus: Falsi sunt incantatores, qui in vitro & vitro volunt spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore. They are foolish enchanters which will sent up their Spirits within their wales or in glasse: for a Spirit cannot be enclosed by a body. Exorcist. 1.

10. There is also another art besides the afore mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by sacrifice and inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and Communicate withall. But the admittling Spirits of God, as they require not any kinde of adoration due vnto their Creatour: so seeing they are most free Spirits; there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the Deuill haue corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof couer themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministration of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immateriall subtilties and abstract natures, either by sacrifice, vow, or enforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Sathan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Deuils which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked diuinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the aire, called Atmanteia, and the like.

The last, and (indeede) the worst of all other is Fascinatio or Witchcraft: the practisers whereof are no lesse enuious and cruell, reuengefull and bloody, then the Deuill himselfe. And these accursed creatures hauing sold their Soules to the Deuill work two waies; either by the Deuill immediaty, or by the art of poisoning. The difference betwene Necromancers and Witches, the Magick hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Deuill.

30. There is another kinde of petty witcherie (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of beausts and birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomet's Dove, which he had vsed to feede with wheate out of his care: which Dove, when it was hungrie, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his bill therein to finde his breake-fast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the holy Ghost that gaue him aduise. And certainly if Bankes had liued in elder times, hee would haue flamed all the enchanters of the world: for whosoever was most famous among them, could neuer master or instruct any beaust as hee did his Horse.

40. For the drawing of Serpents out of their dennes, or killing of them in the holes by incantations (which the Magians, a people of Italie practised. Colubros difformit Maria carin, incantans a Maria makes the Snakes to bur st.) That it hath been vsed it appeares Psal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many impostures may be in this kinde; and euen by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and allure the like. So many things may be laied in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I finde no other Magick or incantment, then to draw out a Moulfe with a peece of toasted cheefe.

of diuers waies by which the Deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

U^t to the end that wee may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of Gods: that wee doe not giue to the Deuill any other Dominion then he hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the minister of Gods vengeance, as when Agypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by euill Angels) hee otherwise worketh but three waies.

1. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second by the exquisite knowledge of nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot work what they would G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotencie: the second, their owne reason disuading them from daring ouer much, or indeede (and that which is the only certaine cause) the great mercie of the Creator, Tenens eas ligatas (saith the same Author) velut inmanissimas belluas. S. Augustine was of opinion that the Frogges which Pharoas Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Deuill (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Vaerus obserueth, those Frogges of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeede. Hereof saith S. AYGUSTINE. Nec sane demones naturas creant, sed quae à Deo create sunt committunt, ut videantur esse quod non sunt. The Deuill create not any naturas, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giueth the reason. Demon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentia, per quos aperire lumen rationis: radius mentis solet, (that is) The Deuill fills with certaine cloudes all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertullian in his booke de anima rightly conceiueth, if the Deuill can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Deuill entrench in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogges were not imaginarie, but such indeede as they seemed: not made magica artis labore, which indeede agreeth not with the art, but (according to THOMAS) per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem. By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not bee deceived by that sleight of false semblance: and S. Augustine in another case like vnto this, (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his companions into birds, per actum cum passibus, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that S. Augustine beleueed that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man vry learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Magicks he vseth these wordes. De huiusmodi autem operibus est semper generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutorijs, quae ipsa femina natura consortari & accurrunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus natura videatur (quae tardius talia efficiere consuevit) sed potentia demonum, &c. to which he addeth. Qui autem in his docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant. In such works (saith he) the sodaine generation of Frogges, and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which nature alone worketh; but by meanes strengthening the seedes of nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so haisten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of nature, which usually worketh more lesiurely, but they thinke it is done by the power of Demils. But they who are learned in these arts meruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these these two waies the Devils doe most frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the vtmost of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or vnscarable power, but of God only.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the aire, as well as moue it or presse it; who knows not that these things are also naturall? Or may it bee objected that hee foretellet things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion? it is true, that hee sometimes doth it; but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets; and hee foretold the death of Saul, at such time as hee was in his owne possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath liued from the infancie of the world to this day, and obserued the successe of euery Counsaile: hee that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations: hee that is of counsaile with all those that studie and practise subuersion and destruction: hee that is Prince of the aire, and can thence better iudge, then those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if hee should not very oftentimes gheife rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to giue impediment) it were very strange. For wee see that wise and learned men doe oftentimes by comparing like causes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Deuill doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, hee cuermore answereth by riddles, as

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the ouerthrow of his owne kingdome, or of his enemies. And thus farre we graunt the Deuill may proceed in predictions, which otherwise belong to God only; as it is in Esai. §. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead by the power of the Deuill: and that it was not the true SAMVEL which appeared to SAUL.

40 To conclude, it may be objected that the Deuill hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed that some of the Deuils acts exceed all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Iustine Martyr was sometimes of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed: and so was Ambrose, Lira, and Burgenis; from which authorities those men borrow strength which fo belieue. But Martyr changed his opinion: and so did St Augustine, who at first seemed to bee indifferent: For in his questions vpon the Old and New Testament he accounteth it detestable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his wordes elsewhere to the same effect. In requie sunt animas piarum a corpore separate, impiorum autem panes luunt, donec istarum ad vitam aternam, illarum vero ad aternam mortem que secunda dicitur corpora renouiscant. The soules of the godly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies does of the iust rise to Eternall life, and of the wicked to an Eternall and second death.

And (besides St Augustine) Insiene Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysofome and others beleined firmly, and taught that the soules of men being once separate from their bodies did not wander on the earth at all. Crederet debemus (saith CYRILL) quom corporibus sanctorum anima abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris veniati diuina committantur. We must beleine when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the Diuine Goodnesse as into the hands of a most deere Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Deuill cannot stretch high: if in Hell, ab inferno nulla est redemptio, from Hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death; Enam (saith AVGVSTINE) in igne aeterno; alterum in regno aeterno: the one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall kingdome. And though it bee written in Iure Pontificio, that many there are who beleue that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Glosse vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous. Creant, & male, quia sunt Phantasmat (saith the Glosse) They beleue, and they beleue amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath bene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one; hec oratio a fraude atq; deceptione diabolica est. This speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Deuill, saith CHRISTOSTOME. Likewise of the same faith Tertullian. Abstru animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, a damonio credamus extractam. God forbid that wee should thinke that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet, should bee drayne vp againe by a Deuill.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Sammel; so doe they the woddn images Cherubims: and false brazen Gods are called Gols; and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a booke not numbred among the Canonick Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, if it bee his cura pro mortuis agenda conselleth) yet Siracides following the literall sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Deuill would willingly perswade, that the soules (yea euen of iust men) were in his power, yet so farre is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods iust and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all diuine reason, as Saint Augustine (or whosoeuer wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion so to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that hee refused to answer him either by dreames, by Vrim, or by his Prophets: it were foolish to conceiue, that he would permit the Deuill, or a wicked Witch to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his owne diuine Law to aske counsaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elswe here. Therefore it was the Deuill, and not the soule of a dead bodie, that gaue answer and aduise.

But because Helias and Helisew had raised some from the dead by the power of 40 Gods thofe Deuils which S. Augustine calleth Iudificatores animantium sibi subiectorum, mockers of their owne vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their eares like the voices of men, doe also perswade their gracelesse and accursed attendants, that themselues both possesse, and haue power ouer the soules of men. Ehndit Diabolus aciem tuam spectantium, tunetiam cogitantium saith, L. VIVES, The Deuill beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the boundes of the Deuils power, whom if we will not feare, we must learne to sinne. For when hee is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntary vassall: potest ad malum mutare, non potest trahere, saith S. AVGVSTINE, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwise may goe into the number remembred by Lactetius.

Of the memorable buildings of NINVS, and of his wife SEMIRAMIS: and of other of her actes.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by NINVS: and of Babylon
by SEMIRAMIS.

BEfore we come back to Ninive the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaster, it is vncertain. As for the City it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compasse 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walles whereof were an hundred foot vpright, and had such a breadth as three charriots might passe on the rampire in front: these walles were garnished with 1500.
towers which gaue exceeding beautie to the rest, and a strength no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this Citie (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the banks of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden), was founded long before Ninvs time; and (as ancient Histo- rians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campfor, at such times as Ninvs amplified the same, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these workes of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldaea, and in Assy- ria, Ninvs and Semiramis made perfect. Ninvs finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein shee sought to exceed her husband by faire. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vse of themselves and their people without either Walles or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of woods, briars, bulmets, and waters, to make it the more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in that age, when Ambition was in frong youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnderaken, gaue that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of NINUS: and beginning of SEMIRAMIS reigne.

THis he did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had maintred Babtria, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwixt it and the Mediterran Sea and Hellefont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninive, he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeares. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would graunt vnto her the absolute soueraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenas, and others, speakes of five daies. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Ninon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greekes, then that it had any truth.

Ellen. Ji. 7. ex Diodot.

How soeuer Ninus came to his ende, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch because he changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Ninive in Assyria. Iustine reports that Semiramis (the better to inuest her selfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offense to take on her so great a charge) presented her selfe to the people in the person of her sonne Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as the ruled long, so he performed all those memorable actes which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vnderaken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninias had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlkely that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeares after by any such subtilty: (for so long shee reigned after the death of her Husband;) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous gouernment and vndertakings.

§. III.

Of SEMIRAMIS parentage, and education, and METAMORPHOSIS of her Mother.

SOME writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue bene of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countrey, a Syrian. Bezojus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascalentis; of Ascalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derecta, a Curtis, an of Ascalon exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Derecta is the mother of Semiramis was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated seated on the bank of a Lake adjoining to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man she was by him made with child, which (for feare of extreme punishment) she conuaid away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild beasts) the same was fed by certayne birds, which vsed to feed vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this Lake had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might there by thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of vow; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have fained) changed by Venus into a fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and humane shape. It is thought that from this Derecta the invention of that Idol of the Philisiums (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained only the Trunk of Dagon, the head being broken of: For so St. Hierome hath conuerted that place. Vatabius, Pagninus, and Iunius write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it only appeared: the head thereof by the second all being hundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philisiums was an Idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For this City being maritimate (as all those of the Philisiums were, and so were the best of Phenicia) vsed all their deuotions to Neptune, and the rest of the pettie Gods which attended him.

20 Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

BVt for her Pedigree I leaue it to the Assyrian Eerals: and for her vicious life I ascribe the report therof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and ease do more often accompanie licentiousnesse in men and women, then labour and hazzard do. And if the one halfe bee true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princess more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes she did at Babylon and else-where, and for the warres she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprife of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned; and that of all her most powerfull Army there furnished but onely twenty persons: the rest being either drowned in the riuier of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Sturobates. But as the multitude which went ouer are more then reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Army, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which she leued by her Lieutenant Derectaus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horsemen one million; of Chariots armed with hookes on each side one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phanicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast but fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be tax'd with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Armie (though the fame was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the beliefe of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellefont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the seuerall Prouinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

50 But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowen by Sturobates vpon the banks of Indus, caniticum cantant exte:

Of the Temple of BELVS built by SEMIKAMIS: and of the Pyramids of Ægypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes 10
(besides the wall of this City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, inuironed with a wall carried four-square of great height and beauty, hauing on each square certaine brazen gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square she raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) the first second Tower, and so eight in all, one about another; vpon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests, made the obseruation of the starres, because this Tower ouer-topped the ordinary cloudes.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower haue many T rauailers beene deceiued; who suppose that they haue seene a part of Dionodors Tower, when it was but the Foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Ninrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense eury yeare (saith Herodotus). This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Iherusalem, & of the temple of Salomon: all which vessels & ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This Temple Zerxes euened with the soile; which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the persuasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might haue been in his desire so to do; but he enjoyed but a few yeares after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Ægyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leauell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramids by Memphis, which were conspiciue vndisturbantibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramids Bellonius a carefull obseruer of rarities (who being in Ægypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report. Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommeite, et tirant vne fleche en l'air, a peine pouroit l'envoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez. The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramids, and shooting an arrow from thence into the aier as farr as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall vpon some of the degrees or steppes. 40

FTER the death of Semiramis, Ninias of Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Babylonia, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approved writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiect to ease and delicacie, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other then that out of ieaoulouie he euerie yeare changed his Provinciall Governours, and built Colledges for the Chaldaeans Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successour, whom Suidas calleth Thoras; but that he reduced againe the Babyloniens and Cassians, revolted as it seemeth in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successour of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, inuented jewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose waies are warrantable, (till wee meet these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom, and by whose issues we shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Ninus, Ninias, nias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balanus. For otherwise if we seeke to proue things certain by the vncertaine, and iudge of those times, which the Scriptures set vs down without error, by the raignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story at aduerture, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures do not help vs, Nimus non est in Iobus antiquis Historiam non constare, Ne meruiale si Iobus in thinge very ancient, History want assurance. 73.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeare the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeare of Nimus was the birth-year of Abraham, by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeare after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeares; others 352 yeares between Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archiloachus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeares from the flood to Nimus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeare of Nimus, according to Ensebius, and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeare of Abrahams birth was in the yeare after the 20 flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather the yeare 292.

Now, since I do heere enter into that neuer resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it becometh me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enic caeth at noelicly, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the calic waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuerity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue ABRAHAM was borne in the yeare 292. after the flood, and not in the yeare 352.

THose which seeke to proue this account of 292. yeares, betweene the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture. So TERAH lived 70. yeares, and begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: secondly vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrewes before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight. 42

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the latter Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; that TERAH at 70. yeares begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the some of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seventieth yeare of his life. Secondly it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nabor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nabor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeare of

Terah

Terah his age, then in the 131. 132. &c. Moses having no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeare, in which his Father died.

Fourthly it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. yeares: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeares.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that ABRAHAM made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

Answers all which objections it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me: Now so farre as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abrahams journey into Canaan be first considered; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to stretch into a strange tradition concerning his trauals, that serueth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is written, By faith ABRAHAM (when he was called) obeyed God, to goe out into a place, which he should afterwarde receiue for inheritance; and he went out, not knowing whither hee went. This supposition (if it be granted) serueth very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surly, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by the words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct, and plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terahs death, and an other after: no such thing being found in the Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can pick any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that he be belieued in the rest. But that he performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith the Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and, whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those waies, more often than he was enforced so to doe: if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despair, he had more cause then euery man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was beleeged with famine at his first arrival, and driuen to the into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and he had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himselfe for Sacrifice: all which difcomferts hee patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the waies themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles, and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauaile through the dangerous and barren Deserts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were ealie walks for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let every reasonable man iudge. For if hee trauielled it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Vr to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancie; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe, that he had not animu reuertendi, not any thought looking backward, than any mans bare coniecture, bee he of what antiquity or authority focer. For thus it is written of him: Then Abraham tooke Sarah his wife, and Lot his brothers sonne, and all their substance that they possesse, and the fountes that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the Land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him; his wife, and kinmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if hee could haue benee thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnfeded, and prest with extreme famine at his first iuriall. For had his Father benee then aliue, hee might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Egyptians, to whom hee was a meere stranger both in Religion and Nation.

Gen. 22.5.

and

What the cause might be of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were vrged, could say little else, than that without such a second voiage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plaine, if it be not otherwise troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite vn-done the businesse, which as wee read, was within foure or five yeares after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very solemne oath his principall seruant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither he nor his seruante were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had beene there in person so lately, as within foure or five yeares before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his owne iudgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely sonne, who was then 25. yeares old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the flood had begotten children, rather than haue left all at random to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it bee supposed (if it may be belieued) that either Abraham forgot this busines when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can deuise. What might be the reason, that Abrahams man in doing his masters errand was faine to lay open the whole story of his masters prosperity, telling it as newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine author, had so lately benee among them, would not all this haue benee an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident.

Whether

Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to have returned back to Eur. would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how auster hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kindred could not have bene obtained without his personall presence. Isaac indeedd was sent thither by his parents, to take a wife of his owne lineage; not without Gods especiall approbation; by whose blessing he prospered in that journey: yet he liued there as a seruant; suffered many iniuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence hee hath taken and transplanted them. That briefe saying, Remember LOTS wife, contains much matter. Let vs but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: wee shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrewes. When Ezechiel was visited with an honourable Embasie from Babel, it seems that hee conceined great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a peece of his prosperity; but the prophcy which thereupon he heard by Esaie, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they late downe and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought captivity vpon Israell: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I do not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomie, that God had said, They should no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his King. Whether the Lord had laied any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: that he neuer did returne, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of *Abraham*s is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can persuade those of iudgment or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to proue it, I will belieue as they doe. For all the trauals of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem hee removed to a mountaine betwene Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt: from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattle were more, then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee removed to Mamre, neare Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, vnder Abimeles: and after neare vnto it at Bersabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his some Isaac on the mountaine Morish. But this imitation of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one story, either diuine or humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Leuita in his Cabala hath faimed, it should in reason bee therewithall belieued, that hee would in those his first traualles haue prouided himselfe of some certaine seat, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, familie, goodes and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham, when hee came from Charran, pass through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Morish: where finding no place to inhabit, hee departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discouer and finde out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis, the eleuenth. Hee went fourth, going and iourneying towards the South: and alwaies vsited.

Ment. in Calab.

By occasion of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebrai. Further, to proue that hee had formerly bene in the Countrey, we may note, that ere hee came to Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him saying, Vnto thy seed will I giue this Land, shewing it him-as vnto a stranger therein, and as a land to him vnknowne. For Abraham without any other prouident care for himselfe, belieued in the word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discouer it; but being arriv'd he recieued a second promise from God, that hee would giue those Countreies vnto him and his seede to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted any such double journey of Abrahams, seeing he setteth downe all his passages elsewhere, long and short? as when he moued from Sichem, and seated betwene Hai and Bethel: the distance being but twenty miles: and when he moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but twenty fower miles: and when hee left Mamre, and fate downe at Gerar, being lesse then sixe miles; no, Moses putt ouer all the times of the first age with the greater breuitie, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting vp all betwene the Creation and the Flood in six chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeares: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the five and twentiet; and this time endured but 175. yeares. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams traualles, or other actions: or that he would set downe those small remoues of five miles, and omit those three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would haue ministred some varietie of matter, or accident, worthie the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

d. IIII.

The answer to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not vnliekely, that TERAH should beget ABRAHAM in his hundred and thirty yeare.

NOW touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very vnliekely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeare, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed miscast, and mistaken: Abraham having respect only to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeares. For when the Angell said vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre 3. Lee, SARAH thy wife shall haue a Sonne, it followeth in the next verse, NOW ABRAHAM and SARAH were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with SARAH after the manner of women: therefore SARAH laughed &c.

So then, in that it is said it ceased to be with SARAH after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, & not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah had many sons after Sarahs death, as Zimo, Isachar, Midian, Yshak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37 yeares after Isaac: and the youngest 40 yeares after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeares old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at one hundred yeares? For Sarah died in the yeare of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeare 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham beget his sonnes 36. yeares after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. yeares old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed and Jesse, who liued so many yeares & ages after Abraham, beget sons at 100. yeares, or neare it, it cannot be meruailed uailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and seven yeares after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may have certainty of ABRAHAM'S age from the Scripture, though wee make not ABRAHAM the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of ABRAHAM his two brethren should be respected.

10 T followeth now to speak something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except wee allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70. yeares old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any period rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse wee make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeare of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that St. Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeare of Abraham was the 205. yeare of Terah: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nahor and Haran, because they were out of the Church but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenent, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nahor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Be-

30 thuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca the mother of Israel: & Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a sonne at 90. yeares, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nahor, and Jacob Lea and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nahor: it was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these men times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange Gods, as it is

40 1st. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countie, and City of Ur in Chaldaea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldaea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also who remained at Charan, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacobs his owne kinsmen: hee himselfe hauing also married in his owne familie; not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleued in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charan, hee inuited

50 him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in thou blessed of Iehouah &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said; This thing is proceeded of Iehouah &c. meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein hee acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written Take, sake, goe that she may be thy

Now although it be the opinion of Saint Chrysostome, and some later writers, as Cateter, Olesster, Musculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolter, because he retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleue in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of Iehouah, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the faith.

Hint or Note upon Gen. 11. v. 26. VI. v. 26. who read Hint or Note borne That the naming of ABRAHAM first of the three brethren. Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons proving that ABRAHAM was not the eldest sonne of TERAH.

TO the maine obiection which I answere last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strue to shorten the times, endeavour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeare of Terahs life: grounding themselues first and chiesly on this place of the Scripture, And TERAH liued 70. yeares and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR and HARAN: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooue at all that hee was the eldest and first borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seib was not the first borne of Adam: nor Isaac of Abraham: nor Jacob of Isaac: nor inda and Ioseph of Jacob: nor Dauid the eldest of Iesse: nor Salomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembered.

Gen. 11. v. 26.

129. Prob.

Aug. quæst. super
Gen. 11.

But it is written of Noah, Noah was 500. yeares old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. yeare of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to St. Augustine speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis sed significatio futura dignitas: in qua excellit ABRAHAM. The order of natiuitie is not heere to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which ABRAHAM was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it heere, where it is said that TERAH liued 70. yeares and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: For it was late ere Terah began to beget sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nahor at 29. as other his aunceitors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seib at 130. Enoch Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalael at 70; Mahalael Iered at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeares old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes: as aforesaid. And St. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, then other wise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His owne words are these. Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus ABRAHAM: sed merito excellentie, qua in scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be said he, that ABRAHAM was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture hee is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spirituall blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipso potius electio diuina, qua comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat SEMI in libro NOA, & ABRAHAMO in libro Thare. Pietie saith he or rather diuine election election, which doth enmore draw with it or after it picture and the scare of Go's gone place and precedence to SEW among the children of NOAH, and to ABRAHAM among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. year of his age, And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86. years. It was at Gerar (the fourth border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. years. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and hee had then but the age of 83. years: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father 10 Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70. year old, then must Abraham have bene 135. years when hee first set his foot in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205. the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembered. For hee entred at 75: hee rescued Lot at 83: he had Ismael at 86: he had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Gen 11.4. Gen 26.16.

Act. 7. 2 & Gen. 14.

Moreouer if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. year of his age: then had Terah lived till Isaac had bene 35. years old, and Ismael 49. both which must then have been borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vnlesse wee should either deny credit to St. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else giue credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the greke word παρὰ, may be transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. years before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to have bene borne in the 70. year of Terah; we must giue thole times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authentic will warrant. For Abraham had no children in Vr of Chaldaea, nor in Haran: nor in 10. years after his arriual into Canaan. For the year of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World 2083; and the year of Ismaels birth was the Worlds year 2094: which maketh 10. years difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Ierusalem, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia: nor while Terah lived: nor in lesse then 10. years after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. year of Terahs age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 40. 70, then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also have bene the full age of Terah: but Terah lived 205. year: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. year of Terah.

Gen. 21.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Isckah wanted but 10. years of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. years old.

It followeth then that if Abraham had bene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at 9. years old: for granting that Haran was borne but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within 10. years as old as Abraham, then too needfullie must Haran beget her, when he had lived but 9. years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Isckah was Sarah, Rab: Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith hee, bearing the same signification; and names of principallitie. Againe, to what end was the word Isckah or Isckah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to speake speake of any thing superfluous it is not vsed in Gods Bookes : and if Israh had not belonged to the story, it had bene but an idle name to no purpose remembered.

Now if it had bene trew (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nachor and Harah, who were notwithstanding the parents of Deuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israh, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Israh in this place, were then Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last.

The age also of Lot disproueth the eldership of Abraham : for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83. yeares : And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Harah were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcab, Abraham marrying one of Harahs daughters, and Nachor the other, Sarah also being within 10. yeares as olde as Abraham : it may appeare to euery reasonable man (not obdinate and preiudicate) that Harah was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham : who also died first and before his Father left Yr in Chaldæa. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeares younger than Abraham himselfe. Lyra his wordes are these. Stigitur HARAN fuit iunior ipso ABRAHAM, sequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit SARAM: imò nec oclò &c. and after ward, & idè melius videtur dicendum, quòd ABRAHAM fuit vltimò natus de tribus filijs THARE, tamen nominatur primò, propter eius dignitatem: & quia peneduxerat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta est ei re promissio expressa de CHRISTO, sicut supra dictum est de SEM &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) ABRAHAM was younger then ABRAHAM himselfe, it followeth that he was not 10. yeares old when he begot SARAH: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that ABRAHAM was the last borne of the three sonnes of THARE, neuertheless he is named first for his dignitie, both because he was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following: and because the promise of CHRIST was first made vnto him, as before it is said of SEM.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition that they which flourish the times make all ancient stories the more vnp probable.

T therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Harah was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeare of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeare. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that iourney by Abraham performed when hee was 75. yeares old, these two numbers added make 205. yeares, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my selfe, I haue no other end herein then to manifest the truth of the Worlds Storie: I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuersie. For whatsoever is borrowed from him out of his 16. Booke de Ciuitate Dei ca. 15. the same may be answered out of himselfe in his five and twentieth question vpon Gen. But S. Augustine herein followed Iosephus, and Isidor: and Beda followed S. August. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrews and Iosephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Iosephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Imperiall Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which euery one had an infinite multitude vnder him; trecentos & octodecem prafectos bashit:

habit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Phisao invading him with a great armie,ooke from him his wife Sarah. Such fables argue that Iosephus is not to be believed, but with discrete referuations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeares from the flood to Abraham, is vpheld by manie of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in such matters were worthe to be regarded, it would haue appeared in setting downe the succession of the Persian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whose historie was not so faire remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of manie good writers. Yet grossely haue they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldome finde their opinion rehearfed without the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing vsual among them, to maintaine what soeuer they haue beene formerly knowne to hold and belieue. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times Beroaldus, Cadaman, Penser, Caluin, Iunius, Bezaz, Broughton, Doct. Gibbens, and Moore, with diuers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to haue beene borne in the 130. yeare of his Father Terah. From these (asin a case not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the same Religion, and those neuertheless good Authours, as Buchaeerus, Chirraus, Ruanzius, and others, are veneauef hereine, especially Iosephus Scalger with his Sethebe Calafius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-hereticke in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise Aegulinius Tornellus a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a iudicious, diligent, and free writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered; not alledging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant writer, as being perhaps vnwilling to owe thanks to heretiques. For my selfe I do neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to vphold it, nor fauour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approued; it but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparant to all men of iudgement, that the best approued Historians, Diuine and prophane, labour to inueltigate the truth of times, thereby to approue the stories, and for-past actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgment to our selues, which of these two accounts giue the best reputation to the storie of the Scriptures; teaching the worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeares, or thereabouts, betweene the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 332. yeares betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeare of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeares. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not hastily satishe our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiated doe slothfully and drowsily sit downe; wec shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it about 1072. yeares betweene the flood and Abrahams birth: then to take away any part of those 332. yeares giuen. For if we aduicely consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea, before Abraham was borne, we shall finde that it were verie ill done of vs, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times ouer-deeply betweene Abraham and the flood: because in cutting them too neere the quicke, the reputation of the whole storie might perforce bleed thereby, were not the testimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this precept of St. Aegulstine, that where soeuer any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation misfunderstood.

For in Abrahams time all the then-known parts of the world were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the world besides, as far as India: and those not built with tickes, but of hewen stones, and defended with walles and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvelles? giuing also strength thereby to common cauellers, and to those mens apish braines, who onely bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and mankind.

N this sort therefore for the reasons before alleaged, I conlude, that from the generall flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeares were consumed: and taking the Assyrian Historie with vs, the same number of yeares were spent from the flood to the 43. yeare of Ninus: in which 43. yeare of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeare of the World 2000.

Gen. 11. 8.

Now of this time of 352. yeares, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that staid in the East, to wit, 30. yeare to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sons, we may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Strug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Haula, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne as it appeareth Gen. 10: which S. Augustine approueth. Giuing then 30. yeares more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeares to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeares were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age ere any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison: for Peleg, the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same yeare of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeares more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel: for sure we are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeaseth God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125: The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeare they arrived in Shinar whereof there are 6. yeares remaining) we may giue them for their trauels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattle: and as some ancient writers haue conceived, and Beccanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaines sides, for feare of a second flood. Now if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221, of which number Berofus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus, before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeares of the 352. from the flood to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. needeth bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-short. For Nimrod, by this account, liued in all but one hundred twenty nine yeares: whereof hee raigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sile who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued four hundred thirty three yeares:

years: and of the fame age of the World was Nimrod, the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne Ninus reigned 9. years: which added to 43. make Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his succellor. Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. years, and died in the 52. year compleat of Abraham life.

Ninus or Zameis succeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. years, in the second year of whose reign Abraham left Mesopotamia.

- 10 When Abraham was 85. years old he rescued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by surpris Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninus reigned 38. years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. years after Semiramis died: which was the 75. year of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue bene this Ninus the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. years, as aforesaid, being the 75. year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. year of Abraham, and the 33. year of his own reign: after which he reigned five years: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninus, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian kings, that they are to be ordered as wee haue set them downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine: vnllesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his compaction, which were impietie: or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to be a fiction, which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fables.

That AMRAPHEL, one of the foure Kings whom ABRAHAM ouerthrew Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene NINUS the sonne of NINUS.

- 30 Nd now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes king of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. year of the reign of Ninus or Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could bee at this time king of Babylonia: Ninus or Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath bene already noted, that this Ninus or Zameis was no other then our Amraphel: who inuaded Traconitis or Basan, and ouerthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was king

- 40 of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and it falleth out with the 85. year of Abraham life: wherein he rescued Lot, flew Chedorlaomer, and ouerthrew the rest. T'rue it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in cheife, though Amraphel bee first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or of the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedorl. and not of Amraphel: as it is written. Twelve yeares were they subiect to CHEDORLAOMER, but in the 13. yeare they rebelled, and in the 14. yeare came CHEDORLAOMER and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorl. the principall in this enterprise, who was then king of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated ouer Tigris, and to the East of Amraphel's Countrey; and the other two kings, who were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel bene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But though Cheorlaomer were the first and greatest of those fower Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel) yet this makes not the conjecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the kingdoms betwene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

of ARIOCH another of the fower Kings: and that ELLAS, whereof he is said to have bene King, lies betwene Cœlesyria and Arabia Petraea.

NOW the two other kings joined with Amraphel, and Cheorl, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellasar, the other of the Nations. For Ellasar, Aquila and Lierame write Pontus: so Toisatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Pererius fauoureth. But this is not only to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any armies into Arabia Petraea, or into Idumæa: which Countries these fower Kings chiefly invaded. Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vsed all the art they had to inuite Cyrus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprize what it was. These kings (saith the Text) made warre with BERSA, king of Sodome, BIRSHAK king of Gomorba, SHINAB king of Admath, and SHEMEBAR king of Zeboim, and the king of BELA which is Zoar. All which fise kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kind of Regnuli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning; of which Canaan had 33. all flaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, be imagined to haue bene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weaknesse in the kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleadged for an example, that diuers kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor reach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these petty kings, or of the other Countries: But the eies of the world were fixed on Cæsar; and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then fearefull: But the whole Countrie by these fower kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Ruben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the riuer of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consisting of the two small Prouinces of Traconitis or Balsan, and the Region of the Moabites: a conquest farre vnualluable, and little answering the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subiected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the Vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellasar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a king of the Scythians, a king indeed, as faire fetched to ioyne with the Assyrians

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellasar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountains where of the Arke did reſt, ſo doe they in this place retain the Hebrew word Ellasar, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Pererus himſelfe remembreth other opinions faire more probable then this of Pantus or Heliopolis: yet he cares not auow his liking of them, becauſe the Latine Tranſlation hath it otherwiſe. For Stephanus de Vrbiſibus a Cræſian Coſmographer, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Caleſyria. and St. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Artoch, as in truth it was. Now although the ſame be ſeated by Stephanus in Caleſyria, yet it ſtandeth on the border of Arabia, of which Artoch was king: who formerly iouined with Ninus in all his conqueſts, being of the ſame familie, and defended from Chen and Chis: after whom the name of Arus was by the Hebrews written Artoch: and afterward againe Arctas: as in the Maccabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of St. Paul, who was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Arctas commanding in Damaſcus. They were Princes for the moſt part confederate and depending vpon the Aſſyrian Empire. It is true that we finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonſor, one Artoch was Generall of his armie, and the principall Commander vnder him, who was a king of kings: which makes it plain, that Artoch heere ſpoken of, the ſonne of that Artoch confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia, regions farre removed from the Aſſyrians and Babylonians. The name alſo of Artoch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonſor is mentioned in Iudith, by the name of king of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Perſians bordering Aſſyria according to Stephanus: though Plinie ſets it betweene the Sea-coaſt, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that houſe (knowne by the name of Arus, Artoch, Arctas or Arctas) had the government of that Perſian Province called Elymais (as it ſeemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Iudith) yet the ſame was in Nabuchodonſor time. But this Artoch heere ſpoken of may with more reaſon bee taken for the king of Arabia, the ſonne of Arus, the confederate of Ninus: whoſe ſonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Princee of all on that ſide to- wards the Welt to Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the be- ginning, and of their own houſe, and bloud: which D. Siculus alſo confirmeth.

of TIDAL another of the ſoure Kings.

40 The fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, king of the Na- tions. The Hebrew writes it Goyim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation: Pererus out of Strabo, findes that Galilee was inhabited by diuers Na- tions, which were a mixt people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales ſunt qui Galilee habitant, ſuch are the inhabitants of Galilee ſaith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called king of theſe Nations, as they ſuppoſe. And it may be ſo: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this queſtion. For Galilee was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, how ſoeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdomes adioyning to Phœnicia, and Paleſtina, as Palmyrena, Batanea, Ladiſcene, Apamena, Chalcediſce, Caſtiota, Chelobomra, and all theſe doe alſo ioin themſelues to Meſopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the Eaſt. And that theſe Nations gathered themſelues together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probableſt conjecture.

Gen. 15. 6.

That CHEDORLAOMER the chiefe of the 4 Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

Asly, where as it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Prouinciall gouernour of Babylonia, and that the other kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Males was too well acquainted with the names of Assur, and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldea, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kider, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Quartius calleth the garment which the Persian kings ware on their heads.

Neither doe I belieue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, do not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not so ouer-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tamberlan conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioined a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature herselfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before him.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampl'd. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those kings adioining (whose subiection, and calamities incident was but new, and therefore the more greiuous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successour. For in regno Babylonico hic parum resplendat, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian kingdom. And likely it is that the neeces of mortal men hauing been neuer before gawled with the yoke of torraine dominion, Nor hauing cuer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slavery: no long descent hauing as yet inuested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him to be pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse matthering, and a mindlesse indurstious than his Father, and Mother had vied before him. And he that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idlenesse, as yet inuested his Mother to raigne 42. yeares, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither inadauoured to gaine what he could not gouerne nor to keep what he could not without contentions penill enjoy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we finde that Amraphel king of Shinar was rather an inferior to the king of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall, make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will add these two arguments confirming the former : First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trouble upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldæa to Charran, and then to Canaan, a pilgrimage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandered were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand : in which time of 23. yeares after the death of Semiramis, the neighbor Princes had recovered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis armed of foure millions, with herselfe vterly confumed in India, and all her armes and engines of war, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunitee due to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arins the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Caspjans, and againe subiected them : which needed not if they had not bene revolted from Ninias, after Xerxes death. And as Arach recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balanucus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Agypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor or Triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vnder takings had bene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves, from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is of the reconquest of Arins and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninias and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninias and Semiramis to be but fained : but if we graunt this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Affryian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses as before remembered.

§. XIII.

That it is not verprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that AMRAPHEL was NINIAS, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

The consent of all writers, whose workes have come to my penicill, agreeing as they doe, that these 4. kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellowes were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intitled; doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as it doth elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites; as Tidel was said to be of the Nations, that is of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundrie regions: then may we otherwise conceiue of this Historie: removing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue bene vnwilling to see, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had been a strange coniecture to thinke that Arach was drawn to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites; as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddam should haue bene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were king of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as to subdue those siue Townes, whose very names how they should come to his care, being distioined by so many great Nations of different languages a wife-man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Peris together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdom of Ellasar, & that of Tidel, so far off removed were become his dependants, what reason can we finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorah; & when he should haue fought the establishment of his new-gotten Empire, by rooting out the posteritie of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharus of Aledia, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to imploy the forces of Amraphel, and those other kings, against five petty townes, leaving Tyrus, and Sidon, and the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and farre neerer vnto him, vs-subdued? Now as these doubts which may be alleadged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddam, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Provincie to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to bee forgotten, than that hee should come or send to reclaime them: was it not more then madnesse in them, 10 when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a disolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betwene Euphrates, yea betwene themselves and the ri-uer of Indus? Likewise on the part of Cheedorlaomer we should finde no greater wise-dome, if he knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces hee might haue subdued.

 For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countrey, was not sufficient to counter-uail one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small then must his valour haue bene, who with so mightie preparations effected no more then the waiting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned 20 well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrey, although hee had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed so great) make any fearefull matter: but compose the two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the raigne of Nimias who liued foure or five yeares longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if hee had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appeares that these foure kings, were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may 30 therefore well bee true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne companie, which he carried forth as a Colonic, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it vnprobable, that Cheedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Countrey which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations, in the insancie 40 of Greece, or the manner of the Saracens inuading Africa, and Spaine, with almost as many kings as severall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusuall, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the stofffull qualitie of Nimias then reigning in Affyria: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vndertaking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed, in the raigne of Semiramis, rather to seeke adventures abroad, than to remain at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole streame of writers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold

Gen. 14. 17.

hold our selves to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Nimias: and that the power of his Auncetours being by his sloth decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Cheslorboomer: or if this doe not satisfie, wee may say that Amraphel was an Vnder-king or Satrape of Shinar, vnder Nimias: who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninieue: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom hee hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, and where in therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, that these foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of 10 Countries named in the Text, and not kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And heere too adde that Cheslorboomer seemes rather called a Persian king, then king of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betweene Syria and Arabia) hauing beene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captaines or pettie kings. These and such like things heere to vrge, were but with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthie to haue cost bestowed vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leaue it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these 10 opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries or people fouer these foure were kings, this expedition is the only publication that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sonnes, and of his Nephews Esfau and Isaac, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, neither to stand vpon things generally knowne to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath beene elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent ourselues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, wee passe them heere in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a setled and flourishing king-

CHAP. II.

Of the kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the flood, to the time of the deluerie of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A breife of the names and times of the first kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficultie in resolving of the truth in these points.

Once after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (having doubtlesse known the fertilitie of Egypt before the flood) came thither and tooke possession of the Countrie: in which they built many Cities: and began the kingdome one hundred ninetie one yeares after the deluge. The ancient Governours of this kingdome till such time as Israel departed Egypt are shewen in the Table following.

| An. Mundi. | An. Dil. | |
|------------|----------|--|
| 1847. | 191. | Cham. |
| 2008. | 352. | Osiris. |
| 2269. | 613. | Typhon 2 |
| 2276. | | Hercules 5 |
| 2276. | 620. | Orus. |
| 2391. | 735. | Sesathris the great. |
| 2424. | 768. | Sesathris the blinde. |

| 2488. | 832. | Rathoris or Athoris . |
| 2497. | 841. | Cheneres drowned in the red Sea. |

The Table and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, because in such obscuritie manifest and resolute truth cannot be found. For S. Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had fought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varo, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian kings, which he would not haue done, if they had not bene more vncertaine then the Sicyonians, whom he remembereth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscuritie in the Egyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Preists: who to magnifie their antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings: and recounted vnto strangers, the names of many kings that neuer reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that the magnificent workes and royall buildings in Egypt, such as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesseth that their Princes were of miraculous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Preists were not altogether

- ther false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Ægyptian Historie, was the too much credit of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrarie reports of fundrie Ægyptians, and publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were enforced them upon vs, by their authority. A third and general cause of more than Ægyptian darknes in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Annius, of whom (if to the censures of fundrie verie learned I may add mine) I think thus; That Annius having seene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, may be credited, as an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Geneologie of the Ægyptian Kings, runnes three altogether different waies. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius; Many late writers follow the edition of Annii his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Hierodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

- 20 That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that CHAMs reigne in Ægypt began in the yeare after the Flood 191.

- TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient kings, about whom is most controuertie, the best meanc is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italiens, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioined by general consent, with the 43. yeare of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeares, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater Gods: so that all the yeares of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty indured foure-tee yeares: the foureteenth 26: the sixteenth 37. These three last are said to have bene vnder the three yonger Gods. So the fiftene first Dynasty, lasted 161. yeares. As I do not therefore beleue that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath bene mentioned, because Annii in such-wise limits out their time: so I cannot reiect the account vpon this only reason, That Annii hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the yeare of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast, by which the summe of 161. yeares, which according to our account were spent in the fiftene former, being subducted out of the summe of 352 yeares, which were betwene the flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Ægypt, was in the yeare 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Abraham's deluio 121. In building the Tower were consumed fortie yeares as Gilgas recotdeth: whose report I haue else-where confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattle, and substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of bogges, Forreits, and bryers: (which the deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuentie one yeares had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Ægypt, wee allow twentie yeare: and these summes being added together, to wit one hundred thirte one yeares after the flood, before they arrived at

Babel,

Babel, 40. yeares for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Egypt, and settling there, make vp the summe of 191 yeares: at which time we find that Cham began his reigne in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. yeares if we adde the 161. yeares of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the yeare of Abrahams birth, which was An. M. d. 352. And heere to omitting manie other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue beene verie short, and not containing in the whole summe of their severall times about 161. yeares: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt haue beene peopled as soone as Babel after the flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinke) must haue beene before the flood. That the arruall at Babel was manie yeares before the plantation of Egypt, after the flood, enough hath beene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the flood, the number of the longliu'd generations betwene Adem and the flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into manie Dynasties, then may this haue beene aswell after the flood, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrey erect such forme of Politie, as had been vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authoritie and power of the Conducter, together with manie other circumstances, did induc or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft times many vnder one king.

The short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not severall races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warrant. For in reiterations of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirm. But this may be said, partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest prooffe, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the government of the Countrey into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, only reseruing the soueraigntie to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vizier. This is confirmed first by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Misraim; and must therefore haue beene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phiceal Captaine of his Hoste; though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his priuate carriage, hee followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not hee the sonne of IERUBBAAL? and ZEBULI is his Officer? Also Isboseth the sonne of Saul, feared Aner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Isab for his crueltie did not punish him, in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite liuing then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne ignenese and pleasure, to haue laied the burthen of government vpon others; and vpon ielousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue charged his Lieutenants often. About all other prooffes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph, Only in the Kings throne will I bee about thee: behold I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt. William, Arch-bishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred eightie, affirms that the like like or verie same forme of government by Viceroyes, was in his time practised in Ægypt, having there been in vse (as he beleu'd) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Ægypt were not Lords of the Countrey, how euer they have been so deemed; but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of ciuile government, but the power of making war and peace, with the whole office and authoritie roall into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Mulene Elbasdech, with the fourme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authoritie as Ioseph was, though farre inferior in wisdome.

To thinke that manie names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the list of the Ægyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Iosephs brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey: Besides, it is not vnlike that the vainglorious Ægyptian Preists would as easily report him a king to posteritie, as ignorant men and frangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of importance, and roiall managing of the State had passed, whilst that the king himselfe intending his quiet had given his office to another. How frangers haue mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of preists do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authoritie, say, Diodorus, that Sejofris was the nineteenth king after Menas, Herodotus, that he was the 33 after Menas: which could not haue been if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many fundic linages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoeuer means a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditarie office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the kings gift, and free choice, that gaue the office. But the Crown roiall alwaies passed by descent, & not by election: which (beside consent of Authors)

30 the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Ægypt for Pharaoh, if the crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaohs children hereby either haue been intralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successour: or injoying their Fathers land, though not his estate, haue beene more mightie then the king: as Land-lords of all Ægypt, and the king himselfe their Tenant. Likewise wee finde in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of PHARAOH; that was to set on his throne: And in Esay it is said of PHARAOH: I am the sonne of the ancient king.

§. IIII.

Of CHAM, and his sonne MIZRAIM, OR OSIRIS.

40 That the succession of kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chemes, now it followeth to shew. Ægypt is called in the Scripture, the land of HAM. That this name is not giuen to it because the posteritie of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Ægypt, were called the land of HAM. Further it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himselfe the eldest borne of Cham, saying, Milhpater Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sauo Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needs be vnderstood of Cham. for this Saturnus Ægyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptus. Likewise the Temple of Hammou not farre from Ægypt doth testifie, that HAM resided in those parts: And St. Hierome in questionibus Hebraicis; is faith, that the Aegyptians themselves did in his daies call their Countrey Han: as in four severall places in the Psalmes this Countrey is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Aegyptians; this Countrey of Egypt was called Chemis, expounds it for Chomis: ut puto (saith he) & Chano Nos sibus, to which also he addeeth out of Isidor, Aegyptum vsg, hodie Aegyptiorum lingua KAM vocari: that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Aegyptians is called KAM. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alledged, which I have already giuen in proofe of the time spent in the 45. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham, should last so long as 161. yeares: considering that Sem liued 600. Arpachbad and Shelah 10 each about 400. But strange it had beene, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there, 19. yeares, and with Beon, Apachmas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glorie of Osiris, Orus, and Sesostrius. Reinecius in his istor. Iulia, placeth Mizraim next, other wise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitye and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reinecius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language Misere. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessarie, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the year of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Strabonius his Berosus, to have begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebas began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie. I can well beleive: assenting so farre to Reinecius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only, according to the severall seats of the kings.

¶ V.

Of the time when OSIRIS reigne ended: and what IACOB came into EGYPT in the time of ORUS the sonne of OSIRIS.

He death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The onely coniecture that I know, is made thus. Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybins, made warre in Nalio, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. year of Baleus king of Affryria: before which yeare he had made many great warres in Egypt, Phanicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and having ended his Aegyptian warres, 40 left the kingdome to Orus. Thus saith Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the Gods (as they were stiled) held the kingdome of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch has much; to which all old Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon infers, that sixe yeares may be allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countreies, after the Aegyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris have bene the 34. of Baleus: when himselfe had reigned 297. yeares. I thinke that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For surely in those daies when commerce was not such as now, but all Nauigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would haue beene required, to the subduing of so many Countreies. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet so would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtlesse) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had bene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israell haue come into Egypt but seven yeares before the death of Osiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleieued. For it was the same king

Diod. Sic. l. 1. s. 1
Plut. de Iside
de Osid.

king who advanced Ioseph, bad him send for his Father, and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the raigne of Orus, cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh year of Iscariel coming into Egypt: we must needs cut off 23. yeares from that number, which Krentzenhemius coniectures his raigne to haue continued: namely seven which he should haue liued after Jacobs coming into Egypt: nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming: and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Orus, yet before Iosephs aduancement.

- 10 Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italie, is said to haue indured 10. yeares: After which proportion we may well giue not only sixe yeares, as Krentzenhemius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far-distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeares, which passed betweene the time of Iosephs being sold into Egypt, vnto his aduancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, and whose daughter he may seeme to haue married, continued all that while chief Steward vnto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to haue been, if so violent alterations had hapned the while in Egypt, as the tyrannous vsurpation of Typhon must needs haue brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Orus, was by him in the beginning of his raigne made his chief Steward: at which time buying Ioseph and finding him a iust man, and one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and vnlucky in the troublesome daies of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further & say, That when the laying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants: then Putiphar Prefit of On, being chief Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, & his iniurious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife: and being old resigned his office of chiefe steward vnto him: who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did fauour the Preists, when he bought the lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not vnlike to the frierly booke of Asenath, Putiphars daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes usually by means: and that Putiphar was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Jacob died: it would seeme a matter not vnprobable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should haue spent 42. yeares after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italie, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian warres considered, & his former enterprises & atchieuements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as the probabilities collected out of the vndisputed truth of Scripture doe confirme it.
- 10 Neuertheless I freely grant that all these profers are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

d. V I.

OF TYPHON, HERCULES ÆGYPTIVS, ORUS, and the two SESOSTRES, successively reigning after MIZRAIM: and of diuers errors about the former SESOSTRES.

- 10 Concerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I finde notice that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. David Angelus aitor giueth three yeares to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is to peremptorie without proof, as if his owne worde were sufficient authoritic, in many points verie questionable, alledging no witness, but as it were saying, Telle meisse: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzenhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did verie soone

vndertake his Fathers reuenge : and was not long in performing it : and that leauing Egypt to his brother, he followed other warres, in the same quarrell, as hath bene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon : yet seeing Auentinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also belieue it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, seuen yeares were spent, how soeuer diuided betwene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seuen yeares after the death of Osiris : forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90. yeares of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus : it seemes that the reigne of Orus lasted 115. yeares. 10

From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeares by our account : who (according to Bernaldus and others,) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the flood to the birth of Abraham _____ 352

From that time to the vocation of Abraham _____ 75

which summe diuers other waies may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeares from the death of Orus : we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Sesostrius or Sesonechosis : who is placed next vnto Orus, by authoritie of the Scholiastes Apollonij : not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Asia : to haue built a flecte of shippes on the red Sea : and so to haue entred into India : likewise with an other flecte on the middle-earth Seas, to haue passed into Europe, and subdued manie Nations. This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Iustine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris : For Iustine placeth Vexoris was more ancient then was Osiris (otherwise Misraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gerar, and gaue it to his daughter : after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and gaue it to his daughter : after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, & Necho sought passage through the land of Israel, when hee made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great king Sesostrius. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, so far as much as he came into India, with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt leaueth it vndecided ; vntill it bee sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that hee himselfe placeth Sesostrius next to Orus : following the Scholiastes Apollonij. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For as Iustine witnesseth, Sesostrius, otherwise Vexoris, made warre on people farre removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Iherusalem. Sesostrius, as Diod. witnesseth, had but 24000. horse : Sesac had 60000 : Sesostrius had 8020. Chariots, Sesac but 1200 : Sesostrius made his expedition for no priuate purpose, but to get a great name : Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose then to succour Ieroboam, and giue him countenance in his new reigne : whom he had fauoured euen against Salomon : therefore Sesostrius must needs haue reigned whilst Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Hierodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menis, or Menis, was next to Orus : because those Historians affirme that hee reigned next after the Gods ; it moueth me nothing. For Osiris did succeed those 15. Gods, namely the twelue greater and three lesser : himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menis. Which name, as also Minas, and Menis, were titles of dignitie : though mistaken by some as proper names, Krentzhemius doth verie probably gather, that Menis was Mercurius Ter-maximus ; the Hebrew word Meni

Men signifying an Arabian man: which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris: who was a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giving good Lawes, and teaching profitable Artes. In prowess and great vndertakings Sesoftris was no whit inferior to Osiris. For he fought victorie not for gaine, but for honour only: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and roiall disposition, leaving them in a manner to their libertie, returned into Aegypt. Soone upon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which he was, being by his owne brother purposely fired: which neuertheless hee is said to haue escaped, and to haue reigned in all thirtie three yeares: after which time hee chose rather to die then to liue: because he fell blinde. Both Hierodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sesoftris left a sonne, whose name was Pheron or Pheranes, who afterwards tooke the name of Sesoftris: but was nothing like to his Father in glorie: for hee shortly fell blinde. The cause of his blindnesse Hierodotus attributes to his assaulting the river Nilus with a iaueline: which tale Diodorus hauing likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps hee tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where expressed: yet so far as Orus the second, (otherwise Busris) who succeeded him, began 14. yeares after that this Sesoftris had been king, it must needs bee that this reigned 14. yeares at least. That Busris began not vntill these 14. yeares at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Busris, to the departure of Israel out of Aegypt plainly shewes, being almost generally agreed vpon, to haue beene 75. yeares. That none came betwene Sesoftris the second and Busris or Orus the second, it stands only vpon probabilities: which are these. After Sesoftris had reigned somewhat, he fell blinde: after certaine yeares hee recouered his sight, as is said: which may haue beene true, but is more like to haue beene a fable: surely the manner of his recouerie as it is set downe, is verie fabulous: namely that by looking vpon a woman, or walking his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his sight againe. As the time of his reigne, before his blindnesse, and when hee was well againe (if euer hee were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeares: so his workes which were great doe much more strongly argue, that his reigne was not verie short. His words are largely set downe by Hierodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may seeme to haue beene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and fluces of Nilus: whom I thinke he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with spades and shouels, then with darts, and iaulins: and by his diligent ouersight of that worke, was like enough to looke both his eye-sight and his peoples loue: whom his Father had verie busily employed in excessive labour about it.

§. VII.

40 OF BUSRIS the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his Successor QUEENE THERMUTIS thatooke vp MOSES out of the water.

50 And herein (if I may presume to cōiecture) Busris, who was afterwards king, is like to haue dealt with him, as Ierobam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Busris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, as it well appeared, by the drudgerie where with he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesoftris, as Ierobam was by Salomon, in the ouersight of those busineses, he had good opportunity to worke his greatnesse with the king by industrie: and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king: as Ierobam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at others: vnlesse he haue either an equal spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he fought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the

Egyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his owne people was verie plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the kings cradie. Now that Orus the 2. or Busris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted tenne moneths is a common opinion of many great & most learned writers: who also think that hereupon grew the fable of Busris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Ex. 1. that the King, who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. I hat Busris was of a new familie, Reneccius doth thus: who also thinks him Author of the bloody edict. Neuerthelesse, true it is, that Busris according to all mens computation, began his reigns 5. yeares after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began: which Bunting thinks to have lasted 87. yeares, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroyes in Egypt was: and how great confidence the kings did put in them: seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, & all the Egyptians for bread; giuing at the same time the best of the land to his owne father & brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread: Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph: what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to have gouerned himself, would giue such trust, and soueraine authoritie: it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, in his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to haue begun, til the death of Sesostris. But whether Busris did vsurpe the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title: or whether Busris were only Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busris did it, vling at first the power of a king, and shortly after the title. Thus of the 122. yeares which passed betwene the beginning of Sesostris his reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent: the 75. which remaine, are to be accounted to Busris or Orus the second, and his children. Busris himselfe reigned 30. yeares, according to Eusebius: whom verie many iudicious authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeares: Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Matris according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Aceneris: and out of Artabanus his Historie Meris: Iosephus calls her both Acenhere, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that the was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenophis, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made & much spoken for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sonnes daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is placed next before Busris or Orus the second by Eusebius and others: but whether he were a king or only a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the neece or grandchilde, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glorie of Sesostris, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was the both daughter, grandchild, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and suruiuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeares. But if she were the daughter of Orus the 2. & sister of Atorris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene THEAMVTIS: and what King it was, under whom MOSES was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

10 SHEE had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eusebius: but his lineage and offspring described by Rameccus. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned 9. years: after whom Cheneres, thought to be his son, reigned 10. and then perished in the red Sea. During the reign of Cheneres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon Io: of which Historie elswhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cheneres (whom some call Accheneres: but all or most do stile Scheres a fighter against God) Acheres reigned 8. years: and then Cheres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeare of Cheres it is said by Euseb. that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Aegypt built

20 Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwife was not vnlkely: viz. That Aegypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: els he could it not haue had two reigning in it at once the later of whom, or his posteritie seemes to haue taken all from Cheres the grand-child of Cheneres. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned 4. yeares after Cheres: and Armesio one after Armais: these two kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to haue bene 5. yeares. His name is called Armenus, otherwife Danaus: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Italia,

30 Telegonus:
Epaphus:

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

40 Aegypt or Rameffes who gaue name to the Countrie, having expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lyneus, married to Hypermetestra. Danaus or Armenus expelled by his brother Aegyptus, after hee had reigned five yeares, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermetestra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephews sons of Epaphus shoul haue occupied the kingdome after Cheres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to haue been borne in the time of Cheneres. But forasmuch as the Historie of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the Father of Danaus & Aegyptus, otherwife called Armenus and Rameffes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the secod, with Cheres the grandchild of Cheneres. And that the posteritie of Telegonus did marrie very young, it appears by the historie of these two brethren, Danaus & Aegyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sons: perhaps, or rather questionless, by diuers women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: How soeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succede Cherres: and (according to Enschius and good Authors approving him) reigned five yeares. Rameses followed, who reigned 68. yeares. This Rameses or Aegyptus is that Armesefmiamum or Armesefmiamus; vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born: and the cruell Ediff made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seems to me the chiefe, if not the only ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go returne to Aegypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee, Mercator heereupon conceives, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moses was borne, and vnder whom he slew the Aegyptians at the 40. yeare of his age: and fled into the wilderness, and there abode for teare: all which Circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameses, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Aegyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in a nage 112. or 113. yeares more ancient than others list him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Themosis (whom Eufscals Amasis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betwene Manetho and Euleb, he findes Moses borne vnder Armesefmiamum: and Israell deliuered in the daies of his sonne Amenaphis. The verie name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharates, of which name one was thought to haue flourished either as 20 a king, or a wife man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, Pharetsis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable workes: yet my allent heerein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Cheneres was the king who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place Exod. 4. all are dead &c. may better be vnderstood of Bufris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, St. Cyrill in his first booke against Julian the Apostata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeares old: Rameses, which was this Armesefmiamum, being then king of Aegypt. After Rameses, Amenaphis reigned 19. yeares: who is thought 30 by Mercator, and perceptibly by Bunting pronounced, to be the king that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and heere to speake of that great deliuerance of Israell out of Aegypt: which for 40 manie great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly ouer-passe.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivrie of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of MOSES birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

It is that the Historie it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this, and other great workes of the Highebb, the different opinions are verie neere as marie, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vines in his annotations vpon S. Augustine citeth manie of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoiata, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: but if he meant the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrary to all storie Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued shee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites or Moabites or Edomites while shee ruled, in verum natura.

A second opinion hee remembreth of Apion, taken from Ptolomie a Preist of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus ruled the Argiues, and Amefis in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Historie the first booke; that Moses was borne while Apis the third king ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Trojan warre, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by manie arguments.

Fiftly, he setteth downe the testimonie of Numerius the Philosopher, whoooke Musaeus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Strapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Gracians; and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris, others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses vir Deo centum. Fiffimus is called Musaeus Indaeorum. Eusebius in his Chronologie, findes that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharaon, which liued at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thmolis: the same perchance which Apion the Grammarian will haue to be Amefis, and elswhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whom Isinachus and Cornelius Tacitus giue the name of Bacchoris. To me it seemeth most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Sphernus or Spherrus, gouerned Assyria; Orthopolis Sicymia; and Crisus the Argiues; that then (Sestaftris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was borne. For if we beleue S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Educit MOSES ex Aegyptio populum Deionissimo tempore Cecropis Athenienium regis: MOSES (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time king of the Athenians.

In this fort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proued. S. August. affirms (as before remembreth) that Moses was borne: Saphrus gouerning Assyria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time.

Now

Aug. 12. c. 11. de ciu. d. 1. 2514

Now Saphrus ruled 20. years; his successor Mamelus 30. years; Sparetus after him 40. years: in whose fourth year Ceoprus began to gouern in Africa: Afcataides followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Affrica, Ortopolis Seyonia, and Crisus Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Ceoprus did when he departed Aegypt), it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yearke of the Affrican Saphrus: for take one year remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirte yeares of Mamelus, and the 40. yeares of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were waisted three yeares of Ceoprus his 50. yeares: then take nine yeares out of the reigne of Afcataides, who was Sparetus succellour; those nine yeares added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Aegypt: and adde these nine yeares to the three yeares of Ceoprus formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeares of Ceoprus his 50: and so it falleth right with S. Augustines words, affirming that towards the end of Ceoprus his time, Moses led the people of Israell out of Aegypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppressed in Aegypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine year before the birth of Moses, and 54. year, or rather more, after Ioseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeares: some of which time, and 80. yeares after, they liued in great seruitude and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters ouer them, to keepe them vnder vish burdeus: and they built the Cities Pithom and Rameses &c. And by crueltie they caused the children of Israell to serue; and made them wearie of their lines, by sore labour in claie and brick, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: euen from 54. yeares, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World, when it had lasted 2370. yeares, to the eightieth year of Moses, and vntill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514, towards the end thereof, according to Codeman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Aegypt, may the better be vnderstood, I thinke it necessarie to speake a few wordes of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Aegypt, mentioned in this storie, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

This Citie which the Hebrewes call Zaan, was built seuen yeares after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie, the Septuagint, Tanis, Iosephus Protaidis after the name of an Aegyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thamis, Hegesippus Thamnia; and William Tyrinus, Tapis. It adioineth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, where in Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching againt the Aegyptian and Tersibis idolatric.

Zaan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Aegypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnlikely to be the same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham read Astronomie in Helopolis or On, to Pharates King of Aegypt. Alex. Polyhistor out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise: saying, that Abraham instructed the Aegyptian Priests, and not the king; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zaan write Helopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, ianius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomee Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Aegypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelusion. And it may it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the river Trajan, was the same which Vatablus, and our Englisb call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge: the same which Pomp. Metel, and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrus in the Holie warre, Malbec; the Arabians Babalbeth; and Sencon Seth, Jons Salis. Of this Heliopolis or On, was Putiphir Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the territorie adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he liued in Agypt. In the confines of this Citie, Omas the high Priest of the Jewes built a Temple, dedicated to the eternal God; not much inferior to that of Iherusalem (Ptolomee Philopater then gouerning in Agypt) which stood to the time of Resposian, 333. yeares after the foundation by Omas, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, heerein to haue fulfilled a prophetic of Esaie. c. 19. In die illa erit altare Domini in medio terra Agypti. In that day shall the altar of the Lord be in the midst of the land of Agypt. Antiochus Epiphaneas at that time of the building tyrannising ouer the Jewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Agypt. Lastly, there it was, that our Saviour Christ Iesus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Marie feared the violence of Herod: neare which (saith Brocherard) the fountaine is still found, called Iesus Well, whose streames doe alterward water the gardens of Belshammun, no where else found in Agypt. And hereof see more in Brocherard in his description of Agypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembered by Esaie and Ezechiel; the same which Hofea the prophet calleth Moph; which latter name it took from a mountain adjoining, so called, which mountaine Herodotus remembereth. And this is that great Citie, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Ascar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalensis, Mizraim.

Pelufium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our Englisb write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrus witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. (saith Tyrus) quae olim dicta est Pelufium, Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelufium.

The Citie of Nob, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Agypt. Hierome conuerts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Bubastus, for so Iherome and Ziegler write it, is the same which the Hebrews call Pibeseth.

To make the storie the more perceivable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zaan, Heliopolis or Bethsemes, Balsaphon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desertes of Arabia the Stonie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what we read, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions do. In which respect I am druen to digresse in manie places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authoritie, after many others more ancient, that great learned man Arius Montanus; who in his Preface to the Storie of the Holie land, hath these words. Si enim absq[ue] locorum obseruatione res gestae uarentur, aut sine Topographia cognitioe historia legantur, adeo confusa et perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit. If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficultie.

BVt to returne to the storie it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slaucerie, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented poeury, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Asaphora & Thina, women the most famous and expert amongst them, quaesprasant. (saith Comestor) multitudinis obstetricum, who had command given them ouer all midwives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the midwives of Ægypt together, had bene a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrewes, or of the Ægyptians, it is diuersly disputed. St. Augustine calls them Hebrewes, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Ægypt commanded the midwives of the Hebrew women &c. But Iosephus, Abulensis, and Pereus beleeue them to be Ægyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickednesse of the Ægyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding those women filled with pietie, and the feare of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, of howsoever, to destitoe all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom he might haue assured, by assording them the iustice, which euery king oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might haue employed or sent awaie at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, that it was prophetically deliuered him by an Ægyptian Priest, that among the Hebrewes there should bee borne a child; who growing to mans estate should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a mean, contrarie to the laws of Heaven and of nature) he stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdom of Christ, as if it should haue bene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future success, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fifth of Exodus. Come, let vs wake wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there bee warre, they ioineth themselves also into our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But wee see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdomes of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they relye on the inuentions of their owne most feeble; and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearely beloved daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods meruailous workes taken out of Nilus, being therein turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princeesse hauing beheld the child his forme and beautie, though but yet in the blouth, so perceived her compassion, as she did not only preferue it, and cause it to be fostered; but so commanded that it should bee esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memorie that it was her deede, shee called the child Moses, as it were, extractus, or creptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glycus, Moy, a voice exprelling water, and hise, as much to say, as that that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before he was put into the Arke of Reedes, and that Amram, his father, had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care and at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the moit understanding taught and instructed. quem regio more educavit, praeceptis et sapientibus Aegyptiorum Magistris, a quibus eruditus, fuit Basil; Puto whom saepe Gae Prince- Phil. de vita Mosi. lie education, appointing over him wise Masters of the Aegyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Aegyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the Icutenth of the Aits confirmeth. And MOSES was learned in all the wisdom of the Aegyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, we have added, betwene the death of Moses, and the raigne of Iosua.

hen Moses was growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus tell vs of ten years warre that he made against the Aethiopians: of the belieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses called Meroe; and how he recovered that Citie by the favour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Aethiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Comestor a pretie tale of Moses. How after the end of that warre, Tharbis resisting his returne into Aegypt, Moses, most skilfull in Astronomie, caused two Images to be engraven in two pretious stones: whereof the one encreased memorie; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after shee had awhile worn, shee beganne to neglect the loue shee bare her husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Aegypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. year of Moses age, when he beheld an Aegyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Aethiopes, moved by compassion in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Aegyptian. Soone after which act, finding a disposition in some of his owne Nation to accuse him, for whose defence hee had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduise of God, whose chosen servant hee was, hee fled into Arabia Petraea, the next bordering Countrie to Aegypt; where wandring all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place unknowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Aethiopes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldie means) to make the watering of a few sheepe, and the alighting of the Daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrie nearest Aegypt; fittest to returne from: necessarie to be knowne, because interjacent betwene Aegypt and Iudea, through which he was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best served. And lastly, where the glorie of the world shined least, amidst mountaintous Deserts, there the glorie of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble sheepe-herd, sitting at a mountaine foote; a keeper and commander of those poore beasts only.

In that part of Arabia, neare Midian, he consumed 40. yeares. And thought (as Philo Philo in the storie of Moses life obstrueth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge, yet in that solitarie Desert he enjoyed himselfe: and being separate from the praise of the world, and the troublesome affaires thereof, he gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his yonger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also judging that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principalltie, which he afterward obtained. Eti cum (saith Patrio) ori Pastoralis, quasi per aliditum ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, egregium mansuetissimi. Quae maiusmodum bello castigenia praerexerunt seminationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis praebentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero profectura mansueti pecoris, habet quidam simile cum regno in subditis; ideò, Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumelia sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introduction exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Euen as warlike naturies doe before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the gouernement of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subiects; therefore, Kings are stiled sheep-headers of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob; as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither darè I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses, while he liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the bookes of Genesis; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iob's patience hee might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their deliuerie from the Egyptian slauierie, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of his calling backe into Aegypt by the Angell of God, and the meruailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to persuade Pharaoh, that hee was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name he should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent, he receiued from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euer-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest; and in his second, to be vnderstood by all: For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the eternall; which truly is; which is aboue all, which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment; neuer continuing at one stilly, nor being the same so long, as while one may say Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in euery shortest peece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one stite. *Veritas Dei & sola natura, quae uere est: id enim quod subsistit non habet diuinitatem, sed suam est. Terra quae creata fuit, etiam si uidentur esse non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & patet rursum non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not being, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: *Tota rerum natura ueritas est, aut inanis, aut fallax: The whole nature of things is but shadow, either empty or deceiuefull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse then nothing, and vanitie.

Of the ten plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing changing the Rivers into blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their forefathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the waters say, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast: and holst, because thou hast iudged at these things; for they shed the blood of the Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou giuen them blood to drinke. c. 16. v. 6

The rest of the plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps; by the death of their Cattaile; by leoprous scabbes; by haile and fire; by Grasshoppers; by darknesse; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moued the hardned heart of the vnbeleuing King no longer, then the paine and perill lasted, till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherin we remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition: whereas before, hee first yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reseruing their bestiall; but hee was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their owne, but with a part of the silver, gold, and jewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being past) he suddainly repented him, as his pursuit after them proued. For when eery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses received) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Passouer, (a Sacrament of the most cleane and vnspotted Sauiour) and with the blood thereof coloured the poste and linterne of the doores; the Angell of God in the dead of the night smote eery first-borne of Egypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the begger and slau: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites vsed after the Passouer; ascribing an exceeding vertue to the red colour: and therefore they did not only marke their sheepe and cattell, but their trees bearing fruit, to preferue them from lightning and other harmes.

 §. V.
 OF PHARAOHS pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

NOW, when the people were removed; and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) hee bethought him awell of the honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many calamities and plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despight of himselfe. And hauing before this time great companies of 40 souldiers in readinesse, hee consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the thortest and fairest passage was through the Countrie of the Philistims. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, hee suspected that Moses meant to hide some other outlet, to wit, through the Desert of Ethiops; and there, because the Countrie was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of women, children, and entraille, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to cleare him that way. In the meane while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines over them; he determined to set vpon them in the plaines of Gosen, which way sooner they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with brode and sharpe hookes on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines vsed against the Romans, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Armie of Pharaoh, Iosephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Inf. ant. l. 2. c. 6. horse, horse, and 20000. foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things, either that the Hebrewes might ioyne themselves to his enemies within the Land, or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, yet by the wordes of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt: which could not be done in haile. For Moses made but three daies march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to drue their cattell and sheepe with them, peised with a world of women and children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that he went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his enterprises: so he lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vising the vnderstanding which God had given him, he left nothing vnperformed, becoming a naturall wise man, a valiant and a skillfull conductor; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

Exod. 14. 7.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after hee had warned Israel of the Passouer, he appointed a generall Assemblies or Rendezvous of all the Hebrewes at Ramses, in the Territorie of Gosen; a Citie standing indifferent to relieue from all others parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that every familie should bring with them such store as they had, of Dow and Paste, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was vtterly vnprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites went vp armed) hee marched from Ramses Eastward, towards the Deserts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account, as the first Moneth of the year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to beginne their year in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rite of their forefathers, it is vn certaine. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politike year, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vs. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, vnto the beginning, middest, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politike year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of daies in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their year, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in fourtie yeares space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publike, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I doe not finde. Now because time and motion beginne together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew year: with the difference betwene them and other Nations, in ordering the account of time.

20 VE Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, some yeares, vnto the other twelue, to make the Solarie and Lunarie yeares agree; which (besides the generall inconuenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Sommer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine precept. For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeare, and withall on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not haue so bene kept, if either the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe bene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeare.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driuen in like manner to make their yeares vnequall, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more daies, as the error committed in foregoing yeares required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yeare. For though by the continuall course of the Sunne, causing Sommer and Winter duly to succcede each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most fawgall of all people, when a yeare hath passed ouer them; yet the necessitie of ordinarie occurrences, that are to be numbered by a shorter talie, makes this long measure of whole yeares insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affaires. Therefore men obserued the monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeare into twelue parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. daies and nights, and those againe into their quarters and hours. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexitie in the vnderstanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by eleuen daies or thereabout, than the yearelie course of the Sunne, through the Zodiack, in the space of sixteene yeares, euery Moneth was found in the quite contrarie part of the yeare, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeare, making it to consist of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sunne and Moone to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yearelie reuolution by any set number of whole daies; neither did the Moone change alwaies at one hour; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be observed by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule. Here by much wisdom and deepe art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at random, the Athenians held the yeare to containe 360. daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Gracian yeare (besides many collateral proofes) it is manifest by that which Plinie directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (saith he) 360. whilest as yet the yeare exceeded not that number of daies. By this account neither did any certaine age of the Moone beginne or end their Moneths, neither could their Moneths continue many yeares, in their owne places: but mult needs be shifted by little and little, from Winter to Sommer, and from Sommer to Winter, as the daies forgotten, to be inserted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupie their owne roomes in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnitie of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Hecatombæon (which answereth in a manner to our June;) they were carefull to take order, that this moneth might ever beginne with the new Moone, which they effected by adding some two daies to the last moneth of every yeare: those games being held once in four yeares. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeare, which was the second of the moneth Badromian; (agreeing nearly with our August;) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it into the fourth Lunatic yeare, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their moneth of June would every yeare haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keepe all vpright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeare one whole moneth, which they called the second Pofidon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. and so successfullly through the whole yeare. Thus with much labour they kept their yeare as neare as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but these marks which they obserued, were found at length to be deceiuefull guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeares intercalation, that it should not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good methode, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeares intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeares, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeare, as in the 19. yeare before past thee had done. This inuention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in golden letters, being called the golden number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were aoided the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had beene vsed; for by the intercalation of 7. months in the 19. yeares, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one yeare could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeares; and afterwards Hipparchus, a noble Astronomer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obseruations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Cesar made, who by aduise of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heauenlie bodies, reduced the yeare vnto the forme which is now in vse with vs, containing 365. daies and fixe houres, which houres in foure yeares make

vp one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year; the 24. of Februarie. The correction of the Julian year by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anna Domin. 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeede, but as a note added vnto the worke of Cæsar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anna Dom. 324. entred the Aequinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the year 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie brooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that in steade of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moueable F falls depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were a 10 gaine celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had bene. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in every hundredth year, the leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred; because the Sunne doth not in his yearlie course take vp full fixe houres aboue the 365. daies; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. years make about 3. whole daies.

But the Cycle of 19. years, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neither did neede any nice curiologie of houres, minutes, and other lesser fractions to helpe it; neither did in summing vp the daies of the whole year, neglect the daies of the Moone, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fell out so, that 20 alwaies the Kalends or first day of the month was at the new Moone, and because that day was festiuall, they were very carefull awell to obserue the short year of the Moone, passing through all the 12. signes in one month, as that longer of the Sunne, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue to Nisan their first month, which is about our March or April, 30. daies; to Iar their second month 29. daies; and so successfully 30. to one, 29. to another. Herby it came to passe, that euery two months of theirs contained somewhat euenly two revolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. daies, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bellowed among the superfluous or Epaet daies, which made vp 7. months in 19. years; to 6. of which 7.

30 were commonly giuen 30. daies to one of them 29. daies, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the feeral daies of each month) contained 354. daies, which faile of the year, wherein the Sunne finisheth his course, 11. whole daies, with some fractions of time. But these daies, and other broken peeces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. years were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the same day of the year, month and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had bene at the beginning of it 19. years before.

Diuers have diuersly set downe the forme of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. Siganus tells vs, that euery second year they did adde a month of 22. daies, euery fourth year a month of 23. in the regard of 11. Sig. de reg. Hebr. 13. ca.

40 daies and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a year of the Sunne. But herein Siganus was very much deceived. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. daies: and therefore to haue added so many daies to the end of the year, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the months in the years following, which could not haue begunne as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that euery third year, or second year, as neede required, they did intercalate one month, adding it at the yeares end vnto the other 12. This I beleue to haue been true; but in which of the yeares the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they do not probably deliuer, who keepe all faste from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. years. For (to omit such as erre grossly) some there are who say, that after three years, when besides the daies spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. daies are left remaining, that is, 11. daies of each year; then did the Hebrewes adde a month of 30. daies; keeping three daies, as it were in plussage quo remanent

vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth year; at which time, besides the intercalarie moneth, remained fixe daies, namely three summounting that moneth, and the Epact of three yeares, besides the three formerly referred. Thus they goe on to the 18. year; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeare make vp a moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalared at the end of the Cycle makes all euen.

Whether this were the practise, I can neither affirme nor denie; yet surely it must needes haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeare euery moneth were removed from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeare and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnaoidable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of intercalation in the 8. yeare. For the 6. daies remaining after the 2. former intercalations made in the 2^d and 6th yeares, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7th and 8th yeares, doe fitly serue to make vp a moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeede it helps to make the yeares ensuing varie the lesse from the proper season of euery moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and Yeares, by which they guided their accompts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of ISRAEL from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers waies leading out of Ægypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recover the mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse then to goe out that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompass'd, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight mile. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of aboue a Million, if not two millions of soules, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundrie sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desert and high mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should haue ouer-taken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words. They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East side of the land of Gosen, or Ramefes: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrewes kept the mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the horse and chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the all-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wif, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glorie of his deliuerance and victorie to almightie God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to call the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day

It is probable that all those Ægyptians & others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

day he marched with a double pace from Eithon towards the Valley of Pihacherath, 16. mile distant; and fate downe betwene two ledges of mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea; to wit, the mountaines of Eithon on the North, and Balzephon towards the South: the fame which osorius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagrus noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as Dominus speculae, sine custodia, Lord of the watch tower. For the Aegyptians beleued, or at least made their slaves beleue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Aegyptians had Gods for their

Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage up and downe, than that it is any proper name.

10 Aegyptij Dys fauendi; The Aegyptians were fruitful in Gods, saith S. Hierome. But Moses who incamped at the foot of this mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower alleepe, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Aegypt into Arabia vpon the firme land Moses refused, as well that of Pelusion and Casotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judas, as the other by Eithon; from which he reflected, for the reasons before rememberd, and tooke the way by the valley of Pihacherath, between the mountaines, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharao made so great speede with his horsemen and chariots, as hee gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gat fight of them, and they of him, euen at the very bricke and wath of the Sea: inlomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with *Pharao*s sudden approach beganne to despaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And Eare, which, saith the booke of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours which redemptio offereth, made them both despaire in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

§. VIII.

Of their passage ouer, the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

BVt Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnes, who hath neuer abandoned those that assuredly trust in him; vning this comfortable and resolu'd speech. Feare not, etc. for the Aegyptians whom ye haue seene this day, ye shall neuer see them againe. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses calling on God for succour, receiued encouragement, and commandment to go on, in these wordes. Wherefore criest thou vnto me: speake vnto the children of Israel that they see forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it, and let the children of Israel goe on drie ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands vncouered, pass on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere hee entered the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Exod. 14. v. 13.

Exod. 14. v. 16.

Pharao followed him euen at the heeles, finding the same drie ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written, The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, remoued, and went behinde them: also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behynd them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministerie of his Angell, to interpose his defence between the Hebrewes and their enemies s to the end that the Aegyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmefull speede. But in the morning watch Moses seised the other banke of Arabia side: and Pharao (as the dawne of day beganne to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Exod. 14. v. 17. Seas returne, halted himself: towards his owne coast: but MOSES stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is; the Sea moved by the power of God, ranne backe towards the land with vrefeatable furie and swiftnesse, and overwhelmed the whole Armie of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, that is; when the waters began to couer the sands, the Aegyptians being stricken with feare of death, ranne one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had pait on after the Hebrewes, their wheels stucke fast in the mudd and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lyranus vpon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of 10 the Hebrewes, conceiued, that after Moses had by the power of God diuided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israell were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the aduenture, and that therefore was that Tribe euer after honoured aboue the rest, according to the prophetic of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers finnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Hosee condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Desert, and, as we now call it, led the Vanguard; (wherevpon it may be inferred, that hee also led the way through the Red Sea;) yet that Moses himselfe was the conductor of Israell at that time, it is generally receiued. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalme; Thou didst lead thy people like sleepe by the hand of 20 MOSES and AARON.

The Hebrewes haue also another fancie, that the Red Sea was diuided into 12. parts, and that euery Tribe pait ouer in a path apart, becaue it is written in the 135. Psalme, according to the Vulgar, Disiit mare rubrum in diuisiones; Hee diuided the Red Sea in diuisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene field or pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulenfis, and Genebrard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not 12. pillars, nor 12. armies of the Aegyptians. It is written in the 77. Psalme. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy waies; and in the last of the booke of Wisdomme, uof. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses pait, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chenchres, perished in the 16. years of his raigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea; though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke notheth, and our selues know by experience, it is of a blewh colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait betweene Arabia the Happie and Aethiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolome calleth Possidium, to the other land of Aethiopia, hath not aboue fixe leagues in breadth: and the same also filled euery where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. leagues from coast to coast: and it runneth vp betweene Arabia the Happie, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Aethiopia and Aegypt on the other, as farr as Sues, the vttermoest end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his flecte of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses pait, is called Heropolites of the Citie Hera, sometime Troy: and of later times Sues. Plinie calls it Cambisu, by which name it was knowne, faith he, before it was called Hera many years. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Eleniticum: King Iuba Lamiticum: others more properly Eleniticum, of the Port and Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolome Elana: Plinie Lana, and Marius Niger Aila: there is also Ilalab in Assyria, to which Salmanasser carried the Israelites: captiue Kings 2. c. 8. 11. which Ilalab in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the first of Chren. the 5. Ala. But as for this red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuerly named, the Moores and Arabians (Vassals of the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of Alahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraem: of a King called Erythras, or Erythrasus: and becaue Erythras

Curtius* coniectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirme. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discourse of that Sea in the yeare 1544. performed by Steuens Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Custro, a principall commander vnder Gama (which discourse I gaue Mr. Richard Hoeluis to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalagua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25 leagues, and 12. in breadth, the earth, sands, and cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Custro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall latitude, to 27 (which make in length of coast 180. mile, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sunne beames, giue a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest flore of Corrall growes, which is carried into most parts of Eurape, and elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red trees, saith Strabo, and those growing vnder water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shadowes of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which walseth the banks of Madian or Madian, is for 16. or 17. leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three leagues or nine English mile ouer, and from this Port of Toro, to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. leagues, of which the first 26. haue 30 nine miles breadth: as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Aegypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and straighten it so fast, as for sixe miles together it is not about three mile ouer; from thence vppward the land on Aegypt side, filleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Cune for some ten miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer against Elana or Toro; but without iudgement: for from Ramses to Pihacheroth and Balzephon, there is not about 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three daies: and betwene the land of Aegypt oppositeto Elana or Toro, the distance is about 80. miles. For Ramses to which Citie Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharao at Zaan, and tooke his last leaue, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrionall Latitude: and Widdoll, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foote of the mountaine Climax, or Balzephon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of sixe and thirtie English mile: the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

T

He Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue objected that Moses past ouer the red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tide, and that Pharao conducted more by furie then discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recouer the coast of Egypt, he was ouertaken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances, For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authoritie to men that beleue not therein perswadeth nothing) I say that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from above or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses, and the children of Israel than ordinarie and casuall, then could not Pharao and all his armie haue perished in that pursuit.

pl.

For where soeuer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the land: and runne downward towards the Ocean: leauing all that part towards the land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to bee drie land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Migdol vnder Balscephon (if hee had taken the aduantage and opportunitie of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by filling a way of the water, ten or twelue mile farther into the Sea then Sues, much more was it made at Sues, and betweene it and where Moses past: who entered the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleue or Strait, had beene by the ebbe of a spring-tide discovered, when Pharao found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tide, on his right hand: and so taken ground againe at the end of that sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrarie, that is, That the sea did not fall away from the land, as naturallly it doth; but that Moses past on betweene two seas: and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, proue the cause to haue beene a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong east-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that sea doth not lie East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-winde blew athwart the sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South, and maine body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnknowne to Pharao: while he was cheeke by that sea, which vsed in all times before to ebbe away: the flood preth him and ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Ioseph vsa auoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent iudgement generally, but also to great a Captaine, as he ouerthrew the Ethiopiens in many battels, being imploied by Pharao, and wan diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grossenesse, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a mountainous passage at hand, (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which hee would there winne vpon Pharao) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water.

For

For hee knew not the contrarie, but that Pharao might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding *Pharao*s approach, cried out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their succour: and when Moses praised vnto God for helpe, he was answered by God: *Wherefore criest thou vnto me: speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and divide it: which proues that there was not at the time of Pharao's approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperic and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the sands discovered themselues betwene the sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued nor, and the sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters fo defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path; nor that the waters stood vpright as walls doe, as some of the Schoolemen haue fancied. For had Pharao and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharao and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and refluxes of the sea, in his owne Countrey, on his owne coast, and in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens, and wherein his people hauing had fo many hundreds of yeares experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerful hand only; which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discern it comming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Armie of the Egyptians had bene ouertaken by the ordinarie returne of the floud, before they could recouer their owne coast; their bodies drowned would haue bene carried with the floud which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that sea, and not haue bene cast ashore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the sea-banke ouer against Bealesephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinarie floud would haue carried them: Which floud doth not any where crosse the Channell, and runne athwart it, as it must haue done from Egypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the Egyptians bodies there; but it keeps the naturall course towards the end of that sea: and to which their carcases should haue bene carried, if the worke had not bene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which staid in the Countrey, and did not follow Pharao in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were buied at the time of *Pharao*s destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden made a God of that Plant or Roote, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be giuen elswhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans tells vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeares after Christ, the prints of *Pharao*s Chariot wheeles were to be seene at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But hereof I leaue euery man to his owne beleeft.*

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I can not affirm. And yet the fardite of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelve Fountaines, could hardly be left vnpeopled. Wilhelm, Arch-Bishop of Tyre, in his Historie of the Holy War, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And at such time as Balaam the first pait that way into Egypt, ingressus (saith he) Helim, Civitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum pervenisset, loci illius incola, Regis athenia prae cognito, nuntulans ingredientis in mare rubrum se contulerant Entering Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne sometime to the people of Israel: whither, when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boate, and suffred themselves into the Sea, lying near them. From Elm hee returned againe towards the South, and fate downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seventh Manzion. For it cometh that he had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to retit his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Iebreues, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the minds of the rest, who encountering with the least miserie, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which every where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vnder- take or sustaine so dangerous an enemy: hee therefore made stay at this Manzion, until the fifteenth of the second Moneth called Zin, or Iar: and made the eight 10 Manzion in the Desert of Zin; where the children of Israel mutinied against Moses the third time, having want of foode. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elm to the red Sea, but in the collection of every feuerall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set downe.

Here it pleased God to send fo many fighs of Quales, as all the Countrie about their incamping was couered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattle, and Sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feede themselves with many of those: but referued them both for the milke to releue the children withall: and for breede to store themselves when they came to the land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie mile: the one to Daphet, the other to Alua, distant from Raphidim sixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beafts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessarie want, and to vndergoe the hazzards and trauals which every manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God and their owne freedoms. But of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and IETHROES coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

40 Moses with the same rood which hee diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satis- fied:

And while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesied that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrey (which being barren of it selfe, would bee viterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattle) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at

Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man infebled them. On the other side Moses perceiuing their resolutions, gaue charge to Ishua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to encounter Amalech. Betweene whom and Israel, the victorie remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God bene of farre greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcitie of fooode, and those minds whom a feruile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaird in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought againe to hazard themselves:

After this victorie Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till he had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exodus, v. 1. When IETHRO the Priest of Madian, MOSES Father in Law; heard all that God had done for MOSES; &c. of which, the last deede, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Judges, and other Officers, ouer Israel; being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of 30 people, full of discontentment and private controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges v. 11. & 17. it is made manifest; where it is written. Now HEBER the Kenite, which was of the children of HOBAB, to wit, the sonne of IETHRO, the father in law of MOSES, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, least he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites. Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocks. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giueth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the sixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they defended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they receiued from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Madian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them Idolaters) haue made Iethros Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these; who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chui. For in the fiftenth of Genes. vers. nineteenth these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated them selves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembered, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Israhel, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Kadish, Againe, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better judgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

10 And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into six Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neare the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zipora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to have beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israhel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petra, were by Israhel rooted out, when those adjoyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Iethro was 20 Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrarie is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israhelites, as farre backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his wifes kindred inhabited: seeing himselfe comming with 60000. able men, was encountered by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himselfe and Israhel had wandred 40. yeare.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel; and our English Reuel; Exod. 2. 18. calls him Iethro, or Iothor, Exod. 3. & v. 1. & 4. v. 18. & 30. & 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. & 12. and in Numbers c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given: with diuers commendations of the invention of Lawes;

40 THE rest of the moneths of this ycare 2515. were spent in the Desert of Sinai, neare the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Manfion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 16 it is written Sinai. In the 100. Psalme v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 19. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so is it in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the 2. of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. Which bearest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: who in the ycare 1588 658 passeth out of Aegypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Funet of France, and trauielled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adjoyning: where he found two Menseries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent

P. u. M. l. h. a.

excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neare Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he camped there about almost a yeare, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the waters, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where he staid a whole yeare, wanting some ten or twelue daies: for he removed not till the 20. day of the second month of the second yeare; and he arriued about the 45 day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and vie thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the storie any way disioyned, he may turne ouer a few leaues, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfulllest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouerne that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternal law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very liues of euery estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eie without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what he hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue.

This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as Gods, or as the sonnes of Gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritic for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedaemonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedaemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIII. Lex, ius, iustitia, et ratio

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

The word Lex, of Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and so in an indifferent sense vsed. For if we consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammer, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees doe also vsurpe that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Ely, Woe vnto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vsed for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call laws, though euill and vn sufficient. Mala lex est, que tumultuarie posita est; It is an ill law that is made tumultuouly. So as all ordinances, good or euill, are called by the name of laws.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their pattene and platforme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem sensum, is to be vnderstood. For every law is a kinde of pattene of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as * elsewhere, * Gen. 5. 12 this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in St. Paul to the Romanes it is called a Law. But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my minde, and leading me captive vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometime called Laves, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternal; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

20 All private contracts among Merchants and other Tradefmen, doe often put on the name of laws. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a public rule, prescribing anecessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniuriae, are by Thomas called violentiae magis quam leges, rather compulsions then laves: And whatsoever is not just, Saint Augustine doth not allow for laws, howeouer established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, que nec iura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The vnjust constitutions of men which are neither to be termed nor thought laves. For saith ARISTOTLE, Legalia iusta sunt factitia, & conseruata felicitatis; Iust laves are the workers and preseruers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, i.e. a quiet life, according to Cicero. Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, saith Plato, is God and his worship. Finis legis Deus & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines a legendo, or a legendo, of reading or binding: Leges quia lectae debent, & ad populam latae, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Ety-mologie, a legando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confergerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula; they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalme, dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus a nobis sines ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands

40 in sunder, and cast away their cordes from vs.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselves vnto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vie the word διαθηκη, a Testament or last will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator, for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomus of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The rainge of the law, is the rainge of God.

50 Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vita regula, praecipiens que sunt sequenda, & que fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow and what to shunne, or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queene or Princeesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of inescapable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index sui & curui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the Iudge and measure of right and wrong.

Mr. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen actum & voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Civile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Ius and Fas: whereof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goeouer an other mans field, is permitted by Gods law, not by mans: and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vied both those words: as Fas & iura sinunt: God and Men permit.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the old substantiue Nowne iusus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke ἴω, which is the name of Iupiter: or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis: because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that Ius-in-an-dum came of Iouis-in-an-dum (for so we finde it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum Iehona) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quis Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents the Magistrates; he is the pronouncer and exequutor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, iustus iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternall.

BVt because lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leauing the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aeterna est aeterna divina sapientia conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso praecogitatum; The eternall law is the eternall concept of Gods wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknowne by himselfe. Or Lex aeterna est summa atq. aeterna ratio divina sapientia: quatenus res omnes ad definitos fines ita dirigit, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis asserat; It is the high and eternall reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessitie according to their severall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called providence: but as it imposeth a necessitie according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a delicto auocans: qua non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente divina: quamolrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum ratio est reita summi Iouis; That perfect reason and nature of things encouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith he) then beginne to be a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true law and a fit Primocess to commend and forbid is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as Gods) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers objects, so the reason of man finds it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarie, as the motions of the heauens, stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men; another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and providence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely, as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a streame from this fountaine.

The Law humane or temporall is also thence drawne: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impeditio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only boroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subjected: as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether necessarie or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall; and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall, and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Directour: as Praise him all ye his Angels: praise ye him Sinne and Moone, all bright Starres: heauen of heuens, for he hath established them for euer and euer. Hee hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all depths: Fire, and baile, snow, and vapours, stormie winds, which execute his Word: mountains, and hills: fruitful trees and all Cedars: Bees, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glorie and felicitie propofed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselves, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it: without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end propofed. For beafts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heauie to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoeuer is appofed. kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference vsed in termes only; it being no other then Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: soare all things which appeare in themselves, thence deriued: thence vnder subiected: thence-from by his eternal law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and obiect of the eternal law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetite, to conduct them: so is the obiect and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to St. AVGVSTINE, Lex eterna est, quia in sum est, et omnia sunt ordinatissima; The law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternal law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which St. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-will the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Pedagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired: which time of expiration some thinke our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Crosse hee said, Consummatus est. But I rather thinke these words of our Saviour to haue no other signification, then that now the prophetic of their giuing him Vineger to drinke was fulfilled. For so St. Iohn expounds it, when he saith v. 28. *That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this all might be fulfilled, said I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Iewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospell of Christ.* For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe: but the things prescribed change according to this eternal ordinance; of which the Wisedome of SALOMON. And being one shee can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

IF the law of Nature as it is taken in general, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternal law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura. VLPRIAN defines the natural law to be the same which nature hath taught all liuing creatures; ius naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Ius istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quae terram a mari, nascuntur, animam quoque commane est; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures: aswell to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not general, but of the natural law in things of life.

The law of nature in general, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formal qualitie, which God in his eternal providence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in men, enlightning our formal reason: so is it more then sense in beasts: and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flie from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulls and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogs: and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from from the other, yea though by them scarce scene before, and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it fense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of Indis to make their nests on the smallest twigs which hang ouer Riuers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to saue their egges and yong ones from the Monkeys, and other beasts, whose weight such a twig will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not beare any fruit except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that law which the infinite and vnsearchable wisdom of God, had in all eternitie provided for them, and for every nature created. In man this law is double: corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassal to passions, and affections brutall, and incorrupt where time and custom hath bred in man a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the law of Nature incorrupt, which St. Augustine calleth the law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the laws of Lycargus it was permitted to men to vse one an others wife, and to the women to choofe thm others besides their husbands, to beget them with child: which law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to burie with them the best beloued wies: as also they haue many other customes remembered by G. Valentinus, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authentic it is that these laws some men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selues by another mans destruction: that iniurie is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we feare: and the like. For taking the definition of naturall lawes, either out of St. Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light; the other, the dictate or sentence of practique reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, then to the exercise of Iustice and vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which wee would bee content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the law of nature to the munde, as the eie is to the bodie; and that which according to Dauid the weath vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the law increased and eternall. For without any law written the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrarye, we prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith S. PAVL) which haue not the Law, doe by nature these things containe in the law: they haue not the law, are a law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom wee are, and to doe the same right to all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her dwelling place, and habitation. In are alij stima rationis quies habetur; Therefore, the Gentiles (saith S. PAVL) which shew the effects of the law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for witnesses of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law vnto himselfe (while he hopeth to abuse the world by the aduantage of hypocritie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying betraying of his owne soule, by craftie vnrighthouse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth vs not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eie, we cannot hide them: some Garlandes wee may gather in this May-game of the world, sed flouille, dum loquimur, arefit; Those flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selues, and become fearefull witnesses of our secret euils, did that reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept. Nil turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maxime omnium revere teipsum; Commit nothing soule or dishonest, saith he, neither to be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but aboue all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to giue heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is he aptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

Gen. 1.

Ioh. 1. 28.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the budde of the hearbe which seedeth feede, &c. and the Beast, to which liueth thereon. He gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes, the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darknesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Caine perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the reuenge of Men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might bee done vnto him againe. And that this iudgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall law, before the law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. the fourth. If thou doest well shall thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sinne hath as thy dore.

Gen. 1.

The Schoolmen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a volume of this subiect.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habit, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reason: they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and euill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as euill (as of the first to desire to liue, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they diuide it, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to bee thif which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to preferre our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to prouide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable lawes of nature, for the most part. For it needes no prooff, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as

Tom. 2. 94. art. 1.
1 appetitus

man is a being, Ens or Res: fo hee doth desire good, and shunne euill. For it is comon to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Psalme approueth: Religie quidem Bonum desiderant, Quod omnia expectant; Rightly haue some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, wee desire the delights of euery sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut vs with fatiety, nor hurt vs with excess. For as Sense it selfe is for the preservation of life and being: so is it meete, euen by the law of nature, that the sensitiue appetite should not carrie vs to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) wee may well say, that Nature hath giuen diuers lawes vnto them: In which sense the Civilians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to bee the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Yet the Schoolmen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but only a Ius, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of euery Law. For so they distinguish it; where Placian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (saith Valentius) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Nipian also distinguisheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius naturae, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderstand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reason: both in beasts and men; and restraints the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a liuing creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selues: and the lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuisions of this law of nature answering the diuision of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeh: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountain or roote in the naturall or motiue facultie, which is but one, stirring vp to good, and decliming the contrarie: secondly, because all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of obseruation of the law of nature increaseth. Postquam ratio ad perfectum uenit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adueniente mandato peccatum reuocatur: When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by S. PAVL, When the Commandement came, siue reuocet. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by S. PAVL, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not comenient: and againe, that their consciences beare witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to euery particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet it commandeth in generall all good, and whatsoeuer is agreeable to right reason. And therefore, said DAMASCENE; homines scilicet sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrarie to nature: and S. AUGUSTINE, Omne uitium natura nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Euery vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrarie vnto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so strict, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inquality of portions, according to vnequall merit: by by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enioy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of iustice and equitie.

And though the law of nature command, that all things bee restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes this her lawe suffereth to be broken: as to denie a madde man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while hee was sober. But the vniuersall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to St. PAUL, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himselfe.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

FTER the eternall, and naturall, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explanation of the former, hath two kinds: Diuine, and Humane. Again, the diuine positive law is double; the old and new: The old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere whenas Moses and Azazel governed the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Troopus the Argues, Cecrops Africa, and Acherres Aegypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham 430. yeeres. And this, it seemes, was the first written law which the world receiued. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Grecians: no not in Homers time: who liued after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was cast down 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Aegypt. This law, it pleased God to engraine in stone, that it might remaine lasting booke of his expreſt will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, fill the coming of Christ: and that so these children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Aegypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of families might easily without any written law instruct their owne children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had besides the law of Nature, forasmuch as the law of nature did not define all kinds of good, and euill, nor condemn euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authoritie than other to the naturall law; In these respects it was necessarie, tht the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessitie, why the law was written, whereof these are the chief. 40

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of DAVID, The law of the Lord is vnspieled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessarie, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by David it is called vnspieled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the lawes of men, can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of intermall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actioes hominum hominum nulla essent, nisi prius in mente discernentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar laws among sundrie Nations, wee cannot bee assured of; but the law of God bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also said DAVID, That the testimony of the law of God is faithfull giving wisdom to children.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

Now, that in all this long tract of time, betwene the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarchs of the first age receiv'd many precepts from God himselfe, and what former was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliv'ed over by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Iewes afterward called Cabala, or Receptis precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Iewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, referred in the boosomes of their Priests, and unwillfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeede the diuine law recu'aled to the Patriarchs, and from them deliv'ed to the posteritie, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beaſts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding thereason of his owne name Adam of Adamah, Earth, or red clay, hee gaue other names significant, not only to beaſts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruits, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to cohabite with their Wives, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and crueltie was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it felt; it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noah, *An end of all flesh is come before mee: for the earth is filled with crueltie through them: and behold I will destroy them * from the earth.* That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknowne to all that perished: Gods mercie and iustice interposing betweene the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandement God repeated to Noa, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Who so shed mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for on the image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was observed among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as Cursed be Canaan, a seruant of seruants shall he be vnto his brethren. Again, we finde that the vnnatural finne of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree; as with fire from Heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rauishment; was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dims's forcing: and by the judgement which Isa gave against Tamar, That shee should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken: for shee is a mans wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vn-cleane beasts, of Circumcision, of the Brother to raise vp seede to his Brother that left a Widdow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written Law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be said, not only to haue been written in the hearts of men, before it was ingrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue been giuen in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: to euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law; the Angels intuitively; Men by Reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessarie motions, without sense or perception,

Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of MOSES.

Rom. 3. v. 19.

OW as the word (Law) in general, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and re- strain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know whatsoever the law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the law.

Luc. 24. 44.

When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophecs; and Psalmes, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so Saint Luke hath distinguished them; All must bee fulfilled which are written of mee in the Law, in the Prophecs, and in the Psalmes.

Rom. 3. 28.

When it is opposed to the Gospell, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by faith without the workes of the Law.

Rom. 6. 4.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremite of law, and summus ius: as, For ye are not vnder the law, but vnder grace.

Gal. 3. 12.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the ceremonies or figures are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadowes and figures; as, The law was giuen by MOSES; but grace and truth came by IESVS CHRIST.

Gal. 3. 23.

Luc. 16. 6.

Heb. 7. 12.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ comming, it signifieth the whole policie of the Iewes Common-wealth; as, Before faith came, wee were kept vnder the Law, &c. or the law of the order and institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophecs, and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied vnto Iohn. And if the Priesthood bee changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs bee changed.

Rom. 8. 3.

Rom. 7. 12.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constringing force; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the Law of the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the Written Law of MOSES, or the Lawe of the Old Testament, of which wee now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first pur into the the mindes of men by God; and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Justice, promising eternall life conditionally; that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For according to Saint James, Whosoever shall keepe the whole, and faile in one point, is guiltie of all. The definition vsed by the Schoolmen, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium vsq; apte peruenit ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, qua est ultimus humanae uitae finis; The diuine law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessarie meane, whereby they may aptly attaine Supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as Doe this for I am the Lord, whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Againe the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruite, and of holinesse; (for externall worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremonie) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Iewes; and prescribeth orders for iustice and equitie. And therefore was it said of Saint Paule, The commandement is iust, honest, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall; holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the government of the common-wealth of the Iewes, in which manie things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kinds of things, of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holie things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beafts, and the fruits of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments Circumcision, the Passouer, and such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meats, as not to eate the bloud and fat of beafts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, anointings; and attire, as not to weare mixt garments of Linnen and Wollen; as also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as thou shalt not yoke together in a plough an Oxe and an Ass, or cast mingled seede in one field. It also exhorteth naturall compassion, and forbiddeth crueltie euent to beafts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be deltroid without any profit to man. For so some referre these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest, nor beate downe the first budding of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: situing in the abilitie of iustifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to loue and worship God; and to vie charitie one towards another: which for euer shall bee required at our hands. Therein also are wee in particular directed, how this ought to bee done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, and for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it foresignified. For the shadow is not deltroided, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it still liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church for some ceremonies and types of holy vification; which are still expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a farre lesse degree of necessitie.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vse and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Jewes Common-weale, and policie.

p. X.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

S for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect bee reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignitie and worth of the law.
2. The Majestie of the law-giuer.
3. The proprietie and peculiaritie of the people receiving it.
4. The conueniencie of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignitie of the Law is sufficiently proued by St. Paul in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Majestie of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, so he only gaue the law, who could only giue the end and reward promised, to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministerie of Angels: as it is said. And the law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediatour: and in the Acts, He gaue the law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The proprietie and peculiaritie of the people, receiuing this law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disuicered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and seuered they were, because of Gods choise and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham, and his seede: not vnto his seedes, as to Esau and Jacob, but to his seede, as to Jacob, or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to ABRAHAM and his seede were the promises made: he saith not to the seedes, as speaking of many, but to thy seede, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conueniencie of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betweene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the law written in the Commandments, receiued by Moses in the worlds year 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time begunne the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniencie are formerly giuen.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiven, who taketh away the sinnes of the the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weake, Gal. 2. beggerly as containing no grace, weake as not able to forgive and iustifie. The bloud Hab. 2. of Goates and Bulls, and the ashes of an Heifer could only cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's bloud, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the Gal. 2. law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

§. XI.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

The old and new Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation; as the old by works, the new by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or obiect and remote end, they agree: which is, mans happinesse and saluation.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the old, because it preceded the new Testament, which is an explanation of the old: from which the new taketh witness. Yet the new of more excellencie, in that it doth more liuely expresse, and openly and directly delineate the waies of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that be saith the new Testament, he hath abrogated the old. For the old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policie perishable: but the new was given in a promise of an euermlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospell for euer during.

The old Testament is called the law, because the first and chiefe part is the law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that law.

The new Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and chiefe part thereof is the glad tidings of our redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or Storie of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Euangelson signifying a ioyfull, happie, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) The reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victorie, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations: First, for glad tidings in general, as in Ezay by the 52. v. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained to signifie that most ioyfull message of saluation, as in Luc. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the Historie of Christ: and so wee vnderstand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the Preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as Cor. 1. 9. v. 14. and Cor. 2. 8. v. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in voc Jumes) is by Danteus comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Couenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ:

In the effects, that is, in righteouesesse and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one couenant, one adoption, and one doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; and one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: euen the saluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter is the end of our faith. For although it bee said, that Moses did promise by obseruing the law an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly hee raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Iherusalem: according to this place of the

Gal. 1. 13.

Hebrewes: All these did in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them a farre off and believed them: confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also S. AVGVSTINE: Ommino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena aeterna promissa. Few (saith hee) doe understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. HEROME: Noluit Deus pacere Iudaeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Iudaei seminant: God would not see the Iewes as beasts with corporall gifts and riches as themselves dreame. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God and I will beee your God. For the wordes, I will beee your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise; but in respect of the future: to wit the safetie of their soules. For as God created both bodie and soule, so hath hee of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncaared for, which liueth euer.

The agreement betweene the Old and New testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets: in whom all the promises of God in the Old and New, are assured: the fathers hauing eaten the same spirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospell, the proper effects whereof are mercie and saluation: to which the law serueth as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sinne and miserie, God sheweth his mercie and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise if we seuer the law from subordination to the Gospell, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteounesse by workes, the other by faith; the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospell allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth; Christ pardoneth. The old restraineth the hand, the new the minde. Data est lex qua non sanaret (saith St. AVGVSTINE) sed qua agrotantes probaret; The law was giuen not to helpe but to discover sicknesse: and S. CHRYSOSTOME, Data est lex, ut se homo inueniret, non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quaereretur; The law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen: but that he might then seeke out the Physitian. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a sonne, so the greatest benefit was referred to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

Heb. 7.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

2. 40.

Leuit. 18. 5.

THe sequent consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteounesse in our owne workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteounesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

L. 90.

The second end of the law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing ing to perfect a law, doe not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteouſeſie, and performance of dutie to God and Men.

The third and chiefe end of the law is, as hath bene ſaid, to ſend vs to Chriſt, and his grace, being in our ſelues condemn'd and loſt. For the law was deluſed with thunder, and with a moſt violent and fearefull tempeſt, threatning eternal death.

The fourth end of the law was to deligne, and preferre, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Diſcipline, and awe, till the coming of Chriſt: after whom the Church was to be diſperſed ouer the whole world.

10 Theſe be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vſe of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Chriſt, and the new Teſtament. The vſe of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equitie, and right, wherto we muſt conforme our ſelues.

The ſenſe and vnderſtanding of the law is double, literal and ſpiritual: by the literal we are taught the worſhip and ſeruce of God: by the ſpiritual the figures and myſtical fore-ſpeakings of Chriſt.

Laſtly, for the durance or continuance of the law, the ſame had being vntill the paſſion of Chriſt: before which time, and while Chriſt taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true ſacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Croſſe, then the iewiſh ſacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Chriſt (Chriſt being the body of thoſe ſhadows) ceas'd to binde the conſciences any longer: the myſterie of our redemption being now by Chriſt and in him finiſhed. In token whereof the vaile of the Temple rent aſunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailes and ſhadows were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandments was hereby abolifhed, or weakened at all: otherwiſe then that it had not power to condemne according to the iewiſh doctrine, as aforeſaid. For the obſeruing of the law was by Chriſt himſelſe feuerly commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witneſſed. And herein Dauid ſo much reioyc'd, as he preferred the obſeruation of the law, before all that the world could yeeld.

In via teſtimoniorum tuorum deleſtus ſum, ſicut in omnibus diuitijs: I haue bene delighted in thy law as in all manner of riches: And againe. The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and ſilver. This is the loue of God (ſaith S. I O H N) that we keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuſe for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himſelſe in Deuteronomie witneſſeth. This Commandement (ſaith he) which I command thee this day is not hidde from thee, neither is it ſarve off. It is not in heauen that thou ſhouldeſt ſay who ſhall goe vp for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cauſe vs to hear it that we may doe it: neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou ſhouldeſt ſay, who ſhall goe ouer the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? Or, but the word is very neare vnto thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart for to doe it. Behold (ſaith M O S E S) I haue ſet before thee this day life and death, good and euill, in that I command thee this day to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou maiest liue, &c. Neither is it ſaid in vaine in S. MATTHEW. Si vis ad vitam ingredi ſerua mandata, iſ thou wilt enter into life, keepe the Commandments: and in S. I O H N: Sciō quia mandatum eius vita aeterna eſt; I know that his Commandement is life euerlaſting. And if this be the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainly he is but a liar, that proſſeſſeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obſerue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confeſſe it is not in mans ability, without the ſpeciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Chriſt only as man excepted) yet if we rightly conſider the mercifull care which God had of his people in thoſe his Commandements, we ſhall finde in our ſelues, how we borrow libertie, and rather let ſlip our affections, and voluntarily looſen them, from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reaſon hath faltened them, than that we are excuſable by thoſe difficulties and impoſſibilities, which our minde (greedie of libertie) propoſeth to it ſelſe.

For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements,

p. XIII.

Of the severall Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our defaults.

Or by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinites: and that it is of necessitie that by this almightie Vnitie, all things haue beene caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his prouidence he hath also provided for euery of them, which giueth to beasts their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

Colosse in vob. ca. 1. 1.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatrie, and worship of Images: the making wherof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla hominis iniquis orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memorie of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantium) the Devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weake and ignorant soules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deaf, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vnde prize and baser, then the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? for what doe wee thereby (saith the Wisdome of SALOMON) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iourneys of him that cannot goe, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which hee praieeth, be more senselesse: Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

1. Cor. 13. 17.

1. Cor. 13. 18.

The breach of the third Commandement is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest enchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, vnieste the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euerlasting sorrow, and Hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the Deuill brought vp among men, without all subtile argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most forseiuil aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to neede, Adulterie to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse; but this contemptuous offence of blasphemie, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most saluage Nations of the world doe not vlc it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither paine, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Ass may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weak and helpless infancie, and bestowed on vs the haruest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporal and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not doe them the following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affectio est imitia (saith BRAC TON) imponit uicem opus tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the worke such as it is. And certainly whosoever cannot forbear to commit murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vsf of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from adulterie. Now, if the pre-secration of Virginitie haue beene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, y who in all ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with care forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himselfe giue succie to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kind of violent robbrie had beene vsed in Mosses time, which many Russians practise now-a-daies in England, and to the dishonour of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians, out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speake not of the poore and miserable soules, whom hunger and extreme necessitie inforceth, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, robbe, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man, or breake by violence into other mens houles, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkenesse, and ypon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouerishing whole families: and taking the bread and foode from the mouthes of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued, it would soone appeare; if Princes would resolute, but for a few yeares to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-hounds. And if euery man may presume to be pardoned once, there is no state or common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impouerish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandement of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surerie of estate, and life, were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuse, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment; which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandements forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiuers for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if we iudge hereof rightly, it may bee doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For although it be not easie to master all our suddaine passions, yet we may restrain and hinder their growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all those it is to be considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of hauing: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selues by any our naturall frailtie, or vnadvised error.

But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for adeterminate and vnbridled euill intent, or for some vrging inclination therunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vniuersi; Such passions or inclinations are vnperfect acts, that is, not deliberated vpon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or virtuous action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as wee resist such motions they harme vs not: as they say, Quandiu resagamus nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not: and that then only they hurt when we suffer them to beare sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into act, is forbidden; therefore, that wee may know the difference betwene this Commandement and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so euen the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrarie passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if wee will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, we must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, euen those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though hee that bridleth his euill desires, be much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man doe as well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing hee ought not so much to haue them at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinitie deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent man the hauing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous man: so we, that the hauing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of Diuinitie to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth that the euill desires of the Continent man, that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull induours to keepe his commandements, we witness our loue toward himselfe: we may not safely giue libertie to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and commandements impossible for vs to keepe. For as he is accursed (saith St. Hierome) that auowes that the law is in all things possible to be obserued: so hee hath made this addition. Male dicitur qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the law: so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laid before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without euasion, or without betraying of our selues, doe our faithfull induours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfaithfully, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, Dauid witnesseth. Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustificed. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe, Who can say I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne grievous without liberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether he giue way willingly, or restrain himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his sub-

§. XIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

- 10  Nd if we consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull prouidence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them, yet there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men, yet if we did not for our owne sakes strue to obserue these lawes: all societie of men, and all induours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would bee taken away: and euery state and common-weale in the world fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might bee defended, that euery man might enjoy the fruits of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might lue the lites of reasonable men, and not of beasts: of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of saluages. And hereof making our humane reason only Iudge, Lets vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if wee acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersitie of interpretation, hath already brought into the world, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

20 And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibilitie to receiue thence from, either helpe or comfort.

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature herselfe requieth intermission of labour.

40 If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorn and neglect vs, when our aged yeares require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the races of mankind would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the libertie to destroy others, giueth libertie to others to destroy himselfe.

If adulterie were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe, this is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posteritie, no induour by vertue and vndertaking to raise families: murders and poisonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed; and euery man subject to most filthy and vnclane diseases.

50 If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perishe, or lue as the saluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischiefe of robbetrie, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution foure-fold, policie of State and necessitie hath made it death.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waiter against the wealthie: the idle begger and loiterer, against the careful and painefull labourer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The coueting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while wee couet what appertains to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we doe but couet; and if we doe attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiuers or goods of our neighbours, wee can looke for no other, but that our selues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all living? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull and prudent God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertilitie of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vprofitable, and of no vse. For wee should remaine but in the state of brute beaſts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

*V*lman Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, viz. Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and hee defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae, to be customes approved by antiquitie or vnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from vsage, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vsage and continuance established into a law: but yet there where the law is defectiue, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written customes, received and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie, and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Castile, and other Principes.

The second are these pettie customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or pettie customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornewale comprehending also the Stannerie of Deuen, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Deuen, but not in Cornewale. But howsoever vsage and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought euery custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith VLIAN) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest ratu temporis conualescere; Course of time amendeth not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessarie in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessarie continuance: it being manifest that euery custome, which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deedes, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they haue bene since continued, because posteritie is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued.

ued. For non subicit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nona legem, & nona consuetudinem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome, against law: save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane Law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduisement of Wisdemen, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Onncid quod ratione consistit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall, and eternall: made by the rationally discourse of those, that exercise publique authoritie: prescribing necessarie obseruances to the subiect. That every law ought to bee a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Nihil lex esse non videtur, qua iusta non fuerit; It seemes to be no law at all to me, which is not iust; and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines deriuauerunt.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracie, it cannot be doubted, be the Government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or vicious constitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so every particular of the humane law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it isto be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it isto be made by publique authoritie.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to THOMAS, alia lex IVLIA de Adulterys, alia CORNELIA de Sicarijs; The law of IVLIAN against Adulterie is one, the CORNELIAN against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for every law which is not of it lesse, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Spian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations: but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Am bassadours be granted betwene enemies, &c. which National law according to diuers acceptions, and diuers considerations had of the Humane law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

civill law 111

Ius Civile, or the Civill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers estates it is also divers and peculiar, and this law is not so immediately derived from the law of Nature, as the law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and doe not fit all estates.

in Leg. 6. tit. ff. de iustitia iur.

Hereof V ER I AN, Ius civile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium rececit, neque per omnia ei seruit: itaq; cum aliquis addidit vel detrahimus iuri communi, ius proprium, id est, civile efficitur; The Civill law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of nature, and nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore, when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Civill Law.

The law now commonly called the Civill Law, had its birth in Rome: and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeares after the foundation of the Citie. It was compounded afcwell out of the Athenian, and other Grecian laws, as out of the ancient Romane customes and laws Regall. The Regall laws were devised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regia, or Papirian, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquinius then reigning. For though so many of the former laws as maintained Kingly authority were abolished, with the name: yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve Tables. To these laws of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebis-cita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistristrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetual laws: and the Pollime thiled Edictum perpetuum: as those and the like Collections of Iustitia afterward were.

The difference anciently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call reglement, consisted in this, that laws are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraigne authority (be the soveraigntie in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Iustus Magistratus, without authority it be made a law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith V ARRO. Qui plurimum Edictio tribuunt, legem annuum esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most vnto an Edict, say that it is a law for one yeare: Though Sisdore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edict, those Ordinances called Actus Prerogatives: as Constitutio: vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaim.

Lastly, the Humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillitie of the Common-wealth: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church, aliquid natum a legem, hoc dicitur spectat; That respecteth the Law of nature, this the law of God. And so may Ius Civile be taken two waies: first, as distinguished from the law of Nations, as in the first diuision: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diuers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolmen is obscure. For although the Civill be the same with the Secular, as the Civill is a law, yet the Secular is more generall and comprehendeth both the Civill, and all other laws not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular laws, in vse among Christian Princes, and in Christian Commonweales, there are three kinds: the Civill which hath euerwhere a voice: and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerful; the Laws of England called Common, and the Laws of customs or Provinciall. In Spainne besides the Law Civill, they haue the customs of Castile, and other Provinces. In France besides the Civill, the customs of Burgundie, Blays, Berri, Niuernois, and Lothinois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lothinois, seront gouernez selon les customes du dit Pays. All places lying within the precincts of Lothinois, shall bee governed according to the customs of that place.

Art. 3. tit. 5. G. C. G.

There are also in France the customes of Normandie, and these of two kinds: General, and Local; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation haue these words. Nos autem, registrum praelatum, vsus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. Laudamus approbamus & autoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register afore said, laudable vses, and ancient customes, we praise, approve, and by our Kings authority confirme. The common law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certaine Maximes by those customes of the Realme approved. Vpon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customes of England haue beene approved by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custom by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, distressed, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the law of the land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient customes of England that the eldest Sonne should inherit without partition: In Germanie, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all lands (that haue not beene relinced into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the house shall enjoy the inheritance during his owne life: and fo the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the customes of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of land haue foure Sonnes, and the eldest of those foure haue also a sonne, the three brothers of the eldest sonne, shall after the death of their brother, enjoy their Fathers lands before the Grandchild: the custome being grounded vpon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times hauing alwaies liued in a subdivided Civil warre, not only the greatest against the greatest, but euery Baron and Gentleman one against another, were inoffit to leaue successors of age and abilitie to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Prouinces of France, there are certaine peculiar, and pettie customes, besides the great and generall custome of the land, fo are there in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Acts of choise, and selfe desire. Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent quam quod iudicio populi recepta sunt; The lawes doe therefore binde the subiect, because they are receiued by the iudgements of the subiect. Tum demum humane leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institute, sed etiam firmate a approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane lawes haue their strength, when they shall not only be devised, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Natura listeneth these properties to euery Christian law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Countrey; also for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of private profit, that it be written for the generall good. Hee also giues foure effects of the law, which Modestinus comprehends in two: to wit, obligation, and intigation: the former binds vs by feare, to auoide vice: the later incourageth with open, to follow vertue. For according to Cicerro. Legem oportet esse virtuosam emendatorem, commendatricemq; virtutum; It beloneth the law to be a mender of vertues, vs a commender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obseruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes: and it is two-fold, the one constraint vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects of the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactiue, and Directiue.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Intigation, or incouragement to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, bidding, urge vs to well-doing: laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue commanding good, and power negatiue forbidding euill, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which Dauid comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina a malo, & fac bonum; Decline from euill, and see good.

§. XVI.

That only the Prince is exempt from humane lawes, and in what sort.

10

Now whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subiect, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid, the one Directiue, the other Coactiue: to the power Directiue, they ought to be subiect, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a preiudiciall iudgement against himselfe: and if equals haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receiue their authority and strength.

102+3 675.7

+9 B20

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much about the lawes, as the soule and body vntied, is about a dead and senselesse carcasse. For the King is truly called, ius viuum & lex animata; An animate and liuing law. But this is true, that by giuing authoritie to lawes, Princes both adde greatnesse to themselves, and conferre it, and therefore was it said of Bracton out of IUSTINIAN. Merito debet Rex tribuere legi, quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipse sit Rex, Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King, for it is the law that doth make Kings.

Bracton's.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine: and by humane lawes only declared to be Kings. As for the places remembred by the Diuines and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God only.

Palso. de lege.

Tibi soli peccauis, saith DAVID; Against thee only haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be said to be subiect to the law. Princeps non subiecitur legi; For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiuae: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humana non pertinet: sed vis potestatis humana non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transfundendi aliquid; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kinde of organ, or instrument, of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold off: but the gouerneur himselfe, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be contrould. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for every actiue abilitie is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps siue legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the law. Therefore in the rules of the law it is thus concluded. Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis, Principes vero sibi voluntate suis, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince only by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique laws, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no civill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater abilitie. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that we ought not to seeme wiser than God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their severall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to governe aptly, one and the same law very hardly were able. The Roman civill Lawes did indeede containe in order, a great part of the then knowne world, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundrie people, which it governed. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or peradventure some temper of the soile and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunitie to steale, makes the Arabians to bee Theeves) very hard it were to forbid by law, an offence so common, with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo vnhappy diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great furie rejected, because plentifultie of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, mee thinks, it were not amisse to consider, that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the general nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vnjust; there may the law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forsoeth man, as neare as may bee, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained, a vicious, yet not intollerable habite, with so long and so publique approbation, that the vertue opposing it, would seeme as vnouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparell in Turkie: there may a wife and vpright Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses's law required; as euen as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people, The good Lord bee mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obserued by Matter Doctor Willel, that the morall Iudicialls of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that we are tied to the same seruitie of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not given by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemencie and Mercie, may abuse of the seruitie of Moses's law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauie: for to showe more rigour than Moses, becommeth not the Gospell.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath bene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither will I take vpon mee, to speake any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say; that the defence of it hath alwaies beene very plausible. And surely, howeouer they bee not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and only law; yet shall wee hardly finde any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue bene witness, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentle-woman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other prooffe, for murdering her husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a yeare after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistris was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) grieuouly lamented: but this Iudge, saith the same Author, Sapienter ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facti ipse purgaret, sic himselfe often confessed vnto mee, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphisiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of sciences, which out of the sciences themselves cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politike institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphisiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium, The being of beings, the only good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well saith Saint AVGVSTINE. Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit aeternam, de qua nulli anima indicare datum est; The Author of temporall lawes if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

§ I.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderneffe; with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troupes.

30

When Moses had received the law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuarie, hee mustered all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and having seen what numbers of men, fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeares of age upwards; hee appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Arme was 603550 able men for the warres, besides women and children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Arme was diuided by Moses into foure 30 grosse and mightie Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men, led by Nasfon: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathanael: in Zabulon 57400 led by Eliah. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vanguard, and was the first that moued and marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incamping on the East side of the Arme; which was held the first place, and of greatest dignitie.

40 The second Battalion or Arme, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had ioyned vnto Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simeon 59300. vnder Sethaniel: in Gad 45650. vnder Elisaph. These had the second place, and incamped on the South side of the Tabernacle.

The third Arme marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elisbama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gemiel: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abisdon.

50 The fourth and last Arme, or Squadron, of the generall Arme, containing 157600. able men marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were ioyned the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asser. And these had the Rereward, and moued last, incamping on the North side. Dan had 62700. vnder Abieser: Asser 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephthali 53400. vnder Abira.

Besides

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines ouer Thousands, ouer Hundreds, ouer Fifties, and ouer Tens; as it may appear by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses, Numb. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renoume: of which number were Korab, Dathan, and Abram. Which three principall Mutiners, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the twelue Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonells before spoken of, as by their names Numb. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, tooke place not only in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but euen in sorting them vnder their severall Standards in the wilderness it was obserued. For Iudab had the precedence and the greatest Armie, which also was wholly compounded of the sonnes of Lea, Jacobs wife. Reuben hauing lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had vndergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Ioseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogatiue of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments: the yonger (according to Jacobs propheticke) taking place before the Elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best beloued brother, the other sonne of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest sonne of Jacobs Concubines, was giuen the leading of the fourth Armie, according to Jacobs propheticke. Hee had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but only the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Leuites. Neare vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of their foure powerfull Armies, which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neare it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moueable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people obserued the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on euery side of the Tabernacle; The Gehurites on the West, with in the Armie, and Standard of Ephraim, ouer whom Eliashaph commanded, in number 7500. The familie of Cobath on the South-side, guided by Eliashaph, within the Armie of Reuben, and betweene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8500. The third companie were of the familie of Merari, ouer whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North side within the Armie of Dan; On the East side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Iudab led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall families, was Eliasar the sonne of Aaron, his successeur in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Armie of Israel, and of their incamping and marching: the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. Thereunder care, which Moses the Prophet and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Santuarie, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industrie vsed in the framing thereof, and euerie, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp and preserving the holie Vessels; the sollemne remouing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now for forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Familie, by the Anabaptish, Brownist, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Poperie, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: in somuch as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence againe into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the Hedges; and the Offices of the Ministerie (robbed of all dignitie and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-Gouernment, left to newnesse of opinion and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many Kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: every contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancies with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gifts of Reu'ation; in somuch as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contrarie to it selfe, the Faith of men will soone after die away by degrees, and all Religion bee held in korne and contempt. Which distraction gaue a great Prince of Germanie cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Sime adiuugo uobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiuugo, a uobis condemnor; Quid fugiatis uideo, sed quid sequar, non habeo; si I adiuo me selfe to you, I am condemnd by others; if I ioyne with others, I am condemnd by you; what I should auide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II.

The offerings of the twelve Princes: The Passouer of the second year; The departing of IERHO.

30 Now when Moses had taken order for all things necessarie, prouided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbered his Armie, and diuided them into the battales and troupes before remembered, and appointed them Leaders of all forts: The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes, brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, sixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belongeth therunto: the Sanctuarie excepted; which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sonnes of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the sonnes of Gersham and Merari.

Besides these Chariots each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a charger of fine siluer, weighing 130. sheekles: a siluer Boll of 70. sheekles: after the sheekle of the Semitari: and an incense-Cup of gold of ten sheekles: which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards their conquest: besides the beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve siluer chargers, and twelue siluer Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheekles of siluer: and the weight of gold in the incense-Cups, to 120. sheekles of gold: which makes of sheekles of siluer 1200 every sheekle of gold valuing ten of siluer, so that the whole of gold and siluer which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twentie pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passouer: which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second Month of the second year: and on the 20. day of the same the cloude was lifted vp from aboute the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God, Rise vp Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountain Sinai, towards Param the the Armie, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Nahshon, taking the Vantguard, followed by Nethanel, and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched as in the figure express. And because the passage through so many Desarts and Mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leauing nothing vnforethought which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father-in-law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompanie them in their iourney towards Canaan: promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man as hee was of great vnderstanding and iudgement (as appeared by the counsaile he gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeares and experience, for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter: which was 42. yeares before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeares in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauaile: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of soules, which could not bee so few as a Million: it was necessarie to vse many guides and many conducters. To this request of Moses it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Iethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not: for it is euident that he went backe from Moses into his owne Countrie. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posteritie of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites: it is most like-ly that this his returne to his owne Countrie was rather to fetch away his familie: and to take his leaue of his owne Countrie, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The voiage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turninge backe to the red Sea.

After this dismissal of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Desarts of Paran: and after three daies wandring, they sate downe at the Sepulchers; of lult, afterward called Tabera, or Meeniso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers, which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second moneth, of the second yeare, they rested and fed themselves with Quailes (which it pleased God by a Sea-wind to caft vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof surfaiting there died great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thomus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazereth: where Miriam the sifter of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seuen daies, after whose recouerie Israel remoued toward the border of Iuduma: and incamped at Rithma, neare Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelue discouersers into the Territorie of Canaan: both to informe themselves of the fertilitie and strength of the Countrie: as also to take knowledge of the Waies, Passages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad King of the Canaanites surprisid diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neare those waies: through which the discouersers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discouersers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the Egyptian sla-uerie, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernesse (for so Moses calleth it) with the victorie which hee gaue them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preferred them, but to bring them, their wives, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoile to the Amarites or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, That the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers, and Castles: that many of the people were Giantlike (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anaz there) who were men of fearefull stature, and so lare ouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grashoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutinie exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choofe them a Captaine (or as they call it now-a-daies, an Electo) to carrie them backe againe into Egypt: so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished euery soule of the whole multitude (Iosias and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neare it; and at the mountaine foot of Idemaa: which is but narrow, laying before them the fertilitie thereof: and assuring them of victorie. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense: they threatened to stone these encouragers to death: accounting them as men either desperat in themselves, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their bretheren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the feare of his bright glorie betwene the vnadvised fure of the multitude, and the innocencie and constancie of his seruants, persued them thereby from their violence: threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth infection and rebellion, which they had made, since God deliuered them from the slauerie of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) praied vnto God to remember his infinite mercies: alluding that this so seuer a iudgement, how deserv'dly soeuer inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations: and giue them occasion to vaunt that the God of Israel failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Deserts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than mercifull, as God is slow to anger; so is his wrath a consuming fire: the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heauie than hoped for, he scourged this iniquitie, so by the measure of his glorie (euermore jealous of neglect and dension) hee suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished; reseruing his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, hee was pleased to preserve, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer bene frustrate.

§. IIIL

Of their unwillingesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

40 Now when Moses had reuiled the purposes of God to the people: and made them know his heauie displeasure towards them: they beganne to bewaile themselves, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often pled and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, They would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrarie againe to the aduise of Moses: who assured them, that God was not now among them: and that the Arke of his couenant should not moue, but by his direction, who could not erre: and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no lesse sharpe than death: and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwaies follow those counsells which carrie them them to their owne destructions: so the Hebrewes after they had forsaken the opportunitie by God and their Conductors offered: and might then haue entred Iudea before their enemies were prepared and ioyned: did afterward, contrarie to Gods commandement, vndertake the enterprise of themselves: and ranne headlong and without aduise into the mountaines of Iadumaa. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioyned and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughterd the greatest part: and following their victorie and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight euen vnto Hiormab: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthroweate Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displacement and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assemblie of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioyned together for their common safetie) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For hee commanded him to returne by those painefull passages of the deserts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came backe to passe ouer Jordan there were consumed 38. yeares: and the whole number of the sixe hundreth and odde thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses Ioshua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborne and carelesse generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children: which were increased to 600000. and 29 more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Holt of heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israeletes worshipped the Sonne and Moone in after-times it is proued out of sundrie other places.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commandement receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he remoued to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuided among them. From thence hee went on to Libnah, taking that name of the frankincense there found. From Libnah hee crost the valley, and late downe at Bessi neare the foot of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceclata: where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwaies keeping the valley, between two great ledges of mountaines (those which bound the Desert of Sim, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceclata; and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence hee passed on to Harada; then to Maacletot; and then to Thahab; and so to Thara or Thure: the foure & twentieth mansion. Where while Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutinie, of Korah, Dathan, and Abaran: who for their contempt of God and his Ministers were some of them swallowed vp aliuie, and by the earth opening her mouth deuoured, others euen two hundred and fiftie which offered incense with Korah were consumed with fire from heauen; & 14700. of their partie, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest meruailes and judgements of God, that hath beene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authoritie, were suddenly swallowed vp aliuie into the earth with their families and goods; euen while they fought to ouerthrowe the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common-weale of his people. And the better ter to assure the people, and out of his great mercie to confirme them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the twelve rodde given by the Heads of the twelve Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and drie Wands; and on every rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on that of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable Spirit, and having laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Arke one night, had on it both Buds, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

10 From Tharab the whole Armie removed to Metbra; and thence to Efnoma; and thence to Miseroth, (or Misur after S. Hierome), and from Miseroth to Beneicuan; and so to Gadgad, which Lieame calleth Gadgata; thence to tebata, the thirtieth Manzion; where from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Abricominus maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, betwene Maclon and Afiongaber.

Now although it be very probable, that at Afiongaber, where Solomon furnished his Fleets for the East Indus, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus Her. 3. maketh mention of a great River, in Arabia the Stone, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the Inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Armie of Cambyses: yet is A-

20 Arichonius greatly deceived as many times he is, in finding the Springs at Gadgad, or tebata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Manzion. For it was in Penon, that those Springs are spoken off, which in Deut. the 10. v. 7. is also called tebata, or tebath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zo ed, the next adioyning. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Afiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleue, for the way is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those landie parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirfie sand, before they can recouert the bankes of the Red Sea.

30 From tebata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Eibrons; and from thence to Efiongaber: which Citie in Iosaphus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieromes Eflia. From thence keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded: Efiongaber Deut. 3. being the furbest place towards the South-east, that Moses traileth in that passage.

It seemeth that Efiongaber or Afiongaber, Eloth and Atahan were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses Num. 10. v. 13 and AARON in the Mount Hor, neare the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumea. And if Efiongaber, and the other places neare the Red Sea, had at this present bene subiect to the Idumaeans, Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the figure the Idumaeans obtained those places: for it is said. And they arose out of Midien, 1. King. 11. 16. and came to Paran, and tooke men with them, which were those companies that followed young Ahad of Idumea into Aegypt, when he fled from Iob. Likewise it is said of Salomor, that he made a name of ships in Efiongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of MOSES arrivall at Zin Kadis: and the accidents while they abode there.

50 From Efiongaber he turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wildernesse of Zin, which is Kadish: or in Erath, of the children of Isaac; where they fate downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeare after they left Aegypt. For at the next Manzion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeare: the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Esiogaber. And at this Citie of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or neare it, died Miriam or Marie, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcitie of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen; by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the earth; by the suddaine pestilence which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and calling vngreatfully on Moses all their misaduentures, yea though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end; he commanded Moses to linke a Rokee adjoining with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattaille were satisfied, Neuarthelesse; because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place: therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to end the traualles of Aaron at the Mountaine of Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was deposed of the Garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but God receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seene.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwile Mosera, as in Deuter. 10. vers. 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumians had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seuen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esiogaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hefbunna, and before he came to Berinaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister died; the first being the seuen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue bene written, Hor iuxta Mosera; Hor neare Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Hebeare: whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Hor. By the West part Moses incamped, as he past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as he went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent Messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that hee might passe with the people of Israel through his Territorie into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the Citie of Kadesh, where Moses then incamped; whereas otherwile taking his iourney by the Riuer of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riuer, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commaunded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumea hereto, Moses remembred him, that he was of the same race and familie with Israel: calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites

Edomites and Israelites were the Sonnes of one Father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esaú his Ancestor had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races defended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumaea. Hee also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waite his Countrie, but that hee would retrain his Armie within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high waies, paying money for whatsoeuer he vsed, yea euen for the water, which themselves or their Cattel should drinke. For Moses was commanded by God not to prouoke the children of Esaú. But the King of Edumaea knowing the strength of his owne Countrie, and the fame being neare Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and with all suspeting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrie, it would rest in their wills to giue him law, resolutely refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his countrie together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For as it is writtē: Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with mightie power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprife was not the conquest of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe, who was of a naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, and the skillfullist man of warre that the world had, he refused to aduerture the Armie of Israel against a Nation, which being ouer-come, gate but a passage to inuade others; and which by reason of the seat of their mountainous Countrie, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enricbled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumaea, and trauielling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leauing the way of Idumaea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanchd the way of Edumaea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to finde his enemies in his neighbours Countrie, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victorie, had Moses beene enforst first to haue made his way by the sword through Idumaea, and thereby, though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resoluēd to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his owne home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Armie; which, for the multitude, occupied a great space, and for the many herds of Cattle that they draue with them, could not incampe so neare together, but that some quarter or other was euer more subiect to surprisē. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which ioyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Armee were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuter. 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victorie ouer Israel, neare Cadesbarne, or if it were his Predecessour that then prevailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue bene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, hee would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compass, by the Riuers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their coniecture to bee valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territorie lay without it, and neare the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Againe, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victorie pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Iudaea. There is also a Citie of that name in Simoon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutinie which followed presently after the repetition of this victorie, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water, and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had past Jordan: Iosua then governing them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his Citie so called; and with him the King of Elon: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And hee nameth them amongst those Kings, which hee vanquished and put to death.

Now after this assault and surpris by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, hee led the people Eastward to compass Idumaea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, beganne againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of drie Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venome inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leauing the ordinarie way which lieth betwene the Red Sea, and Calesyria, incamped at Zalmone: and thence hee removed to Phanon, where hee erected the Brazen Serpent; making these iourneys by the edge of Idumaea, but without it. For Phanon was sometime a principall Citie of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Vers. 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned backe towards the Red Sea; neither neither did they march (according to FONSECA per viam, que habet a latere mare rubrum, By the way that lieth the Red Sea, but indeede they crost, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Eijongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Jisrah to Iunne the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phannon he went to Obooth; where they entred the Territorie of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Sapha, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea, and from thence to Abaram, the eight and thirtieth Manzion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; From thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the Riuier of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that Riuier, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet 48. v. 22. calleth the House of Diblahaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchodonosor. From thence they came to the Riuier of Arnon, and incamped in the mountaines of Abaram: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Himmon-diblahaim, but speaketh of his remoue from the Riuier of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon, calling Arnon the border of Moab, betweene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Amorites, by Schon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Balaac Peor then reigning. From Diblahaim, Moses sent Messengers to Schon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrey: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to giue a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he undertooke. And though Edom had refused him as Schon did, yet hee had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Seon observed the same precept, which he left to his posteritie, and successours, for a law of the war, namely in Deut. 20. v. 10. in these wordes, When thou comest neare vnto a Citie to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries vnto thee, and serue thee, but if it refuse, &c. then shalt smite all the Males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of Armies haue obserued to this day, or ought to haue done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battales of the Lord, mentioned in this storie, and of other Booke mentioned in Scripture which are lost.

40 NOW concerning the Warre betweene Israell and Schon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this storie to that Booke entituled Liber bellorum Dominii: The booke of Gods battales; and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His wordes after the Geneua translation are these. Wherefore it shall be spoken in the booke of the battales of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Riuers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this; But the Greeke Septuagint varieth. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the booke: The Warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brookes of Arnon. Iunius in the Red Sea, which is in the Geneua and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of * Sapha, a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he coniectureth. The Text hereradeth thus. ταυριδ δειξοι εν γενεσιονε bellorum ΙΕΝΟΥΧ, contra VΑΠΕΡΕΜΙΝ ΙΝ ΡΕΓΙΟΝΕ ΣΥΡΗ: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonia; Therefore is it spoken 18. §. 3.

spoken in respect of the battailes of IEHOVAH, against VABEB in the Countrey of SYPH: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which wordes he vnderstandeth, that amongst the Warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memorie in the mouth of most men, concerning the Warre of Seloon against Vabeb, the King of the Moadites, and of his winning the Countrey neare Arnon, out of the possession of the Moadites. For this Vabeb was the immediate Predecessour of Balaac; who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balaac was the sonne of Zappor, and not of Vabeb. For it seemes (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were electiue, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall booke be meant; and if any; whether it bee not a prediction of Warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the booke of Iudges. Siracides. 45. tells vs plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by IOVA. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few wordes, referring the Reader to other bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a booke as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the booke of Henoeh, howsoever they haue been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddeus, and cited by Origen apud apud, and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Acliba, is no where found. The booke remembered by Iosua c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Iesse, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the midst of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still, till Israel had auenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also Dauid tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Iuda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according to the 69. Psalme v. 28. where it is said, Let them be put out of the booke of life, neither let them be written with the righteous. HEROME thinks, that Dauid by this booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the booke of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the iust Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; others, that it was the booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentarie vpon Iosua by an vnknowne Author.

The booke of Chosai, concerning Messie, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 19. Of this booke, also lost, HEROME conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Storie of Salomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Ierobam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Israell from the sonne of Salomon: as to the booke of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieda the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. with these haue the booke of Shemaiab and of Idda, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Iehu the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Iehosaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomons which the Hebrewes write Hilfarum, of 5000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Cantorum only remaineth, 1. Kings 4. 32. and with this diuers other of Salomons workes haue perished, as his booke of the naturas of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1. Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembered by Origen, Iosephus, Hierome, Cedrenus, Cicero Alconatus, Priest de in Inde, and others. §. VIII.

Of MOSES his sparing the issue of Lot: and of the Giants in those parts: and of SEHON and OG.

10 When Moses had pass'd Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the Citie of Nebo, leaving the Citie of Mathan on his left hand, and attempting nothing vpon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South side of Arnon, hauing lost all his ancient and best Territorie, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battaile, God hauing giuen that Land to the children of Lot: the same which was anciently possit by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sonnes of Anak.

Deut. 2. 9. & 10. 11. & 12.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, euen to the Desert of Arabia, aswell on the West, as on the East side of the Mountaines of Gilead, were inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Issachites did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Jordan, but left their Countrie to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We finde also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the Citie of Arbah, which Arbah

30 There had also bene Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief Citie was Aroer or Ar, neare the Riuer of Arnon. To the Giants of the Replains, the Ammonites gaue the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chief Citie was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendi, Gigantes, Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Eom, in the same Province, and not farre to the North of Aroer.

40 Now Moses hauing pass'd Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and hauing (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrie, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest vpon Zabeel the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and vipers, (themselves being of the sonnes of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speede as he could, because Moses incamped in the Countrie of his new conquest, to wit, the Plaines of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Manfion: which Moses waiked with the multitude of his people, and cattle. Towards him therefore halting himselfe, they encountred each other at Iahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victorie pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. Hee also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and descended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now haue taken a ready way and passage into India: being at this time, and after this victorie at the banks of Jordan: yet hee knew it to be perilous to leaue so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Tracanis: and therefore heled on his Armie to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature: and the only man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defended: lying betweene the mountaine of Herman (which mountaine saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the Riuer of Jordan. And it befell vnto the King of Basan (who attended Moses coming at Ederai) as it did vnto Sihon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and posselt. After this Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the mountaines of Abarim, left the persecution of that warre vnto Iair the sonne of Manasse: 10 who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, euen vnto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machaii, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his owne name Hanath Iair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse posselt the North part as farre as Ederai, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the mountaines of Gilead adioyning, was giuen to Ruben and Gad.

Of the troubles about the Midianites, and of Moses his death. 20

After these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Midian; the Midianites and Moabites (ouer both which Nations it seemeth that Balaam King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) fought, according to the aduise of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the loue of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serue their Idols, to diuide them both in Loue and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their owne interest against them, as also to beat them out of Moab, and the Countreies adioyning. The Israelites as they had euer bene inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these euill courses, and thereby drew on 30 themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by his commandement put to the sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the sonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cobbi a Daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the loue and kindeesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes became an Idolater) as hee forgaueth the rest of Israel, and laied his hand for his sake?

Deut. 32. v. 2.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: 40 and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembered) from the worship of the true God, to the seruice of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatrie. Ouer which companies of 12000. Moses gaue the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the siue Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately bene, the vassalls of Sehon, as appeareth by Iosuah. These siue Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleazar were at this time but the vassalls of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eui, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the Dukes of Sehon, saith Iosua. Hee slew also all the men, male-children, and women: slaying such as had not yet vied the companie of 50 men, but those they slayed and disperst them among the children of Israel to serue them.

And Moses having now liued 120. yeares, making both his owne weakenesse of body body knowne to the people, and his vniablie to trauaile: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the spirit of God: from whom he receiued a new commandement to ascend the Mountaines of Aburim: and thereon to render vp his life: Hee haisted to settle the Government in Iosua: whom hee perswaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the conquest begunne, assuring him of Gods fauour and assistance therein. And so hauing spent these his later daies after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law (or an iteration of the Law, according to S. Augustine) vsing both arguments, prayers, and threats vnto the people: which he often repeated vnto them; thereby to con-firme them in knowledge, loue, feare, and seruice, of the all-powerfull God: Hee 10 blessed the twelue Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with severall and most comfortable blessings: praising the greatnesse and goodnesse of him, vnto whom in his prayers he commended them: Hee also commanded the Priests to lay vp the booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that hee indited was that Prophetieall Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heewens and I will speake, and let the earth heare the word of my mouth and being called by God from the labours and sorowes of this life, vnto that rest which neuer after ward hath disquiet, hee was buried in the Land of Mash, ouer against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day, which happened in the year of the World 2554.

10 Observations out of the Storie of MOSES, how God dispossesseth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let vs a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of fundrie of the great events, which have beene mentioned in this Storie of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the me-30 dium of mens affections, and naturall appetites.
 And so we shall find that the feare which Pharao had of the increas of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorowes and losse, which befall himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when hee fought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when hee commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose providence cannot bee resisted, nor his purposes preuented by all the foolish and saluage craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharao's owne Daughter, to preserve that child, which after ward became the most wife, and of all men the most gentle and milde, 40 the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the Conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed Brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharao, and all the flower of his Nation; euen then, when hee fought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them vnder and burie them in the dust.
 The grieue which Moses conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatening him to dis-couer the slaughter of the Egyptian, moued him to flie into Midian: the contention betweene the sheep-herds of that place, and Iethro's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre 50 from the presse of the world, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Herds-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein he first suffered him to liue many yeares, the better to know the waies and passages through which hee purposed that hee should conduct his people, toward the Land promised:

promised: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his Will and diuine Pleasure for his returne into Aegypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Storie of Israel before remembered. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeares after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israclites had dealing after their comming out of Aegypt; and of the men renowned in other Nations, about the times of MOSES and IOSVA, with the summe of the Historie of IOSVA. 25. 6

§ I.

How the Nations with whom the Israclites were to haue warre, were diuers waies, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

* It seemeth also that Hin, the Sonne of Nachor, & Esau his Brother, planted themselves in the Eastside of Iordan about Bathan: where they finde the Land of Hin in which both Hin dwelt, as one of the issue of Hin the Sonne of Nachor, and Hin, his frind, which is called a Ruht. See hereafter Chap. 10. §. 7.

IN like manner if we looke to the qualitie of the Nations, with whom the Israclites, after their comming out of Aegypt, had to doe, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward: we shall finde them long before-hand, by the disposing prouidence of God, as it were prepared for enmitie: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Israclites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diueritie in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israclites: and so to serue for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must vnderstand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Aegypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one familie, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: by proesse of time diuided into severall families and names: whereof some

Some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamuzimims, or Zuzi, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabit the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Iobabites, Amorites, Henutes, Heites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Countrie in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another familie, and strangers in that Countrie: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more then the Phylishtims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now euen they which descending from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those partes, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them intraguers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they dayly contracted affinity: than of their olde pedigree from Abraham.

True it is that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had loo far possit them selves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to bee æquall in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lor came those two great families of the Moadites, and Amorites: of Esfau the Idumians: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest sonne of Abraham came the Ismaelites, with whom are joyned as of the same nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue been a tribe of Edom, because Esfau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason conuinceth it to haue bin otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed and endlessse ware decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere. Chap. 8. §. 3.

Of Ismaels eldest Sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petra, called Nabathæi. Now euen as Abraham besought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betwene Hanilath vpon Tigris, and Sar which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petraea. Yet howeouer the strength of these later named nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: yet it is not vnlkely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these families before named, were not so vnited, in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for Dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood a-part or vnited, they were taught by the care of their owne preservation, to joyne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumians only denied the Hebrewes a passage: which the Moadites durst not deny: because their Countrie lay more open; and because themselves had lately bene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their Countrie lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Basan. Againe, that which moued the Moadites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his Confederat: was that the Moadites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betwene the mountaines of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Mosch, Balac, perceiued that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of God and Ruben, he beganne to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the Daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at length the Mosabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmitie against Israel. And as for diuers of therest that were descended from Abrahams kindred, which in the posteritie were enmities to be asie were prelates of future quarrells, which in the posteritie might be the easier incensed, by the memorie of old grudges: and withall by some distaine from the elder in nature to the yonger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Jacobs, being but a second sonne, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses being naturall men, might scorne to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselves, to their inferiours, as they took it, and for a more aggravation the issues of Esau Princes of Edom, might keep in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacobs taking his aduantage, and that he was deceiued of his Fathers blessings also by him: and that Jacob after reconciliation came not into him as he promised into Seir or Idumaea.

Gen. 27.

Gen. 33. 14.

So also in the posteritie of Ismael, it might remaine as a seede or pretence of enmitie, that their fore-father was by the intiguation of Sara, cast out into the Desart, with his Mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieue them. Ismael also had an Aegyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalec was also an Horrite by his Mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edomians also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two Wives of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the Daughter of Elois, the Hittite, and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Henite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name Edom or Edumaea.

Gen. 36.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Mosabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proesse of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuerlation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those Wives of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, wherof Ietho was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-living God.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Petigree) we finde foure named by Moses: and one and thirre remembered by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territorie adioyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Henites, &c. and so here we vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrie of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God had appointed that the seven principall Families should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrie, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemor Gen. 34. of the Hevites, whom Simcon and Leui slew, together with his Sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their Sisters rauishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Idom and the Dead Sea; the same which surpris'd Israhel, as they incamped in the Wildernesse in the edge of Edu- Num. 21. 1. m.e.s.

The third named was Sehon King of Effebon, who before Moses arriual had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraea or Nabathes, and thru't them 10 ouer Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses ouer-threw in the plains of Moab: at which time he tooke Effebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Num. 21. 14.

Presently after which victorie, Og was also slaine by Israhel, who commanded the North part of that Valley betwene the Mountaines Tracori or Galad and Jordan, Num. 31. 35. who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fift was Adonibezek King of the Iebusites, and of Iherusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hobab, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Iarmuth.

Iapta, King of Lachis: and 20 Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seem'd to haue some Dominion ouer the rest, for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before-times was the head of all those Kingdomes.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confess that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands, and fetter'd of 70. Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who after Bada and Simcon had vs'd the same execution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Iherusalem where he died.

30 The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he imploied Sisara against Israhel, whom hee oppressed twentie yeares, after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac Ind. 4. (incouraged by Debora) ouerthrew, and his Captaine Sisara had by Isael, the Wife of Heber the Kenite, a naile driuen into his head while hee slept in her Tent. Iabin Ind. 4. P. 181. 8.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathes: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Getheleu or Iehres, faith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Keris in the first of Iudges, Exod. 3.

40 the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iexanis, or Iosham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter, or Neece, Moses married: and of whom I haue spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his Father: and this Hobab had seuen Daughters. Hee guided Moses in the Wildernesse: and became one of the Israhelites: of him defended the Kenites so called of his Father Raguel surname of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, euen now remembred. Cethur, pag. 34.

At such time as Saul inuaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israhel, gaue them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had 50 strong fates, and liued in the mountaines of the Desarts. 1 Sam. 15. 6.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find nam'd were these.

1. Hemor the Heuise of Sichem
 2. Arad of the South parts
 3. Sebon of Essebon
 4. Og of Basan.
 5. Adonizeck the Jebusite, King of Hierusalem
 6. Hoham of Hebron

Þ. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

Gen. 27. 30.
 Ind. c. 7.

F the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according to the promise of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Medianites were numbred among them, were more renouerned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur vnto Hamulah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petraa, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelue Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraa, called Shur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cetura, that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue bene, and so were the Medianites:) they felues taking possession of a better soile in Arabia the Happie, and about the Mountaines of Gilaad in Arabia Petraa. For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraa, which was very fruitfull though adioyning to the Desert, in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathæe: the same which neighboureth Iudæa on the East side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happie, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathæi (B) changed into (P).
 Rehar

Kedar, the second of Ismaels Sonnes, gaue his owne name to the East part of Babylon, or Batanea, which was afterward possesst by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the Mountaines Traom, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampyrinus calleth Kedarens, and Plinie Cedarens.

Adbeel, late downe in the Desart Arabia, neare the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happie: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Ptolomie calleth Agubens.

Abhsam, was the Parent of the Mysianusces, neare the Mountaine Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happie.

10 The Kaabens were of Stilbma: who ioyned to the Creechens, neare the Arabian gulfie, where Ptolomie setteth Zagmasis.

Of Dama were the Dumarians, betweene the Adubens and Kaabens: where the Citie Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Mossa the Misians, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Asbrius, who bordered the Napathans in the same Happie Arabia.

Thema begat the Themansians, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the Citie of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Iurians, or Chamatens: of whome Tobu was King in Davids time.

20 Of Naphri the Nubien Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zola: ouer whome Adadecer Phi. 1. 6. c. 2. commanded, while Dauid ruled Israell.

Cadme, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonians: who were afterward called Asite: because they worshipped the fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Arctus, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: Exod. 17. when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

30 Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neare Cades Num. 14. borne. After the Governement of Orthoniel, they ioyned them with the Mosabites: after Barac with the Medianites: and invaded Israell. God commanded that as soone as Israell had rest, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he waisted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Havilah to Shur.

In Davids time they tooke Siklag in Simcon: but Dauid followed them, and surpris'd them, recouering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, 1 Sam. 30. they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse. 1 Sam. 8. 1. 2.

In Ezekiels time as many of them as ioyned to Edumaea were waisted and displant'd 1 Chron. 4. 40 by the children of Simcon.

§. IIII.

Of the illustration of civillie in Europe about these times, and of PROMETHEUS and ATLAS.

Here lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but then now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civillie (bred and fostered farre off in the East, and in Egypt) beginne at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Indea. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Acadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbs and Rootes: we may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how fallily those Nations haue vaunted of that their antiquities accompanied not only with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge, And it was in this age of the World, as both Ensebius and S. Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished. Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia Doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he form'd men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of Wisdome: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to PROMETHEVS, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Aeschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire was meant, that the knowledge of Promethæus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that hee had the art to vife this fire, as thereby hee gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Promethæus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire hee had to inuettigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies, for so it is said: Idèò altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut scereno celo quam longissime astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That hee ascended Caucasus, to the end that hee might in a cleare skie discerne a farre off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expound it otherwise, and others diuerly.

Of this mans knowledge ÆSCHYLVS giues this testimonie.

Æschylus in Præm.

Africanus makes Promethæus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeares after Ogyges. Porphyrius saies that hee liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Isaac.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Promethæus, both being the Sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it bee said, that they were borne before Moses daies, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the aduantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among Men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these Sonnes of Iapetus, Aeschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus, and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Evening, and so to the evening euening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name; but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that thofe Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sai, and Ilex, with the Sea adioyning rooke name, which memorie Plato in Critias beflowes on Atlas, the Sonne of Nephele.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by thofe names to expresse diuine knowledge. Verò ATLAS sustinet eorum, nec PROMETHEVS officus Causa, nec scilicet CE PHEVS cum Fovee traderetur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorum fabula tra- (1023)

10 duxisset; Neque should ATLAS be fatis to beare up heauen, nor PROMETHEVS to be fastened to Causas, nor CEPHEVS with his Wife to be stilled, unless their diuine knowledg had raised vpon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime hee tooke him for Saturne, as Rhesus saith of Promethen. But that the Storie of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approved Hilitorians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine haue not doubted, For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Astronomie, sixth S. Augustine, were his Daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archeus the sonne of Orpheomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Arae Aradais in Peloponnesus tooke name, and therefore did the Aradians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be vnderstood, sixth Natalis Comes, before there had beene any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof vpon Enchymion: others (as Xenoporus) on Tiphon; yet Isaacus Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities gaue it Atlas of Lybia: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequall'd and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milelian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophie.

§. V.

of DEUCALION and PHAETON.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Theffalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion Cum. Alex. 5. 7. 7. was the Sonne of Prometheus, sixth Herostratus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for Mother, the rest Clymene; Homerus Strabo. lib. 9. in the fiftieth of his Odysses makes Deucalion the Sonne of Minos: but 40 he must needs haue meant some other Deucalions; for else either Flysses was mistaken, or Homerus, who put the tale into his mouth. For Flysses after his returne from Troy fined himselfe to be the brother of Elemonens, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Atrios: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that Warre) and this Deucalion the Sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Theffalie: by which in effect euery soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his Wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Theffalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impietie of men is the forcible attractiue of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule finnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and crueltie of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood Vniuersall. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iustice, and of Religion. 58 Of whom Ouid:

Non illo melior quisquam, nec amantior aqua
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior villa de arum.

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any Woman godlier than Ihee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this over-flowing: and aduised him to provide for his safetie: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotion: and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Doue, to discouer the Waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Storie had bene but an imitation of Noahs floud deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approve this Storie of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Alcathion on whom Neptene is said to have begot Delphus, which gaue name to Delphos, fore-nowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and meruailous than this floud, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phaeton: not only in Ethiopia, but in Isiria, a Region in Italie, and about Cuma, and the Mountaines of Vesuius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

OF HERMES TRISMEGISTVS, (I) TER MAXIMVS

original Mercury
THERMVS

BE vt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned: the name which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus: and of the Greekes Hermes.
Many there were of this name: and how to distinguish them in their owne times, both S. Augustine and Lactantius finde it difficult. For that Mercurie which was citemed the God of Theues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercurie, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mercuries. Of which two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the Sonne of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians leared to viter, as the Iewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercurie, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to haue deliuered literature to the Egyptians, and to haue giuen them Laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercurie which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercurie, otherwise Theus; whom Philo Biblius writeth Tautus; the Egyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrians Thot; and the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Tautus, Sanconiatius, who liued about the Warre of Troy, giues the inuention of letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slaine Argus. For he finds this Mercurie, the slauer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vner vpon S. Augustines seems to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembered. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Gracian Mercurie brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any any truth in prophane antiquitie) that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that betweene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents callt; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth year Moses died; after Crotopus, Sibonelus who raigned eleuen yeares; after him Danaus fiftie yeares; after him Lyncus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arriued in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom S. Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew of grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters, and taught the use of them to the Iewes; of whom the Phœnicians their Neighbours receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Iewes and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercurie, vpon part of whose workes he Commenteth, to haue bene foure descents after Moses; which hee hath out of Forgh, who calls Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercurie, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counsaier and Instru-ctur of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giueth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercurie instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lo. Pines vpon the sixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of S. Augustine, De Ciuitate Dei, conceiuet, that this Mercurie, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Termaximus, but his Nephew or grand-child. * Sancho-niaton, an ancient Phœnician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercurie; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturne, and called by the Phœnicians, Tautus; and by the Egyptians Thoot, or Thoyt. It may bee, that the many yeares which he is said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeares, gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which haue collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inuentor of the Egyptian Wise domes, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detesteth, yet whosoever shall reade him with an euen iudgment, will rather resolute, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and Spirit deuised. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Treatise, those things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature. For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conserued by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had bene found in all things like themselves: I thinke it had not bene peruenient to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuised by the first, and more ancient Mercurie, which others haue thought to haue bene Ioseph, the sonne of Isaac: whom, after the exposition of Pharaos dreames, they called Saphan phane, which is as much to say, as absconditorum reparator; A finder out of hidden things. But these are our-venturous trous opinions. For what this man was, it is knowne to God. Enie and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him : of whom, whofoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this fort. Hic scripsit libros, & quendam multos, ad cognitionem diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus materiam summam ac singularem Dei asserit, ipsamque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hec habet written many Bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which he affirmeth the maiestie of the most high and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which we doe. The same Father also leareth not to number him among the Syblis and Prophets. And so contrarie are these his acknowledgments to those idolatrous fictions of the Aegyptians and Gracians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatfoever is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inferred. For thus much him selfe confesseth; Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eius esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding being most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And he was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic vnum ait (saith FICINVS) prauidit prouised prouised Religionis, hic ortum noua fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem sancti, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This MERCURIUS foresaw the ruine of the old or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith: and of the coming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glorie of the Blessed, and the torments or a fraction of the wicked or damned.

12 Prof. Alteru. Trinitis.

To this I will only adde his two last speeches reported by Caleidius the Platonist, and by Volateran out of SYDAS. *Hactenus filii pulsi à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolam inuenio: cumq; post paulum à vobis corporis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote me quasi mortuum lugentis: Nam ad illum optimum beatissimq; Ciuitatem regressior: ad quam vniuersi cives morti conditione venturi sunt. Item namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui cines suos replet suauitate misericors: ad quam hac, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O Sonne, being driven from my Countrey, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safetie. And when I shall after a few daies (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, see that you do not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Cite, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the only God, the most high and chief Prince, who filleth or saeureth his Citizens with a sweetnesse more than manerfull: in regard whereof this being which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death, than a life. The other and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense but not in wordes with SYDAS. *O caelum magni Dei sapiens opus, teq; O vox patris quem ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, aduro per vniuersum eius verbum, & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei; I adore thee O heauen thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voice of the Father, which he first uttereth, when he framed the whole world, by his only begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercie vpon me.

But Sydas hath his inuocation in these wordes: Obtestor te caelum magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primus, cum omnem mundum firmasset, obtestor te per vniuersum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius eius; I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voice of the Father, which he spake first when he stablished all the World, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word containing all things, be fauourable, be fauourable.

Here were also in this age both Ascalapins, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Alecturtus, as Vines thinks in his Commentarie vpon Augustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer have beene heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiaritie with Deuills, or ill Spirits: words indeede that feldome came out of his mouth; how euer by the Septuagint they are called Sephisla or Venefici and Incantatores, Sophists, poisoners, and Incantators: by Herome Sapientes & malefici, Wise men, and euill doers: and so by Vatablas, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick: calling them παπαδοι, workers by drugs. The Generall Sorcerers and Incantors are LVNIVS Sapientes, Praestigatores & Magi. Magicians and Wise men here by him are taken in one sense: and Practifigatores are such as dazell mens eyes, and make them seeing to see what they fee not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (religion and superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaos Sorcerers appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Deuill changeth himselfe into an Angell of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary every worke which surmounteth the Wisedome of most men, is not to be condemned as performed by the helpe or ministerie of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are such as where hee also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and about nature or art: which two speculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabaldys distinguished by these names; Opus de Beneficis & opus de miracula: the one they call Sapientiam naturae, The Wisedome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis, The wisedome of diuinitee: the one Isaac practised in breeding the pied Lambs in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farr as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he vseth to his glorie that gaue them: asuming to himselfe nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth that from the time that Moses left Egypt to the death of Iosias, diuers other famous men lived in the world, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inventions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Graecians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musicall plaies to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrenesse and scarcitie vpon that part of Greece, because they refused not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Eriichonius institute the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oile, in memorie of her that first preit it out of the Oliue.

rules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Aegyptian: Monses sum sit, non Thebanum HERCVLEM, sed Aegyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terre (saith PHILOSTRATVS) It is manifest that it was the Aegyptian HERCVLES, and not like Theban, which trauielled as farre as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soeuer they were that liued in the daies and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things, whom he fauoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) hee so often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuersant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge; neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posteritie by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of idolatrie, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed it.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloued of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the feare of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glorie, caused him to heare his voice, sanctified him with faithfulness, and exalted him out of all men.

He is remembered among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic: by Megasthenes and Namenus the Pythagorian. The long lines which the Patriarchs enioyed before the flood, remembred by Moses, Eusebius, Iheronymus Aegyptius, Heateus, Elicanus, Auulianus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall flood which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Eusebius, and Sybilla haue approoued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Heateus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited speaketh of Abraham passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the bookes of Moses. Eusebius writeth the very fame of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, he saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the Citie called Camerina, or Vrien, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrologie of the Chaldeans was inuented. In iustitia pietateque (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, vt diuino precepto in Phoenicem uenerit, ibique habitauerit; For his iustice and pietie he was so pleasing vnto God, as by his Commandements he came into Phoenicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Booke and fifth Chapter speaketh reuerently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which confirme the bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospell, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimonie of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words,

MOSES enim affirmabat, docebatque, Aegyptios non recte sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemque, Aros & Graecos, qui Dijs hominum figuram affinxerunt: id verum solum esse Deum, quod navi & terram & mare continet, quod caelum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profecto imaginem, nemo sanamentis, alicuius earum rerum, quae penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effigie tione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum consistendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum. MOSES affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattail: Also that the Africans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shape of men: whereas that only is God indeede, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heauen, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likeness of those things, which are among vs: That therefore (all denising of Idolls cast aside) a worthy Temple

Temple and place of prayer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure as all therein.

Now concerning the Ægyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Ægyptians, and in as mighte in his workes and wordes, the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Pyodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Iudæus, and Eusebius Casariensis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

Ann. 1. 7. u. 22. 150. 3. 2. 2.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguished into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick; the ancient Ægyptians excelled all others. For Geometrie, which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vsfull vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly ouerflowe and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a large and spacious Plaine, free and cleare from cloudes, yeilded them delight with calcin obseruing and contemplating the risings, falling, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied: because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired further knowledge; that seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripatetick Philosophie, teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certaine fouent heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raine proceede and bee from mutations in the aire; that the Planets haue their proper soules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdom, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleueueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Ægypt, partly by means of the temperatenesse of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Sommer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertilitie, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortal, and hath transfugation from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue bene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, haue bene Deified; that those beafts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victorie, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they prevailed ouer their enemies. Moreover, the Ægyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mytical and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to bee concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this latter Ægyptian learning into three severall sorts, viz. Epistoliar, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expressed by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figuratiue wordes; as for example, where it is written: The Isis by the Hornet participateth the beautie of the Hawke; which is red thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of diuine beautie; the other symbolically, or by signatures, which is three-fold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropical, and Ænygmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, acters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sunne; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropical or Transfrent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signific the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods and of Men. So with the Egyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone: by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skillfullnesse: by a Lyon, Fortitude: by a Horse, Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudencie: by a Fish, Hatred is to be vnderstood: Ænigmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lyons body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænigmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth, that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Aire, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eie, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Governing all things. The Scythians are thought to haue bene delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherceides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthurus, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthurus returned to him a Mouſe, a Frog, a Bird, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagus, Tribune of 20 the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the Mouſe, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their aire: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodes madean other construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his Men did hasten away, as a Bird through the aire, or creepe into holes as a Mouſe, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, till his grounds. The same Historie is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

Herod. l. 4.

The fourth and last part which is Morall, and Politique, doth containe especially 30 the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Alepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinitie, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not only to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Tamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Selenus and Menasus, affirmeth that this Mercurius was not only the Inuentor of the Egyptian Philosphie, but of all other learning, called the Wisdom of the Egyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that 40 subiect 36523 Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fierie Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aereall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptian language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greeke, they seemed to haue bene first written in that tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physick sixe bookes; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrologie foure.

§. VIII.

A Brife of the Historie of IOSEPH: and of the space betwene him and OTHNIEL: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Con-temporaries to IOSEPH: and of the breach of Faith.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth year of the Egref-10 lion, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Iofua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, tooke on him the Government of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Jordan, and to possess, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iofua's rule St. Augustine dates with the raigne of Amintias, the eighteenth King in Affyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sycyonia, when Darius Lib. 18 de Ciuit.
gouerned the Argues; and Erichonius, Athen. Vol. 6. 11.

Iofua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Jordan certaine discouersers to view the feat and strength of Ierico, the next Citie vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which hee was to passe ouer. Which discouersers being fauced, and sent backe by Rahab, a Woman of ill fame, because shee kept a Tauerne or Viting house, made Iofua know, that the Inhabitants of Ierico, and those of the Countrie about it, 20 hearing of the approach of Israel had lost courage. Whereupon the Day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the regression, Iofua remoued from Sittim in the Plaines of Mosab, and drew downe his 30 Armie to the banks of the Riuer Jordan; and gaue them commandment to put themselues in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer: giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his fauour and presence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Jordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters coming from above should stand still in a heap, whereby those below towards the Dead Seas wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with drie feet.

30 He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselues (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Iuda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and the Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice & equalitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth;
and on the tenth day of the first Moneth Nisan or March, they past ouer to the o-40 ther side, taking with them twelue Stones from the drie ground in the middle of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Ierico, where they incamped the first night. At which place Iofua gaue commandment, that all borne in the last fortie year in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had beene omitted. Of 50 the neglect whereof St. Augustine giueth for cause, T he peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certaine

And as Moses beganne to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition, and distribution, was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Ruben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Jordan; Secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth yeare of his government: proved in the 14. of Iosua, v. 10. and a third diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes at Shilo, where Iosua leated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set downe in his owne bookes, as I shall not neede to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to vnite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdom and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the inuaders, to themselves and to their owne defences: hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so far as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendered themselves to Iosua. Only huc (the rest looking on to see the successe) namely the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Ierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Iarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, adreft themselves for resistance: whose Armie being by Iosua surpris'd and broken, themselves despairing to scape by flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caeue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victorie hee also tooke Makkedab, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Iosua posselt himselfe Eglon, Licron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were posselt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings, and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the ouer-late counsailes of incestuall, vnited themselves, to make one grosse strength and bodie of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practis'd and gather'd together, being at that time of all the Canaanite Kings the most powerfully which Armie being by Iosua discouered, as the same rested neare the Lake of Merom, hee vs'd such diligence, as he came on them vnawares; and obtaining an absolute victorie ouer them hee prosecuted the same to the vttermost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities: of which he burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skillfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times hee vs'd the stratageme of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon, by surprisfe. For he march'd all night from his camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when they suspected no enemy at hand; as hee did also at Merom, when hee ouerthrew Iabin, and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of this victorie, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuer of Jordan at the Springs, to as the Armie of Israel pass't it with a drie foot; the fall of Ierico by the found of the Hornes; the shewers of Haile-stones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished, than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those, which fled after the ouerthrow; as a wonder of wonders, and a worke onely proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage betweene Iosua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no distinction, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidioufnesse, and horrible deceit of this latterage, called Aequiuocation. For notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Heuites, exprely and by name, by the commandment of God to be roote out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceiuers, and counterfeites, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iosua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to be sent as Embassadors from a faire Countrey, in which trauaile their clothes were worne; their bread mouldie, which they auowed to haue bene warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrells and bottles of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Iosua hauing sworne vnto them by the Lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though vrged by the murmure of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iosua had it. For first, the commandment which hee receiued from God to roote out this Nation among the rest, preceded by faire the peace which hee had granted them. Secondly, he might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there bee any euasion from a promise made, whereof the liuing God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites that hee gaue peace, because hee knew them to bee a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that hee gaue faith, and to a Nation which came from Irre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Iordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleued what they had said, and consulted not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and serued those Puppets of the Heathen; men of an Apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they beleued not. I say therefore, that if euer man might haue serued himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iosua might iustly haue done it. For hee needed not in this case the helpe of Aequiuocation, or Mentall Reservation. For what hee sware, hee sware in good Faith; but hee sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtilitie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises hee made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuiolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom hee had sworn it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, or a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence. That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that wee therein neglect: wee therein professe that wee feare him not, and that wee set him at nought and defie him. If hee that without Reservation of Honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, prometh in his name, and makes him a witness of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne, to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or King, to breake those Contracts which have bene made in former times, and confirmed by publique faith. For though it were 400. yeares after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people defended of the Gibeonites: yet God who forgat not what the Predecessours and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to referre in silence contrarie intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subiects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassalls to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not only be made vncertaine, but all the chaines, whereby freemen are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot pass): that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies. it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his wordes are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witness, and in whose presence he taketh the oath hath promised; I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the severitie of Gods Commandements in this kinde: But this indeede is the best answer, That he breaks no faith; that hath none to breake. For whosoever hath faith and the feare of God dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holue Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Catiph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only loose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holue Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishopp which wrote that storie) that Americ the fiftieth King after Goffrey brake faith with the Catiph Elhadach, and his Viceroy, The Soldan Sauar; who being sodainly invaded by Americ drew in the Turke Syracom to their aide; whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his owne, beate the Christians out of the Holue Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it bee a direction from the holy Ghost, That hee that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, shall the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victorie ouer Amurath the Turke, and when the said King had compelled him to pence, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet he lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers: bee it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnc conquered by Isracl; to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To bee Thornes in their eyes to prouoke them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not only remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforst to inhabit the Mountaines, and places of hardiest access. And those of Iuda were not able to bee Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of yron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoining vnto Juda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azazah, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeares, eightene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expresse in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him five and twentie yeares, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Author of the Hebreu Chronology eight and twentie: And Massius sixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteene: Ioannes Lucidus, euentene: Caetanus, ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen and twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, sixe and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeares from the deliuerance of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessarie that we allow to Iosua only eightene of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to mee seems the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approved opinion.

The same necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeares from the departure out of Egypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of error, such as haue infer-30 red yeares betwene Iosua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius finds eight yeare, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapters vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeare: Bucholzer and Kaufner but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeares, there can be no void yeares found betwene Iosua and Othniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed vnto Iosua by the acceptm already specified. The praises and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the sixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him. Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battells of the Lord?

Euseb. Prep. E. newg.

40 That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter ver. 26. And Iosua wrote these wordes in the booke of the Law of God: which seemeth rather to haue bene meant by the covenant which Iosua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promiskd to serue and obey the Lord: which promise Iosua causd to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caetan and Ablensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceine that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorum:
1. 10. 13. remembered by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the worke of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these wordes of the 26. vers. And Iosua wrote these wordes, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when the 50 people had answered Iosua: The Lord our God will we serue, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

1. 10. 14. v. 26

about the same time the fiftie Daughters of Danaus (as it is said) slew the fiftie Sonnes of Aegyptus, all but Lyncus who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived also with Iosua, Phenix and Caadmus, and neare the end of Iosua's life. Jupiter is said to haue rauished Europa the Daughter of Phenix, (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and begot on her Minos, Radamansibus, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this rauishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomenus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a yong or strong man at the same Troian warre. And so doth Nestor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greekes, Thefens and Peribous for men of antiquite, and of ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

§. I.

The Proame to the description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an exposition of the name of Syria.

THE Storie of the Judges ought to follow that of Iosua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Iewes was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the description of Samaris: But because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Storie past, with that which followeth hath bene acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderstanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderstood, and conceiued. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue bestowed on euery Tribe his proper portion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength, were by the Iewes obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leaue vnconquered: by whom he might correct and scourge them, when vngrateful for his many graces, they at sundrie times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deafe and dead Idolls of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (saith S. AUGUSTINE) ideo maxime trascurit in hoc seculo, ne trascuratur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalium adhibet severitatem, ne eternam iuste inferat ultionem; The divine goodnesse is especially therefore angrie in this world, that it may not be angrie in the world to come, and doth mercifully of temporall severitie, that it may not illy bring temporal vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I haue added a short Storie of the beginnings, and ends of diuers Kingdomes and Common-wealthes: and to helpe my selfe herein,

I haue

I have perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect: among whom, because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduertured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their old patternes.

And because Canaan, with Palästina of the Phylisians, and the Lands of Og and Sihon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Anathites, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the general, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus called Leuco Syriani, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petras, that Region also which the Greekes call Mejopotania, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riueres, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aram-Naharajim is expounded: also Padon Aram: that is, Lingum Syria, because the two Riueres goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Calefrya which the Latines call Syria Cæna, because it lay in that fruitful Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus and Anti-Lybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodiceæ, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damaſceus or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damaſcus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adioyning to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobai: ouer which Adadaceer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syrphœnics: and lastly Syria Palästina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudæa also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giueth the name of Syria Iudæa.

But Arius Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, maketh it a common name to all those of Nachis Sonnes, which pass ouer Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, faith he, is as much as transiens or transmittens, of going or passing ouer. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certaine abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of *C. Now besides these Prouinces of Phœnicia, and Palestina (both which the Riuer of Jordan boundeth; saying that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus; that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermon, Gilead and Arnon, otherwise Traceni, fell to the possession of halfe Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: aswell because anciently possit by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites, which Easternmost parts are againe diuided into Basan or Batanea, into Gilead, Galab, Midian, Arnon, and the Territories of the Machati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are knowne to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general: and by the names of Traceniis, Pleoria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speake in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, for these be his wordes. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar vntill Azab (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text. And as thou goest vnto Socome and Gomorab, and Ainab, and Sebojim, euen vnto Lahba: by which wordes Moses setteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomie it seemeth to be faire more large. For it is therein written: All the places whereon the sole of your feet shall treade shall be yours: your coast shall be from the wilderness, and from Libanon, and from the Riuer Perab, vnto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanori is put for Zidon: and the Wildernesse for Gerar and Azab, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perab be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petraea, and the Desert as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possit: nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue that by the Riuer Perab, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territory of the holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perab in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it but per gentes in amissionem receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Affryia, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countreies giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vpperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not only to inclose them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow: but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods themselves also serued and obaied. And first the promise by which the Hebreues claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the last condition both in the Verbes preceding, and subsequent: which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect: who know that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodness of God looked for, aswell in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perseuer in his love, seruice, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandmentes was a condition ioyned to the prosperitie of Israel. For therein it is written: Therefore shall ye so keepe all the Commandmentes which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whether ye goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your daies in the Land which the Lord swore vnto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the land conquered, and the diligent, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to doe, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it bee manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Majestic, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely voided, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, saith he, obedi- entia promissionem praecipiam non esse hoc Politico regno, He beweith that his chiefe promise is not of a civill Kingdom. To which agrees that answer, which S. Hierome made to certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouerthrew the reputation of the Iewes Stories, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat vivunt terram quae in caelis est; (that is) Only to that Land of the living, which is in Heaven.

Quoniam tota Iudaeorum Regio adae angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudo habeat 160.
miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones loca vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Iudaeis occupata, sed tantum divina sollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrie of the Iewes is so narrow in compasse that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and
40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countries, Places, Cities, and many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possess, but were only granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Esay touching the blessings promised vnto Hiernsalem: where he hath these wordes. De quo diximus Hiernsalem nequaquam in Palaestina Regione petendam: quae totius Praevinciae deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur. & penarum partur sitis: ita ut caelestibus rotatur pluujs, & varietatem fontium efferuarum extruere soleat: sed in Dei manibus ad quam dicitur festinauerunt struere iudaei; From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hiernsalem is not to be sought in that Region of Palaestina, which is the worlde of the whole Prouince, and aged with craggie Mountaines: and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preserue thine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building Cesternes, but this Hiernsalem is in Gods handes, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened, so saith S. Hierome, where also to preuent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neque hoc dico in suggestione terra Iudae, ut Haereticus Syrophanta mentitur:
aut quo auctorem historiae veritatem: quae fundamentum est intelligentiae spiritualis, sed ut decuriam supercilium Iudaeorum: qui Synagoga angustiis latitudinis Ecclesiae praeferrunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum viuificantem: ostendant terram pro-missionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the Land of Iudae (as the Ihereticall Synophant doth helme me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spiritual understanding, but to beate downe the pride of the Iewes:
which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue further then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them leaue the Land of 40 promise, flowing with milke and honnie.

By this it may also be gathered, how fouler it be vnlike (seeing the West-bound in the place, Dent. 11. 24. had his truth in the littoral fence, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East bound, should be taken only in a spiritual fence) yet neuer-thelesse that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be vnder-stood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Affor, Nephthalim, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were feated in Pharicia, I will beginne with these three, taking Affor for the first: of which Tribe yet before 50 I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly expressed, so that the vnskillfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuerfity (as by those learned in the Iehrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions
 of

of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions haue; and partly becaufe the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter thinke fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

¶. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THe Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maide of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men about twentie yeares of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mulcted by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, 20 there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plains of Sidon and the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Sidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolemais Acon alongt the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophetic, As ser panis concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And hee shall giue pleasures for a King.

of Sidon.

THe first Citie seated on the North border of the Territorie of Asher, was Sidon, which Iosua calleth the great Sidon: both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine denues the name from the abundance of Fish found on those shores: whereof it hath been called Sidona. But that it was farre more ancient Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witnesseth, 40 the same being founded by Sidon the eldest of Canaans Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosuas time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Asherites, or any of their Successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, euen vnto the comming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Elij, Eheremie, Eeckiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Sidon is seated on the very wath of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterranean or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarbat: which standeth betwene it and Tyre, 50 the distance betwene which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Sidon and Tyre, is fourteene thousand paces, saith Scylerus: but Padiannus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissemburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. of distance as well betweene these two knowne Cities, as all theret, make it ouer difficult to deuise any new scale to the Map and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agagenors time there is no memorie: 'T he Storie which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof; being by time confumed and lost. It seemeth to bee more ancient than Tyre: which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, becaufe it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became faire more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zobabel, their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone; for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Atheoricall Arts and Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wife Zidonians. The Citie was both by nature and art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an ynaccessiblle Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Cattle it hath on the South side by the Port of Agypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colomes besides that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Baotia in Greece.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the invention of Blasse, which they vfed to make of those sands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, near Ptolemais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleare Glasses which they make at Morana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie. Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrarjvs officinvs Nobilis; Zidon a famosus Glasse-maker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-houes.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Cananites) worshippers of Basd and Afforath: which Idolts though common to the other of the sitte of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 31. 10 and Judg. 10. 6) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1. Kings 11. 5. in the storie of Solemons Idolatrie: where Afforath is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the storie of Achab, the chiefe worshipping of Basd, where it is said that he marrying Jezebel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Basd. Diuers Basd and diuers Afforaths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plurall names of Basidm and Afforath, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere for euent the name Afforath, as I am informed by a skilfull Udavian, is plurall: the singular being Afforath: whence Ind. 2. 13. the Septuagint reads αφωραθαιωνων; They worshipped the Afforaths. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Basds and Afforaths, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the duresitie of the formes of the Images; or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were double in diuers Cities diuers. Au-

40 gustine quæst. 16. in Judg. thinks Basd and Affarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrrians) call Iuno by some such name as Affarte. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddes of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Affarte: whom he makes to be borne of Tyre and Syria, and to haue bene the wife of Adonis: as also Macro. 2. Satur. cap. 21. Eies that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Affyrrians: and Hierome vpon Eccle. 8. 44 notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Affarte, or Venus, they did bewaile her husband Adonis: as also the Grecians, did in their songs of ADONIS. Mourne for ADONIS the faire, dead is ADONIS the faire.

50 Howbeit others in that place of Hezekie: not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifices of Isis: whose losse of her husband Osiris, was as famous in the Agyptian Idolatrie, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Agyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoeuer these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatrie: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine and Gospel of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jewes: who had bene taught by Moses, and the Prophets so many yeares, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke. Woe be to thee Chorazin, &c. for if the great workes which were done in thee, had bene done in Tyrus, and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say unto you it shall bee easier for Tyrus, and Zidon, at the day of judgement than for you.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocese of Tyre. But in the yeare of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Jerusalem, in the yeare 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Normans, who came with a flecte to visit the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recovered, the commandment thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeare 1250 it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowick the French King: while hee spent foure yeare in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeare 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turkes, and hath the name of Zat.

†. III.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe Historie of Tyre in the same coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphat, is the next Citie Southward from Zidon, betwene it and the River called Azar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a Citie very famous for the excellent Wine growing neare it: of which Strabonius.

Vinamibi non sunt Gazeta, Chis, Falerna, Quaq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's wine.

This Citie had also a Bishop of the Diocese of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, saith Postellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous Citie of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of great rule and power, the Tyrans erected Tyris, Leptis, and Carthage in Affrica, of which Virgil. Vrbis antiqua fuit Tyris tenerae Coloni Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phoenicum, a Colome of the Phenicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italy, Nola: in Asia the Iellie, Dromus Aethiis, which Citie the Scholust of Apollonius placeth neare the River Pheylus, in Bitynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation: because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end the Latines, as it seemes, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, offron Sarraunus, by which name Iuuenal and Siluis remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day: the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colome of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon: which Trogus also confirmeth, though Ercastus by affinity of name makes Thiras the Sonne of Iaphet to bee the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie whose antiquitie is of ancient dates:)

dues: yet that Thiras the sonne of Iaphet set himselfe in the bolome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to persuade mee.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to bee the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Cicero: and Iosephus, and Isidore make this Citie elder than Salemons Temple 240. yeares: Cicero saith 361. who also addeth that Tyrus the Wife of Agenor gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the storie of their Kings.

- For strength and for the commoditie of the harbour, and the better to receive
- Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island, 7000. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middle of the Sea, as some reade, or as others in the inner-moat part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it the Mart of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Esay a Mart of the Nations: and so Proud, Wealthie, and Magnificent was this Citie, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the world.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufecture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet cloth: which, saith Iulius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing alongt the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Cochinus or Purpura: the haire of his lips became of that colour. It worshipping the same Idolls that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Patron in after-times.

For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrans presented him with a crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that hee had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their Citie: and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it.

Wherupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremonie: but this availed not. For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitions, hee desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, hee as one whome no perill could feare, nor labour wearie, gathered together as many

- ships as he could; and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many waightie Stones, from the old Citie of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often walsh away with the strength of the Sea, and the Tides, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Island: and hauing once approached their Walls; hee ouer-topt them with Towers of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the sword that resisted, after which he caused 20000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongt the Sea-shore: which execution vpon cold blood hee performed (as some Authors affirme) vpon the issues of those Ilaues which had formerly flaine all their

Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. His victorie of Alexander ouer the Tyrans, Iosephus remembreth: and how Samballet reuoluted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Governour, which Darius seated in Somaria: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Mansse, brother to Iudon the high Priest of Iherusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might bee built on the Mountaine Gurizim ouer Somaria: that the forces of the Iewes being diuided,

Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The Honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his sonne-in-law Mansse, whom the Iewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged

- Gaza*, Samballet, whom Gul. Tyrus calleth Sambalid, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre, by the crueltie of Alexander, it was attempted by Solomon for the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the reit of Syria, became enuious of the beautie, riches, and power of that Citie. Hee besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three-score ships of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victualls nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelue saile-featured that fleet, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Afryians: notwithstanding, the Afryian continued his resolution and lay before it by his Lieutenants five yeares, but with ill success. And this siege Menander Ephesius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the storie among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander conuerted into Greeke) adding that Eulenus, whom Tyrius calleth Heliſaus, was then King of Tyre, hauing governed the same fixe and twentie yeares. Soone after this repulse of Salmanassar, and about 200. yeares before the victorie of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at such time as he destroyed Iherusalem with the Temple, came before this Cite: who indeed gaue to Alexander the example of that despairfull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawſe and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Ezech. 39. 18.
Ezech. 23. 46.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeares, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did these Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Ejzay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end and after thirteene yeares siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of ships, abandoned their Cite, transporting with them selues the ablest of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches sailed thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perills, or any person vpon whom to auenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Egyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Armie. Whereupon Saint Iherome noteth, that God leaueth not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happinesse refered for his Seruants and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repaieth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Ezech. 39. 17. 19.

2. 46.

Now this enterprize of Nabuchodonosors against Tyre, prophane Historians haue not been silent. For both Dioctes, and Philostratus (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phenician Histories remember it.

Joseph. Ant. 1. 10.
cap. 13.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this Cite of Tyre repaired and recouered it selfe againe: and continued in great glorie about 300. yeares, euen to the comming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith near 600. yeares: the Archbishop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Iherusalem only: who within his owne Diocesse had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cesarea, Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthofia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortosa) and Marada. But in the year 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phenicia and Palestina, subiected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracens. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whose Tyrannie it suffered with the other Palestine Cities 488. yeares.

Gul. Ty. de Bell. Sac.

Gul. Ty. de Bell. Sac. 17.

In the year 1112. it was attempted by Baldwin King of Iherusalem but in vaine: yet in the year 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Iherusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleets of Gallies, it was againe recouered, and subiected to the Kings of Iherusalem; and so it remained 165. yeares.

Finally, in the year 1189. Saladine hauing first taken Iherusalem, remoued his whole Armie and late downe before Tyre: drawing his fleet of ships and Gallies from from Alexandria into the port, this Cittie as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The Christians finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and falling out resolutely vpon his armie, slew so great numbers of them, and followed their victorie with such furie, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeares after which victorie the bodie of that famous Fredericke Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies ouer a Riuer vnsfordable 10 perished by the weight of his armor therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral church of Tyre, nere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and grauen with gilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeares before therein buried: but in the yeare 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turks.

†. IIII.

of Ptolomaeus or Acon.

20 THE third Cittie along the coast of the Sea, which the Affries could not obtaine, on the fourth bound of Aster was Acho, which was the ancient name there: of Acheron, though other good Authors affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomaeus. Pliny calleth it Acon; and otherwise the Colonia of Claudius. It had also the name of Cath or Cad, and of Ziglerus it is called Hactipos.

But lastly, it was intided Ptolomaeus after the name of one of the Aegyptian Ptolomies: which Cittie also as it is 1. Macc. 11. another of the Ptolomies indelicately wrote from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphane: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra daughter of the said Ptolomaeus not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabeus treacherously surprized 30 and slaine as it is 1. Macc. 12. 48. by the peridiousness of Tryphon, whom soon after Antiochus pursued as it is in the Storie ensuing: and by likewise about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the warre against Demetrius one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolomaeus ioynded, ouerthrowne and treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolomaeus: who enioyed not the glory of his victorie and treason about three dayes, for God strucke him by death.

For the beautie and strength of this Cittie, this Alexander made it his regal seate, two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for siletie and capacite not inferiour to anie other in all that Tract. This Cittie is distant from Jerusalem some foure and thirtie miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castellum Lambertii: from Tyre Antoniensis maketh it two and thirtie Italian miles. In the middle of the Cittie there was a Tower of great strength sometime the Temple of Bel-zelub: and therefore called the Castle of PHES, on the toppe whereof there was maintained a perpetual light, like vnto that called Pharus in Egypt: to giue comfort in the night to those ships, which came nere and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocesis of Tyre, after it became Chrestian: but in the yeare 636. (a fatal yeare to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Hosmarus the Saracen. In the yeare 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the reueneue was giuen in recompence. Againe, in the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred foure score and seauen Saladine King of Egypt, and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeare of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninetie and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeare 1291. it of the Castle of S. GEORGE.

Recho
Of the place &

his death. See
Chap 9 §. 1.

Flue miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of S. George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adjoining bearing the same name. And though for the credit of S. Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue every man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours Roiallie haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the world had not that scarcitie of Saints in those daies, as that the English were driuen to make such an erection vpon a Fable, or Person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Affer, to haue beene in the fields of Libanus: betweene the Riuier Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these. *Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inelyrum Christi Militem D. GEORGIVM, Regis filium ab inmanissimo Dracone asseruisse: eam, maculata bestia parenti restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata: In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint GEORGE, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and hauing killed the beast, deliuered the Virgin to her Parent. In memorie of which deede a Church was after built there: Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authors he cieth Lodouicus Roman. Patrie. Navigationum, l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of S. George. If this authoritie suffice not, we may rather make the Storie allegoricall, figuring the victorie of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

t. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BEtwene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong Citie of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierom calleth Achzaph, and Iosephus Edappos, Plinie Edippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Afferites. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauielled as farre to the North as Reob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berath which by Ezekiel cap. 47. v. 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hedarhezor, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. cap. and 8. verse, and cap. 10. v. 6. and it defended it selfe against the Afferites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achzaph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbab, and Aphék did.

This Aphék it was, whose Wall falling downe, slew seuen and twentie thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had beene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Abab. Here Junius findes that the Philistims incamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his Note vpon the first of Samuel, the 50. p. and 1. he takes Aphék there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue beene in Iuda. Of which see Ios. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. hee reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphék. Where others conuert it, Percussions Syras in Aphék.

The next place along the coast is Sandalium, first called Schapladium of Schanoer, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when hee beleiged Tyre: and set on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betwene Aezaba and Tyre: which Cattle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the yeare of Christ 1157. when he undertooke the recouerie of Tyre.

Not much about a mile from this Cattle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living waters: from whence not only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to tra-

 Within the Land, and to the East of Aeziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the Citie of Achaph, or Asub, or atier St. Hierome Achaph, a Citie of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iosua, at the waters of Aleron.

Of Thoron, Gisela, and some other places.

20 Farther into the Land towards Jordan, was seated the Cattle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdenar built on the Easter-most Hills of Tyre, in the yeare 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre: against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Cattle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Storie of the Warres for the recouerie of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobilitie. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third, King of Hierusalem, lieth buried: There were sixe Castles besides this within the Territorie of Affer: whereof foure are seated al-

30 most of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castellum Lanerit, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castellum Regium, and Belfort: The first neare the Sea vnder the Hills of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and Fellowship of the Tentonicke, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possessed the best part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was Ptolomais Acon. The first Fortresse was for beautie and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the Riuier Naar, neare the Citie Ramis: of which in this Tribe 10/19. 29 for which the Vulgar reads Herma: making the Citie a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Cattle of 40 Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Aegypt, was by the Christians Arme raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulced.

 To the East of Belfort, is the strong Citie of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rehob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Galala (which Herod, surnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territorie of Chabul, Quod Syrorum lingua dicitur

50 this Chabul or Cabul, containing a circuit of those twenty Cities giuen to Heray, to haue beene without the compasse of the holy Land: though bordering Affer on the North side: as it is said, 1. Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israclites: howsoever, that at ter Thoran had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears 2. Chron. 8. 14. And it seemes they were conquered by Dauid from the Syri Rechobos, whose Citie Reob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoran, they place the Cities of Gisfala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Jordan: Gisfala was made famous by Iohn the Sonne of Leui, who from a meane eluate gathering together four hundred Theeues, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romanes attempted the conquest of Judas: by whose practise Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all hee could the Citie of Gisfala (whereof he was natue) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the Citie, gaue opportunitie, during the contention, to the Tyrrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forst it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authoritie rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Maior, and * Cades: (of Cedeffa) of the first was that Syro-phenician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neare the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabaus ouer-threw the Armie of Demetrius.

There are besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Affer, diuers others: as on the South border, and neare the Sea, Messill or Misicall: within the Land * Besara, b Bethdagan, and Bethemes, standing on the South border betweene Affer and Zabulon: on the North side ioyning to Syro-phenicia, is the Citie of Eththalon, or Cheleston, the vtmost of the holy Land that way: vnder which towards the Sea is Chall, and then * Enoch supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his Sonne Enoch, but without probability, as I haue formerly proued: there are others also besides these as Ammon or Chammou, of which Ios. 19. 28 where also wee reade of Nehiel, Rema, Alamelec, and Beten: the Cities of Aleath, or Chelath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misael, which we haue already mentioncd, were by the Afferites giuen to the Leuites. Others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Iudg. 1. 30. to which out of Iosua we may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no storie dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

of the Riuers and Mountaines of Affer.

The riuers to the north of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler ioyneth Lycus, Ptoleme, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neare Berytus: which Riuer of Leontis, Ptoleme drawes neare vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Ptoleme doth, betweene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brocard intituleth Eleutherus: for which he also citeth Plinie; and the first of Machabees the 11. Chap. but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Affer: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesseth Ptoleme: and therefore Pintus calleth it Yalania, and Postellus Felana: which Riuer boundeth Phenicia on the North side: to which Strabon also agreeth: but this principall Riuer of Affer, Arius Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and describerd the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuee Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streames which runneth into it from the North side, Near, and another from the South-west Chabul: of the Citie adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another Riuer describerd by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no other Author, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word Ghe which is added thereto Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley; and for a Valley the the Pulgar, and Genena, and Arias Montanus turne it. There is also found in Affer the River of Belus, remembred by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagetha, faith Plinie: out of the sands of this River are made the best Glasses, which sometime the Zidemiens practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chebedamim, which it cannot be: for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cen deusa, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true that the River of Chisoutaketh water from Chebedamim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it finde the Sea at Ptolomus Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betwene Caphas and Siamannum, witness Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of Luqu waters adioyning to Tyre: and Miserephat, or after S. Hierome, Miserephatim, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Calefrya: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phoenicia, and Syria, extend themselves farre into the Land Eastward: four hundredstadia or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley 20 of Calefrya: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they beginne at Theophsophon, or Des Jades, neare Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they beginne to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desert Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sien, the Phoenicians Syrion, and the Amorites Sanur, neither is this any one Mountaine a-part, but a continuation of Hills: which running farther Southward, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Jeremie propheth: Galaad in mihis caput Libani: noting that this Gilead is the highest of all those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconitis: and Ptoleme by Leppus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Affer, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrarie to all other Cosmographers, but hee giueth no reason for his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are couered with snow all the Sommer, the Hebrew word Libanon (kith Weyßenburg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those trees yeeld: because Libanotis is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphradisus affirmeth, that on Caucasus there fallth a kinde of honic dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard sugar, which the Inhabitants call Saccarum, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Rivers which Libanus belteweth on the neighbour Regions are, Chyforhoas, Jordan, Elenthernus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons boetorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountaines of Affer, are those Hills about Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebos, or the Mountaine of Abarim, in Rubem, Moses beheld Libanus three-score miles distant.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

The next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the Sonne of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maide of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able to bear armes, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Sonnes 45400. Besides Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twentie yeares of age. The Land of Nephtalim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adioyning, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West wth Asher, and on the East and South-east by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adioyning to this Territorie of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the Citie of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountaines adioyning shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Pestellus calls it Balbec; NIGER, Marbech; and Leoncaius, Beelbeeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldean Paraphrast, otherwise Beelshemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The Citie of the Sunne: into which, saith Plinian, Senecus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Gestellus nameth Deamirach: 30 and of this name Stephanus also findeth a Citie in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adioyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrona hath the name of Chalcidica, ouer which Herod, Agrippa, and Berenice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gaue name to the R Region adioyning, of which Lysanius the Sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Gouernour: whereof Ptolomee gaue it the addition of Lysanij, and called it Abila Lysanij. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which hee notes that one Diogenes a famous Sophister was natieue, who by Volaterran is intitled Aphileus not Abileus. After that this Citie of Abila or Aphila, had receiued the Christian Faith, Prifillinus became Bishop thereof: flaine afterward by our British Masimus at Treuer. For distinction of this Citie (sit be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered that in the Tribe of Manasse, ioyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is an other Citie of the same name, saying that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembered in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calls Abelmachas, and Eleremus Belmachas. In the place of Samuel for distinction like it is written, Abel Beth-Machas (for belike it was the Towne of Machas, the Wife of Maacir, the Sonne of Manasse), the Father of Gilead in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Masim. This Citie Iosab besieged: because Seba the sonne of Bisbri, who rebelled against Dauid, fled therinto for succour: but a certaine wife woman of the Citie perswading the people to call Seba his head ouer the wall, Iosab retired his Armie. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground, and therefore no meruaile, that many Townes (with some addition for distinction

IN this Tribe of Nephthaim, was that famous Citie of Iabin, in *Iosua*s time called Afor (or after the Chaldaean Paraphrast, Elafzor) by Iosephus Afora, by Iunus * Chazor: which Lactian names Hebron: the Regall Citie and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West part of Nephthaim, towards Asher. In this Citie was that great Renderous, and assembly of those foure and twentie Kings against Iosua: who being all overthrowne, slaine, and scattered, this their powerfull Citie was by Iosua taken and burnt to dust. But in proesse of time the same being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a second King Iabin, 137. yeares after the death of this first Iabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatrie, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable seruitude twentie yeares: till Deborah the Prophetesse overthrow Sisera, Iabins Licutenant, and his Armie, neare the mountaine Tabor. This Citie Salomon restored at such time as he also reedified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with Megido, Beithoron, and other Citys; but about 250. yeares after, it fell into the handes of Teglathphasar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, saith Aldrichimus called Antiopia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is an other Citie of this name in the Territorie of Beniamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, b saith Elerom.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Iuda, See chap. 25. 51. of a fourth in Brachims, See that which follows in this place of a fifth in this Tribe of Nephthaim, called Hien: Chazor we vnder, Ios. 19. 37. 50. which we may adde Chazor-Henan, in the Westermork of Manasse, ouer Iordan, Ex. 47. Nam. 14. 8. also in Simeon, Chazor, an other

THEre was also on the border, and within the Territorie of Nephthaim, that renowned Citie of Lais, or Lajsch, as Iunus writes it, or Leschen; which Citie the children of Dan (being straightened in their Territorie vnder Iuda) invaded and mastered: and gaue it the name of their owne Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Gen. the fourteenth, at which place Abraham surprised Chedorlaomer and his confederates: and followed his victorie as farre as Sobab, formerly remembred in the diuision of Syria, other wise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Dantes, it had the ioynt name of Leschem Dan. Westfoburg writes it Lais, the Geneca Lajsch, IOSEPHVS, Dans; BENIAMIN, Balina; BREITENBACH, Belena: but the now Iud. 18. Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina this day: witnesse Neabrigenfis, Tyrus, Volaterranus, Breuard the Monke, and Fogellus: who also taketh this Citie to be the same, which in Atthweh the 15. v. 39. in the Valger is called Magedan, for which the Greeke Text hath Magedala in that place, and in S. Marke, speaking of the same storie, Dalmanntha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free Citie, of the alliance and confederacie of the Zidomans; or else subiect vnto the Kings thereof: for it is written in the eighteenth of Iudges: And there was none to helpe, because Lais was farre from Zidon: and they had no business with either men, for it was about thirte English miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

Plin. l. 5. c. 15. In after-times when these Regions became subiect to the State of Rome; it had the name of Panacas, from a Fountain adioyning so called: and therefore Plinom calls it Casaria Panaca. Hegesippus calls it Pannum, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copie: for in Hegesippus set out by Basilius; it is written Pannum without an (R): and at such time as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Traconitis, sometime Basan, this Cite was by him amplified and fortified; and both to giue memorie to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Casar, he called it * Casaria Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head Cite of Traconitis: and one of the first Cities of Decapolis.

* Inspis in the Booke of the *revel. v. This Cite built by the Danites was neare the ioyning together of those two Rivers which arise from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two apparent Fountaines of Jordan: in a soile exceeding fruitful, and pleasant, for as it is written Iudg. 18. It is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this Cite, it was that S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es PETRVS & super hanc Petram, &c. After this Cite recieued the Chriftian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fulch the fourth King of Ierusalem, and after the death of Goodfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians: and shortly after by them againe it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the world subiect to the

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Among the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the least: so often remembred by the Euangelists, This Cite had the honour of Christis presence three yeares: who for that time was as a Citizen thereof, in which he first Preached and taught the Doctrine of our saluation: according to that notable prophetic of Esay 9. The people that walked in darknesse have seene a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, euen where it entrench into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich soile: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophesied in this these wordes. And thou Capernaum which art lifted up unto heauen, shalt bee brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatnesse of that Citie: for it was one of the principall Citie of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Citie's magnificence in S. Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth: it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne; yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Brochar, Breidenbach, and Salinius affirme, that it then consisted but of fixe poore Fishermens houses.

The Region of ten principall Citie called Decapolitana or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in S. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, also remembred; but I finde no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinie himselfe confesseth: for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Calvus in Castolis; and endeth it to the South at Aegypt and Arabia; by which description it embraceth Phoenicia, a part of Calesyria, all Palesstina, and Iudaea.

Plinie also makes it large, and for the ten Citie of which it taketh name, he numbred foure of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three Damascus, Opetus, Raphana, then Philadelphus (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as Ighelle Amona rather because it was the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Pro. Philadelphus gave it this later and new name) 20 Then Seythopolis sometime Nysa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memorie of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Bethsan, for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Calesyria, which was also called Antioch and Selenia: but it is Gadara in Basjan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, seated on a high hill, neare the Riuer of Hieromaix. This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manasse ouer Jordan: but he mistaketh it: for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betweene Hippus and Gerasa, whereas Iaboc entreth the same Sea betweene Ephron and Phanuel. For the seventh he nameth * Hippus or Hippion, a Citie so called of a Colonie of Horsemen there garriford by Hieron, on the East side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasse ouer Jordan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region ouer Jordan called Peraea. For the ninth Celasa, which Iosephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Calesyria by Iosephus, Hegesippus and Stephanus: but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phoenicia. The tenth and last, Plinie nameth Camatha, and so doth Suetonius, and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a Citie in the Region of Basjan ouer Jordan, so called, because those two Hillson which it is seated, haue the shape of a Cammell. But the collection of these ten Citie, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brochar, Breidenbach, and Salinius, which make them to be these: Casaria, Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes, Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capernaum, 40 Bethsaida, Isotapata, Tiberias, and Seythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors disagree herein and giue no reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract betweene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came into the Sea of Galilee, through the middlest of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North, by the Phoenician Sea, betweene Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hills of Galbo and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracoron, otherwise Hiermon, Sannir, and Galadad on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the holy Land: and from the North to the South, neare the same distance which may be 50 each way fortie English miles.

Of Hamath.

BVt to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is seated neare the foote thereof the Citie of * Hamath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adjoining taketh name : the same which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis : * Jacobus Zezler, Itraa. Itraa Regio tenet borealis tribus Nephtalim, per montem Libanum vsq; Trachones. The Countrey of Itraa, saith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls

Trachonitis Itraa, he mistakes the seat of this Region : and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Itraa (which Hegippus calls Perea, and G.Tyrius, Baccar) the same with Tracoonis, yet Tracoonis it self is farre more to the East than Hamath in Nephtalim : for Tracoonis lieth betweene Casaria Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones : which the Hebreues call Gilead : and this Hamath or Chammath is seated vnder Casaria, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Caelesyria, beyond the Mountaines Trachones,

b. So Hierome in his Com. which b. Hierome vpon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hamath or Hamath the lesser in Amos c. 6. v. 3. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seemes, for distinction from the other in Nephtalim, though Matth. Beroldus relating Hierome, rather follow the opinion of Zezler about mentioned, as indeed it can not easily be illiud, that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the same Citie which Iofhu 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephtalim, was also called Hamath (whence the word Hamath and Emath were framed) it may be gathered partly because the other Hamath, Cleus b. 3. for distinction is called Chammath Tjuba, as this (as it may seeme by Iofhu 21. 32.) was Chammath Dor, and Chammath Isle, as we have noted 2. c. 24. Secondly, because Numb 34. 8. and also Ezekiel 47. 10. Hamath in the North side of the holy Land, is placed too near the West corner to bee that Chammath Tjuba. for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Mose to name neuer a place Eastward along all the breadth of the holy Land, until we come to Hierome (for to they expound Mount Hor, Numb 34. 9.) and beyond Hierome Eastward in this North side, they make him to name diuers Townes, first Chammath, then Ziphon, then Ziphon, and lastly Chasur-bezan, a thing most vobly seeing Israhel had little or nothing Eastward beyond Hierome. Therefore we must needs expound Hor to be one of the Hills neare Sidon, and so those Townes, as they are named to lie in order on the North side of Affors, Nephtalim, and Manassis : and in like maner those in Ezekiel 47. 10. Chasur, then Chammath, and so in order, Brasim, Sidraim, Tjedad, Chasur, Chasur-bezan. c. Of which Iofhu 19. 35. d. Which Reboh, or Rekoh, is placed in Iofhu 29. 28. is placed in after towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephtalim.

e. Tilemetus Stelle and Peter Laiffas, in their Tables of the holy Land. f. Iofhu, Act 13. 8.

the other Hamath or Emath (being Eurr removed and beyond the former named mountaines, which inclose all those Lands which Israhel ever had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Itraa, witnesse * Stella and Laislan : and notthat in Nephtalim, where * Jonathas Matthabaus attended the Armie of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

For though Tracoonis is comprehended within Itraa (and therefore it is said to be sinima Galilee Gentium) yet it hath beginning ouer the mountaines Tracoonis, and so it stretcheth into the plaines of the Territorie of Itraa : where Phlip the brother of Herode was Tetrachor or President both of Itraa and Tracoonis : both which are to recover Jordan towards the East. But Chamath in Nephthim, is on the west side of Jordan towards the Mediterranean sea.

The Countie Ituras was so called of Ietur one of the sonnes of Israel, it is placed in the bounds of Celefyria and Arabia the desert.

The people of Ituras were valiant and warlike men and excellent Archers. Of whom Virgil.

Ituras Taxi torquentur in arcus.

10 Of Eugh the Iturians bowes were made.

This Citie Chamath or Hamath in Nephthim seems to have been as ancient as the other in Ituras, both built by Amathus the eleventh sonne of Canaan. Whether in the time of Dauid, this, or the other had Tobu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hamath in Nephthim were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subjugation Tobu reioyced, because Hadadezer whom the Damasceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the strength and prosperitie of Dauid, hearing of his approach towards his territorie, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of golde, silver and brass.

20 But it seemeth that Dauid in such great successfe should not haue had peace with Tobu if he had bin King of any place in Nephthim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tobus: which Citie Salomon after his Fathers death made himselfe Master of, as a part of the lands (* in the larger and conditionall promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hammath of Nephthim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being as it hath beene said possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

30 While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a Citie well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

t. V I.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and diuers other Townes.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath towards Jordan standeth the Citie Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountaine Daphnis: which falleth into the lake of Meron. Hereunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the City of Iericho: and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor: who to be auenged of Zedekias infidelity, beyond the proportion of pietie, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might bee the last that euer hee should behold in this world, and so the most remembered, hee commaunded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in yron chaines, hee was led a slave to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life. Of which feldome-exampled calamitie, though not in expresse words, Hierome the Prophet fore-told him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldeans; yet shall hee not see it, though hee shall die therein.

50 There are besides these before remembered, many other strong Cities in Nephthim, as that which is called Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in Ituras, an other in Juda, of which Ios. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of Nephthim, as Iudg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Ios. 20. 7. Kedesib in Galilea in monte Nephthim: Iosephus calles it Cedesis, and in Saint Hiero-

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zepeth, which was also one of the ten Decapollitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many years the impugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritime neare it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated Northward near Sephet: this is to be noted: that there are () diuers places of this name in Palaestine, all situate on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebraica excellens), Rama with the Hebrewes is high.) Also that for this Rama Ios. 19. 36. they called Arama, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Townes) to be a part of the word: whence calling away the spiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place Bethsemes, of which Ios. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephtalim Iud. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephtalims.

Adioyning to these which standeth Carthos ² or Kirathajim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountaine out of which the springs of Capbarnaum arise, called Monte Christi: a place by our Sauour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the Euangelists.

Adioyning to these are Magdalen, a place of strength ⁶ and Mafaloth, of which we reade that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the 4 Maccabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothas of Nephtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, ⁶ one neare Chanath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weak coniecture out of Ios. 19. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neare the waters of Merom, because the Kings that ioyned with Sabin against Iosus, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Ios. 11. 5. are by Iosephus said to haue incamped at the Citie Berotha in Galilee, not farre from Cedes Superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. It is in that Galilee which is called the vpper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentils. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neare Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Mahacab we haue spoken already) this he doth vpon a coniecture touching the place 2. Sam. 20. 14. where some reade Abel & Bethmahacab, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai: for Shebab being of Beminit (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Berotha or Berothi) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Berotha of Nephtalim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembered by Ezek. 47. and Aroth gentium, neare the waters of Merom or Samaehonitis, the Citie of Sisara Lieutenant of the Armie of the second Sabin: from whence not farre off towards the Sea of Galilee, is Ebrai, or Ebrehi, a strong Citie: besides many ¹⁰ others whereof I finde no particular storie of importance: as Ser in Ios. 19. v. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Astedim and Ser. Then Adama which they call Edama: also Hion which they call Ahion, of which in the bookes of Kings. Then the strong Citie of Cinnereth

Cimmereth after called Gennezareth, vvhence vve reade of the Land and Lake of Gennezareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberias. In the body of the Land they place Galgalá to the South border: of which * Mace. 1. 9. 2. also diuers others named iosf. 19. as Penca or Chukkok: Horem & Az-nath-tabov (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Iofua: In 2. 20. Lakkum Iep-mach, Hieleb, and * Reecath, vvhich two last they place near Casaria Philippi: To these they adde out of Iofua, Nekob, and Adami: for which two Iunius readeth Eofia Adami, making it no Towne but a Ditch call'd by some of Adamath, as it kemes; or at least the custodie of vvhich March or Limit belonging to the Towne. To these out of 10 Num. 34. 10. they adde Sephana which 1. Sam. 30. 21. seems to be called Symoth. As for Tichon and Hielon vvhereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47. 16 and the latter out of Iofua. 19. 33. it may appeare by Iunius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediani, and for the latter Quercetum. The Citie of Nephtalim which they make the native place of Tobias, and Naas-fon near vnto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation Tob. 7. 7. but in the Greeke Text there is no signe, neither of the one nor of the other.

Mat. 6. 13. Luc. 5. 1.

* This place of the Maccab. was the noticia gala or Gilgalin Phylatini, but may well be vnderstood of Galgal in Mat. 6. 13.

† This Reocab or Rabekth, In or thomas that it is the same with Kathon (one of these being made of the other by Transposition of letters) which Kathon we haue noted already that it is also called Kiris-thajm. b In the place 1. Reg. 4. 15. which also they bring to note any Citie of that name.

pharisees, and others, received the same curse of threatened miseries, as Woe be unto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Alongit the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Cattle of Magdalan, the habitation of Marie Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Citie of Isotapata: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surprised by Vespasian: who slaughtered many thousands of the Citizens: and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that Sea and the Lake of Genezareth within Zabulon was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in honour of Tiberius Caesar, it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapollitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Mathew, from the toll or custom-house, to be an Apastle, and neare unto it raised the daughter of Tairus from death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius Caesar: in the most fruitful part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quam iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) ad sepulchra dies impurus habetur, qui in talibus locis habitat, Whereas by our law he should be seven daies held as uncleane who inhabited in such a place: by which words and by the whole place of Iosephus it appeares, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Cinereith, which was seated not in Zabulon but in Nephtalim.

Neare unto this Tiberias at Emas there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperor encamped against Tiberius: More into the Land toward the South-west is Bethulsa, seated on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the storie of Heloferses and Iudith, such as this. Neare which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adjoining vnto it, Capharath fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes: and Iaphus an exceeding strong place afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in furie slew 15000. of the Citizens: and carried away about 2000. prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Lewites, and Gahava, of which Iosephus in his owne life, then Ieste according to Adrichomius (of which Ios. 19. 12.) he thinks that it is not that Iaphus of which we spake but now out of Iosephus, Idelsa of which Ios. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Idela: vnder it Westward Legio, (afterward a Bishops seate) and the Citie Belma in ancient times exceeding strong, remembered Iudith 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Naxeret is the Citie Saffa or Saffras, the birth-Citie of Zebedean, Alphaus, James, and Iohn: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Iosephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome, was called Diocæsaria: the Citie of Ioachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Marie, it was walled by Herod the Tetrarch: and by him, as Iosephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he saith Primum Galilaearum maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris is greatly vexed Vespasian ere hee wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seate of the neather Galilee, and so founded it with a strong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperiall, saith Iosephus: and it is now but a Cattle called Zapher.

To the South-west of this Sephoris or Diocæsaria was that blessed place of Nezareth, the Citie of Marie the Mother of Christi: in which hee himselfe was conceived, it standeth betwene Mount Zabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie hee abode chiefly foure and twentie yeares, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward were for many yeares. It was created into an Archbishopricke in the following age. Neare vnto it are the Cities Buria (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahadal of which Ios. 19. 15. and Iud. 1. 30. where it is called Nahalol: and Ios. 21. 35. where it is a Citie of the Lewites, neare the Sea: adjoining to the Riuer of Chisjon is Sarid, noted in Iosua for the vttermost of Zabulon.

* The names of the chief Cities seated about this Sea, or lake, through which Iordan runneth, were Capernaum, Tiberias, Bethsaida, Galata, Tarsidea, and they adde Cinereith which in future times gaue name to the Lake and Countie. Matth. 9. Luc. 5. Ios. 19. 18. 30.

In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diuers small Mountaines: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and John: vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memorie whereof on the top of the Mountaine, the Emperesse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe Riuer of Zabulon is Chifon, which rising out of Tabor runneth with one streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with an other streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chifon where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedunim or Cadunim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolome calleth Chorfeus: though others distinguishing them: and set Chorfeus by Cæsaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalon: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaim, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neare Magdalon: which Torrent they call Dorham, from the name of the Cite, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthah which Iesus steeketh in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

THE TRIBE OF JSACHAR.

The next adjoining Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and South-west, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increas'd in Aegypt, as appeared by their multitudes at Mount Sinai 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the reit in the Deserts, there entered the Holie

30 Land, 64300.

The first Cite of this Tribe neare the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more, a Cite wherein the Jewes (by the practise of a certaine mutinous yphart, John the sonne of Leai) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouverneur of both Galilees. This Cite was first taken by Cassian, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian: who entered it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Iewes in a sea fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the Riuers of blood running through euery street, he reserued the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

the fields, as they say, adjoining to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian vterly broken and discomforted by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Arames or Syrians slaine: before which ouerthrow the seruants and Counsaillors of Benhadad 1. Xijgij. 20. 23. (in derition of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines they should ouer-come them.

Vnder Aspec towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esarelon, in the plaines of Galilee, called also the great field of Esarelon, and Maggelo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphre to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Cafalath, of which 1. Macebab. 9. 2. Anem or Hien-Gannim of the Leuites, and Secfima or Shahastima, the West border of Isachar, of which Ios. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrimes: a strong Castle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-houfe and Magaine of the Christians, and built by the Esrie of S. Giles or Tolouse.

From the Castle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmell, not farre from the Riuer Chifson: where Elijab assembled all the Prophets, and Priests of Baal, and praied King Achab and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal, were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done the Priests of Baal praied, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijab in derision told them that their God was either in purpose of his enemies: not at leisure, or perchance a-sleepe, &c. but at the praier of Elijab his fire kindled notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessels of watertheron: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifson adjoining.

At the foote of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caiphos, built, as they say, by Caiphos the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Porfima and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe from the Sea coast towards Tubenas by the banks of Chifson, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Aphraim, and the Castles of Asfisa, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Nana on the Riuer Chifson: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widowes only sonne.

In these * plaines Geleu ouerthrow the Madianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

S. VII.
THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe : and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therfa, and others.

The next Tribe which ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleventh sonne of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the Daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Sileopis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongst the sonnes of Jacob, and made vp the number of the twelve Patriarks.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entred of their issues 52700. bearing armes. The Territorie which fell to this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora vpon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Jesael on the North, and Machata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Ither Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asiath the lesse, and pierst into the South, to the vttermost of Celestria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians giuen it by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northren people, constrained the Jewes to fight against their owne Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victorie, they themselves set on the Jewes which serued them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the vtmost towards the South of Celestria: and Strabo ioynes it to Galilee. It is seated betwene Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabitena, saith Ziegler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Israel neare Jordan: after that Jordan streightneth it selfe againe into a Riuer: leauing the Sea or Lake Genesareth. Notwithstanding, Mentanus describeth it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neare Embor, contrarie to Stelle, Lactian, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane an enimic, or Beth san, the house of an enimic.

ouer the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the bodie of Saul, and his sonnes, slaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christiian Religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocesse, numbred by Tyrinus, in his 14. Booke and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nesareth. The later traualiers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the rains of that Citie, goodly pillars and other peeces of excellent marble, which witness the staturely buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbin, saith Hierome, do not finde to bee the same with Hiersalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a towne of that name, Hieron. in Epist. ad Euseb. & in Luc. Hieron.

near Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture Gen. 13. 18. doe not confirme, where the Pulgar readeth franfuilij, in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others reade, uenti in colanis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Sichem not to be a proper name, but an adjectiue) yet the place Iohn 3. 13. where it is said, that Iohn was Baptizing in Anon near Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not vnlikely that this Salem of which S. Iohn speaketh, is but contracted of Sshalim, of which in the Tribe of Beniamin, 1. Sam. 9. 4. This word Iunius maketh to be the Plurall of Sshalim: of which we reade, 1. Sam. 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Cant. 6. 12. of Sshlammitis, as if it had beene as much as a Woman of this Salem, near Anon, it hath no probabilitie.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they finde Bezeck the Citie of Adonibezec, Iosephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israell, and Iuda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieue Iabez Gilead, against Naab the Ammonite: who would giue them no other conditions of peace than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neare Bezeck is the Citie of Bethbera or rather Beth-bar of which Iudg. 7. 24. in the Storie of Gedeon: and then Ephraim Hophra wherein Gedeon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal: which he pulled downe and defaced: and neare it that stone, on which Abimelech the Basard slew his 70. brothers: a Heathenish crueltie, practised by the Turke, to this day; and not farre hence, betwene the Village of Asophan and Jordan, 1. Paral. 20. 1. 13. c. 31. ant. maus Lathur ouerthrew Alexander King of the Jewes: and slaughtered as Iosephus numbred them 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victorie, as Ptolomee pass by the Villages of the Jewes; hee slew all their women: and caused the young children to be sod in great caldrons, that the rest of the Jewes might thereby thinke that the Aegyptians were growne to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terrour.

Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Leuites, and Abel-Mehols, which Iunius, Iud. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim, it was the habitation of Helisaius the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1. Reg. 4. 12. which were giuen in charge to Baans by Salomon, to whose charge also Takane belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first rebeld Iosua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their Citie giuen to the Leuites.

In the body of this Territorie of Manasse, but somewhat nearer Jordan, than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Iosua slew: which the Kings of Israell vsed for their Regall seate: till king qs. Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Ieroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sonnes health: who knowing her, though shee were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes near Samaria, of which name there are both in Aegypt, and Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Towne, wherinto the Citizens retired, the Basard Abimelech was wounded by a waigite stone, throwne by a Woman ouer the Wall, who despairing of his recouerie, commanded his Page to slay him out-right, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others set this Citie in Ephraim near Sichem or Nesopolis.

Iud. 9. v. 54.

Hier. Muc. 3. c. 5.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territorie adioyning is called Acrabatens (one of the Ten Toparchie or Governments in Iudea) for which Ierome 1. Muc. 5. reads Arabatena: but in the Greeke it is Acrabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largest Territories of all Palesine belonging to the Governour thereof, Iosephus remembred it often, as in his second Booke of the Jewes Warres, c. 11. 2. 5. 28. and else where.

The difference betwene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a Citie with some lesser Territorie adioyning, and a Tetrarchie is the same with Prasies in Latine, and President in Englishe, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome: and thereof so called. Punienameth (euntecne teene Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Leinster, Ulster, Connaught, and Munster.

To the South-west of Acrabania they place the Cities of Balsam or Bilham, and Gerthremmon of the Leuites: but hinnus out of Ios. 2. 1. 2. 5. and 1. Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one: and that Ishbaleam Ios. 16. 11. is another name of the same City.

Then is Israhel a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Iezabel by a false accusation caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end shee might possesse his Vineyard adjoining to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Ioram also was cast vnburied into the same field: for which his Mother Iezabel murdered Naboth.

Toward the Sea from Israhel is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Ahaziah King of Iuda fled from Iehu, when hee had slaine Ioram, hee was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound hee died at Mageddo adjoining. The Scripture calls this Citie Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadremmon, neare vnto which the good King Iosias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a Warre vnuadvisedly vnderaken. For Necho marched towards Agypt against the King thereof: by the commandement of God: whose Iosias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour Citie to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembered in the Scriptures: whose King was slaine among the rest by Iosias: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. The River vvhich passeth by the Towne, may perhaps be the same vvhich Ptoleme calleth Chorfeus: and not that of which wee haue spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that haue described the Holie Land delineate no such Riuer. Moore only sets it downe in his Geographie of the twelve Tribes: but the Riuer vvhich passeth by Mageddo hee vnderstandeth to bee but a branch, falling thereto. Laichan and Schorat make a great confluence of waters in this place: agreable to this Scripture in the fifth of Isaies: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, giue it no other name then the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phenicia, euen to Sebaste or Samarita; and Strabo firre beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Iosephus calls Casaria Palestina a Citie of Phenicia, yea Laurentius Cornutus extendeth Phenicia as firre as Gaza: seeing also Ptoleme lets downe Chorfeus for the partition of Phenicia and Iuda: this Riuer running East and West parallell with Samarita: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptoleme in his fourth Table of Asia calleth Chorfeus. The later trauielers of the holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day.

†. II.

Of Casaria Palestina, and some other Townes:

FROM Mageddo toward the West, and neare the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Casaria Palestina: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Plinie calls Apollonia: though Ptoleme sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, betweene this Citie and Ioppe, to which Vespasian gaue the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod rebuilt; who therein laboured to exceede all the workes in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which hee reared within the Walls, of cut and polish't marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke ouer the Seas firre away, with the high and flatelty Towers and Gates: hee forced a Harborow of great capacitie, being in former times but an open Bay: and the wind blowing blowing from the Sea the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their cables and Anchors. This worke hee performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that kinde hath not beene found in any Kingdome, nor in any age: which because the Materialls were fetcht from farre, and the waight of the stones was such as it exceedeth beliefe, I haue added Iosephus owne wordes of this worke: which are these. Hinc locorum incommodatam correxitur, circum portus circumduxit, quantum pateret magna clasi recipiende sufficere: & in viginti vltimum profundum, per agrandiam saxa demisit: quorum plerasq; pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octo decim, altitudine nouem pedali: fuerunt quadam etiam maiora, minoralia; To mend this incommenue of place (saith Iosephus) he compassed a Bay 10

*wherein a great flecte might well ride: and let downe great stones twentie fadome deepe: whereof some were fiftie foote long, eightene foote broad, and nine foote thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or caslle of two hundred foote long, to breake the waues: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with diuers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent hee called Drusus, after the name of Drusus, the sonne in law of Cesar: in whose honour hee intituled the Citie it selfe, Casaria of Palsstine: all which he performed in twelue yeares time. It was the first of the Easterne Citiees that receiued a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishopspricke, commanding twentie others vnder it, saith Tyrius.*

L. 14. c. 13. h. h. ll. sac.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Ascius, Euzerius, and Gelasius to haue beene Bishops thereof: In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by S. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two yeares prisoner, vnder the President Felix, vnto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeale, he was sent to Cesar. Here vnto Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to bee called a God by his flatterers, hee was stricken with an Angell vnto death, saith Iosephus.

To the North of Casaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade Ios. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it ioyneth to the Sea, whose King vvas slaine by Iosua. But Iunius for in Naphoth Dor, reades in trallibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor: although 1. Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth 30 omnis Naphath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Iosua call it Nepheth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Ios. 12. 23. Iudg. 1. 27.) may seeme to bee Dor. It vvas a strong and powerfull Citie: and the fourth in account of those twelue Principalties or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon Maceb. 15. 11. placeth it betwene the Hill Carmel and the mouth of the Riuer Chorfenus: for so some name the Riuer Chorfenus, of which vve haue spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strength thereof, Tyrrhon fled from Antiochus the sonne of Demetrius: where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 120000. foot-men and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villaine that receiued 200. talents for the ran- 40 some of Jonathan Machabeanus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him slew his owne Master, vsurping for a while the Kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Diocesse of Casaria.

From Casaria towards the South, they place the Citiees of Capharnum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnum famous in the Euangelists they find in these parts near the West Sea, an other of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal or Gilgal, was in Beniamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slaine by Iosua.

 ouerthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Iudaea by a traitorous Jew, called Aleimus: vwho contended for the Priest-hood, first vnder Bacchides, and then vnder Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Iherusalem, conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Jews. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bullon attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Balamine. It was honoured in those daies with a Bilhous lease, but it is now a poore Village called Affur, faith Brochard. Neare vnto this Citie the Prophet Jonas was three daies preferred in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatri and Casaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territorie taketh name: which Cestius the Romane walted with fire and sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Casaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neare vnto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: where in he hidde an hundreth Prophets, and fed them, after which hee himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of prophetic alfo.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§ I.

The bounds and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these siue Tribes, of Affur, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, posselt the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a Briefe of those Kings which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deuoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange: seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, & in so many changes of Estates and Conquests of Heathen Princes, haue bene torne, cast away, or otherwife consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very vncertaine: but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it taketh beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Galilee, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthofia, to the North of Trapolis. Ptolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the Riuer Elentherus, that falls into the Sea at the lland of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthofia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterran Sea, as farre as the Riuer of Chorfeus, which seems to bee that which the Iewes call the Torrent or Riuer of Maggedo. Plinie extends it farther and comprehends Ioppe within it: Corunus and Budeus, Ioppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud græcos appellata (saith BVDÆVS) que nunc Palaestina Syria dicitur; it was called Phœnicia of old (saith hee) which now is called Palaestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia, all the Sea side of Iudæa, and Palaestina, euen vnto Pelusium, the first Port of Aegypt. On the contrarye Diodorus Siculus, foldeth it vp in Calesyria, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deuiued in his owne art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Ilands)

Ilands) to wit, Aradus, Oribasia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomæia (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palaestina: and by reason of the many ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that familie were called Zidonians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iosias time. For till then it is probable that there was but one king of all that region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Vandall Warres. But in proceesse of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Propher it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Iosua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sonnes Caamus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possit the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Sonne) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Eurapa taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surpris'd Tyre, had stolen her thence: of which the Poets deuised the fable of Iupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealeth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia: and findes Cadmus his successour: whom hee calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successours of Dido held that name alwaies in reuerence, making it a part of their owne as Asirubaal, Hanniball: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses:

*His Regina grauem gemmis auroq; poposcit
Impleuitq; moro pateram: quam BELVS & omnis
A BELLO soliti.*

The Queene anone commands the waightie bowle (Waightie with pretious stones and masse gold)
To flow with wine. This BELVS vs'd of old,
And all of BELVS Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemeth to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Libya, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the sonne of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenor successour liuing at once with Iosua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territorie of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in steede of the building of Tyre, and Zidon, it is probable that hee repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Ninuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For bee it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Egypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kind of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian: yet it is very likely that either he came to saue his owne Territorie: or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israclites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Iosua conducted ouer Jordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians by reason of the losse which they receiued by the hand of God, in the Red sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrewes from invading Canaan by Land: which alló they knew had fo many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Dejars inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having fuch Vessells, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or allist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Phisistims which held the shiores of Canaan, next adjoining vnto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phenicia, which Agenor was said to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iosus, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iosus called the strong Cities. C. 19. v. 39. Acho afterward Ptolemas, Azazab and Dor) were all that Phenicia had in those daies.

That the Kings of Phenicia were mightie, especially by Sea, it appeareth, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that Dauid and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Regula, defended it selfe 13. yeares against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed vnresistible) spent more time in the recouerie of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosaphus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Callysthenes deriue it ab urbore ductylorum, and the Greekes from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phenicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phoenix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phenicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnecessary.

The Ethiopiens affirme that Atlas, Oryon, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and ciuill Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Libyans: to wit, from the South and Superior Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited nearer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosphic: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, receiued Ciuilitie. Again, the Phenicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonne were Affricans: whence Lucan.

*Phenices primi (sancti si credatur) ausi
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.*

Lucan. l. 5. 31 X 123

*Phenicians first (if fame may credit haue)
In rude Characters dar'd our wordes to graue.*

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phenician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno: when he in a kinde of reproch was called a stranger and a Phenician:

Si patria est Phenix quid tum? nam CADMVS & ipse Phenix: cui debet Gratia docti libros.

Alben. 1. Dignus.

If a Phenician borne I am, what then?
CADMVS was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Joseph. contra Apostat.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient : and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports : but affirme constantly, that the great Zambelsis flourished among them : when Atlas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our Bardes and Druids are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sonnes hither to bee by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all, for hee liued at such time as learning and arts flourished best, both in Egypt, and Assyria, and he himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the general flood : either by Seth, or Enos, or by whom else God knows; from whom all wisdome and vnderstanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations : whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other: as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently vsed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldie: and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutcheions, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations. In a naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Natural Lawes are common and generall.

§. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BVt whatsoever remaneth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the books of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnsæus, and others of that Nation; being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iosus, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus: tooke the name of Phœnicia: what Kings succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Gracians besieged Troy, Phafis gouerned Phœnicia.

E. 17. v. 3.

In Hieremies time and while Iehoiakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King a-part: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnefus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded as some Writers affirme, Xerxes fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Regulz, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiected by Nabuchodonosor, of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnefus: remembred by D. Simulus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependance vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Emper against the Gracians. But diuers Kings, of whose there is no memorie. came betwene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeares and somewhat more betwene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander clemed esteem the more unworthie of restitution, because (saith Curtius) hee rather submitted himselfe by the insigation of his Subjects (who forswore their viceruine by resistance) than that hee had any disposition therunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this strato, Atheniens out of Theopompus reporteth, that hee was a man of ill living: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women dancers, and singers: whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautifull and lively among them, hee might recover them for his owne use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Athrome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were neare him with an Armie too waightie for his strength, and finding that hee was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Aegyptians: hee determining to kill himselfe, betwixt fainting in the execution, his wife being present wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died.

After Alexander was possessor of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, hee gave the Kingdome to Hephestion, to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse virtuous than rich, desired Hephestion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the bloud and mee of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolonimus, IUSTINE Abdolonius, and Plutarch Alynonus: who at this very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting heards, and roots, for his reliefe and sustentance: though otherwise a wife man and exceeding stout.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subiect to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Asser.

30 The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare. Iosephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twentie Kings of the Tyrians; but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menasier Epiphanius, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes, nor in other particulars.

4 Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abemulus: the same perchance that the sonne of Sarac mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Saron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. 40 David (saith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Saron to pay him Tribute of PROP. Saron 19. whom also David complaineth Psal. 83.

Hiram succeeded Saron, whom Iosephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hiramenus, sometime Hironenus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiron. He entered into a league with David, and sent him Cedars with Masons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Ierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was hee that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of money, but also hee ioyned with him in his enterprize of the East Indies, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram there is not only mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7 and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 7^d booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greekes, and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mightie and magnificent, hee defised the 20. towines which Salomon offered him: hee defended himselfe against that victorious King David: and gaue his Daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zelomon: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asteraph, the Idol of the Phoenicians. Hiram liued 53. years.

Balesartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. years according to Iosephus.

Abisartus the eldest sonne of Balesartus, gouerned 9. years, and liued but 20. years according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. years, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurce, the eldest of them held the Kingdome 12. years.

Astartus brother to Abisartus, recouered the Kingdome from this Vsurper, and reigned 12. years.

Astarinus, or Atharinus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Astartus, and ruled 9. years, and liued small 54.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Balesartus, and brother to the three former Kings, flew Astarinus: and reigned 8. Moneths: liued 50. years.

Ithobalus (or Iustobalus, in Theophilus) sonne to the third brother Astarinus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddess Astarta, which was a dignitie next unto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughterd his Vncle Phelles: and reigned 32. years, the fame which in the first of Kings cap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose Daughter Iezabel, Achab married.

Balezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. years, and liued in all 45.

Mettimus succeeded Balezor, and reigned but 9. years, (saith Iosephus) he had 2. two sonnes Pygmalion and Barca, and two Daughters Elysa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40. years, and liued 56: In the 7. year of whose raigne, Elysa sailed into Affrica, and built Carthago, 143. years and 8. Moneths, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our account was 289. years after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be farre out of Square. For Pygmalion couetous of Sichens his riches, who had married his sister Elysa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleuee Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elysa feareing to be spoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Affrica as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his Mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arreited. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Familie of the Barca in Affrica, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hannibal. Seruus interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts, others from Idida, a surname of Salomon.

Elaeus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. years: the fame that ouerthrew the fleet of Salmassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which hee continued his siege before it on the Land side five years, but in vaine.

After Elaeus, Ethobales gouerned the Tyrrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this Prince died, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who serouended and attempted Tyre 13. years together, ere he preuailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. years a tributarie, perchanee, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death it was gouerned by diuers Iudges, succeeding each other: First, by Ethibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Gerasus, who held it among them some 7. years, and odde Moneths: after whom Balatarus commanded therein as a King for one year: after him Mervalus sent from Babylon 4. years: after him Iram sent thence also, 20. years. In the 17. of whose raigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

of Bozivs his conceit that the Edumeans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

- 10 The great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozivs that hath written a Tract at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder Heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who only is vnchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the said Bozivs, inforcing herence, that the prosperitie and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumeans, descended from Esau, Jacobs brother: hith, it can hardly be beleued that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glorie, was in any sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the prooffe which the
- 20 Scriptures giue of *Hiram*s good affection when Salomon built the Temple) he brings many coniectural arguments: whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion that the posteritie of Esau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumeans, he endeoures to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Plinie, and others witnesseth, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumeans: as Elabam and Elsongher; or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose chiefe Citie was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posteritie did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Herunto hee addes that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Athartia, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophie from the Idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumeans, was an Vniuersitie, wherein as may appear by Elyphaz the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.
- 30 Such is the discourse of Bozivs who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumeans at all. In what Religion Esau brought vp his children it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a profane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posteritie were Idolaters is directly proued in the five and twentieth Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetual enemies to the Houe of Israel, saue only when Dauid and some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knowes not? or who is ignorant of *Dauid*s vnfriendly behaviour amongst them. when first they were subdued? Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, between Tyrus and Mount Ser, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid: euen then when Iob slew all the Males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were so ill treated. It seemeth that the pietie and ancient wisdom of Elyphaz the Temanite, Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumaeans punished, for being such as David in his owne daies found them. Although indeede the Citie of Teman whence Eli- phaz came to reason with Iob, is not that in Edumaea, but an other of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoyning to Hui, the Countrie of Iob: and to Sueh the Citie of Bilad the Sulute, as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, doe plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Iob is said to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wisdome, all the people of the East; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eli- phaz the sonne of Esau had a sonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those daies to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a sonne called Thema: of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the seuenth Chapter of the booke of Judges the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleue that such a people were descended from one of Esau his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse mult the forces of all Edom haue beene: if one Tribe of them, yea one Familie of a Tribe had bene so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoyning could not haue held them. But wee no where finde that Edom had to doe with Amalec: or afficted the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being sonne to Abraham by Ceturah, doubtlesse was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seignorie of the Red Sea-coast, which Bozium imagines the Edumaeans to haue held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places as Elan and Elsongder on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himselfe saith that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs haue knowne it: because he had sojournd long in that Countrie: and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Aegypt.

But coniecturall Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psal. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozium himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appears Gen. i. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Israel. After Ios. 29. because they were euer Idolaters, and of the curst seede of Canaan, not Consens to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King DAVID a wise Sonne, we cannot inferre that he was of Dauid's Religion. The Turke hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is that the Sidonians then worshipped Astartoth, and drew Salomons also to the same Idolatrie.

Whereas Hiram aided Salomon in building the Temple, hee did it for his owne ends, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oile, and the offer of twentie Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram, in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon, Hee allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pelted: being otherwise apt to yeeld silkes: as the Andarine silkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oile, which hee wanted, hee gaue that which hee could well spare to Salomon. Also gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wifer: who haing got the gold first, gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that hee had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessarie policie which inforced Tyrrus to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Mosh, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates: through which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and recarrie their Wares on Cammels, to to their fleets on the Red Sea: and backe againe to Tyrus: so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries, through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrans in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might haue greatly distressed the Tyrans, and perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to imploy his Fathers treasure, in magnificent works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore hee willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workemen, to increase his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betwene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrans: so those other proofes which Bozsius frames negatively vpon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I thinke, no man knowes. It seemes to me that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, hee would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples. Every salvage Nation hath some whose wisdom excelleth the vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whose being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrans, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatrie, therefore the Tyrans were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Ytica, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrans (of which, I thinke, the Ilands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue bene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrans, who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so like wise.

This their Idolatrie from Salomon's time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozsius, who would haue vs thinke them to haue bene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptorie, that he Iuleth men of contrarie opinion, impiou politicians, as if they were impie to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honestie, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse this doctrine of Bozsius, would better haue agreed with Iukan the Apollata; than with Cyril. For if the Abyssians, Greekes, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most when they drew neare vnto the true Religion: what may be said of the foule Idolatrie which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon eury new victorie? How few great battailes did the Romanes winne, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honour to one of their old Gods? yea, what one Nation saue only that of the Tenes, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterwards entertaine in their Citie? Only the true God, which was the God of the Tenes, they reiecte: vbraiding the Tenes with him, as if he were unworthy of the Romane Majestie: shall we hereupon enforce the leud and foolish conclusion, which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primsie Church: That such Idolatrie had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozsius, who writing against those whom he fallily termes impiou, giues strength to such as are impiou indeede. But such indiscretion is vsually found among men of his humour: who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others: or vaine-ly fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimeras: of Diuinitie, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidells, that are not transported with the the like intemperate ignorance. Great pittie it is that such madde Dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Epycorite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of EPHRAIM, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was EPHRAIM.

§ I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of EPHRAIM.

Plat. 19. 78. 108
Fol. 25.

HAUING now past ouer Phanicia, we come to the next Territorie adjoining: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deserts (Iosua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children, growne to bee able men 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Jordan, betwene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran terran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had was Samaris: the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel: built by Amris or Omri: King thereof: and seated on the top of the Mountaine Somron, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Sea-coast. It was after ward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This Citie is often rememberd in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater than those of Iherusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly marble pillars, with other hewen and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sonnes of Hyrcanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the sonne of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Hercin were the Prophets Heliass, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Gracian Monks.

Near Samaris towards the South, is the Hill of Bethell, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to bee worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napalasa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Leui, in reuenge of the rauishment of their Sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec eued enued with the foile. Iefoboam raised it vp againe: and the Damaicens a third time call it downe.

Vnder sichem towards the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhatton on the Mountaine ^{1udg. 12. 15.} Amotet, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israell. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, ^{2. Reg. 23.} built as it is said by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Neare to this Citie Indas Maachabean ouerthrew Seron and Elyfias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This Citie had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir of which Iof. 10. And Saron whose King was flaine by Iofus: it is also mentioned Ait. 9. 35. and of this Seron the ^{16. 12. 18.} Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cefaria Palestina extendeth it selfe along the coast as farre as Ioppe, fith Adrichome. Though indeede the name Sarons is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitfull plaine Region; for not only this Valley is so called, but wit, betweene Cefaria and Ioppe, but that also betweene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Eysy interprets the word Seron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdia, reade Saron for Affaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine neare Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diopolis, or the Citie of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Indus, the fifth in dignitie (or the third after Plame) where Saint PETER (non fuit Christus virtute) cured Aeneas. ^{Act. 9.} Niger calls all that Region from ^{Luc. 21.} Antilibanus to Ioppe Sarona. This Ioppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those Raens and spoilers of all Elatets, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes: who with no other respect led than to amplify their owne glorie, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one an ^{1. 2. 3. 4.} other, became a prey to the most saluage and barbarous Nations.

In Diopolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memorie Iustinus the Emperour cauled a faire Church to bee built ouer his Tombe, these be Tyrius his wordes: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatriade, & Ioppe, per laicè patentiem plantitem Eleutheriam petri anseantes, Liddam qua est Diopolis, c. 7. & 3. 5. ^{1. 2. 3. 4.} ubi & egregij Martyri GEORGII vsque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, peruenit, cuius Ecclesiam quum ad honorem eiusdem Martyri pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, AVGVSTVS IVSTINIANVS multo studio & deuotione prompta aedificari preceperat, &c. They hauing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatrias, and Ioppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Eleutherias, came to Lidda, which is Diopolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr ST. GEORGE is at this day liued: whose Church, when the Gally and Orthodoxe Prince of the Romans, High and Mightie IVSTINIAN had commended to bee built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrius, by whose testimony we may coniecture, that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than hee is commonly thought: for his wordes of the Temple of GENIUS, How long shall this Sepulcher stand? occasioned the vprore of the people against him: as fearing least hee would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports: who though hee say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yet he addeth that his ashes with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, least if their Reliques had bene gathered vp, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part I rather thinke that it was not this Georgius, whose name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather an other, whom Tyrius, aboue cited, witnesseth to haue bene buried at Lidda or Diopolis. The same also is confirmed by VITRUS. S. Hierome affirms that it was sometime called Tigris, and while the Christians inhabited the holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Neare to Lidda of Diopolis, standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathis: afterward ward Rama, and Ranula, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christi. There are many places which beare this name of Rama: one they set in the Tribe of Iuda neare Theca in the way of Ilebron: another in Nephthalim, not farre from Sephet: a third in Zabulon, which they say, adioyneth to Sephoris: a fourth, which they make the same with Silo: and a fifth which is this Rama in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived: and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North along the coast are Helon, or Silon of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the Warre of the Iewes. Also Balsafsa (for which Iunius 2. Reg. 4. 42. reads plentius Shalifsa) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim: but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 9. where we to reade of the Land of Shalifsa, findeth it in Beniamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofna, one of the Toparchies or Cities of government, the second in dignitie, of which the Countrie about it taketh name.

Then Thimnath-sara, or according to the Hebrew Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Presidencies of Iudas, which they call Thimnathica: a goodly Citie and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim: on the North of the Hill called Gas: which Citie and Territorie Israel gaue vnto their Leader Iosua: who also amplified it with buildings, neare which hee was buried. His Sepulcher remained in S. Hieromes time, and ouer it the Sunne ingrauer, in memorie of that greatest of wonders, which God wrought in Iosua's time.

In the places adioyning standeth Adasa or Adfa: where Iudas Maccabaeus with 3000. Iewes ouerthrew the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria: neare to Gifer or Gizer which Iosua tooke, and hung their King: a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharao of Aegypt: the people all slaine, and the Citie razed: Salomon rebuilt it.

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Ieseti, of which Ios. 1. 6. 3. otherwise Teleshi, whence David had part of his Pretorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benata. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept for many yeares, till the Philistines got it.

To this they ioyned the Citie of Machmas or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabaeus inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samosis towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Naieth where Saul prophecied: and neare it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Ieroboam: after the great overthrow given him. Then Abisam of the Leuites, of which Iosua 2. 1. 2. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokmeah, of which 1. Chron. 6. 28. As for Abisams Baalgor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reads it the Plaine of Chatzor: and finds it in the Tribe of Iuda: as Ios. 1. 5. we read of two Chatzors in that Tribe: one neare Kedesh 40 v. 23. and the other the same as Chetzeron v. 25. toward Jordan.

In this Tribe also they finde the Citie of Mello: whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus Mello, reads incola munitiois, and for Salomo adificabat Mello, he reads adificabat munitioem, and so the Septuagint reads τις ἀκρας in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but an other in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by 50 Iosua: and Ianoach or Ianoah spoiled by Teglaiphallaser: Pekah then governing Israel: with diuers others, but of no great fame.

The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Jordan: severall parts whereof are the Hill of

Samron

Samron or Samaria, 1. Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gabaſ Judg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tſalmon or Salmon Jud. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tſoph or Tſophim Jud. 9. 5. where Rana-Tſophim good, which was the Citie of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines upon the ſides of theſe Mountaines, was the occaſion that Jacob in the Spirit of prophetic Genel. 49. 22. compared Joſeph two branches, Ephraim & Manſſe, to the branches of a fruitfull vine planted by the Well ſide, and ſpreading her * Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegorie alſo Ezekiel c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whoſe head was Ephraim) proſequutes: as alſo in his Lamentation for Juda, hee followeth the other Allegorie of Jacob Gen. 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the higheſt of theſe Hills of Ephraim, which over-looketh all the plaines on both ſides of Jordan, they finde the Caſtle called Dok: which they make to bee the ſame with Dagon, of which Joſeph. 1. Bell. Jud. c. 2. in which Caſtle as it is 1. Maceeb. 16. Ptolemie moſt traiterouſly, at a banquet, flew Simon Maceebaeus his Father-in-Law.

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in the ſecond of Samuel. c. 23. v. 30. where though Iamius reade Hidday exrens vallum Gabaſi: yet the Vulgar and Vatubius reade Hiddai of the River of Gaas. Alſo in this Tribe they place the River of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great droughth: where he was ^b fed by the Ravens: and after that the River was dried vp he trauiell'd (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where hee was relieued by the poore Widdow of Zarepta, whoſe dead Sonne he reuiued, and increas'd her pittance of Meale and Oile: whereby ſhe ſuſtained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from IEROBOAM TO ACHAB.

30  F the firſt Kings of Iſrael, I omit in this place to ſpeake: and referre it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuiſion from Juda and Beniamin, now it followeth to ſpeake. The firſt of theſe Kings was Ieroboam, the ſonne of Nebar, an Ephraimite of Zereda, who being a man of ſtrength and courage was by Salomon made over-ſeer of the buildings of the Attilo or Munition in Hieruſalem, for as much as he belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manſſe: and fo many of them as wrought in thoſe works. During which time as hee went from Hieruſalem, hee encountered the Prophet Ahijah who made him know that he was by God deſtined to be King of Iſrael: and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this fearing that thoſe things might come to Salomons knowledge, hee fled into Egypt to ſhiſhac, whom Euſebius calleth Oſochores, whoſe Daughter he married: the Predeceſſour of which ſhiſhac (if not the ſame) did likewiſe entertaine Adad the Idumean, when hee was carried yong into Egypt from the ſide of Dauid, and his Captaine Ioab: which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wives ſiſter Taphines: vying both him and Ieroboam as instruments to ſhake the Kingdome of Juda: that himſelfe might the eaſilier ſpoile it, as hee did: for in the fifth yeare of Rehoboam, ſhiſhac ſackt the Citie of Hieruſalem, and carried thence all the treaſure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the ſpoiles which Dauid tooke from Adadezer of Saba, with the preſents of Tobus, King of Hamath, which were of an inſtimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though hee were permitted by God to gouerne the Iſraelites, and from a meane man exalted to that ſtate: yet preferring the policies of the world, before the ſeruite and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule ſhould repaire to Hieruſalem)

* Also the Hill of Phonias where Eſay the high Preſt the ſon of Aaſer was buried Iſa. 54. 33. And the two tops of Hib. Gen. 22. 14. where the blaſtings, and ſhal where the curſings were to be read to the people, of which Dout. 11. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 2. Le. 10. 10. that Ioab in this proph. c. 22. v. 30. ſeech the word Daughters of the Branches, there by the more plainly to ſignifie Colombes: which in the Hebrew phraſe are called Daughters of the Atterup: as in 1. 1. 10. 10. and elſewhere *oti. b. 1. lem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) hee erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Aegyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Arons Calfe in Horeb) further hee made election of his Priests out of the basest and vilest people. This King made his chiefe seate and Pallace at Sichem: He defised the warning of the Iudaean Prophet, whome Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycaas Isel: His hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatrie, and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posteritie.

15. Chron. 13.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abis King of Iuda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twentie yeares: whom Nadab his sonne succeeded: who in the second yeare of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and roote out by Bascha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeares.

Bascha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made Warre with Asa King of Iuda: hee feared himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Iuda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the Materialls, with which Bascha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater hee was threatened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twentie yeares and died.

1. King. 14. 23. 16

To Bascha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Pallace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambri after hee had reigned two yeares: and in him the prophacie of Iehu was fulfilled.

1. King. 16.

Zambri succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seuen daies; But Ambris in reuenge of the Kings Murdrer, set vpon Zambri, or Zimri: and inclosed him in Thersa, and forst him to burne himselfe.

1. King. 16.

Ambris or Honni succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Thersa to Semuria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiected to Tabremmon, King of Syria: the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius, Nicophorus, and Zenar: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue: seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Azi King of Iuda, to assaile Bascha King of Israell, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelue yeares, fixe in Thersa, and fixe in Semuria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

1. King. 15.

§. III.

of Aschab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

ASCHAB or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not only vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Aegyptians: but hee married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Aegyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Semuria. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israell. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets: and afterward flir-eth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Semuria: and taken by Achab was by him set at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycaas calleth Michaas) reproceth him: afterward hee caused Naboth by a false accusation to bee stoned. Then ioyning with

Iosaphat

Josaphat in the warre for the recouere of Ramoth, hee was slaine as Micheas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Joas: besides feuerthe other sonnes by sundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Ahab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: hee brused himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beel-Zebub the God of Achazan, Elshb the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and mistaking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captaines, and with each sifite souldiers to bring Elshb vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercie at *Elshb*s hands, and hee spared him, and went with him to the king: auowing it to the king that he must then die, which came to passe in the second year of his raigne.

Joram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded: He allured Josaphat king of Juda, and the king of Edom to assilt him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000 sheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themselues and their horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Elshb causeth the ditches to flowe. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their king flicth to Kirbarseth: and being beseged, according to some Expolitors, burnt his sonne on the walles as a Sacrifice, wherat the three kings moued with compassion returned and left Moab, walling and spoyling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the king of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue beene taken prisoner, by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him ore the walls, threatening vnlesse the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safetie of his sonne: which when the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, and that Moab according to his former threatening had burnt the king of *Edom*s sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assailants might discern it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsooke the partie of the other kings; for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the king of Aram sent to Joram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the leprolie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that hee doth send to heale a man from his leprolie? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell against him. Elshb hearing thereof, willed the king to send Naaman to him: promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel, and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seuen times in Iordan. Elshb refused the gifts of Naaman. But his seruant Gehazis accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonias.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel what foucer the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsell, sent a troupe of horse to take Elshb: all whom Elshb stroke blinde; and brought them captiues into Samaria, Joram then asking leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Elshb forbade him to harme them: but caused them to be fed and sent backe to their owne Prince in safetie.

The king of Aram notwithstanding these benefits did againe attempt Samaria: and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Joram impeteth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elshb. Elshb by prayer caused a noise of Chariotes and armor to found in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege, an act of great admiration as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entring vpon his frontire tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which warre hee received diuers wounds: and returned to Israel to be cured. But whilest hee lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Joram in Gilead, was annoynted king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha surprized and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his foregoers, but also thcir Religion; for which hee received a promise from God, That his seede should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatry of Ieroboam, for which hee was plagued with grieuous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which warre hee was slaine faith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28. yeeres.

Pag. 86.

Ioachaz or Iehoaabaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whome Azael and his sonne Benhadad often invaded: and in the end subiected: leaving him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot: and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz reigned 17. yeeres.

2. King. 13.

After Ioachaz Ioas his sonne gouerned Israel: who when hee repaired to Elisha the Prophet as he lay in his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commaunded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisha couered the kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or sixe times: and then hee should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as hee gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battells, and recovered the Cities and Territorie of Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his father Ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazias king of Juda, who prouoked him to make the war: whercupon hee entered Ierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioas reigned fixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

2. King. 14.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predecessors: but hee recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and fortie yeeres.

Zacharias the fifth and last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassall, who reigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtred by Menabem of the Gadites.

Menabem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great crueltie to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with child. This Menabem being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with tenne thousand talents of siluer, which he exacted by a Tribut of fiftie shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menabem gouerned twentie yeeres.

2. King. 16. 19.

Pekahish or Phaceia, or after Zonaras Phaceia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, hee was slaine by Phaceor or Pekah the Commander of his armie, who 40 reigned in his place. In this Pekah time Phulassar or Tiglar-Phylassar inuaded the kingdome of Israel, and wanne Sion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Ianoach, Keelab, Hajlor, and Gilead, with all the Citics of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawn in by Achur king of Iudea against Pekah and Resin, the last of the Adades. For Achur being watted by Pekah of Israel and by Resin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, and therewith ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed the Monarchie of Syria and Damascus: and then of Israel: and this inuiting of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Iudea. Pekah reigned twentie yeeres.

2. King. 15. 29.

Then Hofbea or Oset, who slew Pekah, became the vassall of Salmanassar: but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he sought aide from Se, or Sua, or Sebciu king of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, hee cast him into prison, besieged Samaris, and maltred it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Chinise in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Esterne Regions, and there dispersed them: and and re-planted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha a River in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Canaanites bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sepharaim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Assa: which were of the ancient Assins who inhabited the Land of the Philistines in Abrahams time, dwelling neare vnto Gaza: whom the Caphorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desert, called Hanaï: willing to returne to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chamath or Iuraca, the ancient enemies of the Israellites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adads of Damascus: which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Iudea, and Iherusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thinne Garrison, which some decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

And this transfmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeare of the world 3322. the sixth yeare of Ezekia King of Iuda: and the ninth of Hofea the last King of Israell.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of DAN, SIMEON, IVDA, RVBEN, GAD, and the other halfe of MANASSE.

§ I.

Of DAN, where of Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

OW following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, wherof I spake last: of which familie there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land of their sonnes 66400. bearing arms. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea coast was Ioppe, or Japho, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancient of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ionas imbarked himselfe when hee fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Machabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Machabaeus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garisoned in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, invited 200. principall Citizens about them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by 39 firing their fleet, and putting the companies which fought to escape to the sword.

It wastwice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Licutenant vtterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ 1250. Lodowick the French King gaue it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iassa. There are certaine Rocks in that Port, wherunto it is reported that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: and from thence deliuered from the Sea-Monster by Persus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office vpon Ionas speaks of it indifferently.

The next vnto Ioppe was Lannia, where Iudas Machabaeus burnt the rest of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame wherof was seene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bilhops seate, saith Wil. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time that such a place there was.

F. 244.

After Lannia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volaterran. And so Antoninus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Aegypt, of all the Philistin Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volaterran giues neither reason nor authorie for his opinion; for Ptolomie sets Anthedon fare to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Citie of the Philistins: and about sixtene miles from Ioppe; where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iosua could not expell, nor the Danites after him: nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time; who slew Gath, as his Captaines did diuers others not much inferiour in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Hierom. in Micham.

Roboan

Robam the Sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Oziel the sonne of Amazias destroyed it againe. It was also laid wast by Azazel King of Syria. Enke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Willol Tyre in the holy Warre calls Tygrin, I much doubt: the rour growing by taking Gab for Ankeon.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethfemes or the house of the Sunne. In the fields adioyning to this Citie (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethfemes presuming to looke therein, there were slaine of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000. by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter and the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great Abel, saith S. Hierom. Benedictus Theologus findeth three other Cities of this name; one in Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Isachar. Fierome finds a fifth in Beniamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast the strong Citie of Accaron offereth it selfe, sometime one of the uee Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Cafaris Palaestina. Plinie confounds it with Apodonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Danites and Judaans. It worshipped Beelzebub the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Ahaziah King of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose Messengers Eliab meeting by the way caused them to returne with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This Citie is remembered in many places of Scripture.

Christians Schot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ebron. This Azotus or Asdod was also an habitation of the Anticks, whome Iosua failed to destroy, though he once possit their Citie. Hence stood a sumptuous Temple dedicated to the Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Arke of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple; and in the second fall it was vterly broken and defaced. Neare it was that famous Judas Machabees slaine by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lieutenants of Ptolemius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathan: and therest of the Citizens being put to the sword; all that fled into the Temple of Dagon were with their Idoll therein confumed with fire: neare which also he ouertrew Apollonius.

Cabinus the Roman rebuilt it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianitie flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Aethiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tjorab, or Sarara; and Efthaal; and betweene them Cafira Danu neare Hebron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seeme by the wordes Iud. 18. 12. to bee in the Tribe of Judab, as the other also were bordering Townes betwene Dan and Juda.

After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Candebus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Sewes, and neare which himselfe was by the Machabees ouertrowne.

Then Modin the Natiue Citie of the Machabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulcher the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height as they serued for a marke to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeares after their first setting vp, as Brochard and Breidenbach witnelle.

There are besides these the Citie of Ceratbanum; that is, the Citie of the woods; situate in the border of Juda, Beniamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twentie yeares in the house of Amindab: till such time as Dauid carried it thence to Hierusalem: Of this place (as they say) was Zetharias the sonne of Barachias, or Iehoids, who was slaine betweene the Temple and the Altar: also Vrias whom Ioschom King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Ieremie. S. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes vp the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Aegypt: who being the second Sonne of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Familie while they abode in Aegypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinas 59300. able men, all which ending their liues in the Deserts, there entred the Land of Promise of their iustices 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part seue- 30 red, inhabiting a small Territorie on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumaea, of which the first Citie adioyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

* And therefore no mistaketh that diuers places named Iof 15. in the large portion of Iuda be reckoned in this Tribe: see 10. 19. vs. 6. 9. where thus much is expressly noted. Psalm. Greg. 117. 10. 244.

The Regulus or petty Kings thereof were called Ascalonites: of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the Historie of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sonnes of Hymeneus: and that Ascalus being imploied by Atimius King of the Lydians, with an Armie in Syria, falling in loue with a young Woman of that Countrie, built this Citie and called it after his owne name: the same hath Nicolaus in his Historie, saith Volaterran.

= Diodorus Siculus in his third Booke remembreth a Lake neare Ascalon, wherein there hath bene a Temple dedicated to Derceto the Goddessse of the Syrians: hauing 43 the face of a Woman and the bodie of a Fish: who, as I haue said before, in the storie of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be cast into this Lake, and fed and releued by Doves. And therefore was the Doue worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palaestina sancta Columba Syro.

The white Doue is for holy held, in Syria Palaestina.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men (saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sofus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Arcemidorus who wrote the storie of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Heracl borne, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two yeares old and vnder to be slaine. In the Christian

Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that when it was by the Salasine defaced, Richard King of England while he made Warre in the holy Land, gave it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum SALADINVS diruisset, RICHARDVS AN-
Ad. lib. in Trib. Sionit.

In Dauid's time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistins: for hee nameth Gath and Ascalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul, and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it nor in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalona. Gabinius rettored it as hee did Azotus and Gaza.

10 Next to Ascalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Ha-zar, the Syrrians Azan: of Azotus (as they lay) the sonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Melis giues the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian: because belike he rebuilt it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say a Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistins: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Aegypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anskims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, he receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desert.

20 Alexander Iannes King of the Iewes surpris'd it: and slew 500. Senators in the Temple of Apollo which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not let vp in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Machabees, and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was forth by Simon: of which he made to great account as he purposed to reside therein himselfe, and in his absence left Iohn his Sonne and Successour to be Governour. In Brocheard's time it was still a goodly Citie and knowne by the name of Gazara.

30 At the very out-let of the River of Besor, standeth Masima the Port of Gaza: to which the priuledge of a Citie was giuen by the great Constantine, and the place called Confiance after the name of the Emperours Sonne. But Julian the Apostate soon after favouring the Gazians made it subiect vnto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza masima.

On the other side of Besor, standeth Antichon, defaced by Alexander Iannes, rettored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the fauourite of Augustus.

Then Raphia where Philopater ouerthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocoura whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name * of the Torrent Rhinocoura, till the Septuagint converted it by Rinocoura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giuing the name of the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinius calls it Rhinocolura; and Iosephus, Rhinocoura: Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was diuided by lots, betwene the three Sonnes of Noah.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth betwene Kadesb and Sihur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neare to the Wildernes of Beer-shebah, it appeares Genes. 20. 31. and therefore no meruaile that as elsewhere Beer-shebah, so sometime Gerar, was made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdome from the Philistin Satrapies, the Kings by that common name were called Abimelech; S. Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris, The healby Countrey: so that it was no meruaile that Abraham and Isaac liued much in these parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Ch. on 14. 14.

More within the Land was Steleg or Tisfelak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid: in his flying from Saul to the Philistins had left his carriages there, but but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Beſor, and put them to the ſlaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir ſometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuerſitie, as they ſay, or Academie of old Paleſtine. In S. Hieromes time it ſeemes it had the name of Daena: Iofua 15. 49. it is called Prbs Sanna: from the name, as it ſeemes, of ſome of the Anakims, as Hieron was called Prbs Arhahi. For euen hence alſo were theſe Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Orhanel, incouraged by *Caleb*s promiſe of his Daughter in marriage: but that Iofua and the Hoſt of Iſrael were at the ſurpriſe, it appeares Iof. 10. 39. This Citie Iof. 21. 15. is named among thoſe which out of Simeon and Beniamin were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it ſeemes they attribut it to this Tribe.

Befides theſe, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of leſſe fame, as Heira, of which Iof. 19. 7. which alſo Iof. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Iuda and Simeon (for which Iurinus thinks Heſhona is named 1. Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Iofua theſe two are diſtinguiſhed) alſo Tahad ſo named 1. Chron. 4. 29. for which Iofua 19. 4. wee haue Elthelad. Chitazar-Suſa ſo named Iofua 19. 5. for which Iofua 15. wee haue Chitazar-Gadula, both names agreeing in ſignification: for Gadula is Turma, and Suſa Equitatus.

In the ſame places of Iofua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they 20 thinke to be the ſame with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purſued the Iſraelites. But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumaea. For Iſrael fled not that way: but backe againe to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Deſert.

Dist. 1.

Gen. 31.

The ſame places alſo name Beerſheba in this Tribe: ſo called of the Oath betwene Abraham and Abimelec: neare vnto which Hagar wandred with her Sonne Iſmael. It was alſo called the Citie of Iſaac, becauſe hee dwelt long there. While the Chriſtians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to ſtrengthen this place, ſtanding on the border of the Arabian Deſert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in 30 the places of Iofua, and of the Chronicles, aboue noted, becauſe they helpe vs nothing in ſtorie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekias King of Iuda, certaine of this Tribe being ſtreighted in their owne Territories, paſſed to * Gedor, as it is 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the ſame place which Iof. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederuthama) which at that time was inhabited by the ſiue of Cham: where they feared themſelues: as alſo ſiue hundred others of this Tribe, deſtroied the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

* As it ſeemes in the Land of Iuda. See in the firſt part of the Chapter in the Citie of Dan. Iud. 163.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampſon the chiefſt: vnto which he carried the Gate-poſt of Gaza. The Riuers are Beſor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shithar, as is noted in Aſſer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

If Juda the fourth Sonne of Yaob by Lea, there were multiplied in A. 3711 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Desarts. And of their sonnes there entred the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Judaea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simcon included. And many Cities named in these Tribes, did first, as they lay, belong vnto the children of Juda: who had a kind of Soueraignty ouer them: as Succoth, Carathairim, Lachis, Bechemes, Tiglag, Berseba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if it be meant by that ground giuen to this Tribe only) were vncredible if the witness of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbered the people they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

20 The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefest of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judaea from Idumaea: whose King first surpris'd the Israelites as they pass'd by the border of Canaan towards Mab: and tooke from them some spoiles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Israelites, the sonnes of Keniz, the Kinnsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Acerusa or Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed, the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparche called Acrabuthena was denominated: of which we haue spoken in Manses. On the South side also of Judaea they place the Cities of Iagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Alina, Ierham, and Afor or Chafor, most of them Frontier Townes.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Desart and Forrest adjoining tooke name: where Dauid hid himselfe from Saul. After these are the Cities of Ejron, Adar, Karkah, and Afmona, or Hatfimon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumaea towards the North, we finde the Cities of Denna, Shebak, Anan, the other Afor, or Chafor, Behaleth, and the two Sachoes: of all which see Ios. 15. also Carioth by Iosua. c. 15. v. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called Icharioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampson which Rehobeam redified. Beyond these towards the North border, and towards Elcutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iathir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethara: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neare vnto this Citie was that remarkable battaile fought betwene Ase King of Juda, and Zera King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Ase following the victorie as farre as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Not farre from Iethar, standeth Iermuth, whose King was slaine by Iosua, and the Citie ouerturned. Next vnto it is Marefa the natue Citie of the Prophet Michas: Betweene it and Odell, Judas Machabeus ouerthrew Gorgas: and sent thence ten thousand Draemas of silver to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odell or Hadukom it selfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Iosua, and the King thereof slaine. Ionathas Machabeus beautified it greatly: Then Cela or Keila afterward Ehebel, where Dauid sometime hid himselfe: and which afterward afterward he deliuered from the assaults of the Philistims: neare which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained and was scene by S. Hierome.

Neare it is Hiebron sometime called the Citie of Arbab, for which the Pulgar hath Cariatharbe: the reafon of this name they giue as if it fignified the Citie of foure: becaufe the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried: but of Adam it is but fuppofed: and it is plaine by the places Iofua 14. 14. and 15. 17. and 20. 11. that Arbab here doth not fignifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants called Anakim, whose fonne as it femes Anak was: and Achim, Shefoui, and Tahmai (whom Caleb expelled Iof. 15.) were the fonnnes of this Anak, 2 Sam. 13. 23. The name of Anak fignifieth Torquem, a chaine worn for ornament: and it femes that this Anak enriched by the fpoiles which himfelfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and fo got this name: and leauing the custome to his posteritie left alfo the name: fo that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amiffe be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan: built feuen yeares before Isom or Tamir in Aegypt. and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen: to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the reft to the Leuites. It had a Bifhop in the Chriftian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Conftantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis or the free Citie, remembered often by 20 Kings of Hebre. Then Eglon whose King Dabir associated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Eliufalcm, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, befieging the Gabonites, were by Iofua vtterly ouerthrowen. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emass, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government or Presidencies of Indaa. In fight of this Citie Indaa Machabaeus (after he had formerly beaten both Antiochus and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant of Antiochus.

In the yeare 1301. it was ouer-turned by an earth-quake, faith Eusebius. In the Chriftian times it had a Bifhops feate of the Diocesse of Cafaria of Palestine.

From Emass toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nabama, Bethdagon and Gader or Gedera, or Gederothanna, of which and of Gederoth * Iof. 15. v. 36 & 41. 30 Then Azcha to which Iofua followed the slaughter of the five Kings before named, a Citie of great strength in the Valley of a Terebint or Turpentine: as the Pulgar readeth 1. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it femes) they feat it neare vnto Soco, and vnto Lehis of the Leuites. It reuolted from the fubiection of the Iewes while Ioram the fonne of Iofaphat ruled in Hierufalem: And next vnto this standeth Maaceda which Iofua vtterly difpeopled.

On the other fide of Emass toward the East standeth Bethfuar, otherwife Bethfara, and Bethfor: one of the strongest and moft fought for places in all Inda: It is feated on a high Hill 3; and therefore called Bethfuar (the house on the Rocks, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam: and afterward by Iudas Machabaeus. Iofias forfit it, and 49 Antiochus Eupator by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified againft the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is the next vnto it within fixe miles of Hierufalem, otherwife Lehem: fometime Ephrata: which name, they fay, it had of Calebs wife, when as it was fo called by Mofes before Caleb was famous in thofe parts Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abefan or Ibzan, Iudge of Israel, after Iephthah, famous for the thirtie Sonnes and thirtie Daughters, begotten by him. Eliemelec was alfo a Bethleemite, who with his wife Naomi fojourned in Moab during the famine of Inda in the time of the Iudges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomis returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Iffas, of whom Dauid. It had alfo the honour to be the native Citie 50 of our Saviour Iefus Chrift: and therefore fhall the memorie thereof neuer end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was alfo a Citie of the fame name: and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethleem Inda.

From Bethleem fome foure or five mile standeth Thetusa: the Citie of Amos the Prophet:

Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the Citie of Bethzatur, in the way between Bethjura and Hierusalem: on whose Hills adioyning the glorious gilt Shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Iewes. The Citie of * Bezek was also neare vnto Bethleem, which Adoni-bezec commanded; who had during his raigne tortured 70. Kings, by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his T Table: but at length the same end befell himselfe by the sonnes of Juda, after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) wee may passe by vntill we come to the magnificent Castle of Hierodinn, which Hierod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Desert of Ieruel between it and Tekoa, is that citius floridus, where in the time of Iehosaphat, the Iewes stood and lookt on the Moabites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to ioyne against Juda: neare which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange deliuerance.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Adran beautified by Roboam: and Tjohar which the Pulgar calleth * Segor: so called because Ler in his priar for it vrged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tjohar, which signifiesh a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier in Hieromes time Balezena. Then Engaddi or Hem-gaddi, first Asaphthamar: neare vnto which are the Gardens of Balsamum, the best that the world had called Opobalsamum: the most part of all which Tres Cleopatra Queene of Egypt sent for out of Judaea, and Heraod who either feared or loued Antionice her husband, caused them to be rooted vp and presented vnto her: which shee replanted neare Heliopolis in Egypt. This Citie was first taken by Cheorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Judaea: and one of the Prasidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land; and among them Iezrael; not that which was the Citie of Nabob, of which alreadye: but another of the same name, the Citie of Achimoan, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Amnon, whom Abisai slew: also as some thinke the Citie of Amasa, Abisai Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armie. But this seemeth to be an error grounded vpon the nearnesse of the wordes, Israel and Iezrael: and because the 2. Sam. 17. 25. Amasias father is called a Israelite, who first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Ismaelite: indeede the Ebrew Orthographie sheweth that Amasias Father is not said to be of the Citie Iezrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though other wife an Ismaelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills or Mountaines, as those of Engaddi vpon the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Juda, which beginne to rise by Emau, and end neare Tophna, and these part Juda from Dan and Simoon. Of others which standingle there is that of Hiebron: at the foote whereof was that Oake of Mambre where the three Angells appeared to Abraham, which S. Hierome calleth a Fir tree; and saith that it stood till the time of Constantine the yonger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achilla, on the South side of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Heraod, including the old Castle, erected by Tenathus Macchabaus, and called Malsada, garnished it with feuen and twentie high and strong T owers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men: being as it seemeth a place vnaccessable, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley after ward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitica, this Countrey had foure Cities, Adama, Saion, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heauen for their vnnaturall finnes.

§. III.
THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seates and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites came from SEHON King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs Sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Deserts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before wee speake of these or the rest that inhabited the east side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came many mightie Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by EJau or Edom the Idumeans: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Returab his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites, and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possesed by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them defendd) these issues and alliances of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

EJau and his sonnes held Idumea: which bounded Canaan on the South. Ismael tooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea: stretching his possession over all Arabia Petrea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as farre as the Riuier of Tigris, from Sur to Hanieleh.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian: and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betweene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon fate doune on the North-east side of Arnon, and possesed the Tract from Rabba after ward Philadelphus, both within the Mountaines of Gilbead, and without them as farre forth as Arrer, though in Moses time hee had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuier of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundrie parts of Canaan, to the border betweene the Riuier of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territory on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse: whereof that part which Moab had, was first possesed by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedorlahomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held was the Territory and ancient possession of the Zamezammims or Zureis, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab: the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betweene Abarim and Jordan, and driuen them thence from Hebbon ouer Arnon, and this happened not long before before Moses arrivall upon that border, when Ealeb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Ealeb, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were electiue, as the Edumians anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betwene Arnon and Jordan, as farre North as Essebon was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arriv'd there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Seben, of the race of Canaan by Amoreu: and therefore did Iephtah the Iudge of Israel iustly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alleged) Moyses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Iephtah) had three hundred yeares time to recover them, and did not: whence hee inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And least any should marvelle why the Ammonites in Iephtah his time should make claime to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. ver. 36. rather accounts them to have beene the ancient possession of the Moabites then of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be feene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sebon was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were feard so confusely together that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Astadeh, and Ishmael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commended in chiefe, in Iephtahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraigntie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the Mountaines of Galaad, or Gilcad, and as farre South as Arzer belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought to recover it againe. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sebon at Iabac, the Ammonites had lost to the Ammorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arzer, and betwene it and Iabac: Sebon and Og two Kings of the Ammorites having displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. c. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sebon from Arnon vnto Iabac, even vnto the children of Ammon, so as at this time the River of Iabac was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessiōns ouer Iabac which at length the Gadites possess, as in the thirteenth chapter of Iosua ver. 25. it appeares.

Of the memorable places of the Rubenites.

The chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar; without any shew of warrant, readeth Bethon. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint those two verses 36. and 37. of 21. Ios. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedon for Kedemoth, which Kedon by writing slip into Bethon.

This Citie which they gave to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desert adjoining: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Iosua where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beseb or ville eius, reads Boser in Iosuidine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Aribomus makes a Towne called Misor, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad: Farther from Kedemoth near the Dead Sea (for the Countrie betwene being Mountainous hath fewe Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lase or Leshab of which Genf. 10. ver. 19. the Greeks call it Callirhoe: neare which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweete water, all which foone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contractions of sinewes: to which Hierod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenes: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Ingas or Kings. The other town is Macherus the next between Lafa and Jordan. of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Castle, standing vpon a mountaine eury way vnaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Ianneus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinus, in the warre with Aristobulus, saith Iosephus. It was thither (saith Iosephus) that Hierod sent Iohn Baptist, and wherein hee was slaine: his armie soone after being vtterly overthrowne by Aretas king of Arabia, and himselfe after this murder neuer prospering. Not farr from Macherus was Tasor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and nere it Linias vpon Jordan, which Hierod built in honour of Linia the mother of Tiberius Casar.

To the north of Linias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israell embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the bodie of Zimri and Cosis with his speare bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the middle of their sinne: and from hence Iosua sent the Discoverers to visit Ierico slaying here vntill hee went ouer Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Abrichomius dreames of, reading Ios. 3. 18. strigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius valem cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Chureb, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, as it is Psal. 92. 13.

The plaine Country hereabout by Moses called The Plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Booke of Deuteronomy to the people, a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same booke precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desart of Paran: where they had long wandered. On the East it had Chusirath, and Dizahab (of which two the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomy in 30 Palaestina, the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathais in Arabia Petraea, where was * Mezahab, of which Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medausa and Midaba. On the West it had Jordan: and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban Deuteron. 1. 1.) the fame which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Linias, of which euen now we speake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Calesyrea, it had Thobel: whereabout sometime Pella of Calesyria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be ouer against or nere vnto Saph, for which the Vulgar hath the red Sea, as also N. um. 2. 14. it translatheth the word Saphab in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, wth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Saph or Saphab: which doubtlesse was about these Plains of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Country being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as also the red Sea was called Mare Saph, for like reason.

The place in these large plaines of Moab, where Moses made those diuine exhortations, some say was Bethabara where Iohn baptized, which in the Storie of Egeden is called Beth-barra. Iosephus saies it was where vnder the Citie Abila stood, nere Bozra, in a place set with palme trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plaines of Moab, Numb. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-sathaim and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israellites incamping in the time of Moses: T his place is also called Sittim: which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thomes, with Abrichomius

Abrichomus and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plaines of Moab, they place the Cities Nabo, Baal-Meon, Sibmas, and Heibon the chief Citie of Schon, and Elhabel, and Kiribaima the seat of the Giants Enim. Of the two first of these Moses seems to give a note that the names were to be changed: because they talked of the Moabites * Idolatrie. For Nabo (in stead of which Iunius Ep. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinius) was the name of their Idol-Oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nabo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgab, Moses before his death saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which storie Iunius doth not take Phasgab or Pisgab, for any proper name: but for an appellatiue, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatallius in some places; as Nom. 2. 1. 20 where he noteth that some call Pisgab that top which looketh to Jericho, and Heir as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Ios. 13. 20. called Asphalt-Pisga, which is as much as decurfus Pisga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Pisga. In the same place of Iosus there is also named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also had the Idoll was called Baal-Peor, which they say was the same as Priapus: the chief place of whose worship seems to have beene 20 Bamah-Bahab, of which also Ios. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which Nom. 22. 41. they read the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

30 There were besides these diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michol from Dauid: but Iunius thinks this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering so much out of Efisy 10. vers. 29. where it is named amongst the Cities of Beniamin. With better reason perhaps out of Nom. 21. v. 19. we may say that Mahanas and Nahabel were in these confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblatham which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Midian also is found in these parts, the chief Citie of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Ietho inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelue thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the plaines of Moab: at such time as Israel beganne to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the South-liner were then slaine: and their Regall Citie with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Ietho was Prince, or Priest, forgate not the God of Abraham their Ancestor, but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painefull traualles, through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chief Citie of Edom, there is 50 that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Sela, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was also called Iosheel, as appears by the place 2. Reg. 14. It was built (saith Iosephus) by Rezem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites slaine as before is said: after whom it was called Rezem: Now they say it is called Crac and Buzera.

The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest Citie: the same perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Neubathea, whence also the Province adjoining took name: which name femes to have been taken at first from Nabaiath the sonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where vnderstood for all Arabia Petraea, (at least where it is not misvnderstood) but it is that Province which neigbboureth India. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolemie calleth Pharanites, in fteede of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumaeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hue, Sin, and of Q. King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth calleth Hagarims of Hagar.

This Citie Petra, Scarus besieged with the Romane Armie; and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of money, and to quit it. Yet Amasis King of India (after he had slaughtred 10000. of the Arabians in the Valley called Salinarum) wanne also this Citie. S. Hierome finds Ruth the Moabit to be natural of this Citie. In the time when the Christians held the Kingdome of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before bene vnder the Greeke Church. It is situate not farre from Hor where Avon died, and on the other side towards the North is the Riuer of Zared or Zered, by which 20

Moses incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichome describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not farre hence, and betwene Zared and Arnon: and so doeth the Valley of Sauc: but the waters of Nimra or Beth-Nimra (for which it seemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plaines of Moab: 2 and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Sauc also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Sauc, or Shaub, which is the Kings Dale, where Abraham set vp his Monument, as it seemes, not farre from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchisedec King of Salem also incountred him. But Abraham coming 30 from the North, and Melchisedec inhabiting, either neare Bethsan otherwise Scythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not incounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Sauc which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

†. IIII.
Of the Dead Sea.

Now because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias which was fresh water) also the Sea of the Wilderness, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Iosephus makes 180. furlongs (which make two and twentie miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth which make eighteene of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But those that haue of late years seene this Sea, did account it (saith a Weissburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirtie of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptione, granulatus odor is accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut sueta aquis volucres patitur, incertum vnde superiecta riu solidio seruntur periti impertitur, manda perinde at Moab Deut. 24. 1. as also we haue Cristoph in Harath, that is in the plaines, to wit of Zabulon. Mach. 5. Adrichomius imagines a City in Zabulon called Araba. a Dei Act. 5. Ser. foli.

It is neither moued nor raised by the wind: nor induceth fish to live in it, or fowle to swimme in it. These things that are cast into it, and the unskilfull of swimming, as well as the skilfull, are borne up by this water. At one time of the yeare it caeth vp Bistumen: the art of gathering which Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of flaps, and the like buisineses.

And then of the Land, hee speaketh in this sort: The fields not farr from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning: of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face as having lost her fruitfulness: for what sower doth either grow or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripeness haue nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus farr Tactius. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe full grow on the banks of this curfed Lake, doe looke faire and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut haue nothing but dust within. Of the Bistumen which this Lake caeth vp, it was by the Greekes called Asphaltitis. Vespaian desirous to bee satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captiues to be cast into it, who were not only unskilfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, and notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sinke.

§. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Countrie within Arnon Reuben possesseth.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Countrie (within Arnon) Reuben possesseth (though not taken from Moab but from Sehon the Amorite) few are knowne. Ianus in the 21. of Numbers verse 14 nameth Vahab, which seemeth to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balac, the sonne of Zippor: which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. Forfeare to contend with Moses by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams curfings or inchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first moued by the Spirit of God, blest Israel contrarie to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to doe him seruice, he aduised Moab to send Madianitish Women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his euill counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Median.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: sauing that we finde in the first of Chro. the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chobseba, and Iasfi, and Sareph, all being of the issue of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, haec prima fuerunt; these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posteritie chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Amimon, and Amalek, mastered Israel and commanded them eightene yeares: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifest, for neither are na-

After this, David himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for hee slaughtered two parts of the people; and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of DAVID. Moab is my wash-pot,auer Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that he would tread downe the Idumians.

1. Reg. 3.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whose name liueth was Mesha: who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the feuerise of Dauid), fastned himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambs, and 200000. Rammes, with the woll: who ruolted againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was inuaded by Iehoram: with whom ioyned the Kings of Juda and Idumaea: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is else-where shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, affited by the Ammonites and Idumians, inuaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some priuate quarrells among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumians, and slaughtered them: and then one againt an other; so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victorie ouer them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Ezerchie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab many descents: for Mesha liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, foureene Kings of Juda comming betweene, who wasted three hundred and odde yeares.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius, attending diligently to those wordes of Moses, Dent. 2. 36. Ab Harabero, qua est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Qumitate ipsa qua est in flumine 3 Where the Citie in the Riuer is distinguished 40 from the Citie vpon the banke of the Riuer, (as also in like manner Ios. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Harober which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Num. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeede seated neare Har of the Moabites, but diuerse from it. For that Har was neuer possess'd by Moses, it is plaine Dent. 2. 9. where God forbidting Moses to touch it, saith he hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to be within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harober, which is said in the same places to be on the banke of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Iunius proueth out of Num. 21. 15. where Arnon is said to bee diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Haris is seated: And the same is confirmed by the 50 place of Ios. 13. 25. where Harober is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seemes, can not be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for the 5^e seate not Harober near it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here wee must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harober.

Iunius refers the name of the Citie Rephan 1. Mach. 37. of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Iulias (according to Iosephus sometimes Bataramphs) the same Iosephus placeth it in the Region of Peraa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peraa, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio anterior, the Countrie beyond the River, and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Peraa take more paines than needes. Fourteene Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosephus. He makes it to haue bene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias in honour of the adoption of Livia, Augustus his Wife, into the Iulian Familie: by which adoption shee was called Iulia. An other Iulias, he saith, was built by Phelip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which hee saith is the same as Bethsaida.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neare to Iulias in Peraa (that is, in the Region ouer Jordan) they finde Peteeabra, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-zabab, which is as much as diuina hisspi. Of a noble Woman of this Citie, which for safe-guard in the time of War with the Romanes, came with many others into Iherusalem, and was there besieged, Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable Historie; how for hunger shee eate her owne child, with other Tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Sucooth (which we said Ios. 13. is placed with Beth-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is plaine by the storie of Gedeon, that it is neare vnto Jordan: where it is said, that as hee was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zebab and Salmunah, hee requested reliefe of the men of Sucooth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gedeons returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a threebling Carre or Tribulum, betweene which and their flesh he put Thornes to tear their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which forth also Dauid vsed some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Sucooth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haile, either for Men or Cattle, Moses Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the originall of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: As also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Aegypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Sucooth: because there they let vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vled after for thirtie yeares in the Wildernesie. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Sucooth or Tabernacles was instituted.

Other foure Citie of Gad are named Ios. 21. 38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaïm, Cheshbon, and Iahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Iahzer, as Cheshbon or Heibon was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence Nam. 32. 1. his Countrie is called the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In later times (as it may be gathered by the prophetic of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay also Hieremie in a like prophetic alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Machabaeus: as it is 1. Mac. 5. 8. where Iunius out of Iosephus reads Iahzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gézer (as he gathereth out of Iosua 16. 3. & 8. and Iud. 1. 29.) was farre from these Countreys of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraïm, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Aegypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Cheshbon it may be meruiled that in the place of Iosua, and 1. Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to haue bene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13. v. 17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Atrichomius and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Cashon 1. Macc. 5. 36. among the Citie of Gilead, taken by Iudas Machabaeus, makes two Citie of one: as if this Cashon had bene the Cheshbon of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betweene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites: for so also it seemeth that that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another by Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaim, which word signifieth a double Araie, we reade Genesis 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angells of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Hoast or companie, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we reade of a multitude of the Hoast of heauen, which appeared to the sheep-sheards, at the time of our Saviours birth: and vnto the Godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when he was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Pends of middle-England, when he was soone after to ioyne battaile appeared: whence the field where the battaile was fought in the North parts of England, is called Heauen-field. In this Citie of Machanaim Dauid abode during the rebellion of Absalom: and the same for the strength thereof Ahner chose for the seat of Ishoboth, during the warre betwene Dauid and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilead, we reade often in the Scripture, for the recouering of which King Ahab lost his life. Ieremie thinks that Ramoth-Mitpha, of which Iosias 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heape, because of the heape of stones which Laban and his sonnes left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitphah, which signifieth ouer-looking (because there they called God to ouer-see and be witness to their covenant) it is plaine by the place Gen. 31. 49. that in these parts there was not only a Towne, but likewise a Region called Mitpha, it appears Exod. 11. 3. where we reade of the Chibuites vnder Hermom, in the Countrie of *Mitpha the Towne of Mitpha, as it seems both by this place and in the eight verse following, being not in the Hill Countrie, but in the valley. But seeing that Iephthas the Iudge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whether his brethren had driuen him) dwelt in this Towne of Mitpha, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Mitpha rather in Gad, than in Manasse. By Iudas Maccabaeus this Towne of Mitpha (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was vterly spoiled and burnt, and all the males of it slaine: for it was then possit of the Ammonites.

Betwene Susoth (of which we haue spoken) and the Riuier Iaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; a place where the face of God was seene: so called for memorie of the Angells appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churfulness of which Citie, in refusing to relieue Gedeon, was the cause that in his returne he ouer-threw their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they adde Rogelim, the Citie of that great and faithfull subiect Berzellai, as it seems, not farre from Madianaima, where he sustained King Dauid, during Absaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Townes of Gadli, Arnor, and Alimis, of which Gadli being in Hebrew no more then Gaditis, is ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnor also no where appears to be the name of a Towne, but still of a Riuier. Alimis Abrichomius frames of in Aquas, 1. Macc. 5. 26. fo that the name should rather be Alenia, but Iunius iud of Iosephus reads Malle, for this in Alimis: and vnderstanding Malle to be put for Malle, and to be taken much as Manitio (as we haue shewed touching the Millo of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malle to be Mitpha Moditarum, of which 1. Sam. 22. 3. As for that Megrib which Abrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mabacath, which Moses noeth to be as farre as the furthest of Manasses out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1. Macc. 5. 10. (which Iunius takes to be * Rithma, of which Nuom. 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territorie of the Ammonites) and in like manner Mannith and

50 Abel vinearum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we reade in Iephthas pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seems by that place of the booke of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other in the East border, both farre removed from the Gadites. But the chief Citie of the Ammonites was nearer, and not farre from

from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbah as Dent. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolome findes in Caleſyria. Hierome and Callyſtus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it comes neuer possit by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummins: which as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickedness infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his ancestors: who having beene first beaten by the Aſſyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had beene) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumians. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Gyants were descended, contend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hebron had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Bajan the Ammonites, and betweene them recovered the best part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabbah or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those Cities and Countries, which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. yeares since that these Zamzummins or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing these two Kings of one kindred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Ammonites, they recovered againe much of their lost possessions, and thruſt the sonnes of Lot ouer the mountaines, and into the Deserts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Perſia and Aſſyria (remembered in the 14. of Geneſis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, so by that great conquest which Moses had ouer those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites, take opportunity to looke back againe into those plaines: and when the Kenbenites, Gadites, and Manassites lorooke the worship of the liuing God, and became loutfull and licentious, they taking the aduantage invaded them, and caſt them out of their possessions: and were sometime their masters, sometime their tributaries, as they pleased: or displeaſed God: and according to the wiſedome and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauid's time, and the inhabitants slain with great ſeueritie, and by diuers torments. At the first assault thereof Urias was shot to death, hauing been by direction from Dauid appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Armie perished: and wherein Dauid lo displeaſed God, as his altaires had ill successe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had Dauid the waigite and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as some expound it, was vsed to be set on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60 pound waigh after the common talent. In the time of Chriſtians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those which Ptolome calleth the hills of Elipus, a Citie of Caleſyria: and Sirabo * Trachones: the same which continue from near Damascus vnto the Deserts of Moab: and receive diuers names as commonly mountaines do, which neighbour and bound diuers Countries: For from the South part, as farre Northwards as Aſeroth the chief Citie of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead, from thence Northward they are knowe by the name of Hermon, for Moses calleth them: so The Sidonians name them Shurion, but the Amorites Shemir, others Seir: of which name all those Hills also were called which part Iudaea and Iamza: and lastly they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These mountaines are very fruitful, and full full of good pastures, and haue many trees which yeeld Balsamum, and many other medicinal drugs. The Riuer of this Tribe are the waters of Ninrah, and Dibon, and the Riuer Iaboc: Others doe also fancie an other Riuer, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

* Other names of this Citie according to Sirachus were Ammon & Aſeroth. - but in this Iudge perhaps hee mistooke, which might seem to be the same Aſeroth, one of the chief Citis of Og, of which in that which remaineth to be spoke of Manassites, Aſeroth was also called Phisagorith, becauſe of the river Iabes winding about it, but in the place 1. Sam. 11. 27. where he gathers this opinion, Iustus reads intercipit or tristis agum, ſiue mult read with others cepi orbam agnam, yet it can not be taken of Rabba it selfe, but of some Fort adjoining a Gen. 14.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites; part of whose Territories the Gadites waime from Oo the King of Bajan.

10 His Tribe of Gad, posselt half the Countrey of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabalthea, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Of Ammorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amerites, who had thrust the Issues of Lot ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othaniel the first Iudge of Israel, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites against the Hebrewes, and so continued long. Iephth Iudge of Israel had a great conquest ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Sannul they were at peace with them againe.

20 Afterward we finde that cruel King of the Ammonites, called Nahas: who besieging Iabes Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tendered so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame vpon Israel) because those Gileadites vving to carrie a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by looting their right, be vtterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may seeme, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in Sauls time, though Iosephus thinks that this Nahas was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Iabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

30 Hanan succeeded Nahas: to whom when Dauid sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aides received from the Saramites subiect to Adadazer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maach, and from Issob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouerturned: their chief Citie of Rabba, after Philadelphus, was taken, the Crowne which waighed a talent of gold was set on Dauids head, all such as were prisoners Dauid equiped with strange ferretie, for with sawes and harrowes, he tare them in peeces, and cast the rest into lime-kills.

40 Ioseph governing Juda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Iotham insort to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeares.

The fift King of the Ammonites of whose name we reade was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Balis sent Ismael of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

of the other halfe of MANASSE.

THe rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Basan, with the Land of Em, and Avogol, or Trachonitis (wherin also were part of the small Territories of Batanea, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Aurantis) was given to the halfe Tribe of Manasse over Jordan, of which those three later Provinces defended themselves against them, for many ages. But Batanea Ptoleme setteth farther off, and to the North-east, as a ðokir of Arabia the Desert: and all these other Provinces before named with Peraa, and Ituraa, he nameth but as part of Calesyria; as farre South as Rabia or Phaladphas: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, saing the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petraea: for many of these small Kingdomes take not much more ground then the Countie of Kent.

Basan, or after the Septuagint Basanitis, stretcheth it selfe from the River of Iaboc to the Machati and Gessuri: and from the Mountaines to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cakes. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of Oakes, which beare milk (of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howe to see Oakes of Basan) and by reason hereof they bred so many Swine, as ^b 2000. in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the vncleane spirit which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threefoore Cities walled and defended: all which after Og and his sonnes were flaine, Iair defended of Manasse conquered, and called the Countie after his owne name, Anoth Iair, or the Cities of Iair.

The principall Cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these; Pella sometimes ^c Butis, otherwise Berenise; by Selencus King of Syria it is said to have beene called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken and in part demolished by Alexander Tannus King of the Jewes: because it refused to obey the Jewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the River of Iaboc, taken by Judas Maccabaeus: where he set on fire the ^e Temple of their Idolls: together with all those that fled thierinto for Sanctuary; and neare it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2. Atac, 12. 22. Then the strong Citie of ^f Ephron neare Jordan: which refusing to yeeld passage to ^g Judas Maccabaeus, was forced by him by assault, and taken, and burnt with great slaughter.

Iabes Gilead, or Iabesur, was an other of the Cities of this halfe Tribe, which being belieged by Nabab ^h King of the Ammonites, was delievered by Saul, as is elsewhere mentioned. In memorie whereof these Citizens ^k recovered, imbalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his Sonnes: which hung despihtfully over the walls of Bethsan or Scythopolis. ^l Gadara or Gadara is next to be named, seated by Plinius on a Hill neare the River Iheromuar, which River Ortelius seemes to thinke to be Iaboc. At the foote of the Hill there spring forth also hot bathes, as at Machatus. Alexander Tannus after ten Moneths siege wan it, and subuerted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinus ^m made it one of the five Countes of Iustice in Palastine. Iherusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath or Amathus the third, Iherice, and Syphra in Galilee the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyrannic of Herode surnamed Isalornita, accused him to Julius Caesar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not preuaile, and that Herode was highly favoured of Caesar, seeking the terrible ⁿ reuenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping ouer high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Seber: in which ^o Iosephus ant. 5. 13. saith, Iephus ⁿ Ioseph 15. Antiq. 13. ^o Of Mispa in Gilthead the Citie of Iephus, see in the Tribe of Gad.

was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Iud. 12. 7. Sepultus est in Civitate sua Gilehad, (for in vna Civitate sua Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a Citie, and to be the same with Selci. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1. Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Cheshon; the same A. Drubonius imagineth it to be ample & firme Galebatitarum Civitas, so of one Citie Hebron or Cheshon, which they call Eschbon, the chief Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, hee imagineth two more: this Casphor in Manasser, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Cashon, of which we have admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a Cammell) which Iosephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Golanitis over against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Iosephus in his fourth booke cap. 1. & 3. of the Iewish warre: where he describes the place by nature to be almost inaincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his owne person, entering it, was at first repulsed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the comming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping downe the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished: besides foure thousand slaine by the Romanes: so that none escaped, save only two women that hid themselves.

About foure miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Iosephus placeth Hippu, or Hippene, whence Ptolomie in vna sua giueth the name to the hills that compaile the plaines in which it standeth: so that it may seeme to have bene of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countrie: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was retailed by Pompey; after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie: It was waied by the Jemes, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation; they were enraged against their borderers.

The next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Ederhi or Ederai, wherein Os King of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: and neare vnto this his Regall Citie; it was that belost the battaile and his life. It stood in S. Hieronime time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from these Townes neare Jordan, in this valley stood Gerasa or Gergessa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the last sonne of Canaan. Of these Gergesites we reade Mat. 8. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where calling the Diuels out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the heard of Hogs: in which storie for Gergesites or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarens: not as if these were all one (for Gergessa or Gerasa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this storie. This Citie received many changes and calamities: of which Iosephus hath often mention. For besides other adventures; it was taken by Of another Ederai in Nephtali, see Mat. 9. 37. Deut. 3. 7. & 10. 11. & 13. 31.

L. Antimus Lieutenant to Vespasian, and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the year 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldvine King of Damascon: and in the same year recovered by Baldvine de Burge King of Iherusalem: and by him vnto the razed. Neare vnto Gerasa is the Village of Magadan, or after the Syriack Magada, or after the Greecke Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a signe from heauen: the same place or some adjoining to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmannitha. By the circumstances of which storie it appeares that this coast lay betwene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countrie of Decapolis: Brochard makes both these places to be one: and findes it to be Phiale, the fountaine of Jordan according to Iosephus: but this Phiale is too farre from the Sea of Galilee, and from Mat. 17. Marc. 8. Broch. st. 2. Of this Phiale see in Magdala. c. 7. p. 4. 7. 3.

Be. h. i. d. a. to be either Magdala or Dalmannitha. For as it appears by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desert of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five Barley loaves and two Fishes. On the North of this Bethsaida they place Tuliac, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iudaea and Trachonitis: and after the name of India, the wife of Tiberius, called Iulias, as hath beene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Iulias, to be the same as Behsaida: Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazin, of which Christ in Matthew; Wee be vnto thee Corazin.

Gen. 14. 5.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Baphaim; and therefore the Countrie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was og, King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1. Mos. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13. 21. it is called to Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Aforesh, which was the Image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deut. signifieth three: Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to haue bene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heres * Pulciantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex reliquis Raphaim; with the words Ios. 13. 12. Og ex reliquis Raphaim: but if the Karnaim (or Karnajim) were these Raphai, the word would not haue bene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis haue said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Karnaim; but either the Raphai 20 in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for perspicuity: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius vnder Brocheria and Breidenbachus placeth Cadai, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This Citie (which he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith; and there that this Citie vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulcher of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Gadai in stead of the word Cadai; which the Pulgar doth vnder that place of Iudith; and ioyntly Carzai and Gabiles. The Canticles; and the 120. Psalme doo rather proue that Cadai was not here about, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Senit & Cadai; it is apparent, and as euiden by the place in the Canticles that they were desolates, much more than any vnder the Climates of the land of Canaan: whence Senit but of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraea, farre from these parts.

Touching the Sepulcher of Iob it is certain that the Arabians and Saraceni (holding those places) haue many things to abuse the Christians; and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed that many (if not all) the historical circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrie seek to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

Of Iob himselfe whether he were the same Iobab (remembered in the 36. of Genesis), descended from Esau, and King also of Idumaea; though Rupertus, Lyuanus, Oleifer, and Bellarmino are of an other opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with Abanathus, Hippelitus, Iranens; Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eusephus & other, cited by S. Hierom in his 126. Epistle to Eugenius, take him for the same.

The Land of Huts or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke Oti, which the Septuagint use for the word Huts, translated by the Pulgar sometime Hus, as Iob. 1. 1. sometime Ashis, as Hierome 2. 5. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palestina and Cochylis, besides Chonathas (or Hamath) vnder Palmirene in the Countrie called by Ptolomeus Trachonitis or Barhanes, the bounds of which Countrie are confounded with Basan in this halfe Tribe of Manasse. And that this Land of Hus was so situated it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Edumites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneous turbans, because their bounds were not not only joyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the wordes of Iheremie, Lamentations 4. 2. 1. speaking of the same prophetic, of which he speaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, mult needes be expounded: as Iunius reads them distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O fuis Edom, à qua habitas in terra Hus 2. 1. 0 Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth Filia Edom que habitas in terra Hus 3 Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edom. For it is very probable that Etsan when he first parted from Jacob did not leave himselfe in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudaea, but inhabited Seir farr to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galad, and Herman, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir, and from this his habitation did Etsan encounter Jacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Etsan his abiding. It is true that at such time as Nabze wandred in the Deserts, that the posteritie of Etsan inhabited Seir to the South of Iudaea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also driue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence forward

Dem 3 9.

30 placed themselves to the South of Iudaea, bordering the Desert Parau, and stretched their habitations ouer the Deserts as farr as Hor where Aram died.
Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinks in his note vpon Gen 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue bene lost: and partly because in Iob 2. 3. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iob's friends, which cometh to be of Iob's owne Countrey, is called a Buzite, of Buz, the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Iheremie 25 in the same continuation (though some other Nations named between)

VVhen the Septuagint call him ex regno assyriae.

30 where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture that in the place of Iob 3. 2. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Familie of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sen, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Iob's friends (which mult needes be this Elihu) was of the posteritie of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressly) and in as much as he readeth not familia Aram, or Ram, but familia Syria: like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

See Exodus 22. noxi.

As for the other three of Iob's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of 40 the Syrian Familie, or of the familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implied that they thought only Elihu to haue bene of Iob's owne Countrey.
Franciscus Brocard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the journey from Acoa Eastward, findeth Suetia, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neare to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Elihu the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the shuchitis were inhabitants of Arabis the Desert, defended of Shuaib the sonne of Abram and Keturah: of whom 50 Gen 32. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Saccæ. So allo he thinketh the Themanites of whom Elihu was, to haue bene of Arabis the Desert: and Elihu himselfe to haue bene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Elihu, which was the sonne of Etsan. And so allo Nahamab whence Tophar the third of Iob's friends (which in this place of Iob 2. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expolitor thought either to be named Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sonnes of Esaui that gave denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamah, which Ios. 15. 41. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I denie not but that near to the Land of Hus, in Basan, as it seemes, in the Tribe of Manasses, there is a Region which at least in latter times was called Sunitis, or of some like name. For this is euident by the Historie of Wilhelmus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vse for the retaining of the whole Countrie: which in the time of Baldwine the second King of Iherusalem was with great digging through rocks recovered 10 by the Christians: hauing not long before been lost to the great disadvantage of the Countrie, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrius described to be sixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius foure miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Behesluthera, Mitpa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitpa of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis super- 20 rior & inferior, oft in Iosephus. Behesluthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basan by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Basra or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Iherome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Astron (as they are called by Iosias) which make the Lake Sanachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midst betwene Casaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth its very large, saith Brachard: otherwise more contract, leauing the marish ground on 30 both sides, for Lions and other wild beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrie of Manasses, Iosephus names two places of strength fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Tewes rebellion: Selenia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauran, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West of which three Cities we reade Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauran, betwene Tsedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis regio, in Iosephus and Tyrius, whose bounds 40 (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mabachath or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses toward the North-east) are vnknowne: only that Gessur was of might, it appears in that Dauid married Mabaca the Daughter of Tholmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked, and vnfortunate Abfalon.

The Historie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Iſraelites that dwelt on the Eaſt of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the citie of Damascus and the diuers fortunes thereof.

AMASCUS of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnes, and the House of pleasures, and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes saith Iosaphus thinke it to haue bene built by Hus the sonne of Cham: of which opinion S. Hierome vpon Esai seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward, a thing very vniklike, seeing the citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. David was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadezer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recouered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principallitie: but David hauing ouerthrowne Hadadezer king of Sophena, (otherwise Syria Saba or Zabab) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, invaded Damascens, and posselt Damascus it selfe, and became an enemy to Salomon all his life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Aegypt from Dauid, and Isaah, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of *Aegypt*s wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning againe became an enemy to Salomon, all his life, and (as some writers affirme) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians & then the Grecians succeeded. This citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Ahanah, and Parpher: where one of them prophane writers call Chryseus ho: the golden riuier. Iunius takes it for Acenis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitfull of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle built as it seemes by the Florentines, after it became Christians: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citie adell. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos; Esai, Ieremy and Zacharias, propheticd that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalassar inuited by Achaz king of Iuda carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leaving of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome vpon Esai: which thing was performed by Salmansar according to Iunius, in his note vpon that place, five yeeres after the prophetic. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolemies; but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Rommes, it was taken by Metellus and Lullius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishoppe: S. Hierome liuing, as he affirmeth vpon the Actes, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens:

being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the yere of our redemption 636. And in the yere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Leves King of France, Baldwin the third King of Iherusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Fredrick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recover Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians they failed of the enterprize.

In the yere 1260. Halon the Tartar incompa it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the wals, and threatned extreme torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Halon was by his father made King thereof.

In the yere 1400. Temberlaine Emperour of the Perthians, invaded that region, and belieged the citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mislaken) He entred it and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners, those that retired into the Castle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adjoining: he forbore the demolishing of the citie in respect of the beautie of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanternes of gold & silver-but while he inuaded Aegypt they againe surprized Damascus. Lailly in his returne after three monethes siege hee fort it; the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercie: But Temberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwarde to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophey of his victory he raised three towers with great Arte, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this was restored and reposselt by the Soldane of Aegypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Aegyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans, and Christians: of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power:

NOW bee it that Damascus were founded by Hus the sonne of Aram. or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Commonwealth till Dauid time. For it stood without the boundes of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Iudges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some regalls, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those partes had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadazer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubai, inhabiting betweene Batanes and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the Northeast parts of the holy land there were three chiefe principalities whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Commonwealth of Israell, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauid and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadazer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadazer when Dauid inuaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth the leader of those succours, which were leued and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 20000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadazer, Rezon, the Commander of his his armie, taking advantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adad-ezer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tobit King of Chamath or Ituræa, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adad-ezer was utterly overthrowne, sendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dole saith S. Hierom; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judaens and Israelites. But to returne to the kings of Syria, I meane of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath or Ituræa, to which I may adde Gylbour, because it is so accounted in the 2. of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is faire greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our latter writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David hauing invaded that region, and left Ioab therein to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed, fled into Egypt: and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister as before, who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Ioab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he returned againe, and as Bonning thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus: and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adad-ezer the sonne of Reboh, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that principalltie: and the first of Adads, who for faking his fathers name, as hee grew powerful, tooke vpon him the stile of Adad, the great God of the Affrians, saith Macrobius, which signified onenesse or Unitie. I also finde a citie called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes tooke the name or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adad-ezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first because it is against him, that David vnderooke the warre: secondly because he leuid 22000. Aramites out of the territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name, thirdly because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adad-ezer was king, was an exceeding large territorie, and contained of Arabia Petræa as farre as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adad-ezer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of SALOMON. Besides the euil that Adad did, the euil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Eli-adad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion, to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmon, or Tabrimmon, to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings. For Asa king of Juda the sonne of Abiam, the sonne of Ioaboa, the sonne of Salomon, being vexed and invaded by Basfus, the successour of Nadab, the sonne of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad, the sonne of Tabrimmon the sonne of Hezion, king of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to inuade Israel (while Basfus sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to blocke him vp, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, hauing recieued his presents, willingly invaded the countrey of Neptalim, and tooke diuers cities, and spoiles thence: Asa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Basfus had brought to fortifie Rama:s withall, and conuerted them to his owne vfe.

This Benhadads father Tabrimmon was in league with Asa: and so was his father Hezion for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabrimmon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Asah, spake as followeth. The Cities which my father tooke from thy father, I will restore restore: and thon shalt make streets or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Basfa, at the request of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab: and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betweene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Basfas time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when he inuaded Basfa, and after that 49. yeeres, ere he was taken by Achab, which make eightie lacking one, it is vnlikely that Benhadad at such an age would make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe, but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolute that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon inuaded Basfa and Omri, and Benhadad the second inuaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad recieued two notorious ouerthrows: the first at Samaria, by a fallie of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphee, where with the like number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 10000. of the Aramites: besides 27000. which were crucified by the fall of the wall of Aphee. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom he redreth those townes, that his father had taken from the predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refuseth to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being deliuered, Achab inuadeth Gilead, and assiegeth the citie, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad fendeth the commandour of his forces called Naaman, to Ioram the sonne of Achab to be healed of the leaprofic, and though Elizeus had healed him: yet he picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besiegeth Samaria againe, and being terrified thence from heauen, he departeth home, and sickneth, and fendeth Azad with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate, if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towers of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successour Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquitie, ignorant faith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeeres are complete since their warres with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael the first king of the race of the Adads of Damascus was anointed by Elisba, or Elisens, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recouer his present sicknesse: He waged warre with Ioram; who receiued diuers woundes at the incounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Ieruzal, he and the King of Iuda, Abasiah, or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azael continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, ouer Jordan. Hee then inuaded Iuda, and tooke Gath, but by gifts from Ious hee was auerted from attempting Iherusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Iehosaphat, Iehoram, and HAZAZIAH his fathers, Kings of Iuda had dedicated; and which he himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord: and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he inuited him to warre vpon Basfa King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betweene Ious and Azael, yet a part of his armie spoiled the other prouinces of Iuda, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azael vexed Iosiah the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie,

§. III.

Of the latter Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

10 After Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: for *Ioa*s king of Israel, the sonne of the vnhappy *Ioa*chaz, as he was foretold by Elysha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three severall battels: and he lost all those cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Isachaz.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others of the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascenus, cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of *Ioa*s recovered Damascus it selfe, to Israhel saith the Geneus, but better in Iuinius, utque recuperabat Damascum, & Chamathem Iehuda p^{ro} Israel, that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chonathis of Iudaea; for these cities sometimes conquered by Dauid, did of right belong to the tribe of Iuda.

20 And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then liuing, of whom there is no Storie. For when as *Iehoa*s the king of the tenne Tribes had thirre ouercome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and had recovered the cities which Hazael had wonne from Israel; and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and hauing nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damascus.

Razin, or Resin, after Iosephus Rafes, after Zonaras Rasfon, the 10. Adad, maketh league with Pekah, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Iuda; both carie away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hiersusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and beating out the Serues, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Tetraphalsar against Razin, who tooke him and beheaded him, and wonne Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

- 1 Adadecer, the sonne of Rehob.
- 2 Resin the sonne of Eliadad, or Razin.
- 3 Hecion.
- 4 Tabremmon.

40 5 Benhadad who inuaded Bascha.

6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achub.

7 Hazael, whom Elysha foretold, with teares, of his aduancement; the same who ouerthrew Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, becaufe that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with *Ioa*s, made the expedition 30. yeeres, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For *Ioa*s began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael tooke Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also forme prooffe that Hazael which tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, becaufe hee could not at that time but be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth the second person in the Kingdome, and Commander of *Benhadad*s men of warre. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded.

8 Benha...

8 Benhadad the third, whom Iosab King of Israel thrise ouerthrew.
 9 Rezin, or Rezin the last, who ioynd with Pekah King of Israel, against Iuda, at which time Achaz King of Iuda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now betwene Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholus Damascena findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but regals, as those of Emath, and Geffur, we finde that Tohu was King of Emath or Chemath in Dauid time, to whom he sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauid's victorie against Adadezer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

p. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought vnder the Assyrians, neuer recovered themselves againe.

F Geffur wee finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his father Ammitur. To Talmai, whose daughter Dauid married, it was that Abulou fled, who was his maternal grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena or Syria, Soba or Calefyria, there are two named, Rebob or Rechob the father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himselfe, and it is plaine that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria (which became so potent, and ioynd Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the desert of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with Dauid, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Achaz King of Iuda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascena, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Memebem governing Israel) who stoop the enterprize of Phal with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seat at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Abaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Israel and Iuda, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and walled in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Iuda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease posselt himselfe of the Cities of Nephtalim: leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanassar, whom Ptolomy calleth Nabonassar, after the rout of Hofes, forced Samaria: and rent that Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hofes, whom Salmanassar ouerturned, happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the daies of Belochus, and the other two in the daies of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanassar his sonne. For Sardanapalus perished, Osar ruling Iuda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolued, Achaz yet liuing.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Iuda it selfe, being attempted by Senacherib, the sonne of Salmanassar in vaine, and preferred for the time by God miraculously, was at length length utterly ouerturned. Hernskem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Samaris: the destruction of Israel beng in the ninth yeere of Hofes: that of Juda in the cleauenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affrya and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria from the eight yeere of Salmassers, to the last of Baltassar, whom Hierodotus calleth Lathynus: in all about 200. yeeres. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successours the Seleusids reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romenes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering vpon the Israelites, with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whose Historie in those ancient times carried an assured face of truth.

Of the Tribe of BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, vnder roof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mispa, Betel, Rama, Gobeh and Gilba.

Of the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfth and youngest sonne of Jacob, whom hee had by Rachel, there were mustred at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the holy Land of their Iliues 45000. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territorie on this side Jordan, betwene Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which Lod and Ono were built by Sheneas a Beniamite: they were all three re inhabitants with Beniamites, after the returne out of captiuitie, as is mentioned, Neh.

Samarim or Temeraim, named of Temera, one of the sonnes of Cansan, was another of their Cities; and further into the Land standeth Tericho, one of the *Toparchie*s, and the last of Juda; seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palme trees: and therefore elsewhere called the Citie of Palmes. From the time of Iofus, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Achab: in whose daies Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iofus; in which and other respects Iof. 12.14. calleth Iofus a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Israhelians, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the Southeast of Tericho stood Halmom of the Leuites, of which Iof. 21.18. To the South Betharba, of which Iof. 15. and e. 18: Then that Gilgal of which there is fo much mention in the Scripture, where Iosua first ate of the fruites of the lande, circumcised all those borne in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passeover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted 10. 5. 9. Ob devolutionem probri Aegyptiaci, because their foreskinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis per circumisionem. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Ios. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Ios. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. * It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two hills Garizim and Hebal: vpon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mispa of Beniamin (of which also we reade oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midd of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason * Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yeerly to giue iudgement to the Israelites: of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was nere Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mispa nere the West sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yeerly to come, is * Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal which was the first place, where the Ark resided, after they past our Jordan: from whence it was carried to Silo: & thence to Kiriath-barim, and at length to Hierusalem: here in Gilgal it was that Iosua pitched vp the twelve stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it, by which Storie, as it is set downe Ios. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed ouer Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mispa, whither also Samuel came yeerly to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held; as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Indas Machabeus gathered the Iewes (when Hierusalem was possesed by the Heathen) as it is 1 Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationis fuerat Mispa antea Israeli. Touching this Mispa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mispa of Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 38. * Mispa of Manasse, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mispa of the Manites, where Dania for a while held himselfe, commending his parents to the King of Assyria, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chief Mispa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Iehusites, and also in the time of the Machabees (as we haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldeys, Gedaliah whom Nabucho donosor left in Ierusa as Governour ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Iewes) he was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall blood of Iuda, as it is Hierem. 41.

Nere vnto this Mispa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hazer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Iullice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Ios. 18. 22.) and how another Citic called Luz nere adjoining to it, was built by the man of the Citic which shewed the entrance to the spies, as it is Iudg. 4. and of the occasion of the name from Iacobs vision: and how

Ierobom

Jerusalem, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it * Beth-aelen, that is, the house of Vanitie Iosif 1. 15. &c. 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them over.

The territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Ieroboaam (of which 2. Chr. 13.) was taken from them, and adjoynted to the Kingdome of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the Storle of Iosia, which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2. Reg. 23. where those coastes 1. Mace. 11. 34. are called Aphas. Rama, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Iewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Hephraam, which Ios. 18. 23. is called Hephraam, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibba, and Gebah. Of the name Rama, * it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim; that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seemes because Mat. 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brechar and Breidenbach make Silo to have beene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Affer, as it seemes, we have testimonie Ios. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthalm Ios. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim 1. Sa. 25. 1. which more often is called * Ramatha, and 1. Sam. 1. 1. Rama in hamb Tophim: for which the Septuagint have Aramatham. Tophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Ioseph of Armathea Mat. 27. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, leate as we said, nere Bethel the uttermost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Basfha in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Asa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because it was nere to Iherusalem, and after the captivitie belonged to Judea, as it appears Esd. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Basfha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adjoyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the tenne Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Juda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. we read that Iosiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idoltry.

The third Citie Gibba which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Judges had almost vterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished Esd. 10. 27. of which word * Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, he imagineth Gabaath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appears Iud. 19. 13. where the Leuit with his wife not able to reach to Rama, tooke up his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1. Sa. 22. 6. it seemes that there was in this Gibba some tower or Citadell called Rama: where Iunio reads in exce Ios. for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings place in this citie, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Naioth. The great Citie of Hir ouerthrowne by Ief, which Ios. 7. 2. is placed nere Beth-aelen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe as is proud Neh. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Ios. 6. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Ios. 8. 28. in salitudinem in inimulam perpetuam; Another

* Borrowing the name of Beniamin to signify the confines of the Kingdome of Juda and Israel betweene Hebr. 7. 2. and 18. 12. See 98 r.

Of this Rama Demetrius understand the place 1. Mace. 11. 34; where it is named for one of the three Præfectures which Demetrius yields to the Iewes out of the country of Samaritan, lying toward the East to Terruband Judea toward the West and Aphrodisias of which Demetrius now we take lying in the middle betweene the two other. A fifth Rama is seen here was in the Tribe of Simon toward the South, which Ios. 9. is called Rama of the South, and otherwise Bakulish Idol.

* Gibba in construction, which is, Gouerning a genitive case is Gabaath whence the Palace out of the Septuagint read Ios. 34. 33. Gabaath Philistinis; for which Iunio in his Index in Philistinis; (for this word is oftentimes an Appellative signifying Hilly) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, builds his Citie Gabaath vpon this Text and placeth it in Beniamin, when as the words indidone note that this Hill was in the Mountaines of Ephraim.

* The word Nethinai, is as much as dasi (as it were a Dise dase) or as Lasias expounds it deditur, it is viced. choron, and in Edom and Chanaan etc.

Citie of cheife note reckoned Ios. 18. 25. in this Tribe was Gibion, the cheife Citie of the Leuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to save their lines, is set downe Ios. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinai or Profelites: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of saving these Gibeonites broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine 2. Sam. 21. 1. This Gibion or Gibson with Almon and Iebah (of both which we haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Ios. 21. 28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Eliathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehem. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-earim: yet by the lamentable tragicdie of bloodshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1. Sam. 21. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the T abernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esa. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migram in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Campe 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Iannath) and there also was Jonathan Macebabeus his aboad. 1. Macc. 9. 73. Of Gisgala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any here in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, hee sailed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I finde no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, and come to the Citie of Hierusalem, and the Princes and Governours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Ios. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

* See in the hither halfe of Manasse.

T hat time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Affirian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the riuier of Iordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hierusalem (when soeuer or by whom soeuer built) was a principall Citie in Iosua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazar the Metropolis (in those daies and before) of all the Cananites. Adonizelek (whom Iosua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusis (the children of Iebus (as the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation rely on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

2. Sam. 5. v. 6.

Dauid after he had by Gods assistance possess'd it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebusalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolima. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and wals, could not any wher in the world be bee exempld : and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foote of depth: cut out of the very rocke : and 250. foote of breadth : whereof the like hath seldom been heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Jewes was cut asunder, Sisibuc King of Egypt, and his predecessour, having bred vp for that purpose, Ahad the Idumean, and Ieroboam, Salomons seruants ; and both married to Aegyptians : the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Sisibuc first inuaded the Territorie of Juda : entred Iherusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoiles which Dauid had gotten from Audazer, Tahm, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sackt and a part of the wall throwne downe by Iouas King of Israel, while Amasiah the twelfth King thereof gouerned Juda. 3. Chron. 12.
2. K. 12. 14.

Not long after Achaz the fifteenth King of Juda impoucrishd the Temple, and presented Teglabphalasar with the treasures thereof. And Manasse the sonne of Ezechiah, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaults made by Ezechiah, to the Embassadors of Merodach, left the remaine, and the very bottoome of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Iosiah then reigning. But this vngratefull, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the Citie euen to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the wals and towers which embraced them, euen and leuell with the dust : carried away the spoiles of the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heauie yooke of bondage and seruitude full 70. yeeres, in somuch as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed vp field, Iherusalem a heape of stone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briers, but (as Hierome speaketh) Euen the birds of the ayre couer'd to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soile. 1. Chron. 5. 26.
2. K. 23. 15.

2. Es. 1. 14.

Then 70. yeeres being expired according to the Prophecie of Daniel, and the Jewes by the grace of Cyrus returned : the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie enough : and the Citie meanly inhabited, and without wals or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeeres, till Nehemiah by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoiled by Bagojes or Vagojes, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes : after by * Ptolemee the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes : and againe by Appollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as he could of that which Pompey spared. 1. Es. 2. 3. trad.
Hec.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompen'd by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberallitie of strangers. Before the captiuitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolemee Lagi to the second Temple, was requir'd by the bountie of his sonne Ptolemee Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Iherusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that vsurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that he left them fairemore stately and glorious than they had beene in the daies of Salomon. 2. Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romanes.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp, by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death; and to punish the Iewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with the Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. Hee began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Passouer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the ciuile dissension, opprest them within the walles; a formidable enemy assailed them without. The Idumaeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be shor, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victorie, eleuen hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe, and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleue that there had bene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towers (workes most magnificent, and ouertopping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might bee the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining after ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining that thereouer became victorious.

After this, such Iewes as were scattered here and there in Iudaea, and other Princes, beganne againe to inhabite some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebel, Aelius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone vpon another, of that vngratefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulcher of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, hee againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Aelia Capisolia. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which hee did in despite of the Iewes Nation: making an Edifice, that they should not from thenceforth euer enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palestine, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres.

It was afterward in the 636. yeere after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeeres.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when hee was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery it remained vnder the successours of Godfrey 88. yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turke call out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cennamobarec, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes bene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the world haue with their inhabitants, in seuerall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impie impetie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slaucric; but hee hath re-unged himselfe of the very places they posselt; of the wals and buildings, yea of the soyle and the beafts that fedde thereon.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect, lost all her fertilitie, and fruitfulness; witnesseth the many hundreds of thousands which it fedde in the dayes of the Kings of Juda and Israell; it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barraine. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beast that belonged 10 to Amelek, no not any small number of them to bee sacrificed to himselfe, neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moucables were also consumed and brought to alhes.

§. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Iewes.

20 The original of the Iewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuersly and inuiously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation.
Diodore and Strabo make them AEgyptians. Others affirme that while Isis governed AEgypt, the people were so increased, as Ierusalem, and Juda ledde thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because hee was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iustine, of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Iewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith hee, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israell. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israell had 30 tenne sonnes, among whom hee diuided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sonnes of Israell he calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in AEgypt, became learned in magical Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith hee) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished AEgypt. Further, hee telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Deserts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seventh day, for this cause euer after obserued the seuenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie 40 out of their owne Tribes, lest discouering their vncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the AEgyptians. These and like fables hath Iustine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them in affirming That in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored.
 But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the first booke of his owne Historie truly confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one onely God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature; and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no nor so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like 50 this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumea, the first parents of the Iewes.

Claudius Iulius drawes them from Judaus, whose parents were Spartan and Thebis, whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedaemonians: challenged kindred of the He- breues: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports

ports seeme to haue been gathered out of diuine letters, though wrested and peruerted, according to the custom of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood, and giuen new names to the Children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the fathers, and leaders of the He- breues: all which finings, as touching the Iewes and their originals, Iosephus against Apion, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebreues were the Children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originally, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarian, deriue the Hebreues or Iewes, from Arabah, hauing mistaken the name of Abra- ham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abraham: for after Jacob, otherwise Isra- el, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Judaans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chief of the Patriarches of the ten Tribes, the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Judaans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this Nation underwent, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Aegyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a pollicie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselves to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before wee intreat, wee are first to speake of their Government vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua:

Of the memorable things that happened in the world, from the death of Iosua to the Warre of Troy:
which was about the time of

I E P H T H A.

¶ I.
of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of OTHONIEL.

WHEN Iosua was now dead, who with the aduise of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: It pleased God to direct the Tribe of Iuda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward established) to vndertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites.

This tyrants crueltie as else-where hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods iust iudgment against himselfe.

The Tribes of Iuda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this inter-regnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Azotus, Aklon, Ekron, and Iherusalem, which they burnt, and the Iebusites afterward reedified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kirjathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set downe in expresse wordes that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authoritie among them: and that hee with the aduise of Phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if any thinke that they proceeded without a chiefe, the good successe which followed their vndertakings witnesseth the contrarie. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appears Ios. 10. 39: that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterprize, he promised his Daughtre Achisab: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behauiour in that seruice was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after.

But while those of Iuda made warre with their borders, from whom they only recouered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) Iud. 1. 19. The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories: in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recouered Berhel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recouer from Dan all the plaine Countries: and fort them to saue themselves in the Mountaines. And now the Israclites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better aduised them in the inter-regnum) did not only ioyne themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead Gods of the Cananites and Amarites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had provoked with their Idolatric, deliuer them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chusban Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure againit them eight yeares, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othniel to bee their Iudge and Leader: who by God assisted, deliuered his bretheren from oppression: and inuorth the Aramites to returne into their owne Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning, after which the Israclites had peace fortie yeares, during all the time of Othniels government. This Othniel is thought by Tostatus to haue bene the younger sonne of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Iudges he is twice called Othniel the sonne of Cenez. Caleb younger brother. Others doe rather interpret those wordes (Caleb younger brother) as if he signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeede it is not likely, that *Caleb*s Daughter should marrie with her owne Vncle; yet it followes not therefore that Othniel should haue bene the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore we may better thinke that he was the Nephew of Caleb (as some learned men expound it) and as the very wordes of Scripture seeme to inforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephuunneth, and Othniel the sonne of Cenez, *Caleb*s younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers sonne; to whom it was not lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cousen German *Caleb*s daughter.

How long it was from the death of Iosuah to the government of Othniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue bene no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laiß was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best writers are of opinion that betweene the times of Iosuah and Othniel that ciuill warre brake out betweene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites wife. For it is written that in those daies there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne cies. And as Iuda led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craued, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to haue bene when Iosuah was dead, and before the government of Othniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent vnder such oppression of Strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attended such a ciuill Warre, if their power had bene as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies,

ð. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

Here liued in this age of Othniel, Pandion or Pandarus, according to Homer, the fifth King of Athens: who beganne to rule in the twentieth yeare of Othniel, and governed fortie yeares. Hee was father to Erichon: his Daughters were Progne and Phlomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius or Liber pater: vnder whom Linus the Musitian liued. In his time time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharfus, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of iron: but Genesis hath taught vs the contrarie, and that Tablaciū long before wrought cunningly both in iron and brasle. Nor long after this time, Amphion and Zeubus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Græcians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus of whose parentage there is a little agreement. Vines vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. Leclantius and Eusebius make him natiu of Attica: and the sonne of Elenus King of Elenus: which Elenus by careful industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boate, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent: who becaue he made exceeding great speede to returne and to relieue his people with Corne; from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the aire.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othomiel, and after him with the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Iuda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused if in these comparisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make them selues so conuerfant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeare when they beganne to rule) haue hit the marke of time of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, becaue the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne works, but coniecture: Secondly, becaue their owne disagreement and contention in those elder daies, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the raignes of Heathen Kings and Princes; but euen in computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seuenite Weekes, and in what not? Where so euer the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue fought by so many waies to vncouer the Sunne, that the daies thereby are made more darke, and the cloudes more condensit than before, I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeare, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a priuate opinion: which I submit to better iudgments. Nam in proficis rebus veritas non ad vnguem quaerenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truths, saies Diadore.

of ENYDS time, and of PROSERPINA, ORITHYA, TEREVS, TANTALVS, TITYVS, ADMETVS, and others that liued about these times.

After the death of Orsonid when Israel fell back to their former Idolatrie, God encouraged Mosab to inuade and suppress them: to performe which he ioyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from) thereby to make them feele the difference betwene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbour Nations, had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perills: within which they were so speedily folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen yeares vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weak man though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguisht, he assured himselfe of the following victorie: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their government, or to choose a King to command, and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassador to Eglon, loaden with presents from Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate access vpon the pretence of some secret to be revealed: he pierst his bodie with a Poniard, made of purple with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For sodainly after his returne, he did repasse Jordan, and inuading the Territorie of Moab, ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 100000 able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Sangar his Successor had miraculously slaine 600. Philistines with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourescore yeares from the death of Orsonid, which terme expired in the Worlds yeare 2691.

In the daies of Ehud Naomi with Eliamelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauielled into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeares which are giuen to Ehud it was that Orcus King of the Molossians: otherwise Pluto, stale Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hippocynnum in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemery, if he mean not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrrhobus with whom Hercules and Theseus ioyned themselves, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrrhobus, and tare him in peeces, and had also wearied Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering of Theseus out of Hell. But Zexes, as I take it, hath written this storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrrhobus saith he, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina, Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrrhobus were both taken, and because Pyrrhobus was the principall in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or enforcement, the one was giuen for food to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner til Hercules by the instigation of Enriphobus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossians which which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus inhabiting near the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines Oeta is one of the most famous, where Heracles burnt himselfe. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Ataropsi in Thessalie: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, saith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erichon, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribethis rape to the North winde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus 10 ranshed Phulomela, of which the fable was devised of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Phulomela from Athens to see her sister, forst her in the passage, and withall cut out her tongue that she might not complain; perswading Progne his Wife that Phulomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercilesse behaviour towards her, Phulomela expressed by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it Progn. In reuenge whereof Progne caused her only Sonne Irys to be cut in peeces, and set before Tereus her husband, (so dressed as it appeared to be some other ordinary foode: of which when he had eaten his fill, shee caused his head, handes, and feete, to be presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speede towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets faied, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed Strabo finds to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias hath built neare the Rocks Mergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to haue bene done (whence also Phulomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes: by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, T that this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryssa, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countie in Greece not farre from Attica a Citie whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good 30 to beleue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens, made that alliance with a neighbour King from whom he might haue succour, rather then with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdom of Odryssa, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue bene partly because, as Pausanias saies: Daulide nec midificans, nec habitans in tota circum regione Hirundines: As if a Swallow remembreing the wrong that was there done to her, and to her sister, did for euer hate that place.

Neare this time Atalampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to 40 Poets please) were made mad by Iano: and thinking themselves to be Kinged into the woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countreys, where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the 47. yeare of Ehud, Troi beganne to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name, about which time Phenome the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delphos, deuided the Hericall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of loue: and some to the covetous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the 50 Sonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Crete. giue him an other Mother. He was said to be the sonne of Iupiter, as some will haue it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more pretious: he caused his owne Sonne to be slaine and dressed for the banquet: of whom Ceres eat part of one of the shoulders:

shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seeke after diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children of all else the most dearest. And where it was deuised, that he had alwaies Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ouid:

Querit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
TANTALVS, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here TANTALVS in water seekes for water, and doth misse,
The fleeing fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the Gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which Storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against contentnesse.

TANTALVS à labijs sitiens fugientia captat Flumina quid vides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting TANTALVS doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is faired of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the Gods to vaine and vnworthie men, that hee was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus.

Because that stealing immortalitye,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owne age to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant that the secrets of Diuinitie, ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneft meates in a soule stomack, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reserved mysterie are often peruerued by an vnclene and desiled minde.

To you it is giuen (saith Christ in MARK) to know the mysterie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without all things be done in parables. So is it said of him, that he expounded all things to his Disciples a-part. And therefore doth Gregori Nicanzenē inferre vpon a place of S. PAVL. Quod si PAVLO licuisset essaries, quorum ipsi cognitionem celum terram & usque ad illud progressio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo nobis aliquod amplius constaret; If PAVL might haue vntere the things, the knowledge whereof the thir'd beuents, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Reulin, thought it not the part of a wife man, Astio hynam experere, aut mysteria, que ita reciperet, ut Sus iuban, & fidem graculus, & inguenta Scarebi:

bus: quare silentium in dixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arca pateficerent, que meditatione facilius, quam loquendo apprehenduntur; To set an Affe to a harpe, or to learne mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a lay a will, or Scarabees and vncleane flies soueraigne ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples: that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learn by meditation than by babling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphic letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their couered meanings.

10 But to proceede with the contemporaries of And, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchemenus; which Elara being beloued of Jupiter, to auoid Juno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where shee was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Cyant, affirms that his bodie occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a loudr lie of his stature out of Homers.

Porrectusq; nouem TITYVS per ingera terra Astribus atro viscere pascit aues.

Hom. Od. 11.

Nine furlongs stretch lies TITYVS, who for his wicked deedes
The hungrie birds with his renewing liuer daily feedes:

This Serabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocia, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

30 Aemetus King of Thessalia liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued as a Heard-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him aduanced; but hauing slaine Ilyacinthus he crosst the Hellspont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, hee was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricke leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid which fairh:

*Ilion apicies, firmatasq; turribus altis
Mœnia, APOLLINEAE structa canore lyra.*

40 Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high Built with the harpe of wife APOLLO's harmonic.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his handes, as hired in this work. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Parisi Ant. 127
Meqariens witness, saith Pausanias.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the daies of Deborah, liued Perses the sonne of Jupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they sailed out of Peloponnesus to seeke their aduenture on Affrica side) Medusa the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakely accompanied as shee hunted, neare the Lake
50 Triton, was surpris'd and slaine: whose beautie when Perses beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beaume whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonish'd which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Cecrops the second of that name and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea or Sthenobia the wife of Praxus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, shee accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Praxus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, between him and his Sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonorable to lay violent handes on him: imployed him against Chimara, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the Gods (as the report is) pitying his innocencie, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung vp of the blood of Adulsa, formerly slaine by the Souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: vpon which beast Bellerophon over-came Chimara: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Aycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arriued to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates, for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to flie vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disclaiming, caused one of his flaming fies to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Celusia, where he died blinde: of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heauen: and being fed in Iupiters owne stable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, that it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocent and vndefered aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high-minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreme hazard, or rather certaine death, he found both deliuerance and honor: but waxing over-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and euer-during miserie. Secondly by others, that vnder the name of Chimara, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her 30 prow a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the steare, of which three beaists this Monster Chimara was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley of such swiftnesse that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the inuention of sailes (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other explications are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimara was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aeneas.

Iou also from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquite of their parent Iauan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue bene about Ebuds time: Homer calls them Jaenes, which hath a neare resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might be so that Iou himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The inuasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him farre more ancient: placing him between the coming out of Aegypt, and the death of Iofua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ebud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

of DEBORAH and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had lived in peace and quietto the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the pler of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, which were witnesses of the former misery, and of Gods delivrance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For plenty and Peace are the parents of idleness; so is securitie as fruitfull in getting and bringing forth both danger and subversion: of which all celtates in the world have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sinnes were a-gaine ripe for punishment, Isabim King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the Territorie of Israel, and having in his service 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty yeares; till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the Prophetesse, who encouraged Israel to leue a force out of Aphthaim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Aphthaim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seem to have proceeded partly from the authority that Barak had among them, being of the same Tribe, and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harseth the chiefe holds of Isabim, were in Aphthaim. So in the daies of Iephtha the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most upon them; as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to delivier Israel from the Midianite: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and relentless, he overthrow by his owne imaginations, the causes of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humilitie of a Beate. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invincible strength, as when he slaughtered the Armie of Sennacherib by his Angel: or as he did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by hail-stones in the time of Iosias: sometimes by the ministerie of men, as when he overthrow the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlosomer, and his companions, by the household seruants of Abraham. He caused the Mosabites and Ammonites to set upon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites; and having slaine them to kill one another in the fight of Iehosaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake unto Barak in these wordes: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Isabim fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Isabim himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgment of all his powerfullnesse, and great mercies, shee sheweth the weak estate wherinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations in these wordes: Was there a shield or speare seene among ten thousand of Israel? he also sheweth how the Israelites were seuered and amased. some of them confined ouer Jordan, and durst not ioyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: the Alberites kept the Sea-coast, and forooke their habitations towards the Land, and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for sicitie, the shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling neare the place of the battaile (be-licke fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Isael the the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent : shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondencie with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them meanes, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes : and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praises and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdom of Argos which had continued 544. yeares was translated to Myceae: The translation of this Kingdome Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lyncus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lyncus diuide the Kingdome : of which Acrisius being eldest hold Argos it selfe: Praxus his brother possesse Ephyra or Corinth, and Tyrnibos, and other Cities with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tyrnibos, which witness Praxus possession, saith Pausanias.

Part. in Corinthiac.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Ladie being exceeding faire, it is said that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other Worthie man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne: who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vniuilingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patriocide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Praxus: and built Myceae. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witty obseruation.

Inclusam DANAEN, turris abenea, that lived in this Age.

DE BORA and Barac being dead the Midianites afflicted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Judge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had inioyed any quiet or prosperitie: the Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatrie.

Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did fo maltre them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to saue themselves, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in harvest time by themselves and the multitude of their cattle destroying all that grew vp: covering the fields as thick as grasshoppers: which seruitude lasted seauen years.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon the sonne of Joash, after ward called Terubbai: whose feare and vnwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprise, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hosts: Each of these 300. by Gideon's appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loude a noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteemed the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and flaine. In his returne the Ephramites began to quarrell with Gideon because hee made warre without their assistance, being then greedie of glorie, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt haue held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a mild answer followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with trauaile, and wearie euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had sau'd themselves by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth sought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes he performed: to wit, that hee would tear the flesh of those of Succoth with T horns and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their bretheren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: I may presume to make coniecture; it seemes likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, and in the way of all inuasions to be made by the Moabites, and Ammonites, and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their owne peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their armie, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laide to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safetie of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrarie successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard, and want, than that such men as they mislike should be the Authors or actors of any glorie or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or wherefoeuer it were that hee refreshed himselfe and his wearie and hungrie Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunitie, and pursued his former victorie to the vttermost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surpris'd them, & slaughtered thereof 15000. remaining: hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall hee tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's bretheren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be flaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request slew them with his owne hands: his Son whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this meruallous victorie, hee tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his bretheren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The deeds of crueltye and mercie are neuer left vnfinished: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth with great and vnusuall torments, so were his owne 70. finnes al, but one, murdered by his owne bastard Abimele. The like Analogie is obscurd by the Rabbinies, in the gratefull of the plagues which God brought vpon the AEgyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to bee slaine, others of them to be cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his armie in the redde sea. And hercof a world of examples might bee giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

10 In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraigntie ouer them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my child reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall doe. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden earrings, which euery man had gotten. For the Ismaelites neighbors, and mixt with the Midianites vsed to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred Shekels of gold, which makes of ours. 2380. liif we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar.

497 And because he conuerted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew like purple, scarlet, and fine linnen belonging to the High Priest onely, and set vp the same in his owne Citie of ophraz or Ephra; which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kinde of Ephod beides this of the High Priests which the Leuites vsed, and so did Dauid when he danced before the Arke: and Sammael while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies: and afterward 15000. which remained, wee may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder; yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughter, and pursuite, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out

30 of Nephtalie, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in the tents behind him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyfe of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There liued with Gideon Aegeu the sonne of Panion, who reigned in Athens: Eurijbew King of Mycenae: Atreu and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurijbew, the Kingdome of Mycenae fell into the hand of Atreu. This is that Atreu who holding his brother in ieaalousie as an attempter both of his wife and crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest did therewith feast their father. But this crueltye was not vnreuerced. For both Atreu and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grandchildren, and all the lineage of Atreu died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue bene done which are written of Dadalus and Icarus. Dadalus they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos King of Crete for succour, where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth like vnto that of AEgypt. Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe, for Paphis the Queene, that he, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cow satisfie her lust, a thing no lesse vnatural than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beaustly spectacle openly before the people of Rome in his Amphitheater; of purpose as may seeme to verifie the olde fable. For so it appears by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnificeth the abhominable shew as a goodly Pageant in those vicious times.

Inuictam Paphlagonem Dilectos credite Tauris

 Nec se miratur Cæsar longæua vetustas
 Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Paphlagon, Servius makes a lesse vnbonelt construction of it, thinking that Dadalus was of her counsell, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who began her with child, and that the being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Minister Minotaur, halfe a Man and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discouered, and Dadalus appointed, to be slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos purified him with boats which had oares onely, Dadalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he outwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new intencion Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold was ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dadalus that he made Images that could moue themselues, and goe, because he carued them with legs, arms and hands, whereas those that preceded him could onely present the bodie and head of those men whom they cared to counterfait, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Pharke who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dadalus found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the sonne of Apollo, & Tersifabre who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. Hee wrate of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of sluing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus are thought to haue beene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthian Armie ledde by Oedipus overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thebes which shee defended, and by Oedipus dissoluing her probleme, his victorie ouer her. Shee was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the bodie of a Lyon for her crueltye. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx were more probable did not the time dispaue it, for he calles her an Amazonite and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the siter of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despiightfull part, with her owne troope shee held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence shee continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He possessed himselfe of Megara by the treason of Sylla, daughter of Ægeus the King. Hee was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus released as shall bee shewed when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thala. In the end hee was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia by Cocalus the King, while hee pursued Dadalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Ilands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the giant, who was said to haue 60. and odd cubites of length, which though Plutarch doth confirme, reporting that there was such a bodie found by Sertorius the Roman in Lybia, where Hercules slew Antæus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lie. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because hee callt for many men to the ground, hee was fained to bee the sonne of the Earth. Plinie saith that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritanis. §. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonauts.

10 About the eleventh yeere of Gideon, was that famous expedition of the Argonauts: of which many fabulous discourses haue bene written, the summe of which is this.

20 Peleus the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Aeson, who was *Iason*s father, reigning in Iolcus a towne of Thessalia, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heede of him that ware but one shoe. This Peleus afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Peleus demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heede: to which question when Iason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colebus, to fetch the golden fleece, Peleus immediately commaunded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing
30 a shippe built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the Council of Pallas: wherein hee procured all the brauest men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhus the Master of the shippe, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telemon and Peleus, sonnes of Aeacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiarau the great Soothsayer, Atleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Alcalaphus and Idomeneus or Almenus the sonnes of Minos, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Laertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgine, Idas and Lyncus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

40 There and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dolonos, which could speake. They arriued first at Lemnos; the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Haucn, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blowes, insomuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by daylight they perceived, with many teares they solemnized his funeral. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Myssia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elateus, who went to seeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

50 Peliphenus built a towne in Myssia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myssia the Argonauts sailed into Ephyrimia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the auncient inhabitants of the Country, ouer whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whole battes, in which kinde of fight hee had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in reuenge of his death flew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him; with great laughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmadesia, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the

the Harpies. The Harpies were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and fowle long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phœnus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Harpies, and then afterwards to aske my Counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be couered, and meat set on; which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Harpies, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this, they drew their swords, and pursued them through the ayre; & some say so that both the Harpies and the young men died of wearinesse in the flight, and pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpies did couenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phœnus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turne Phœnus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withal of the daungerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them into the passage: and if that passed safe, then to aduventure after her: if not, then by no meanes to hazard themselues in vaine. They did so, and perceiuing that the pigeon had only lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, only the end of the poepe was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue stood still: for the Gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a shippe, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Iason a Soothsayer of their company was slaine by a wild boare; also here Typhis died: and Ancus vnderooke to sicare the shippe. So they passed by the riuer Thermosion, and moumt Causus, and came to the riuer Ibasus, which runnes through the land of Colebos. When they were entre the hauen, Iason went to Aetes the King of Colebos, and told him the Commaundment of Pelias, and cause of his comming, desiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Aetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if he alone would yoake together two brazen hoof bulles, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragons teeth, which Mimerus had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These bulles were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Aetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexitie about this Aske, Medea the daughter of Aetes, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priuily to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gaue she to him a medicine wherewith she bad him to annoint both his bodie and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would arise out from the ground, from the teeth which hee should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedie which inconuenience, shee bad him throw stones against them as soone as they came vp thicke, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; whereto when the euent had answered, hee againe demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so farre from approving such his desire, that hee deuided how to destroy the Argonautes, and burne their shippe, which Medea perceiuing, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung vpon an oake in the groue of Mars, where they say it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, hee went with Iason into the shippe Argo; hauing with her, her brother Abysynus.

Aetes vnderstanding the practises of Medea, provided to pursue the ship, whom when when Medea perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, & cutting him in pieces she scattered his limbes in diuerse places, of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his sonne hee buried in a place which thereupon he called Tomus; the Greeke word signifieth Dijision. Afterwards he sent many of his subiectes to seeke the shippe Argo, threatening that if they brought not backe Medea they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonauts were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Jupiter offended with the slaughter of Abfyrus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abfyrides, there the shippe Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them, and said that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Ansonia, and were clenched by Circe, from the murder of Abfyrus. Now they thereupon sayling betwene the coastes of Lybia, and Gallia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Aeaea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. Only Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauished, and carried to Lybiæum in Sicilie to dwell.

Having past the Syrens, they came betwene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoke. But Thetis and the Nereides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie where the beeces of the Sunne were, and touched at Corecyra the Iland of the Phaeaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while the man of Colchis that had bene sent by Aetes in quest of the shippe Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Corecyra, others in the Ilands Abfyrides, and some coming to the Phaeaces, there found the shippe Argo and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if she were not Iason's wife they should haue her, but if shee were already married he would not take her from her husband. Arete the wife of Alcinous hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchis not daring to returne home, stayed with the Phaeaces; so the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland Minos reigned, who had a man of braffe giuen to him (as some of the Fablers say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his boeie reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was clofed vp with a brazen nail, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When hee saw the shippe Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him madd; others that promising to make him immortal, she drew out the nail that stopp his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Pean, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonauts sailed to Aegina where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly from Aegina they sailed by Eubæa and Loeris home to Iolcus, where they arrived, having spent foure whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this iourney of Iason, vnderstand the myserie of the Philosophers Stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also other superfiue Chymists, draw the twelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the golden Fleece, was ment a booke of Parcement which is of sheepeskinne, and therefore called golden; because it was taught therein how other metalls might be transmuted. Others would signifie by Iason wisdom, and moderation, which ouercometh all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Derimus, that the storie of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeed to robbe Colchis, to which they might arrive by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepes falling falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world, and the people there inhabiting use to set many fleeces of wool in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, lands, and Currents, in the passage betweene Greece and the botome of Pantus, are Poetically converted into those ferie bulles, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasse, she Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterranean Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poeticall morralls: all which Homer afterward vsed (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Vlysses his traualles on the same Inland-seas.

Of Abimelech, Tholoh, and Iair, and of the Lapythas, and of Theseus, Hippolytus &c.

FTER the death of Gedeon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had bene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his three perpetuall Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modestie) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraigntie, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe, who being easily moued with the glorie, to have a King of their owne, redily condescended: and the better to inable Abimelech, they borrowd 70. pieces of siluer of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assit his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren the sonnes of Gedeon, begotten on a his wiues, of which he had many, of all which none escaped but Jotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which hee executed on one stone, a crueltie exceeding all that hath bene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euerlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preferuacion of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beaucie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions and affections by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries ofentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane soeuer) which may serue it: remembering nothing, what soeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alleage on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the vnder takers, and rather praiseth the aduerture than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and beganne in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceeded his creation, yet hath the Diuill which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting euery age, and mans condition.

Jotham the youngest of Gedeons sonnes hauing escaped the present perill, fought by his best persuasions to allicate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happie estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had not power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had had appointed them by whome and how to be governed. This hee taught them by the Olive, which contented it selfe with it's fatnesse, the Figge tree with sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraigntie. He also foretold them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an ealie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right ledde on) Gaal the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and maistr'd it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idol Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman, and finding himselfe mortally brused, he commaunded his owne page to pierce his bodie, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by fo feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government, the Lapitha and *Centaur*es made warre against the Thebans. These Nations were defend'd of Apello and were the first in those parts that deuided to mannage horses, to bridle and to fit them: in so much as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plains, those which had neuer scene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Thoba of Issachar governed Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seemeth to be descend'd of Iair the sonne of Mansse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Habob Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is arguement that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

When Iair iudged Israel, Prianus beganne to reigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules lacked Iunio, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ranome, heere built and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy; and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as hee became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, where of leuanteene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helen the wife of Menelaus the cause of the warre which followed.

Thesius the tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptune and Athra: but Plutark in the storie of his life findes him begotten by Aegens, of whom the Grecian sea betwene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so farre as hee forst them to pay him sequen of their sonnes eury yeere for tribute, whom hee indosed within a Labyrinth, to be deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which hee begat on Pasiphæ the Queene, had the charge of them: Among these sequen Thesius thruit himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countrie of that staterie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing posselt himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, hee recieued from her a bottoome of thred, by which hee conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, hee found a readie way to returne. But whereas his father Aegens had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie, hee should vie a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournfull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegon desiring the shippe of Thebesus with a blacke faile cast himselfe ouer the rocks into the sea, afterward called of his name Aegon.

One of the first famous actes of Thebesus, was the killing of Ceryon, who kept a passage betwene Megara and the Peloponnesian isthmus, and threw all whom hee ma-stered into the sea, from the high rocks. Afterward hee did the like to Ceryon, by wrestling, who vsed by that Arte to kill others. Hee also ridde the Country of Procrustes, who vsed to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastned by cordes such as hee rooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by their springing backe tare them afunder. So did hee roote out Periphetes and other mischieuous theetes and murderers. Hee ouerthrew the armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territorie of Athens. The besus hauing taken their Queene Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom after ward his mother in law Phaedra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abate his fathers bed, Phaedra perswaded Thebesus that his sonne offered to force her: after which it is faired that Thebesus besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage sent out his Sea-Caluces, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as striking the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vnderferued destinie, when Phaedra had heard of, shee strangled herselfe. After which it is faired, that Diana entreated Aesculapius to set Hippoly- tus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because hee was chaste, shee ledde him with her into Italye, to accompanie her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and receiued many woundes in forcing his passage and escape; which woundes Aesculapius, to wit, some skilfull Phisic-ian, or Chirurgion healed againe, after which hee past into Italy, where hee liued with Diana, that is the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of these ancient prophane Stories, Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange beastes, birds, and fishes, and with Ma- thematicall lines, so doe the Gracian Historians and Poets, imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses.
True it is, that Thebesus did many great things in imitation of Heracles, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thinne and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deniging them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismus, by the Lawe of Lottes, or names written on shelles, which was a deuice of his owne.

Hee stole Helen (as they say) when shee was 50. yeeres olde, from Aphidna, which Citie Caster and Pollux ouerturned, when they followed after Thebesus to recover their sister. Erasistratus and Pansanius write that Thebesus begat her with child at Argos, where hee erected a Temple to Luana: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to be true, and so doth Ouid, Non tam en ex facti o fructum vult ille petrum &c. The rape Ensebius findes in the first of Iair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeeres, to whom succeeded Iephtha or lepte six yeeres, to whom Isban who ruled Isaen yeeres, and then Habdon eight yeere: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Thebesus had a child by her in the first of Iair, (at which time wee must count her no lesse than fiftene yeere olde, for the women did not commonly beginne so young as they doe now) shee was then at least two and fifty yeere olde at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was hollen by Paris eight and thirtie: but here in the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Ensebius and Bunting with Halicarnassus doe in effect consent, that the Citie was entered, and burnt in the first yeere of Demophoon King of Athens, the successour of Mnesibius, the successour of Theseus, seauenteene dayes before the Summer Tropique, and that about the eleventh of September following, the Troians crost the Hellespont into Thrace, & wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeere, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath it otherwise, that when Polyphides governed Sicily, Mnesibius Athens, Tautanes Assyria, Hadadon Israel, then Aeneas arrived in Italie, transporting with him in twentie shippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and hercof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicily Phalaris the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successours, Adrastus who reigned foure yeeres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair, so is also Mnesibius King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of the two peaceable Iudges, Mureus and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramfies, and afterwards Anememes.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age. Chron. 690. l.

LN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greeke Poet or Historian wrote of. Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this objection.

*Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Remque mundi, semperque aeterna futuro,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troas, Nōn alius alij quoque res eecere potest?*

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer bene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troye last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercoure they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or fow more corne than was necessarie for their sustentance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattel; saying that the golden armour of Glaucus, was worth 100. beccus, and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsuall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenae the principal Citie in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enjoyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in general was very rude it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the pæface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these latter times, idle Chroniclers use when they want good matter, to fill whole bookees with reports of great froites, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to reade, so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monities, of adulterie committed by their Gods, and the mightie men which they begat, without writing, ought that favoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe waetof is this.

Oedippus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, having beene cast fourth when hee was an infant, because an Oracle foretolde what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who hee was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Jocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to bee his mother, hee begat two lonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in processe of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grieuous murder and incest hee had committed, he tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say, that Oedippus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes, because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne one yeere, and the other another yeere; and so by course rule interchangeably: but this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeeres Government resigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeere, hee refused to giue out the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talaus then reigned, into whose palace comming by night, hee was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-houe, on the backside.

There hee met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fledde from Calidon: with whom striuing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyse, came fourth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembered an olde Oracle, by which hee was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestowe his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deiroke vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, hee was desirous among others to carrie Amphiarus the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is said to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastus, did both vterly refuse to bee one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eryphile the wife of Amphiarus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewel, that shee could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betweene Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eryphile, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a woman should, that loued a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was more easie to foresee than auoide destinie, fought such comfort as revenge might afford, giuing in charge to his sonnes, that when they came to fullage, they should kill their mother and make strong ware vpon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which the seauen chief leaders were, himselfe, Amphiarus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in steade of whom some name Meteiscus) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aetolian, and Parthenopaus the Arcadian sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the armie came to the Nemean wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water, she hauing a child in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a spring; but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the child. This woman was Hippolyte the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saued when the women of the Isle slew the males by conspiracie, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her pietie, the Lemnian wiues did sell her to Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Countrey about Nemea, whose young sonne Opheltes or Archemorus, shee did nurse, and lost as is shewed before. When vpon the child's death shee hid herselfe for feare of her maister, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the child, and in memorie of the chauce, did institute solemne funerall games called Nemean, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horte Arion, Tydeus with whorlebars, Amphiarus at running and quouting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laolocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. Thereare, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltes, a Lacedaemonian. Some say by Hercules, when hee had slaine the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set downe.

From Nemea the Argiues marching onwards, arriued at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Couenants betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly resolu'd to holde what hee had, as long as hee could: which Tydeus perceiuing and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, hee made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuie and malice of the people, who laide fiftie men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fiftie hee slew all but one, whome hee sent backeto the Citie as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argiues vnderstood how resolu'd Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seauen gates, which belike stood not farre asunder, being that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very furre stronger, could scarce muster vpon more thousandes then Thebes had gates) did compass the towne. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Cremis, Amphiarus at Proëris, Hippomedon at Anchisis, Parthenopaus at Eleitra, and Polynices at Hypissa. In the meane season, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them,ooke aduise of Tireias the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans, if Menæus the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vowe himselfe to be slaine in honour of Mars the God of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, and so enuious at his Creators glorie, that hee not onely challengeth honours due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Diuine worshippe, but commaundeth vs to offer our selues, and our children vnto him, when hee hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wits with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maides, and children hath hee exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gulles, Germanes, Cyprians, Aegyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduise of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country self contented with an Oxen instead of a man. Tiberius forbad humane sacrifices in Affric: and crucified the Priestes in the gróues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of haye in stead of the living: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue been practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that *Satan*s malice is onely covered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Meneceus as soone as hee vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as hee thought) vpon Mors, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battell fought, wherein the Argines preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walles, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when hee fell or was cast downe, or (as they haue it) was stricken downe by Iupiter with a thunderbolt, the Argines fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteodes and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: where to the two brethren according, slew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Astus behaued themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slewe Hippomedes so which was one of the seuen Princes: Parthenopus being another of the seauen (who was said to haue beene so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidamus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiarus, which hee cruelly tore open and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wound, as should haue made him immortal, refused to bestow it vpon him: where by perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortal did perish through the beauly rage, that hee shewed at his death.

The host of the Argines being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiarus fledde: of whom Amphiarus is said to haue beene swallowed quicke into the earth, nere to the riuer Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so loit out of mens sight, being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carcasses or drowned in the riuer: and his bodie neuer found nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athen; where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recover their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes, after the death of Eteodes, would not suffer the bodies of the Argines to be buried: but caused Antigone, the only daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to be buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the bodie of her brother Polynices, contrary to *Creon*s Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an armie vnder the Conduct of Theseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argines to Sepulture: at which time Euadne the wife of Capaneus, threw herselfe into the fongall fier, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Captaines which were slaine at Thebes, that any lesse reuenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeeres after hauing leuied forces Atigaleus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Theolander of Polynices, and Eurypylus of Mesifenus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alemaan the sonne of Amphiarus: with whom also went his brother Amphilocheus. Apollo promised victorie if Almaan were their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commaunded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the citie, they were incouraged by Laodamas the son of Eteodes then then King of the Thebanes, (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slew Agadus, yet was he hit to the worst, and driven to flee, (or according to Apolodorus slaine by Alemaan). After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuaded themselves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and so began to wand'r vp and downe, till at length they built the Towne called Ephraim. The Argines when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entering into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and laid it walt; howbeit it is reported by some that the Towne was s'ued by Thefsander, the sonne of Polymies, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there raigne ouer them. That hee sau'd the Citee from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for he raign'd there, and led the Thebanes to the Warrre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephtha, and how the three hundred years which hee speaketh of, 1 Iud. 11. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the plates ACT. 13. 20. 1 R. 16. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologi about these times.

20 After the death of Jair (neare about whose times these things happened in Greece, and during whose government, and that of Trolos, Israel liued in peace and in order) they reuolted againe from the Law, and service of God, and became more wicked and Idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Asterah, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adoyning, and embraced the Idols of the Ammites, of the Zidonians, Mozabites, and Ammonites: with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Ammites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now hee scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines.

30 Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppress'd, because they bordered vpon the Ammonites, they were in sort to seeke Iephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because hee was base borne; but hee (notwithstanding those former iniuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of iudicifull hatred and reuenge, was content to leaue the Gileadites to the Warrre, vpon condition that they should establish him their Governour after victorie. And when hee had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disprou'd Ammons right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same preuailing nothing, hee beganne the warrre; and being strengthened by God, ouer-threw them: and did not only beate them out of the plaines, but fortifi'd them ouer the mountaines of Arabis, euen to Minib, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victorie it is said, that he performed the vaine vow, which hee made, to sacrifice the first liuing creature hee encountered, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and only desired two Moneths time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the illnes of her Father ended: but the other opinion that hee was not offered, is more probable; which Berish and others proue sufficiently.
